

Dictionary OF THE Old Testament

Wisdom, Poetry & Writings

Editors: Tremper Longman III & Peter Enns

A COMPENDIUM OF CONTEMPORARY BIBLICAL SCHOLARSHIP

Dictionary

OF THE Old Testament

Wisdom, Poetry & Writings

Editors:

Tremper Longman III

Peter Enns

 IVP Academic
An imprint of InterVarsity Press
Downers Grove, Illinois

InterVarsity Press, USA
P.O. Box 1400, Downers Grove, IL 60515-1426, USA
World Wide Web: www.ivpress.com
Email: email@ivpress.com

©2008 by InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of InterVarsity Press.

InterVarsity Press® , USA, is the book-publishing division of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA®, a student movement active on campus at hundreds of universities, colleges and schools of nursing in the United States of America, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and regional activities, write Public Relations Dept., InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA, 6400 Schroeder Rd., P.O. Box 7895, Madison, WI 53707-7895, or visit the IVCF website at <www.intervarsity.org>.

Inter-Varsity Press, England, is closely linked with the Universities and Colleges Christian Fellowship, a student movement connecting Christian Unions in universities and colleges throughout Great Britain, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. Website: <www.ucf.org.uk>.

All Scripture quotations, unless otherwise indicated, are the author's own translation.

Design: Cindy Kiple

Images: David Playing on his Harp by Peter Paul Reubens, The Barnes Foundation, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA, The Bridgeman Library

ISBN 978-0-8308-6738-7 (digital)

ISBN 978-0-8308-1783-2 (print)

InterVarsity Press

Project Staff

Reference Book Editor/Project Editor

Daniel G. Reid

Managing Editor

Allison Rieck

Copyeditor

Robert G. Maccini

Editorial Assistant

Jeff Reimer

Administrative Support

Taryn Bullis

Design

Cindy Kiple

Design Assistant

Mark Eddy Smith

Artist

Greg Deddo

Typesetters

Gail Munroe

Marj Sire

Maureen Tobey

Proofreaders

Drew Blankman

Keith Williams

InterVarsity Press

Publisher

Robert A. Fryling

Associate Publisher for Editorial

Andrew T. Le Peau

Associate Editorial Director

James Hoover

Production Manager

Anne Gerth

Print Coordinator

Jim Erhart

Contents

Preface	vii
How to Use This Dictionary	ix
Abbreviations	xi
Transliterations	xx
List of Contributors	xxi
Dictionary Articles	1
Scripture Index	942
Subject Index	960
Articles Index	967

Preface

The editors are honored to present the seventh in a series of critically acclaimed IVP Academic dictionaries on the various parts of the biblical canon. By the time we began our work some years ago, we had already benefited personally from the dictionaries that had seen publication. These dictionaries were helpful to our research because they provided a ready summary of the best thinking on the most important subjects in the areas of their coverage, and they advanced the discussion with fresh insights and ideas. We were excited at the prospect of helping to produce the same quality research tool as our predecessors on a part of the canon that has received spotty attention—the Psalms, Wisdom and Writings.

The delineation of this corpus of biblical books is difficult. The first volume in the Old Testament series presents no problem in this regard, the Pentateuch being a clearly defined unit, the Torah of the Hebrew Bible. The Historical Books are a bit more problematic to define since not all the historical books fall into a particular part of the Hebrew or Greek canon. The Former Prophets of the Hebrew canon (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) are all included, but so are Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, which are found in the Writings (Kētûbîm) of the Hebrew canon. One could mount an argument for the inclusion of Ruth and Esther in the Historical Books volume. Nonetheless, they instead are included in our volume in order to treat all the Megillot (or Festal Scrolls: Ruth, Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations and Esther) together. The Megillot and all the other books covered in this volume are from the Writings, though not all the Writings are found here. We have already commented that Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah are in the Historical Books volume, and Daniel will be treated in the forthcoming volume on the Prophets.

After determining which books would be included in this volume, it was necessary to choose what topics would be given article-length treatment. As with previous volumes, each biblical book gets a long article. But a new feature of this volume is that for each book there is also an article focused on its ancient Near Eastern background and on its history of interpretation. Major characters are also the subject of longer treatment as well as the most significant theological themes. Different methods of study are described and then applied to the text. While this list does not capture all the different types of articles in this dictionary, special mention should be made of those articles that cover the literary qualities of the Psalms, Wisdom and Writings. All told, the topics were chosen to give full coverage to the important tools, concepts and content needed for the study and interpretation of these books.

The success of such a project depends mainly on the quality of the contributors, and the editors were extremely fortunate to have had the participation of the leading experts on this corpus of biblical writings. We want to thank the contributors for their hard work, careful research and stimulating writing. One of the advantages of editing a dictionary like this one is that we learned and deepened our own knowledge in the process. We trust that our readers will have the same experience.

Besides the contributors, we want to thank InterVarsity Press and especially Dan Reid, our fellow editor, for his vision for this series and his huge imprint on the final form of this particular book. Further, we thank Robert Maccini, Jeff Reimer, Taryn Bullis and the others who have attended to the production of the book.

Tremper Longman III

Peter Enns

How to Use This Dictionary

Abbreviations

Comprehensive tables of abbreviations for general matters as well as for scholarly, biblical and ancient literature may be found on pages xi-xx.

Authorship of Articles

The authors of articles are indicated by their first initials and last name at the end of each article. A full list of contributors may be found on pages xxi-xxiv, in alphabetical order of their last name. The contribution of each author is listed following their identification.

Bibliographies

A bibliography will be found at the end of each article. The bibliographies include works cited in the articles and other significant related works. Bibliographical entries are listed in alphabetical order by the author's name, and where an author has more than one work cited, they are listed chronologically by date. In articles focused on the biblical books, the bibliographies are divided into the categories "Commentaries" and "Studies."

Cross-References

This Dictionary has been extensively cross-referenced in order to aid readers in making the most of material appearing throughout the volume. Five types of cross-referencing will be found:

1. One-line entries appearing in alphabetical order throughout the Dictionary direct readers to articles where a topic is discussed, often as a subdivision of an article:

ANAT. See CANAANITE GODS AND RELIGION.

2. An asterisk before a word in the body of an article indicates that an article by that title (or closely worded title) appears in the Dictionary. For example, "*David" directs the reader to an article entitled DAVID. Asterisks typically are found only at the first occurrence of a word in an article.

3. A cross-reference appearing within parentheses in the body of an article directs the reader to an article by that title. For example, (see God) directs the reader to an article by that title.

4. Cross-references have been appended to the end of articles, immediately preceding the bibliography, to direct readers to articles significantly related to the subject:

See also DESTRUCTION; HONOR AND SHAME; LAMENT, PSALMS OF; RETRIBUTION; WARFARE IMAGERY.

5. Occasionally references are made to articles in the companion volumes, primarily the Dictionary of the Old Testament: Pentateuch (DOTP) and Dictionary of the Old Testament: Historical Books (DOTHB). Others include Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels (DJG), Dictionary of Paul and His Letters (DPL), Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments (DLNTD) and Dictionary of New Testament Background (DNTB). These references are found within the body of the text of articles. For example, a reference such as (see DOTP, Law) refers to the article on "Law" in the Dictionary of the Old Testament: Pentateuch.

Indexes

Since most of the Dictionary articles cover broad topics in some depth, the Subject Index is intended to assist readers in finding relevant information on narrower topics that might, for instance, appear in a standard Bible dictionary. For example, while there is no article entitled "Vanity," the subject index might direct the reader to pages where vanity is discussed in the article on "Ecclesiastes 1: Book of."

A Scripture Index is provided to assist readers in gaining quick access to the numerous Scripture texts referred to throughout the Dictionary.

An Articles Index found at the end of the Dictionary allows readers to review quickly the breadth of topics covered and select the ones most apt to serve their interests or needs. Those who wish to identify the articles written by specific contributors should consult the list of contributors, where the articles are listed under the name of each contributor.

Transliteration

Hebrew has been transliterated according to the system set out on page xx.

Abbreviations

General Abbreviations

/	parallel text
§ or §§	section or paragraph numbers
Akk	Akkadian
Aram	Aramaic
BCE	Before the Common Era
c.	circa
CE	Common Era
cf.	confer , compare
chap(s).	chapter(s)
contra	against
d.	died
DSS	Dead Sea Scrolls
e.g.,	exempli gratia , for example
esp.	especially
ET	English translation
fem	feminine
fl.	floruit , flourished
frg(s).	fragment(s)
Gk	Greek
Heb	Hebrew
i.e.	id est , that is
Lat	Latin
lit.	literally
masc.	masculine
mg.	margin
MS(S)	manuscript(s)
NT	New Testament
OT	Old Testament
pace	with all due respect to
par.	parallel text(s)
passim	in various places
pl.	plural
repr.	reprint
rev. ed.	revised edition
sg.	singular
Sum	Sumerian
Ugar	Ugaritic
v(v).	verse(s)

Texts and Translations of the Bible

BHK	Biblia Hebraica Kittel	BHS	Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia
BHQ	Biblia Hebraica Quinta	ESV	English Standard Version

GNB	Good News Bible	NET	New English Translation
HSCB	Holman Christian Standard Bible	NIV	New International Version
JB	Jerusalem Bible	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
JPS	The Holy Scriptures according to the Masoretic Text: A New Translation with the Aid of Previous Versions and with Consultation of Jewish Authorities	NJPS	Tanakh: The Holy Scriptures: The New JPS Translation according to the Traditional Hebrew Text
KJV	King James Version	NKJV	New King James Version
LXX	Septuagint	NLT	New Living Translation
MT	Masoretic Text	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
NAB	New American Bible	REB	Revised English Bible
NASB	New American Standard Bible	RSV	Revised Standard Version
NEB	New English Bible	TEV	Today's English Version
		TNIV	Today's New International Version

Books of the Bible

Old Testament	1-2 Kings	Is	Mic	Mk	1-2 Thess
Gen	1-2 Chron	Jer	Nahum	Lk	1-2 Tim
Ex	Ezra	Lam	Hab	Jn	Tit
Lev	Neh	Ezek	Zeph	Acts	Philem
Num	Esther	Dan	Hag	Rom	Heb
Deut	Job	Hos	Zech	1-2 Cor	Jas
Josh	Ps	Joel	Mal	Gal	1-2 Pet
Judg	Prov	Amos		Eph	1-2-3 Jn
Ruth	Eccles	Obad	New Testament	Phil	Jude
1-2 Sam	Song	Jon	Mt	Col	Rev

Ancient Near Eastern Literature

CH	Code of Hammurabi	MAL	Middle Assyrian Laws
CT	Cuneiform Texts from Babylonian Tablets	NBL	Neo-Babylonian Laws
	in the British Museum	RS	Ras Shamra tablet (Field identification of tablets excavated from Ras Shamra [Ugarit] are identified by RS followed by number.)
HL	Hittite Laws
LE	Laws of Eshnunna

Later Jewish Literature

ʿAbot	ʿAbot	m.	Mishnah
ʿAbot R. Nat.	ʿAbot de Rabbi Nathan	Mak.	Makkot
Add Esth	Additions to Esther	Meg.	Megillah
Ag. Ap.	Josephus, Against Apion	Mek.	Mekilta
Ahiqar	Ahiqar	Midr.	Midrash (+ biblical book)
ʿArak.	ʿArakin	Nid.	Niddah
b.	Babylonian Talmud	Pesiq. Rab.	Pesiqta Rabbati
Bar	Baruch	Pesiq. Rab Kah.	Pesiqta de Rab Kahana
B. Bat.	Baba Batra	Pesah.	Pesahim
B. Qam.	Baba Qamma	Ps.-Phoc.	Pseudo-Phocylides
Ber.	Berakot	Pss. Sol.	Psalms of Solomon
Beṣah	Beṣah	Qidd.	Qidduṣin
1 En.	1 Enoch (Ethiopic Apocalypse)	Rab.	Rabbah (+ biblical book)
1-2 Esdr	1-2 Esdras	Šabb.	Šabbat
4 Ezra	4 Ezra	Sanh.	Sanhedrin
Hag.	Ḥagigah	Sipre	Sipre
Hul.	Hullin	Sir	Sirach
Jub.	Jubilees	Sop.	Soperim
J.W.	Josephus, Jewish War	Soṭah	Soṭah
Let. Aris.	Letter of Aristeas	t.	Tosefta

Ta'an.	Ta'anit	Wis	Wisdom of Solomon
Tg. Esth. I, II	First or Second Targum of Esther	y.	Jerusalem Talmud
Tg. Ruth	Targum of Ruth	Yad.	Yadayim
T. Job	Testament of Job	Yebam.	Yebamot
T. Levi	Testament of Levi

Judean Desert Manuscripts

Qumran

1QapGen ar (1Q20)	1QGenesis Apocryphon
1QH ^a	1QHodayot ^a
1QIsa ^a	1QIsaiah ^a
1QpHab	1QPesher to Habakkuk
1QPs ^a (1Q10)	1QPsalms ^a
1QPs ^b (1Q11)	1QPsalms ^b
1QPs ^c (1Q12)	1QPsalms ^c
1QS	1QRule of the Community
2Q18 (2QSir)	2QBen Sira
2QJob (2Q15)	2QJob
2QPs (2Q14)	2QPsalms
2QRuth ^a (2Q16)	2QRuth ^a
2QRuth ^b (2Q17)	2QRuth ^b
3QLam (3Q3)	3QLamentations
3QPs (3Q2)	3QPsalms
4Q380	4QNon-Canonical Psalms A
4Q381	4QNon-Canonical Psalms B
4Q411	4QSapiential Hymn
4Q416	4QInstruction ^b
4Q417	4QInstruction ^c
4Q418	4QInstruction ^d
4Q426	4QSapiential-Hymnic Work A
4Q498	4QHymnic or Sapiential Fragments
4Q525	4QBeatitudes
4Q528	4QHymnic or Sapiential Work B
4QapocrJoshé? (4Q522)	4QProphecy of Joshua
4QapocrLam A (4Q179)	4QApocryphal Lamentations A
4QapocrLam B (4Q501)	4QApocryphal Lamentations B
4QBark Napshi ^a (4Q434)	4QBless, Oh My Soul ^a
4QBark Napshi ^b (4Q435)	4QBless, Oh My Soul ^b
4QBark Napshi ^c (4Q436)	4QBless, Oh My Soul ^c
4QBark Napshi ^d (4Q437)	4QBless, Oh My Soul ^d
4QBark Napshi ^e (4Q438)	4QBless, Oh My Soul ^e
4QCant ^a (4Q106)	4QCanticles ^a
4QCant ^b (4Q107)	4QCanticles ^b
4QCant ^c (4Q108)	4QCanticles ^c
4QIsa ^a (4Q55)	4QIsaiah ^a
4QJob ^a (4Q99)	4QJob ^a
4QJob ^b (4Q100)	4QJob ^b
4QLam (4Q111)	4QLamentations
4Qpaleo-Job ^c (4Q101)	4QpaleoJob ^c
4QProv ^a (4Q102)	4QProverbs ^a
4QProv ^b (4Q103)	4QProverbs ^b
4QPs89 (4Q236)	4QPsalm89
4QPs ^a (4Q83)	4QPsalms ^a
4QPs ^b (4Q84)	4QPsalms ^b
4QPs ^c (4Q85)	4QPsalms ^c
4QPs ^d (4Q86)	4QPsalms ^d
4QPs ^e (4Q87)	4QPsalms ^e
4QPs ^f (4Q88)	4QPsalms ^f
4QPs ^g (4Q89)	4QPsalms ^g

4QPs ^h (4Q90)	4QPsalms ^h
QPs ⁱ (4Q91)	4QPsalms ⁱ
4QPs ^k (4Q92)	4QPsalms ^k
4QPs ^l (4Q93)	4QPsalms ^l
4QPs ^m (4Q94)	4QPsalms ^m
4QPs ⁿ (4Q95)	4QPsalms ⁿ
4QPs ^o (4Q96)	4QPsalms ^o
4QPs ^p (4Q97)	4QPsalms ^p
4QPs ^q (4Q98)	4QPsalms ^q
4QPs ^r (4Q98a)	4QPsalms ^r
4QPs ^s (4Q98b)	4QPsalms ^s
4QPs ^t (4Q98c)	4QPsalms ^t
4QPs ^u (4Q98d)	4QPsalms ^u
4QQoh ^a (4Q109)	4QQohelet ^a
4QQoh ^b (4Q110)	4QQohelet ^b
4QRuth ^a (4Q104)	4QRuth ^a
4QRuth ^b (4Q105)	4QRuth ^b
4QrgJob (4Q157)	4QTargum of Job
5QLam ^a (5Q6)	5QLamentations ^a
5QLam ^b (5Q7)	5QLamentations ^b
5QPs (5Q5)	5QPsalms
6QCant (6Q6)	6QCanticles
6QpapPs? (6Q5)	6QPsalms 78 (?)
8QPs (8Q2)	8QPsalms
11QapocrPs (11Q11)	11QApocryphal Psalms
11QPs ^a (11Q5)	11QPsalms ^a
11QPs ^b (11Q6)	11QPsalms ^b
11QPs ^c (11Q7)	11QPsalms ^c
11QPs ^d (11Q8)	11QPsalms ^d
11QPs ^e (11Q9)	11QPsalms ^e
11QT ^a (11Q19)	11QTemple ^a
11QrgJob (11Q10)	11QTargum of Job
CD-A	Damascus Document ^a

Masada

Mas1e	Psalm ^a
Mas1f	Psalm ^b

Nahal Hever/Seiyal

XHev/Se 4 Ps (= part of 5/6Hev 1b)

Classical and Early Christian Literature

Apos. Con.	Apostolic Constitutions	Rhet.	Rhetorica
1-2 Clem.	1-2 Clement	Athanasius
Did.	Didache	Ep. Marcell.	Epistula ad Marcellinum de interpretatione Psalmorum
Herm. Vis.	Shepherd of Hermas, Vision	Augustine
Ign. Eph.	Ignatius, To the Ephesians	C. Jul. op. imp.	Contra secundam Juliani responsionem imperfectum opus
Ign. Mag.	Ignatius, To the Magnesians	Civ.	De civitate Dei
Ambrose		Enarrat. Ps.	Enarrationes in Psalmos
Fid.	De fide	Pat.	De patientia
Off.	De officiis ministrorum	Serm.	Sermones
Vid.	De viduis	Symb.	De symbolo ad catechumenos
Aristotle		Tract. Ev. Jo.	In Evangelium Johannis tractatus
De an.	De anima	Vid.	De bono viduitatis
Hist. an.	Historia animalium
Metaph.	Metaphysica
Pol.	Politica

Eusebius		Cher.	De cherubim
Hist. eccl.	Historia ecclesiastica	Conf.	De confusione linguarum
Gregory the Great		Contempl.	De vita contemplativa
Moral.	Moralia in Iob	Det.	Quod deterius potiori insidari solet
Herodotus		Deus	Quod Deus sit immutabilis
Hist.	Historiae	Gig.	De gigantibus
Irenaeus		Her.	Quis rerum divinarum heres sit
Haer.	Adversus haereses	Leg.	Legum allegoriae
Jerome		Migr.	De migratione Abrahami
Comm. Eph.	Commentariorum in Epistulam ad Ephesios libri III	Mos.	De vita Mosis
Comm. Habac.	Commentariorum in Habacuc libri II	Opif.	De opificio mundi
Comm. Matt.	Commentariorum in Matthaeum libri IV	Plant.	De plantatione
Epist.	Epistulae	Prov.	De providential
Jo. Hier.	Adversus Joannem Hierosolymitanum liber	QG	Quaestiones et soltuiones in Genesin
Praef. Job	Praefatio Job	Sobr.	De sobrietate
Trac. Ps.	Tractatus sive Homiliae in Psalmos	Somn.	De somniis
Vir. ill.	De viris illustribus	Spec.	De specialibus legibus
John Chrysostom		Plato
Hom. Matt.	Homiliae in Matthaeum	Crat.	Cratylus
Josephus		Resp.	Respublica
Ag. Ap.	Against Apion	Plutarch
Ant.	Jewish Antiquities	Art.	Artaxerxes
Justin Martyr		Quintilian
Dial.	Dialogus cum Tryphone	Inst.	Institutio oratoria
Origen		Sextus
Ep. Afr.	Epistula ad Africanum	Math.	Adversus mathematicos
Fr. Matt.	Fragmenta ex commentaries in evangelium Matthaei	Tertullian
Hom. Ezech.	Homiliae in Ezechielem	Adv. Jud.	Adversus Judaeos
Or.	De oratione	Pat.	De patientia
Philo		Thomas Aquinas
Abr.	De Abrahamo	Expositio	Expositio in Job ad litteram
		Zeno
		Tract.	Tractatus

Periodicals, Reference Works and Serials

ABD	Anchor Bible Dictionary , ed. D. N. Freedman (6 vols.; New York: Doubleday, 1992)	AJSLL	American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literature
ABL	Assyrian and Babylonian Letters Belonging to the Kouyunjik Collections of the British Museum , ed. R. F. Harper (14 vols.; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1892-1914)	ALASP	Abhandlungen zur Literatur Alt-Syrien-Palästinas und Mesopotamiens
ABR	Australian Biblical Review	AmUS	American University Studies
ACCS	Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture	AMD	Ancient Magic and Divination
ACEBT	Amsterdamse cahiers voor exegese van de Bijbel en zijn tradities	AnBib	Analecta biblica
ADPV	Abhandlungen des deutschen Palästina-Vereins	ANEP	The Ancient Near East in Pictures Relating to the Old Testament , ed. J. B. Pritchard (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1954)
AfO	Archiv für Orientforschung	ANET	Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament , ed. J. B. Pritchard (3rd ed.; Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1969)
ACJU	Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums	ANETS	Ancient Near Eastern Texts and Studies
		AnOr	Analecta orientalia
		AOAT	Alter Orient und Altes Testament

AOS	American Oriental Series	BST	Bible Speaks Today
AOTC	Abingdon Old Testament Commentaries	BT	The Bible Translator
AR	Archiv für Religionsgeschichte	BTAT	Beiträge zur Theologie des Alten Testaments
ASORSVS	American Schools of Oriental Research: Special Volume Series	BZARB	Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für altorientalische und biblische Rechtsgeschichte
ArBib	The Aramaic Bible	BZAW	Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft
AS	Assyriological Studies	CAD	The Assyrian Dictionary of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago , ed. E. Reiner et al. (Chicago: Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, 1956-)
ASB	Austin Seminary Bulletin	CAH ²	Cambridge Ancient History , 2nd ed.
ATSAT	Arbeiten zu Text und Sprache im Alten Testament	CahRB	Cahiers de la Revue biblique
AUS	American University Studies	CAT	The Cuneiform Alphabetic Texts from Ugarit, Ras Ibn Hani and Other Places , ed. M. Dietrich, O. Loretz and J. Sanmartín (2nd ed.; ALASP 8; Münster: Ugarit Verlag, 1995)
AUSS	Andrews University Seminary Studies	CBC	Cambridge Bible Commentary
BA	Biblical Archaeologist	CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly
BASOR	Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research	CBQMS	Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series
BAW	Die Bibliothek der alten Welt	CBR	Currents in Biblical Research
BBB	Bonner biblische Beiträge	CC	Continental Commentaries
BBC	Blackwell Bible Commentaries	CCR	Coptic Church Review
BBR	Bulletin for Biblical Research	CCSL	Corpus Christianorum: Series latina
BBRSup	Bulletin for Biblical Research Supplements	CH	Church History
BCOTWP	Baker Commentary on the Old Testament Wisdom and Psalms	CHANE	Culture and History of the Ancient Near East
BDB	F. Brown, S. R. Driver and C. A. Briggs, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1907)	ChrLit	Christianity and Literature
BE	Biblische Enzyklopädie	ConBOT	Coniectanea biblica: Old Testament Series
BEATAJ	Beiträge zur Erforschung des Alten Testaments und des antiken Judentum	ConJ	Concordia Journal
BES	Brown Egyptological Studies	COP	Cambridge Oriental Publications
BETL	Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium	COS	The Context of Scripture , ed. W. W. Hallo (3 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003)
BETS	Bulletin of the Evangelical Theological Society	CRINT	Compendia rerum iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum
BH	Bible Handbook	CSOLC	Cambridge Studies in Oral and Literate Culture
BHB	Bibliotheca Hispana Biblica	CSSCA	Cambridge Studies in Social and Cultural Anthropology
BHT	Beiträge zur historischen Theologie	CThM	Calwer theologische Monographien
Bib	Biblica	CTSRR	College Theology Society Resources in Religion
BibInt	Biblical Interpretation	CurBS	Currents in Research: Biblical Studies
BibOr	Biblica et orientalia	CurTM	Currents in Theology and Mission
BibSem	The Biblical Seminar	DANE	Dictionary of the Ancient Near East , ed. P. Bienkowski and A. Millard (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000)
BIS	Biblical Interpretation Series	DBI	Dictionary of Biblical Imagery , ed. L. Ryken, J. C. Wilhoit and T. Longman III (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1998)
BIW	The Bible in Its World	DDD	Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible , ed. K. van der Toorn, B. Becking and P. W. van der Horst (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995)
BJRL	Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library of Manchester	DDD ²	Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible
BJS	Brown Judaic Studies
BJSUCSD	Biblical and Judaic Studies from the University of California, San Diego
BKAT	Biblischer Kommentar, Altes Testament
BLS	Bible and Literature Series
BMes	Bibliotheca mesopotamica
BMI	The Bible and Its Modern Interpreters
BMW	The Bible in the Modern World
BN	Biblische Notizen
BO	Bibliotheca orientalis
BR	Biblical Research
BRev	Bible Review
BRS	Biblical Resource Series
BSac	Bibliotheca sacra
BSNELC	Bar-Ilan Studies in Near Eastern Language and Culture

	ed. K. van der Toorn, B. Becking and P. W. van der Horst (rev. ed.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999)	GOTR	Greek Orthodox Theological Review
		GPBS	Global Perspectives on Biblical Scholarship
DJD	Discoveries in the Judaean Desert	GTS	Gettysburg Theological Studies
DJG	Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels , ed. J. B. Green and S. McKnight (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992)	HALOT	The Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the Old Testament , L. Koehler, W. Baumgartner and J. J. Stamm (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994-1999)
DLNTD	Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments , ed. R. P. Martin and P. H. Davids (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1997)	HAR	Hebrew Annual Review
		HBI	History of Biblical Interpretation
		HBS	Herders biblische Studien
DNTB	Dictionary of New Testament Background , ed. C. A. Evans and S. E. Porter (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000)	HBT	Horizons in Biblical Theology
		HCOT	Historical Commentary on the Old Testament
DOTHB	Dictionary of the Old Testament: Historical Books , ed. B. T. Arnold and H. G. M. Williamson (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2005)	HKAT	Handkommentar zum Alten Testament
		HO	Handbuch der Orientalistik
		HRel	Homo religiosus
		HS	Hebrew Studies
DOTP	Dictionary of the Old Testament: Pentateuch , ed. T. D. Alexander and D. W. Baker (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2003)	HSM	Harvard Semitic Monographs
		HTKAT	Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Alten Testament
		HTR	Harvard Theological Review
DPL	Dictionary of Paul and His Letters , ed. G. F. Hawthorne and R. P. Martin (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1993)	HTS	Harvard Theological Studies
		HUCA	Hebrew Union College Annual
DSD	Dead Sea Discoveries	HUCASup	Hebrew Union College Annual Supplements
DTIB	Dictionary for Theological Interpretation of the Bible , ed. K. J. Vanhoozer (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2005)	HvTSt	Hervornde Teologiese Studies
		IBC	Interpretation: A Bible Commentary for Teaching and Preaching
EBib	Études bibliques	IBT	Interpreting Biblical Texts
ECC	Eerdmans Critical Commentary	ICC	International Critical Commentary
EDSS	The Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls , ed. L. H. Schiffman and J. C. VanderKam (2 vols.; Oxford: Oxford University Press)	IDB	The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible , ed. G. A. Buttrick (4 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1962)
		IDBSup	Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible: Supplementary Volume , ed. K. Crim (Nashville: Abingdon, 1976)
EgT	Église et théologie	IEJ	Israel Exploration Journal
EH	Europäische Hochschulschriften	IJT	Indian Journal of Theology
EHAT	Exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Testament	ILBS	Indiana Literary Biblical Series
EncJud	Encyclopaedia Judaica (16 vols.; Jerusalem: Encyclopaedia Judaica, 1972)	Int	Interpretation
EstBib	Estudios biblicos	IRT	Issues in Religion and Theology
ETL	Ephemerides theologicae lovaniensis	ISBL	Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature
EuroJTh	European Journal of Theology	ISFCJ	University of South Florida International Studies in Formative Christianity and Judaism
EvJ	Evangelical Journal
EvQ	Evangelical Quarterly	JAAR	Journal of the American Academy of Religion
FAT	Forschungen zum Alten Testament	JAB	Journal for the Aramaic Bible
FC	Fathers of the Church	JANESCU	Journal of the Ancient Near Eastern Society of Columbia University
FCB	Feminist Companion to the Bible	JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society
FCI	Foundations of Contemporary Interpretation	JBC	Journal of Biblical Counseling
FGH	Die Fragmente der griechischen Historiker , ed. F. Jacoby (Leiden: 1954-1964)	JBL	Journal of Biblical Literature
FBBS	Facet Books: Biblical Series	JBLMS	Journal of Biblical Literature Monograph Series
GAP	Guides to Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha	JBQ	Jewish Bible Quarterly
GAT	Grundrisse zum Alten Testament	JBR	Journal of Bible and Religion
GBS	Guides to Biblical Scholarship	JBT	Jahrbuch für biblische Theologie
GD	Gorgias Dissertations	JCS	Journal of Cuneiform Studies
GKC	Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar , ed. E. Kautzsch, trans. A. E. Cowley (2nd ed.; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1910)	JE	The Jewish Encyclopedia (12 vols.; New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1916)

JEA	Journal of Egyptian Archaeology	NACSBT	New American Commentary Studies in Bible and Theology
JEN	Joint Expedition with the Iraq Museum at Nuzi	NCBC	New Century Bible Commentary
JETS	Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society	NEA	Near Eastern Archaeology
JHNES	Johns Hopkins Near Eastern Studies	NIB	The New Interpreter's Bible , ed. L. E. Keck et al. (12 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1994-2002)
JNES	Journal of Near Eastern Studies	NICOT	New International Commentary on the Old Testament
JOTT	Journal of Translation and Textlinguistics	NIDBT	New International Dictionary of Biblical Theology , ed. T. D. Alexander and B. S. Rosner (Leicester, UK: Inter-Varsity Press; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000)
JPSBC	Jewish Publication Society Bible Commentary	NIDNTT	New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology , ed. C. Brown (4 vols.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1975-1985)
JQR	Jewish Quarterly Review	NIDOTTE	New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis , ed. W. A. VanGemeren (5 vols.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1997)
JR	Journal of Religion	NIVAC	NIV Application Commentary
JRAS	Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society	NovTSup	Novum Testamentum Supplements
JRT	Journal of Religious Thought	NSBT	New Studies in Biblical Theology
JSJ	Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic, and Roman Periods	OBO	Orbis biblicus et orientalis
JSJSup	Supplements to the Journal for the Study of Judaism	OBS	Oxford Bible Series
JSNTSup	Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series	OBT	Overtures to Biblical Theology
JSOT	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament	OCBC	Oxford Church Bible Commentary
JSOTSup	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament: Supplement Series	OEAE	The Oxford Encyclopedia of Ancient Egypt , ed. D. B. Redford (3 vols.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001)
JSPSup	Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha: Supplement Series	OEANE	The Oxford Encyclopedia of Archaeology in the Near East , ed. E. M. Meyers (5 vols.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997)
JSS	Journal of Semitic Studies	OF	Orate Fratres
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies	OLA	Orientalia Iovaniensa analecta
JTSA	Journal of Theology for Southern Africa	Or	Orientalia
JudChr	Judaica et Christiana	OTE	Old Testament Essays
KAI	Kanaanäische und aramäische Inschriften , ed. H. Donner and W. Röllig (2nd ed.; 3 vols. in 1; Wiesbaden: Otto Harrasowitz, 1966-1969)	OTG	Old Testament Guides
KTU	Die keilalphabetischen Texte aus Ugarit , ed. M. Dietrich, O. Loretz and J. Sanmartín (AOAT 24/1; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchner Verlag, 1976)	OTL	Old Testament Library
LACTOR	London Association of Classical Teachers: Original Records	OTM	Oxford Theological Monographs
LAI	Library of Ancient Israel	OTP	Old Testament Pseudepigrapha , ed. J. H. Charlesworth (2 vols.; Garden City: NY: Doubleday: 1983)
LAPO	Littératures anciennes du Proche-Orient	OTR	Old Testament Readings
LBS	Library of Biblical Studies	OTS	Old Testament Studies
LCBI	Literary Currents in Biblical Interpretation	OtSt	Oudtestamentische studiën
LCFF	Language, Culture and Female Future	PÄ	Probleme der Ägyptologie
LCL	Loeb Classical Library	PBM	Paternoster Biblical Monographs
LDSS	The Literature of the Dead Sea Scrolls	PFES	Publications of the Finnish Exegetical Society
LHBOTS	Library of Hebrew Bible/Old Testament Studies	PL	Patrologia Latina [= Patrologiae cursus completus: Series latina], ed. J.-P. Migne (217 vols.; Paris: 1844-1864)
LOS	London Oriental Series	PRSt	Perspectives in Religious Studies
LOT	The Literature of the Old Testament	PTR	Princeton Theological Review
LT	Literature and Theology	PTSDSSP	The Princeton Theological Seminary Dead Sea Scrolls Project
LUÅ	Lunds universitets årsskrift	RA	Revue d'assyriologie et d'archéologie orientale
MAD	Materials for the Assyrian Dictionary	RB	Revue biblique
MBPS	Mellen Biblical Press Series	RD	Religions and Discourse
MDOG	Mitteilungen der Deutschen Orient-Gesellschaft
MGWJ	Monatschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft Judentums
MLBS	Mercer Library of Biblical Studies
MNTS	McMaster New Testament Studies
NAC	New American Commentary

RelSRev	Religious Studies Review
RevExp	Review and Expositor	SHR	Ancient Near East
RevQ	Revue de Qumran		Studies in the History of Religions (supplement to Numen)
RLA	Reallexikon der Assyriologie , ed. E. Eberling et al. (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1928-)	SHS	Scripture and Hermeneutics Series
RNBC	Readings: A New Biblical Commentary	SIDIC	Journal of the Service internationale de documentation judeo-chrétienne
RS	Ras Shamra	SJCA	Studies in Judaism and Christianity in Antiquity
RSCT	Rutherford Studies in Contemporary Theology	SJOT	Scandinavian Journal of the Old Testament
RSR	Recherches de science religieuse	SJT	Scottish Journal of Theology
RT	Religion and Theology	SOTBT	Studies in Old Testament Biblical Theology
RTP	Revue de théologie et de philosophie	SPOT	Studies on Personalities in the Old Testament
SAA	State Archives of Assyria	SPRTS	Scholars Press Reprints and Translations Series
SAIS	Studies in the Aramaic Interpretation of Scripture	SPSM	Studia Pohl: Series maior
SANT	Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testaments	SR	Studies in Religion
SAOC	Studies in Ancient Oriental Civilization	SSN	Studia semitica neerlandica
SBAW	Sitzungsberichte der bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften	SSU	Studia semitica upsaliensia
SBEC	Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity	STDJ	Studies on the Texts of the Desert of Judah
SBET	Scottish Bulletin of Evangelical Theology	STL	Studia theologica Lundensia
SBL	Studies in Biblical Literature	StOR	Studies in Oriental Religions
SBLAB	Society of Biblical Literature Academia Biblica	SubBi	Subsidia biblica
SBLABS	Society of Biblical Literature Archaeology and Biblical Studies	SUSTU	Studia Universitatis S. Thomae in Urbe
SBLDS	Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series	SWBA	The Social World of Biblical Antiquity
SBLEJL	Society of Biblical Literature Early Judaism and Its Literature	SuwJT	Southwestern Journal of Theology
SBLMS	Society of Biblical Literature Monograph Series	TA	Tel Aviv
SBLSCS	Society of Biblical Literature Septuagint and Cognate Series	TCAAS	Transactions of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences
SBLSP	Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers	TCS	Texts from Cuneiform Sources
SBLSS	Society of Biblical Literature Semeia Studies	TDOT	Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament , ed. G. J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974-)
SBLSymS	Society of Biblical Literature Symposium Studies	TE	Theological Education
SBLTT	Society of Biblical Literature Texts and Translations	TGUOS	Transactions of the Glasgow University Oriental Society
SBLWAW	Society of Biblical Literature Writings from the Ancient World	THAT	Theologisches Handwörterbuch zum Alten Testament , ed. E. Jenni, with C. Westermann (2 vols.; Munich: Kaiser; Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1971-1976)
SBLWGW	Society of Biblical Literature Writings from the Greco-Roman World	Them	Themelios
SBM	Stuttgarter biblische Monographien	ThSt	Theologische Studien
SBS	Stuttgarter Bibelstudien	ThTo	Theology Today
SBT	Studies in Biblical Theology	ThWAT	Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Alten Testament , ed. G. J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1970-)
ScrCon	Scripture in Context	TLOT	Theological Lexicon of the Old Testament , ed. E. Jenni, with C. Westermann (3 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997)
SDSSRL	Studies in the Dead Sea Scrolls and Related Literature	TLZ	Theologische Literaturzeitung
SEÅ	Svensk exegetisk årsbok	TOTC	Tyndale Old Testament Commentaries
SFCT	Series on Formative Contemporary Thinkers	TRu	Theologische Rundschau
SGKIO	Studien zur Geschichte und Kultur des islamischen Orients	TS	Theological Studies
SHANE	Studies in the History of the Ancient Near East	TThSt	Trierer theologische Studien
SHBC	Smith & Helwys Bible Commentary	TW	Theologische Wissenschaft
SHCANE	Studies in the History and Culture of the	TynBul	Tyndale Bulletin
		UBL	Ugaritisch-biblische Literatur
		UBSMS	United Bible Societies Monograph Series
		UCOP	University of Cambridge Oriental

UCPSP	Publications University of California Publications in Semitic Philology	WTJ	Westminster Theological Journal
UF	Ugarit-Forschungen	YNER	Yale Near Eastern Researches
VC	Vigiliae christianae	YJS	Yale Judaica Series
VF	Verkündigung und Forschung	YOS	Yale Oriental Series, Texts
VT	Vetus Testamentum	ZABR	Zeitschrift für altorientalische und biblische Rechtsgeschichte
VTSup	Vetus Testamentum Supplements	ZAH	Zeitschrift für Althebräistik
WBC	Word Biblical Commentary	ZAW	Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft
WBT	Word Biblical Themes	ZBK	Zürcher Bibelkommentare
WestBC	Westminster Bible Companion	ZDMG	Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft
WF	Wege der Forschung	ZDPV	Zeitschrift des deutschen Palästina-Vereins
WMANT	Wissenschaftliche Monographien zum Alten und Neuen Testament	ZTK	Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche

Transliteration of Hebrew

Consonants		Short Vowels	Long Vowels
א = ʾ	ל = l	א = a	(א)ֿ = â
ב = b	מ, ׀ = m	ב = e	בֿ = ê
ג = g	נ, ׀ = n	ג = i	גֿ = î
ד = d	ס = s	ד = o	דֿ = ô
ה = h	ט = ʿ	ה = u	הֿ = û
ו = w	פ, ׀ = p		וֿ = ā
ז = z	צ, ׀ = ʂ	Very Short Vowels	זֿ = ē
ח = ḥ	ק = q	ח = ă	חֿ = ō
ט = ʔ	ר = r	ט = ě
י = y	ש = ś	י = ě (if vocal)
כ, ׀ = k	ת = t	יֿ = ǒ

Contributors

- Allen, Joel S., PhD. Adjunct Faculty at Union College, Biblical Studies Instructor at Appalachian Local Pastor's School, First United Methodist Church, Barbourville, Kentucky: Job 3: History of Interpretation.
- Beaton, Richard, PhD. Associate Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Song of Songs 3: History of Interpretation.
- Belcher, Richard P., Jr., PhD. Professor of Old Testament, Reformed Theological Seminary, Charlotte, North Carolina: Suffering; Thanksgiving, Psalms of.
- Block, Daniel I., DPhil. Gunther H. Knoedler Professor of Old Testament, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois: Ruth 1: Book of.
- Boda, Mark J., PhD. Professor of Old Testament, McMaster Divinity College; Professor, Faculty of Theology, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada: Lamentations 1: Book of.
- Branch, Robin Gallaher, PhD. Professor, Crichton College, Memphis, Tennessee: Women.
- Brooking, Clark H., ThM. PhD candidate, Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, Ohio: Ahasuerus.
- Brown, Walter E., PhD. Professor of Old Testament and Hebrew, New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, New Orleans, Louisiana: Oral Poetry.
- Broyles, Craig C., PhD. Professor of Religious Studies, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada: Lament, Psalms of.
- Brueggemann, Dale A., PhD. Director, Eurasia Education Services, Springfield, Missouri: Protection Imagery; Psalms 4: Titles.
- Bullock, C. Hassell, PhD. Franklin S. Dyrness Chair of Biblical Studies and Professor of Old Testament, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois: Ethics.
- Cook, John A., PhD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky: Hebrew Language.
- Creach, Jerome, PhD. Robert C. Holland Professor of Old Testament, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: Cult, Worship: Psalms.
- Davies, John A., PhD. Principal, Presbyterian Theological Centre, Sydney, New South Wales, Australia: Folly; Theodicy.
- Davies, Peter., BD. Senior Old Testament lecturer, Regents Theological College, Nantwich, United Kingdom: Animal Imagery.
- deSilva, David A., PhD. Trustees' Distinguished Professor of New Testament and Greek, Ashland Theological Seminary, Ashland, Ohio: Honor and Shame.
- Dombrowski, Justin, MA. PhD student, Classical Studies, Columbia University, New York, New York: Esther 3: History of Interpretation.
- Edwards, Timothy M., DPhil. Lector (Biblical Hebrew), Oxford Centre for Hebrew and Jewish Studies, Oxford, United Kingdom: Targumim.
- Enns, Peter, PhD. Professor of Old Testament and Hermeneutics, Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Ecclesiastes 1: Book of; Wisdom of Solomon.
- Estes, Daniel J., PhD. Distinguished Professor of Bible, Cedarville University, Cedarville, Ohio: Wisdom and Biblical Theology.
- Fantuzzo, Christopher J., MDiv, PhD candidate, University of Gloucestershire, United Kingdom: Acrostic.
- Ferris, Paul W., Jr., PhD. Professor of Hebrew Bible; Lead Faculty, MDiv & MA (TS) degree programs, Bethel Seminary, St. Paul, Minnesota: Lamentations 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background.
- Firth, David G., PhD. Lecturer in Old Testament, Cliff College, Calver, Derbyshire, United Kingdom: Ambiguity; Asaph and Sons of Korah.
- Futato, Mark D., PhD. Robert L. Maclellan Professor of Old Testament, Reformed Theological Seminary, Orlando, Florida: Confidence, Psalms of; Hymns.
- Garrett, Duane A., PhD. John R. Sampey Professor of Old Testament Interpretation, The Southern Baptist University, Louisville, Kentucky: Dis-

- course in Proverbs; Proverbs 3: History of Interpretation.
- Goldingay, John, PhD. David Allan Hubbard Professor of Old Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Hermeneutics.
- Grant, Jamie A., PhD. Lecturer in Biblical Studies, Highland Theological College, Dingwall, Scotland: Editorial Criticism; Kingship Psalms; Royal Court; Wisdom and Covenant; Wisdom Poems.
- Gregory, Bradley C. PhD candidate, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Indiana: Megillot and Festivals; Purim; Wisdom and Apocalyptic.
- Hamilton, James M., PhD. Assistant Professor of Biblical Studies, Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary's Houston Park Place Campus, Houston, Texas: Divine Presence; Theophany.
- Hartley, John E., PhD. Distinguished Professor of Old Testament, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California: Job 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background.
- Heider, George C., PhD. Associate Professor of Theology, Valparaiso University, Valparaiso, Indiana: Marriage and Sex.
- Heim, Knut M., PhD. Lecturer in Biblical Studies, The Queen's Foundation for Ecumenical Theological Education, Birmingham, West Midlands, United Kingdom: Wordplay.
- Heiser, Michael S., PhD. Academic Editor, Logos Bible Software, Bellingham, Washington: Divine Council.
- Hess, Richard S., PhD. Earl S. Kalland Professor of Old Testament and Semitic Languages, Denver Seminary, Littleton, Colorado: Floral Imagery; Scribes; Wisdom Sources.
- Hildebrandt, Ted A., ThD. Full Professor of Biblical Studies, Gordon College, Wenham, Massachusetts: Proverb, Genre of.
- Hubbard, Robert L., Jr., PhD. Professor of Biblical Literature, North Park Theological Seminary, Chicago, Illinois: Kinsman Redeemer and Levi-rate.
- Irwin, Brian P., PhD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament/Hebrew Scriptures, Knox College, Toronto School of Theology, Toronto, Ontario, Canada: Ruth 3: History of Interpretation.
- Jackson, David R., PhD. Head of Biblical Studies, William Carey Christian School (and Honorary Associate, Macquarie University), Sydney, New South Wales, Australia: Solomon.
- Jobes, Karen H., PhD. Gerald F. Hawthorne Professor of New Testament Greek and Exegesis, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois: Esther 1: Book of; Esther 2: Extrabiblical Background; Esther 4: Additions; Esther 5: Greek Versions.
- Johnston, Philip S., PhD. Tutor in Old Testament and Hebrew, Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, United Kingdom: Afterlife.
- Kelle, Brad E., PhD. Associate Professor of Old Testament and Hebrew, Point Loma Nazarene University, San Diego, California: Warfare Imagery.
- Kim, Koowon. PhD candidate, University of Chicago, Chicago, Illinois: Lemuel and Agur.
- Kitchen, Kenneth A., PhD. Personal and Brunner Professor Emeritus of Egyptology, University of Liverpool, Liverpool, United Kingdom: Maat; Proverbs 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background.
- Klingbeil, Gerald A., DLitt. Dean of the Theological Seminary, Professor of Hebrew Bible and Ancient Near Eastern Studies, Theological Seminary, Adventist International Institute of Advanced Studies, Silang, Cavite, Philippines: Ecclesiastes 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background; Wisdom and History.
- Klingbeil, Martin G., DLitt. Professor of Old Testament and Ancient Near Eastern Studies and Vice-President: Academic Administration, Helderberg College, Somerset West, Western Cape, South Africa: Psalms 5: Iconography.
- Klouda, Sheri L., PhD. Assistant Professor of Biblical Studies, Taylor University, Upland, Indiana: Zion.
- Koptak, Paul E., PhD. Paul and Bernice Brandel Professor of Communication and Biblical Interpretation, North Park Theological Seminary, Chicago, Illinois: Intertextuality; Personification.
- Kwakkel, Gert, PhD. Professor of Old Testament, Theologische Universiteit van de Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland (vrijgemaakt), Kampen, The Netherlands: Righteousness.
- LeMon, Joel M., PhD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament/Hebrew Bible, Candler School of Theology, Emory University, Atlanta, Georgia: Parallelism.
- Long, Gary A., PhD. Professor of Hebrew Bible and Ancient Near Eastern Studies, Bethel Uni-

- versity, St. Paul, Minnesota: Song of Songs 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background.
- Longman, Tremper, III, PhD. Robert H. Gundry Professor of Biblical Studies, Westmont College, Santa Barbara, California: Disputation; Ecclesiastes 3: History of Interpretation; Fear of the Lord; Inclusio; Job 4: Person; Merism; Messiah; Proverbs 1: Book of; Psalms 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background; Refrain; Sound Patterns; Stanza, Strophe; Terseness; Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly.
- Lucas, Ernest C., PhD. Vice-Principal and Tutor in Biblical Studies, Bristol Baptist College, Bristol, England: Poetics, Terminology of; Wisdom Theology.
- Mabie, Frederick J., PhD. Associate Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Studies, Multnomah Biblical Seminary, Portland, Oregon: Chaos and Death; Destruction.
- Magdalene, F. Rachel, JD, PhD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament, Augustana College, Rock Island, IL: Law.
- Matthews, Victor H., PhD. Professor of Religious Studies and Associate Dean of the College of Humanities and Public Affairs, Missouri State University, Springfield, Missouri: Social-Scientific Approaches.
- McConnell, Walter L., III, PhD. Previously Lecturer in Old Testament and Hebrew, Singapore Bible College, Singapore: Meter; Worship.
- McKnight, Scot, PhD. Karl A. Olsson Professor in Religious Studies, North Park University, Chicago, Illinois: Salvation and Deliverance, Images of.
- Meier, Samuel A., PhD. Associate Professor of Hebrew, Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio: Imprisonment Imagery.
- Millard, Alan R., M.Phil. Emeritus Rankin Professor of Hebrew and Ancient Semitic Languages, The University of Liverpool, Liverpool, England: Sages, Schools, Education.
- Miller, Cynthia L., PhD. Professor, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wisconsin: Ellipsis.
- Moore, Erika, PhD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament and Hebrew, Trinity Episcopal School for Ministry, Ambridge, Pennsylvania: Ruth 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background.
- O'Dowd, Ryan, PhD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament, Briercrest College and Seminary, Carleton Place, Ontario, Canada: Creation Imagery; Frame Narrative.
- Oswalt, John N., PhD. Research Professor of Old Testament, Wesley Biblical Seminary, Jackson, Mississippi: God.
- Overland, Paul B., PhD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament and Semitic Languages, Ashland Theological Seminary, Ashland, Ohio: Chiasm; Rhetorical Criticism.
- Perdue, Leo G., PhD. Professor of Hebrew Bible, Brite Divinity School, Texas Christian University, Fort Worth, Texas: Cult, Worship; Wisdom.
- Phillips, Elaine A., PhD. Professor of Biblical and Theological Studies, Gordon College, Wenham, Massachusetts: Esther 6: Person; Mordecai; Novella, Story, Narrative.
- Phua, Leong Cheng Michael, PhD. Lecturer, Singapore Bible College: Architectural Imagery; Sirach, Book of.
- Pickut, William, MA. PhD student, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Illinois: Lamentations 3: History of Interpretation.
- Pitkänen, Pekka, PhD. Course Leader and Lecturer, Open Theological College, School of Humanities, University of Gloucestershire, Cheltenham, Gloucestershire, United Kingdom: Historical Criticism.
- Pokrifka, Junia, PhD. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, School of Theology, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California: Life, Imagery of.
- Pokrifka, Todd, PhD. Lecturer in Theology, School of Theology, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California: Time.
- Rankin, Jeffrey J., PhD. Assistant professor, College of Christian Studies, North Greenville University, Tigerville, South Carolina: Oral Poetry.
- Rata, Tiberius, PhD., Professor of Old Testament Studies, Grace Theological Seminary, Winona Lake, Indiana: David.
- Schifferdecker, Kathryn M., ThD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament, Luther Seminary, St. Paul, Minnesota: Creation Theology.
- Schwab, George M., PhD. Professor of Old Testament, Erskine Theological Seminary, Due West, South Carolina: Song of Songs 1: Book of; Wasf.
- Seevers, Boyd, PhD. Professor of Old Testament Studies, Northwestern College, St. Paul, Minnesota: Remembrance.
- Shields, Martin A., PhD. Sydney, Australia: Autobi-

- ography; Qohelet; Wisdom and Prophecy.
- Stallman, Robert C., PhD. Professor of Bible & Hebrew Northwest University, Kirkland, Washington: Music, Song.
- Strawn, Brent A., PhD. Associate Professor of Old Testament, Candler School of Theology/Emory University, Atlanta, Georgia: Imagery; Imprecation; Lyric Poetry; Parallelism.
- Swanson, Dwight D., PhD. Senior Lecturer in Biblical Studies, Nazarene Theological College, Manchester, England: Dead Sea Scrolls.
- Sweeney, Marvin A., PhD. Professor of Hebrew Bible, Claremont School of Theology, and Professor of Religion, Claremont Graduate University, Claremont, California: Form Criticism.
- Tiemeyer, Lena-Sofia, D.Phil. Lecturer in Old Testament and Hebrew Language, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, Scotland, United Kingdom: Feminist Interpretation.
- Tucker, W. Dennis, Jr., PhD. Associate Professor of Christian Scriptures and Associate Dean for Academic Affairs, George W. Truett Theological Seminary, Baylor University, Waco, Texas: Psalms 1: Book of.
- Ulrich, Dean R., PhD. Baden, Pennsylvania: Boaz; Naomi; Ruth 4: Person.
- VanGemeren, Willem A., PhD. Professor of Old Testament and Semitic Languages, Director of the PhD in Theological Studies, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois: Mountain Imagery.
- Wahlen, Clinton L., PhD. Professor of New Testament and Associate Director, Biblical Research Institute, General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, Silver Spring, Maryland: Wisdom, Greek.
- Walton, John H., PhD. Professor of Old Testament, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois: Job 1: Book of; Retribution; Satan.
- Wegner, Paul D., PhD. Professor of Old Testament, Phoenix Seminary, Phoenix, Arizona: Text, Textual Criticism.
- Wells, Bruce, PhD. Assistant professor of Hebrew Bible, St. Joseph's University, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Law.
- Williamson, Paul R., PhD. Lecturer in Old Testament, Moore College, Newtown, New South Wales, Australia: Canon.
- Wray Beal, Lissa M., PhD. Associate Professor of Old Testament, Providence Theological Seminary, Otterburne, Manitoba, Canada: Psalms 3: History of Interpretation.
- Yamauchi, Edwin M., PhD. Professor of History Emeritus, Miami University, Oxford, Ohio: Susa; Vashti.

A

ACCUSER. See SATAN.

ANTHROPOLOGY. See WISDOM THEOLOGY.

ACROSTIC

Acrostic is the term commonly applied to a composition in verse in which the initial letters of successive lines or stanzas are intentionally chosen either to outline a deliberate message (e.g., “Jesus Christ, God’s Son, Savior” [ichthys, “fish”] in Sib. Or. 8:218-250) or to observe a traditional downward sequence of letters of the alphabet (e.g., from ’ālep to tāw in Ps 145). Acrostic can also specify the design itself, an artistic technique employed by biblical writers in poems of various genres. As a technique, it demonstrates that biblical Hebrew poetry has its disciplines, accenting the perennial tension in religious expression between freedom and constraint; although *parallelism may be biblical poetry’s chief characteristic, in poems that follow this design, acrostic is the chief constraint. Nevertheless, most will agree with Muilenburg (103): “What is notable about this ancient poetry is that such an artificial contrivance does not stand in the way of producing literature of a high order, in which the emotions find full expression and the language bodies forth the intensity and passion of the poet.”

Acrostic is both a creative technique of biblical Hebrew poetry and the broad label for a limited number of carefully crafted canonical poems that, in a variety of ways, effectively employ this technique. The acrostic technique provides a precise design for the poet, facilitating a recital of verse capable of captivating the audience and enabling the listener to follow the movement of the poem from beginning to end. In compositions such as Psalm 119 and Lamentations 3 the listener detects the acrostic pattern effortlessly—a definite appeal is made to the ear. But an acrostic composition, which presupposes not only the invention of the Hebrew alef-bet but also a literate milieu, was intended for appreciation in written form, whereby appeal is made to the eye.

1. The Hebrew Alef-Bet
2. Types and Canonical Examples
3. Function

1. The Hebrew Alef-Bet.

Several suggestions have been offered to account for the derivation of this technique. One straightforward explanation is that the form arose indigenously in the literate milieu set off by the alphabetic revolution as creative writers developed techniques consistent with their own form of writing.

Mesopotamian cuneiform and Egyptian hieroglyphics antedate the simplification and reduction of graphemes that took place with the introduction of Semitic alphabets (the earliest nonalphabetic examples are message acrostics; the parade example is The Babylonian Theodicy [COS 1.154:492-95]). From writing systems of hundreds of signs, the alphabetic revolution produced systems of less than thirty consonantal signs, easily memorized in a basic order. The Semitic alphabets originated with Proto-Canaanite (eighteenth-seventeenth centuries BC) and continued with Phoenician writing. From the Phoenician system, the Paleo-Hebrew script (c. 800 BC) was developed. Even though the Hebrew language did not adopt the familiar Aramaic script until after the Babylonian exile, the basic Northwest Semitic order is already found in Ugaritic cuneiform (fourteenth century BC).

This revolution affected all aspects of society, affording new opportunities for literary expression in three areas highlighted by A. Demsky (364): (1) the organization of information and the placing of objects in their proper alphabetic (or numerical) order; (2) the expression of the mysterious and magical or a reference to the divine (cf. Rev 1:8; 22:13); (3) aesthetics as expressed in writing alphabetic acrostic poetry.

Consequently, the earlier view that biblical acrostic technique was imported from the Hellenistic environment no longer prevails. The Greek alphabetic writing system itself developed from the Phoenician system, and in the absence of extensive evidence in Phoenician poetry, it cannot be supposed that alphabetic acrostics came to the Greeks from the Phoenicians (Craigie, 130). Alphabetic acrostic poetry probably developed indigenously in the literatures of both languages. Furthermore, the discoveries of Ugaritic alphabet texts (KTU 7.5) and beginner's exercise tablets in Proto-Canaanite script demonstrate that the alphabet was thought of abstractly; that is, scribes familiar with the alphabet taught a basic order of letters to their pupils, leading to the literate milieu in which alphabetic acrostic poetry was composed. That this state of affairs existed in ancient Hebrew society suggests that an early indigenous development provides the broad context within which to appreciate the design and function of canonical acrostic poetry.

2. Types and Canonical Examples.

Canonical examples of alphabetic sequence acrostics are found throughout the OT; there are none in the NT. The canonical examples include Psalms 9; 10; 25; 34; 37; 111; 112; 119; 145; Proverbs 31:10-31; Lamentations 1—4 (cf. 11QPs^a 21-22, which shows that Sir 51:13-30 [Heb] is an alphabetic acrostic poem; Nah 1:2-8 will not be discussed in this volume). Though limited in number, significant dissimilarities between the canonical acrostics display the considerable versatility of the biblical writers.

2.1. Complete Alphabetic.

2.1.1. One Letter per Line. Psalm 145 is a *hymn of praise to God the king (cf. Ps 111). Apart from a missing nûn line, the complete alef-bet appears in successive bicola. Without inserting the nûn line, forty-four cola (including the final monocolon) make up the poem, suggesting that the omission was intentional. Most manuscripts of the MT do not have it, but one Hebrew manuscript, supported by the LXX, Syriac and 11QPs^a, does offer a nûn line nearly identical to the sādê (šdq) line, except that it begins with n'mn ("[The LORD] is faithful," Niphal of mn [cf. Ps 145:17 MT]). This justifies its classification as a complete alphabetic acrostic.

Proverbs 31:10-31, praising the noble wife, is part of the "Sayings of *Lemuel" (Prov 31:1-31). Although renowned for its complete acrostic structure, it is also noteworthy for its arrangement in two halves (Prov 31:10-20 [ālep-kāp]) with thirty-six bicola, two tricola (Prov. 31:15 [wāw]; Prov 31:30 [šin]) and a chiasmic quatrain (Prov. 31:19-20 [yôd-kāp]).

2.1.2. One Letter per Half-line. Psalm 111 is a hymn of *thanksgiving; Psalm 112, a wisdom psalm, is closely modeled after it, elaborating specifically on Psalm 111:10. Vocabulary and expressions are borrowed from it to depict the blessings enjoyed by the one who fears the Lord. Both psalms begin with halēlû yāh, followed by cola each beginning with a new letter of the alef-bet. Parallelism of bicola and tricola, *chiasmus, *inclusio and word pairs contribute to the skillful composition.

2.1.3. Stanzaic. Psalm 37 is a *wisdom poem. The alphabetic sequence is followed, but a new acrostic letter begins only the first line of each stanza. The basic unit has two bicola, but hêt has six (three bicola [Ps 37:14-15]) and nûn has five (two lines [Ps 37:25-26]). The sequence is obscured slightly by a preposition at ‘ayin (lē‘ōlām [Ps 37:28b]) and a conjunction at tāw (ūtēšû‘at [Ps 37:39]).

Psalm 119, a massive didactic wisdom poem, is a repeating stanzaic acrostic. Each of the twenty-two consonants of the alef-bet is represented eight times at line-initial position, forming eight-line stanzas. The number of lines corresponds to eight synonyms, distributed throughout the poem, which exalt Torah (cf. Pss 1; 19; 42): tôrâ ("Torah" [25x]), dābār ("word" [24x]), mšpāḥim ("rulings" [23x]), ‘ēdūt ("laws" [23x]), mišwâ ("commandment" [22x]), huqim ("statutes" [21x]), piqqûdim ("charges" [21x]) and ‘imrâ ("sayings" [19x]). These synonyms are distributed throughout 176 lines (with eighteen tricola); in six stanzas all eight terms occur together, and no one stanza contains less than six.

In gravity and literary quality, nothing compares to the artistic achievement of *Lamentations (as a whole, it is larger than Ps 119). Chapters 1 and 2 are stanzaic acrostics; the initial word of each stanza begins with an acrostic letter from ʾālep to tāw (cf. Ps 37). There are three bicola per stanza, except for zayin (chap. 1), a quatrain. Chapter 4 displays the same acrostic pattern, only this time each stanza consists of two bicola. Chapter 3 is the unique central section. Now the initial acrostic consonant appears at the beginning of each line. This intensification in the design of chapter 3 indicates the high point of the book (cf. Lam 3:22-24 MT [hêt]), fading again in chapter 4 and disappearing entirely in chapter 5 (nonalphabetic). Exploring external parallelism between the five distinct poems, J. Renkema (379) suggests that by the external parallelism of their language and content, identical letter stanzas form song responses enabling the reader to visualize the parallel (responsive) design of the whole.

2.2. Incomplete Alphabetic. Two individual psalms “of David,” Psalm 25 (a *lament) and Psalm 34 (a hymn of thanksgiving), unique omit the wāw line and, in addition to the pê line within the poem, include a second pê line after tāw. Thus, a total of twenty-two lines is maintained, and each psalm expresses a concluding concern for corporate redemption (pādā). What is more, this convention makes lāmed the middle letter; hence, ʾālep-lāmed-pê—the three consonants in the name of the first letter of the alef-bet—are found at the beginning, middle and end of the series. The resulting verbal root means “learn” (cf. Prov 22:25 MT). The reader is hereby exhorted to learn the insights that the psalmist passed on (cf. Ps 51:15 MT).

Considered conjointly, Psalms 9 and 10 are individual laments that form an uneven, partially obscured acrostic from ʾālep to tāw. Psalm 9 ends with kāp; however, dālet is missing (Ps 9:7 MT). Psalm 10 is less complete, containing a broken sequence from lāmed to tāw: mēm, nūn and sāmek are missing (Ps 10:2-6 MT), as is šādē (Ps 10:10 MT). Noting the interrelation of the themes, commentators suggest an interpretation on two levels: (1) the level of the initial texts; (2) the unity. There is precedent in a few Hebrew manuscripts and the LXX, which treat them as a literary unity.

2.3. Irregularities of Alphabetic Arrangement. Psalms 9–10 share an irregularity with Lamentations 2–4: pê comes before ʾayin. In 1962 N. K. Gottwald (24) labeled this “a curious and unexpected disturbance of alphabetic order.” Although the evidence weighed against this transposed pê-ʾayin order, he prudently refrained from dismissing it as sloppy editing. Instead, he suggested that the thrice-occurring order was the “normal” order; the ʾayin-pê order of chapter 1 was the more likely scribal slip. Evidence arrived in 1977 with the discovery of the Izbet Sartah ostrakon (c. 1200 BC), a beginner’s exercise tablet in Proto-Canaanite script containing an alphabet of twenty-two letters with ʾayin and pê transposed. Triple abecedaries in Hebrew script from Kuntilet Ajrud (early eighth century BC) provided corroborating evidence. That these are no child’s error becomes evident when one considers the biblical acrostics. The pê-ʾayin order, then, represents a secondary Israelite scribal tradition of ordering the letters.

2.4. Nonalphabetic Acrostics. In a nonalphabetic acrostic the number of lines matches the number of consonants in the alphabet. Such poems of twenty-two lines do not appear coincidental; rather, they suggest that the alphabetic sequence offered a suitable design numerically as well as linguistically. This has been demonstrated by D. N. Freedman, whose methodology for counting syllables and stress indicates that the range of deviation and abnormality perceived in the canonical examples of biblical acrostic was a deliberate or intended element. Moreover, nonalphabetic acrostics indicate that poets increasingly sought freedom from the constraint of the alphabet by deliberately designing poems with a total number of syllables equal to the total number of lines in half-line, one-line and double-line alphabetic acrostics. The following poems build on this basic foundation of twenty-two lines: Psalms 33; 38; 94; 103; Proverbs 2; 5; 8:1-11, 12-21, 22-31, 32-35; 9:1-18; Lamentations 5.

3. Function.

Following Freedman, we see that the acrostic technique is a poetic constraint analogous to the familiar forms of English versification (couplets, quatrains, stanzas, sonnet, villanelle and sestina). Like these basic forms, the acrostic form provides the poet with a robust design suited to engage an audience attentive to the grouping and spacing of sounds. By means of technique, eye and ear are “charmed by the familiar, yet aroused and captivated by the unexpected” (Watson, 33). Yet acrostic is not merely ornamental; it is part of the communicative process. Put another way, what a poem says is the result of how it is said.

The following suggestions have been offered to explain the function of acrostic technique.

3.1. Magic. In his study of Lamentations, Gottwald (25) assessed this explanation sensibly: "By studying the magical ideas associated with language we may undoubtedly learn something about the origin of the alphabet and the acrostic, but any direct transfer to Lamentations is doubtful." Indeed, there is no evidence that any of the biblical acrostics have a magical or occult purpose.

3.2. Pedagogy. The aforementioned poems share a didactic quality; alphabetic acrostics certainly were in use as didactic method, and they are closely associated with the wisdom tradition (cf. Prov 31:10-31; Sir 51:13-30). But the function of each poem must be understood on its own terms. To view Lamentations, for instance, as a device for practice in writing and the imitation of literary technique may miss the point, given the occasion and solemnity of its message. Besides, the more complex canonical acrostics suggest that they did not share the basic function of, say, The New English Primer, commended "for the more easy attaining the true reading of English."

3.3. Mnemonic Aid. The mnemonic view also suggests that acrostics had a practical purpose. Again, the complex features of the canonical acrostics militate against it. Incompleteness (missing letters), alternate ordering, irregular patterning, intricacies of style (e.g., the 'ālep-lāmed-pê pattern in Pss 25; 34) and even the sheer length of poems (e.g., Ps 119; Lam 1—5) point in a different direction.

3.4. Display of Skill. Once this design is chosen, poets are forced to use their skill in a special way. Thus, the interplay between structural constraint and creative expression may account for most of the deviations from the standard sequence. The technique displays the poet's prowess; yet, this explanation too fails to explain why acrostic was chosen as a design for communication.

3.5. Completeness. Perhaps the most acceptable view is the one derived from that of Gottwald (28): "If the subject is to be exhausted, the alphabet alone can suffice to suggest and symbolize the totality striven after." This solution, along with display of skill (see 3.4 above), best accounts for the biblical usage. An acrostic is complete, "from A to Z"; yet, an acrostic limits, providing closure, assuring the reader that enough has been said. Incapable of being comprehensive, the poet, by this design, can effectively express the incomprehensible. Religious expression calls for liberty with discipline.

What is more, the alphabet belongs to a people, and language is an important aspect of a people's identity. The alphabetic acrostic is the perfect form for expressing corporate praise and lament coram Deo. Its semantic import is corporate yet individual, cultural yet theological. F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp (18) writes, "The poet has chosen language as his means of consolation and there is no better symbol of the power and potential of language than the alphabetic acrostic, modeled most likely on the simple abecedaries that were a commonplace in scribal schools. The alphabet stands, as well, as the paradigm symbol of culture and civilization in the ancient Near East, and thus its prominence in these poems profoundly reasserts the values of civilization and culture even in the face of utterly devastating and dehumanizing suffering."

This attractive explanation of the acrostics of Lamentations can be extended profitably to other canonical examples.

See also HEBREW LANGUAGE; LAMENTATIONS 1: BOOK OF; LYRIC POETRY; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF; PSALMS 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. F. Brug, "Biblical Acrostics and Their Relationship to Other Ancient Near Eastern Acrostics," in The Bible in the Light of Cuneiform Literature: Scripture in Context III, ed. W. W. Hallo, B. W. Jones, and G. L. Mattingly (ANETS 8; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1990) 283-304; A. R. Ceresko, "The ABCs of Wisdom in Psalm XXXIV," VT 35 (1985) 99-104; P. C. Craigie, Psalms 1-50 (WBC 19; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); A. Demsky, "Abecedaries," COS 1.107:362-65; F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Lamentations (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 2002); D. N. Freedman, "Non-acrostic Alphabetic Psalms," in The Book of Psalms: Composition and Reception, ed. P. W. Flint and P. D. Miller (VTSup 99; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005) 87-96; N. K. Gottwald, Studies in the Book of Lamentations (rev. ed.; SBT 14; London: SCM, 1962); J. Muilenburg, "A Study in Hebrew Rhetoric: Repetition and Style," in Congress Volume: Copenhagen, 1953 (VTSup 1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1953) 97-111; J. Renkema, "The Meaning of the Parallel Acrostics in Lamentations," VT 45 (1995) 379-83; W. Soll, "Acrostic," ABD 1:58-60; W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (repr., London: T & T Clark International, 2004 [1986]). C. J. Fantuzzo

ADDITIONS TO ESTHER. See ESTHER 4: ADDITIONS.

AFTERLIFE

The OT books of wisdom, poetry and writings largely reflect the standard Israelite perspective that there is no meaningful existence beyond death. However, a few texts may indicate an emerging hope in some form of continued communion with God, which later developed into a belief in afterlife.

1. Traditional View of Death
2. Alternative Views of Afterlife?

1. Traditional View of Death.

For most of the OT, death leads to a shadowy, insubstantial existence in the underworld, called Sheol. There, all are reduced to somnolent inactivity, with no prospect of improvement or escape (Job 3:17-20; 7:9; 17:16 [despite Job's hypothetical wish in Job 14:13]). In particular, the underworld's denizens are cut off from Yahweh and can no longer offer praise or petition: "In death there is no memory of you; in Sheol who will praise you?" (Ps 6:5 [cf. Ps 88:5]). Thus persistence in Sheol is closer to "non-life" than afterlife (so Murphy, 102).

Many psalms assert that this life is the only forum for relationship with Yahweh. Psalm 116:15 boldly asserts that the rupture caused by death even affects Yahweh himself. However, a few texts imply that the underworld is not hidden from Yahweh (Job 26:6; Ps 139:8). Although these do not posit any meaningful contact with the dead, they may hint at alternative views, albeit faintly.

Poetry in psalms and wisdom is by nature evocative and elusive, and their references to death reveal as much about its emotional impact as its conceptualization. Death is portrayed variously—for example, as an enemy that ensnares its prey (Ps 18:6; 116:3) and an insatiable devourer of humans (Prov 1:20; 27:20). The laments often portray the psalmists' anguish when faced with death and are somewhat circumspect in naming Sheol directly, whereas the *thanksgiving psalms convey the joy of deliverance from a no longer threatening underworld.

2. Alternative Views of Afterlife?

Alternative views of destiny after death emerge in other, nonpoetic texts (notably, resurrection in Is 26:19; Dan 12:2). The emergence of these views is often dated well into the postexilic period for many reasons, including the possible influence of Persian dualism and the development of apocalyptic. Even if these views emerged earlier, they had little discernible influence on the postexilic prophetic and historical material.

A few poetic texts discussed below may also point toward alternative views, though scholars assess this variously. First, some argue that all or nearly all of these texts convey the traditional view, and that afterlife interpretations are posterior readings, sometimes discernible in early textual transmission (J. Goldingay on the Psalms [rightly critiquing M. Dahood's speculative approach] and R. E. Murphy on wisdom). Many others accept that at least some of the texts suggest a more positive prospect and must therefore be dated relatively late, in line with other such material. A third approach allows for the positive perspective without necessarily dating the texts late, since theological development is neither linear nor uniform. In any case, much of the poetic literature is very difficult to date accurately. P. S. Johnston, J. D. Levenson and others see a positive perspective in some of these texts.

2.1. Psalms. A few psalms may suggest some form of positive afterlife, and three in particular are frequently mentioned. Psalm 16 concludes forcefully: "For you will not abandon my life to Sheol. . . . You will show me the path of life . . . at your right hand pleasures endlessly [nesah]" (Ps 16:10-11). Given the psalmist's initial vulnerability, isolation and apparent opponents (vv. 1, 2, 4), this ending could be his defiant affirmation of divine preservation and of blessing in a prolonged earthly life. This would concord with the typical OT perspective, but the psalm may well move beyond it. Its predominantly confident mood might imply that avoiding Sheol is not just escaping immanent danger but is somehow avoiding permanent separation from Yahweh, and that the path of life somehow leads beyond it to continued enjoyment of God. If so, this experience is tantalizingly vague, without name, spatial location or any other details. But present confidence in and communion with God may lead to extended, if imprecise, hope.

Psalm 49 is a wisdom reflection on the themes of piety, riches and death. It ponders the age-old question of the faithful suffering oppression from rich persecutors and offers two responses. The first, in vv. 7-9 (whatever the reading of v. 7a), is that human wealth is powerless to prolong life and to ransom people from the pit, or underworld. This is then developed in vv. 10-14, which underline that these foolish rich end up in Sheol (again, regardless of the exact interpretation of the difficult v. 14). The psalmist's second response, in v. 15, is more succinct and more startling. God will ransom him from Sheol and will receive him. This presents a clear contrast between those whom riches cannot ransom from Sheol and the writer, whom God will ransom. Again, this could assume ransom from immediate, untimely death without asserting anything further. But that is neither stated nor even implied, and the psalm's reflective nature, the contrasting fates and the end of v. 15 together suggest a long-term alternative, however imprecise.

Psalm 73 is another wisdom psalm on the same theme. Here, a sanctuary experience brings insight into the total destruction of the arrogant wicked and the preservation of the upright. However, this contrast is less clearly associated with the psalmist's ultimate fate than in Psalm 49, and the psalm concludes (vv. 27-28) by juxtaposing the end of the godless with the continued present life of the godly. This probably sets the context for interpreting vv. 23-26, which affirm that he is guided continually, will be received "afterward" ('aḥar) with "honor" (kābôd) and despite human weakness will know God's strengthening "for the future" (le'ôlām). All these terms could fit into a this-life perspective; however, their open-endedness could also reflect a nascent hope in some form of survival beyond death and certainly enabled such re-reading in later times.

A few psalms contain references to some form of divine record of names, notably "the book of the living" (Ps 69:28; cf. Ex 32:32-33; Is 4:3; Dan 12:2; Mal 3:16). Other books seem to record events (Ps 40:7; 56:8; 139:16; cf. Dan 7:10; 10:21). Some scholars trace the Israelite idea to Babylonian "tablets of destiny" or Persian registers, but the latter are religious and administrative parallels rather than necessary antecedents. The concept of divine records was developed in later Jewish literature and the NT, especially Revelation, in reference to postmortem judgment. Although some interpreters assume a similar understanding in the OT texts, neither their immediate contexts nor wider Israelite beliefs would support this. Given the importance of this life, and the further statements about the wicked in Psalm 69, its author desires their early death. Other references to divine records can be interpreted similarly. So although the concept lends itself to afterlife reinterpretation, this probably is not its intent in the psalms.

2.2. Job. The book of Job has several references to a spirit world separate from the physical world. The opening chapters present a heavenly court (see Divine Council) with Yahweh, "the sons of God" and "the *satan" (Job 1:6-7; 2:1). Job's so-called friends share this worldview, with Eliphaz doubting help for him from "the holy ones" (Job 5:1) and Elihu envisaging a mediating angel who can deliver humans from the pit (Job 33:23-28). Job himself longs for an umpire (môkiah [Job 9:33]) who could force God to listen, and believes in a heavenly witness ('ēd [Job 16:19]) who will vouch for him. In this general context, the famous passage of Job 19:25-27 could refer to vindication in the nonmaterial world, and several of its terms could indicate a postmortem experience. In this case, Job has moved beyond traditional views on death to a new perspective.

However, the overall context suggests otherwise. Job still continues his legal argument after chapter 19: he wants to find God, present his case, be acquitted, be tested and emerge like gold (Job 23:3-10). His defiant summation still longs for fair judgment and a divine hearing (Job 31:6, 35). What Job "knows" in Job 19:25 affects neither this subsequent argumentation nor the closing chapters of the book, with Yahweh's creation-centered speeches, Job's humble responses and the this-worldly dénouement of chapter 42.

The immediate context of Job 19:25-27 also fails to support a profound new insight. After lambasting his friends and rehearsing his dilemma, Job longs for a permanent record of his words (Job 19:23-24). This could be a dated record to prove later that he had indeed maintained his innocence (cf. the record in Is 8:1) rather than a monument to survive his death. Further, the chapter concludes with a reference to punishment in this life (Job 19:28-29).

Admittedly, the text of Job 19:25-27 is unclear in its detail; for instance, the NRSV uses several ambiguous terms or phrases ("at the last," "thus," "on my side," "not another") and has five translation-related footnotes. However, three features are clear. First, Job invokes his gō'ēl, traditionally the next-of-kin who redeems a family member from slavery, unmortgages property, marries a childless widow and avenges a death (see Kinsman-Redeemer and Levirate). It is a fair assumption that the gō'el can also be legal advocate, despite lack of specific OT reference. Since Job previously longed for an advocate vis-à-vis God (Job 9:33; 16:19), and the outcome here is that he will see God (Job 19:26-27), his gō'el presumably is this advocate (hardly God himself, still less Job's personified cry, as some argue). Second, this gō'el will eventually arise to defend Job. The scenario envisaged is probably an earthly court, though the time frame is unclear: both "at the last" and references to skin and flesh are ambiguous. Third, the outcome is that Job sees God. He has longed for this since the onset of his troubles, and at last he will have the opportunity to present his case.

So there is bold faith here: not that Job will survive death, but that he will eventually meet God. This indeed happens at the end of the book, though with an unexpected outcome: instead of defiant self-justification by Job, there is humble contrition, and instead of condemnation by God, there is vindication. Although it interacts with an invisible world, the drama is completed within the visible one. A posited postmortem vindication in Job 19:25-27 does not fit this. Nevertheless, the textual difficulties of these verses could reflect an emergent belief of a positive afterlife among the text's transmitters and translators, and their interpretation of the text accordingly.

2.3. Proverbs. The book of Proverbs has much to say about life and death. This theme pervades chapters 1–9 and occurs in several of the pithy maxims. In particular, the foreign or foolish woman will lead the unwise son to death, Sheol and the rēpā'im, or "shades" (Prov 2:18; 5:5; 7:27; 9:18; there are also references to Sheol unrelated to human fate [Prov 1:12; 15:11; 27:20; 30:16]). However, in general the two options envisaged are this present life and the underworld, without the alternative of a blissful afterlife.

A few proverbs might imply an alternative. The snares of death can be averted by wise teaching, and Sheol by physical chastisement (Prov 13:14, 23:14), though the unspoken alternative is presumably this life. "The path of life leads upward to avoid Sheol below" (Prov 15:24), though again this could simply indicate the present life, as in the earlier contrast with the foreign woman's ways (Prov 5:5-6). More intriguing is Proverbs 12:28, where the path of rightteousness is life and "no death." But here the second half is awkward, reading literally, "and way of path not death": the nominal phrase (derek nētibā) has redundant repetition, and the negative 'al does not normally precede nouns. Further, many Hebrew manuscripts give this term as 'el ("unto"), while the versions follow this and read the line differently. Thus scholars often reconstruct with an antithetical parallelism as in other life-death proverbs—for example, "but the way of folly [tô'ebā] leads to death" (see BHS note). Similar textual difficulties surround Proverbs 14:32, where "the righteous finds refuge in his death [bēmôṭô]." Such refuge is not otherwise an OT concept and is more in line with later eschatology (cf. Wis 4:7-17); further, the LXX and Syriac read a more likely "in his integrity" (Heb bētūmmō), implying a simple mistake of metathesis. In summary, the few proverbs that suggest a positive afterlife are uncertain conceptually and/or textually. They hardly indicate a positive perspective, though the textual problems might testify to emerging afterlife beliefs in the early transmission period.

2.4. The Megillot. Ecclesiastes is the only OT book to contain significant reflection on death itself. The Pentateuch prescribes death as a penalty, the Historical Books record it as an event, and the psalms offer prayer against its untimely occurrence, but without significant reflection on the nature of death itself. By contrast, it has been well noted that Ecclesiastes has "the smell of the tomb about it," with three juxtaposed threads.

First, some verses present tranquil pictures of the natural rhythms of birth, old age and death (Eccles 3:2; 12:1-8) or extol the enjoyment of this life for its own sake and not just in reaction to death (e.g., Eccles 3:12-13). This perspective echoes the traditional Israelite approach to death. Second, and more markedly, there is repeated unease over death. Wise and fool, human and animal apparently die alike, without differentiation. This provokes both frustration with the present life and a focus on it alone (Eccles 2:17-18; 3:19-21): neither wealth nor reputation makes any difference at death (Eccles 5:15-16; 6:1-2); life is but a shadow with nothing certain beyond it, and mourning brings more insight than does celebration (Eccles 6:11; 7:2-4). Then, in a key passage, the sage asserts that death awaits all and obliterates all knowledge, passion and activity (Eccles 9:1-10). Third, there are occasional tantalizing glimpses of divine judgment from both *Qohelet and his epilogist (Eccles 3:17; 11:9; 12:14), though without specifying its time frame or providing further detail.

These three strands remain unintegrated. Many scholars stress the negative perspective of death as final, and certainly it is predominant in the book. Others note references to continued existence in Sheol, but this is not meaningful afterlife. Nevertheless, the references to judgment, whatever their origin, may hint at a future reckoning. Like a few psalms discussed above (see 2.1), they may reach beyond the present limits of life and faith toward some undefined further experience.

The other *Megillot have little to add. Ruth and Esther are stories where death is simply recorded as an event. The Song of Songs brushes the theme only with its proverbial assertion that “love is strong [ʿazzâ] as death, passion fierce/hard [qāšâ] as Sheol” (Song 8:6); in other words, love is as irresistible as death is unavoidable. Lamentations is prompted by calamity, destruction and death but focuses on the emotions and faith of the survivor without commenting on the fate of the deceased. Together, these books illustrate well the traditional Hebrew focus on this life and its events and the general disinterest in any individual consciousness beyond death.

See also CHAOS AND DEATH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barr, The Garden of Eden and the Hope of Immortality (London: SCM, 1992); S. L. Burkes, God, Self, and Death: The Shape of Religious Transformation in the Second Temple Period (JSJSup 79; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003); J. Goldingay, “Death and Afterlife in the Psalms,” in Judaism in Late Antiquity, Part 4: Death, Life-after-Death, Resurrection and the World-to-Come in the Judaisms of Antiquity, ed. A. J. Avery-Peck and J. Neusner (HO 1/49; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 61-85; P. S. Johnston, Shades of Sheol: Death and Afterlife in the Old Testament (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press; Leicester: Apollos, 2002); J. D. Levenson, Resurrection and the Restoration of Israel (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2006); E. C. Lucas, “Science, Wisdom, Eschatology and the Cosmic Christ,” in Eschatology in Bible and Theology, ed. K. E. Brower and M. W. Elliott (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1997) = “The Reader Must Understand”: Eschatology in Bible and Theology (Leicester: Apollos) 279-97; R. E. Murphy, “Death and Afterlife in the Wisdom Literature,” in Judaism in Late Antiquity, Part 4:

Death, Life-after-Death, Resurrection and the World-to-Come in the Judaisms of Antiquity, ed. A. J. Avery-Peck and J. Neusner (HO 1/49; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 101-16. P. S. Johnston

AGUR. See LEMUEL AND AGUR.

AHASUERUS

Ahasuerus is the Persian king in the book of *Esther. The name ʾāḥašwērôš is the Hebrew equivalent of the Persian Khšayārshan, which, for lack of consonantal equivalents, the Greeks rendered Xerxes. The son of Darius I, Xerxes ruled the Persian Empire from 485 to 465 BC and was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes I. The LXX erroneously identified the king as Artaxerxes (for a full discussion of the king's identity, see Paton, 51-54).

1. Xerxes in Classical Sources
2. Ahasuerus in the Book of Esther
3. Critical Challenges to the Biblical Depiction

1. Xerxes in Classical Sources.

Inscriptions provide little information about Xerxes, most of them having been heavily influenced by the inscriptions of his father, Darius I (Yamauchi, 188-89). Significant Greek sources include Ctesias's unreliable History of the Persians, of which only fragments are preserved, and Aeschylus's Persians, produced in 472 BC, just eight years after the defeat of the Persian fleet at Salamis. Since Aeschylus himself fought at Marathon and Salamis, the tragedy provides an eyewitness account presented, of course, with dramatic license. Some information may also be gleaned from Thucydides, but the Greek historian Herodotus is by far the most significant source of extrabiblical information about Xerxes, in terms of both quantity and quality.

Darius, having been defeated by the Greeks at Marathon, was preparing a larger army to continue his policy of expansion. The extreme taxation that these war preparations required incited his Egyptian subjects to revolt. In November of 486 BC Darius died, not yet having put down the rebellion. Xerxes, who had been recognized as the crown prince since 498 BC and had been groomed for the job by a little over a decade of service as the viceroy of Babylon, inherited the Egyptian problem, with the throne, at about the age of thirty-two. He turned his attention first, however, to the completion of his father's palace at Susa. When his brother Ariamenes contested his accession, Xerxes bought him off with gifts and position. By 484 BC Egypt had been recovered, and Xerxes gave his brother Achaemenes charge of that satrapy. With the help of his able brother-in-law Megabyzus, Xerxes was able quickly to put down another rebellion by Babylon. The reprisals against Babylon were severe.

Rebellions out of the way, Xerxes continued building Darius's war machine and, urged on by his cousin Mardonius, planned his northwestern expansion. The attempt proved disastrous for Xerxes. Although Herodotus tends to be untrustworthy with regard to statistics, there is no doubt that Xerxes' capacity for war was considerable. Logistical support for his army was no small burden to the cities along the army's route. A single meal, for example, reportedly cost four hundred talents. Trembling before this mighty foe, the Greeks sent a delegation to Delphi to seek Apollo's prognosis. The oracle gave a dire prediction for Athens. But when the envoys begged for a more favorable answer, Apollo offered a little hope in the "wooden wall." The ensuing debate about the meaning of the wooden wall was settled by Themistocles, who interpreted it as a reference to the Athenian fleet. Xerxes, quite confident himself, sought to further deprive the Greeks of their nerve.

When three spies were caught at Sardis, Xerxes ordered that they be shown the full extent of his forces and released to report what they had seen. The Greeks, with no small difficulty, managed an alliance against the Persian advance. Taking advantage of a local Greek's betrayal, however, Xerxes' forces found an alternate route to the bottleneck at Thermopylae. The news of the failure to hold the pass reached Artemesium, where the Greeks had successfully battled the Persians at sea for two days but had weathered such damage that they were already planning withdrawal when the news arrived. The Greeks withdrew, evacuating Attica. Stationing the Athenian fleet at Salamis in 479 BC, Themistocles led the alliance into a desperate situation. The western exit was blocked by the Egyptian fleet. The allies were trapped. Olmstead (253-355) argues that if Xerxes had waited, the fragile alliance would have disintegrated, and the allied navy would have been forced to come to terms of surrender. Impetuous Xerxes, however, ordered a full attack on the blockaded navy. The narrow passage removed the advantage of Persian numbers. After an initial Persian success against the Spartans, the Athenians came to the rescue and gained the upper hand. The Greeks fought desperately. For every ship that the allies lost, Persia lost five. Xerxes was forced to retreat. Unable to assume the blame for his rash attack, he executed the Phoenician captains for cowardice. In so doing, he lost the support of the Phoenicians and the Egyptians, the core of his naval power. Disappointed, Xerxes traveled to Sardis, leaving the war in the hands of the more able Mardonius. Mardonius's attempts at a diplomatic solution failed, and Mardonius himself was killed in the battle of Plataea. The Ionian Greeks switched sides against their Persian overlords, and the Greeks won liberation.

Pausanias, the Spartan commander at Plataea, having been won over by the opulence of the Persian court, then offered to return the Greeks to Persian submission, should he be allowed to marry Xerxes' daughter (Thucydides 1.128). Xerxes gave a favorable reply, but Pausanias's treachery was discovered by the Spartans, and he paid for it with his life.

Herodotus, being a Greek historian, focuses on the battles between Greece and Persia during the late 480s BC. He leaves us with a picture of a monarch who, having spent much of his fortune and his ambition, turns instead to sensual conquests. In Herodotus's presentation Xerxes' character is much like that of Cambyses: arrogant, unstable and ineffective. He exhibits poor judgment and often ignores good advice. According to Ctesias (FGH 688 F 13), Aristotle (Pol. 1211b37-40) and Diodorus Siculus (11.69.1-2), Xerxes was assassinated by the captain of his bodyguard, Artabanus, who hoped to seize the throne but failed. Artaxerxes I Longimanus, Xerxes' son, took the throne instead.

2. Ahasuerus in the Book of Esther.

The author of Esther is uninterested in the Greco-Persian wars. The events of the book begin with a banquet in the third year (483 BC) of Ahasuerus's reign (Esther 1:3), possibly held to drum up support for his military expansion efforts. Ahasuerus, according to M. V. Fox (171), is the only major character in the Esther narrative not presented in the round. He is a flat figure with no private thoughts. His emotions and psychology are all on the surface. He has one obvious character trait: impulsiveness. This manifests itself most notably in his concern for honor. The banquet, whatever its potential political benefit, is aimed at demonstrating the great wealth at his disposal. His attempt to parade his queen, *Vashti, before his guests, “in order to make known to the people and the princes her beauty,” was similarly designed to bring him honor. Such impulsiveness fits well with the character of Herodotus’s Xerxes, who had the Hellespont whipped, branded and cursed after a storm destroyed part of his fleet (Herodotus Hist. 7.35), and who, for the sake of a grand victory, threw caution to the wind and cost Persia the conquest of the Greeks. But Esther’s Ahasuerus shows some reserve as well. The Xerxes of the Greek historians spurns the advice of counselors, much to his own chagrin, but the Ahasuerus of Esther is almost completely manipulated by advisors. His advisors take advantage of his fury toward Vashti to urge for an empire-wide decree that women honor their husbands. Haman talks the king into genocide. The king even seeks advice for something so mundane as how he might honor a deserving subject. Ahasuerus hardly fits the role of protagonist or antagonist. Though absolute human power is his, he is easily moved this way and that by his own subjects. Fox (173) suggests that the manipulation is facilitated by Ahasuerus’s laziness. Perhaps the respective authors (Greek and biblical) have selected to disclose only those details that fit their own purposes. Or perhaps Xerxes has learned from his mistakes the usefulness of surrounding himself with advisors.

3. Critical Challenges to the Biblical Depiction.

Most biblical scholars generally concede a few points of historical connection, without necessarily admitting the historicity of the Esther narrative. L. B. Paton (64), for example, says of Ahasuerus, “The picture of his character given in Est. as a sensual and capricious despot corresponds with the account of Xerxes given by Herodotus vii. ix.; Aesch. Pers. 467 ff.; Juv. x. 174-187.” Similarly, Paton (65) acknowledges, “Some of the statements of Est. in regard to Persia and Persian customs are confirmed by classical historians. Thus the arrangement of the banquet (1⁶⁻⁸), the seven princes who formed a council of state (1¹⁴), obeisance before the King and his favourites (3²), belief in lucky and unlucky days (3⁷), exclusion of mourning garb from the palace (4⁹), hanging as the death-penalty (5¹⁴), dressing a royal benefactor in the King’s robes (6⁸), [and] the dispatching of couriers with royal messages (3¹³ 8¹⁰).” One of the most central objections to taking the narrative as historical, on the other hand, is that the Greek sources are not silent about the queen’s name. She is not Vashti (nor Esther) but rather Amestris (Herodotus Hist. 7.114; 9.112). Moreover, many point to a problem with Ahasuerus marrying a Jewish woman at all. Herodotus recounts an agreement among seven Persian lords who overthrew the Magians. According to the agreement, the king would be permitted to marry only within the families of the seven (Herodotus Hist. 3.84). It should be noted, however, that Herodotus (Hist. 7.152) also says, “While it is my duty to record what is reported, I am by no means obligated to believe it. And this, I think, holds for the rest of the book as well.” Critics who appeal to this agreement seldom consider the improbability of the tale as a whole. In it, seven lords, debating how to fairly choose a king, leave the choice to the neighing of a horse. If, too, the tale is to be taken seriously, we should consider that the seven also receive the right to enter the king’s presence uninvited. The fact that this privilege is granted to this special seven implies that it is denied to most, lending authenticity to Esther’s concern. The challenges of reconciling the biblical story with extrabiblical historical sources are many, varied and difficult. Unfortunately, it has not been the custom among many scholars to treat their various sources with equal skepticism. Nothing in the extrabiblical sources provides an insurmountable challenge to the historicity of the biblical narrative.

See also ESTHER 1: BOOK OF; ESTHER 2: EXTRABIBLICAL BACKGROUND; MORDECAI; SUSA; VASHTI

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. L. Berquist, Judaism in Persia’s Shadow: A Social and Historical Approach (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); P. Briant, From Cyrus to Alexander: A History of the Persian Empire (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2002); M. Brosius, trans. and ed., The Persian Empire from Cyrus II to Artaxerxes I (LACTOR 16; London: London Association of Classical Teachers, 2000); M. A. Dandamaev, A Political History of the Achaemenid Empire (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1989); M. V. Fox, Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); J. D. Levenson, Esther (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); C. A. Moore, "Archaeology and the Book of Esther," BA 38 (1975) 62-79; idem, Studies in the Book of Esther (New York: KTAV, 1982); O. Murray, "Herodotus and Oral History," in Achaemenid History, Part 2: The Greek Sources; Proceedings of the Groningen 1984 Achaemenid History Workshop, ed. H. Sancisi-Weerdenburg and A. Kuhrt (Leiden: Nederlands Instituut voor het Nabije Oosten, 1987) 93-115; A. T. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire: Achaemenid Period (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948); L. B. Paton, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Esther (ICC; New York: Scribner, 1908); E. M. Yamauchi, Persia and the Bible (repr.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1996 [1990]).

C. Brooking

ALEF-BET. See ACROSTIC.

ALLEGORICAL INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS; SONG OF SONGS 1: BOOK OF.

ALLITERATION. See POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; SOUND PATTERNS.

ALPHA TEXT OF ESTHER. See ESTHER 4: ADDITIONS.

ALPHABET. See ACROSTIC.

AMBIGUITY

In *poetics, ambiguity represents the intentional creation of texts that can be understood in multiple ways. Ambiguity is not to be confused with vagueness. A statement is vague when its boundaries are not properly defined. Although undesirable in situations where a closely reasoned argument is developed, ambiguity can add to our appreciation of a text by forcing us to continually reengage with it. It is a tool that writers use to involve readers in the process of creating meaning because of the need to continually reread and recontextualize a text. The classic study of ambiguity remains that of W. Empson as an expression of I. A. Richard's so-called practical criticism. His earlier work focused on short poetic texts, though later studies showed that his approach also worked with longer pieces. He identified seven types of ambiguity, most of which can be seen in the biblical literature. The exceptions are his fifth and seventh types, in which ambiguity is either something of which the author was not initially conscious or evidence of an actual contradiction. The presence of these forms is difficult to prove, especially with ancient literature, but as accidents within a text rather than elements of intended art fall out of the realm of poetics. Empson's categories are not completely discrete, but they remain a useful analytic tool. The five that are clearly found in the OT are utilized below. *Qohelet makes most deliberate use of ambiguity, but the technique is employed across the breadth of the OT.

1. Details Effective in Multiple Ways
2. Multiple Possibilities with a Single Resolution
3. Simultaneous Use of Unconnected Meanings
4. Alternative Meanings Combine to Clarify the Author's Intention
5. Apparent Contradictions
6. Conclusion

1. Details Effective in Multiple Ways.

Writers can increase interest by including details that are effective in more ways than one. This occurs when a word or phrase seems to be resolved at one point but is used in a different way later. An effective use of this technique is in the so-called Janus parallelism (see Parallelism), in which a word is employed with two completely different meanings. In this way, an author is able to play with the ambiguity of words that either look or sound alike. The classic example of this is Song of Songs 2:12:

The flowers have appeared in the land;
the time of pruning/singing has arrived, and the voice of the turtledove is heard in the land.

There is a play on the fact that zāmîr can mean both "pruning" and "singing." Thus, the word is resolved in relation to the first line as a reference to the need to prune the plants, but the third line points to the sound of the turtledove, which requires that it is singing that is heard. Both meanings are intended, but the ambiguity inherent in the root enables the author to draw in readers by employing them both. Biblical writers often exploit this richness of ambiguity that exists in a number of Hebrew roots (see Hebrew Language).

Care must be taken not to confuse ambiguity of this type in translation with those intended within the text. For example, “who does not lift up his soul to what is false/idols” (Ps. 24:4) represents a translational ambiguity. English does not have a word with the semantic breadth to cover both what is generally false and idols in particular, whereas šāwē covers both.

2. Multiple Possibilities with a Single Resolution.

This approach is the opposite of the first. Rather than one detail being made effective in several ways, the detail is allowed only one resolution. The nature of such a resolution should be deferred so that readers are drawn into the text as they seek the meaning that will resolve the ambiguity. Qohelet makes particular use of this technique as he plays with the meaning of certain key terms, most obviously the word hebel. The word occurs thirty-eight times in *Ecclesiastes, a little over half the total usage in the OT. The only biblical text in which this word clearly is not being used metaphorically is Isaiah 57:13, which suggests that readers would be accustomed to hebel being used outside of its basic meaning of “breath” or “vapor,” though nonbiblical texts also use the word in a nonmetaphorical way. Although he makes his opening claim that “all is hebel” (Eccles 1:2), Qohelet refrains from providing an exact definition of what he means by it. Rather, by characteristically defining things as hebel, he enables readers to gradually build up their interpretation. It is the lack of a direct definition of what is obviously a key term that draws readers in as they seek to resolve the puzzle that is set before them, though it is precisely the fact that Qohelet never provides an exact definition that has led scholars to posit a variety of meanings, such as “vanity,” “futility,” “meaningless,” “ephemeral” and “enigma.” That Qohelet intends a single resolution seems probable from his conclusion (Eccles 12:8), though a single resolution does not require that we employ only one word in translation, because that resolution might not conform to the semantic range of a single English word. The pleasure for readers is in seeking to follow all the clues that Qohelet provides as to what he means by hebel. Indeed, by refraining from providing an exact resolution, Qohelet continually invites readers to come back and reread the text and to continue the exploration.

3. Simultaneous Use of Unconnected Meanings.

This method of creating ambiguity requires writers to draw on the possibility of multiple meanings inherent in words or phrases, with each meaning being retained within subsequent discourse. Such an approach disorients readers, as they normally seek to retain only one possible meaning. This is distinct from details being used in multiple ways. In that case, ambiguity involves the unexpected move from one meaning to another, with only one employed at any particular point. An example of this is Proverbs 25:15:

With patience can a ruler be seduced,
and a soft answer can shatter bones.

One key to the proverb is the semantic range of the word rak (“soft”). Elsewhere, it means “weak” (Gen 33:13) or “tender” (Deut 28:54). This proverb draws on and retains those senses but now links them with a verb (“shatter”) that elsewhere is associated with battle, with the result that it is the soft answer that is harder even than bones. By making the answer both soft and hard, the proverb employs ambiguity to draw us into the paradox of its world and increase our pleasure in it.

4. Alternative Meanings Combine to Clarify the Author’s Intention.

This approach to ambiguity occurs when an author deliberately leaves alternative meanings open as possibilities and only combines them later so as to clarify their intention. It occurs in the use of words and phrases but also can occur in longer texts. This method can be seen in Ecclesiastes 9:11-18. Here, Qohelet shows wisdom as something that is limited (Eccles 9:11-12) but powerful (Eccles 9:13-16), though even when it is effective in achieving its purpose, wisdom does not necessarily achieve anything for the wise. Moreover, the weakness of wisdom is greater than folly among rulers (Eccles 9:17), but wisdom can still be undone by one sinner (Eccles 9:18). Qohelet thus applies a number of different perspectives to wisdom, but his point is precisely that one needs to “ambiguate” the concept of wisdom. Readers are invited to explore this ambiguity because only through this can they recognize what Qohelet holds to be true: one must see wisdom as a polyvalent concept. Once again, it is the use of ambiguity that enables this exploration to occur.

5. Apparent Contradictions.

The use of apparent contradictions is a form of ambiguity that invites the reader to see the way in which statements that seemingly contradict one another actually cohere to create a single meaning. The parade example is Proverbs 26:4-5:

Do not answer a fool according to his folly, lest you come to resemble him.
Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he become wise in his own eyes.

On the face of it, these verses are a direct contradiction. However, their placement and close grammatical patterning suggest that they are to be read as a single unit. The effectiveness of a proverb depends upon knowing when to use it, so the placement of these proverbs together suggests not only that both can be true, but also that the wise should know more than just the content of the proverbs: they should also know which one they need to employ in a given situation. Neither proverb on its own teaches this, but through their deliberate juxtaposition and the ambiguity that is created this text now draws in readers to consider their own application of such material.

6. Conclusion.

The book of *Psalms and the Wisdom literature demonstrate a sophisticated appreciation of the role that ambiguity can play. Ambiguity invites readers to enter into dialogue with the text precisely because it resists easy resolution. It enables an author to hold the readers' interest because they cannot be sure where they are being taken. In these ways, the employment of ambiguity provides a mechanism for making these texts points to ponder—surely the aim of any good wisdom teacher.

See also WORDPLAY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. P. Brown, "The Didactic Power of Metaphor in the Aphoristic Sayings of Proverbs," JSOT 29 (2004) 133-54; R. J. Clifford, "Your Attention Please! Heeding the Proverbs," JSOT 29 (2004) 155-63; W. Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (3rd ed.; London: Puffin, 1960); M. V. Fox, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Re-Reading of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); J. S. Kselman, "Janus Parallelism in Psalm 75:2," JBL 121 (2002) 531-32; G. Ogden, Qoheleth (RNBC; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (JSOTSup 26; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984). D. G. Firth

AMENEMOPE, INSTRUCTION OF. See PROV. ERBS 1: BOOK OF; PROVERBS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND.

AMESTRIS. See ESTHER 6: PERSON.

ANGEL OF YAHWEH. See DIVINE PRESENCE.

ANIMAL IMAGERY

The Wisdom Literature, poetic books and Writings of the OT abound with both literal and metaphorical references to animals. The term hayyāh (from the root hyh, "to live, to have life") indicates living creatures in general, especially wild animals (Job 5:23; 28:21; 39:15; 40:20; Ps 148:10). It is usually translated "beast" (Job 5:22; Ps 79:2), and its use is indicative of the great variety of God's creation, portrayed even in their diverse environments, such as signifying animals in dens (Job 37:8), among the reeds (Ps 68:31 [30]), in the field (Ps 104:11), in the forest (Ps 104:20) or even in the sea (Ps 104:25).

All creatures belong to God (Ps 50:10). He gives them life (Job 12:10), satisfying them (Ps 145:16) with food (Ps 136:25, where the term bāśār, meaning "flesh," is translated "creature"), and creating and sustaining them by his Spirit (Ps 104:30).

The numerous and varied families and species of animals are categorized into the following main groups:

1. Domesticated Animals
2. Wild Animals
3. Birds
4. Fish and Other Sea Creatures
5. Insects, Reptiles and Other Miscellaneous Creatures
6. Mythological Creatures

1. Domesticated Animals.

1.1. Sheep, Goats. The terms ʿēder, šōn and šōneh (Ps 8:7 [8]), often translated as "flock," primarily refer to sheep but may include goats.

The OT's depictions of animals are often directly related to pragmatic concerns, such as the creatures' potential as food, labor or even threat. The ability of flocks to provide milk and clothing (Prov 27:26, 27), plus meat, hides and even musical instruments (the ram's horn or šōpār, see Job 39:24; Ps 47:5 [6]; 81:3 [4]; 98:6; 150:3) made them valuable assets. They needed to be carefully looked after (see Prov 27:23) and guarded (Job 24:2). Job's possessions included thousands of sheep (Job 1:3, 16; 42:12), while Qoheleth's flocks surpassed anyone else's in Jerusalem (Eccles 2:7). An abundance of flocks not only designated prosperity but was indicative of God's goodness, so often expressed in natural and agricultural terms in the OT (Ps 107:41; 144:13). Because of such blessing, creation itself responds in praise to God (Ps 65:13), often expressed through figurative language that, for example, sees mountains skipping like lambs (Ps 114:4, 6).

References to sheep are understandably profuse in the Psalms, many of which are attributed to David, who was himself "taken from the sheep pens" (Ps 78:20). In keeping with the representation of God as Shepherd (e.g. Ps 23:1; 80:1 [2]), Israel is often described as his sheep or flock (Ps 79:13; 100:3). This implies God's pastoral care (Ps 95:7) and guidance (Ps 77:20 [21]; 78:52). However, since sheep are also represented as silly creatures, who stray (Ps 119:176, where the term śeh is used), easily scattered and destined for slaughter, they may be representative of God's rebellious people, who have angered God (Ps 74:1) and who deserve chastisement (Ps 44:11 [12], 22 [23]). This metaphor is applied equally to the wicked (Ps 49:14 [15]).

The Song of Songs includes several references to sheep/goats, both literal (Song 1:7, 8, including a reference to gēdiyyāh—young goats or kids) and figurative (Song 4:2; 6:6, comparing the female lover's teeth to a flock of sheep). Often a knowledge of the local geography informs the similes, such as "Your hair is like a flock of goats [ʿēz, usually a female goat] descending from Mount Gilead" (Song 4:1; 6:5).

Proverbs 30:31 refers to the tayīš, a male goat, among a list of four creatures that strut in a stately manner, while wild male (Ps 104:18) and female goats (Job 39:1) are denoted by the term yāʿēl.

Sheep and goats were basic to the OT sacrificial system. The psalmist promises an offering of rams (ʿayil) in Psalm 66:15 (cf. Job 42:8). However, despite verses such as Psalm 20:3 [4]; 40:6 [7]; 96:8 and 141:2 that employ general terms for sacrifice such as minhā or ʿolā, specific references to the animals to be offered are to be found in the Pentateuch, rather than in poetic or Wisdom literature. For example, the term kebeš, denot-ing a young lamb, occurs over one hundred times in those first five books, while Wisdom literature contains just two references, neither concerned with sacrifice. Instead, in keeping with the pragmatic concerns of Wisdom literature, the animal is portrayed as the provider of a fleece used for warm clothing (Job 31:20; Prov 27:6). Psalm 50 contains two references to the he-goat (ʿattūd), as the Creator God spurns wrongly motivated sacrifices offered by the wicked in terms similar to those found in Amos 5:21-24 and Micah 6:6-8.

1.2. Cattle, Oxen. There are eight Hebrew words for "cow" found in the OT, signifying the importance of these animals to the Israelite life. Cattle could produce milk, meat and hides, and their additional function as work animals made them a very valuable commodity (Eccles 2:7; Job 1:10). This is implied by the Hebrew term migneh, denoting livestock, which originates from the root qnh, which is often used of commercial transactions.

This idea of property and possessions is found in Job 1:3; 42:12, where the term bāqār, variously translated "cattle," "herd" or "ox(en)" appears. It denotes larger livestock such as bulls or cows, rather than the sheep and goats indicated by šoʿn. Such prized possessions were favored by God in the sacrificial system (Ps 66:15; see Lev 1:3, 10, 14).

Another common term for cattle is bēhemā (Ps 148:10). This term sometimes indicates brutish beasts (Job 18:3; Ps 73:22; Prov 30:30). Elsewhere it denotes animals in general (Job 12:7), often in contrast to humankind (Ps 36:6 [7]; 49:12 [13], 20 [21]; 135:8; Eccles 3:18-21, and see Ps 8:7 [8], where humankind's authority over the animals is stated). God owns (Ps 50:10, compare Ps 24:1), preserves (Ps 104:14) and provides for (Ps 147:9, cf. Prov 12:10) such cattle, and their increase is a sign of his blessing (Ps 107:38; cf. Job 21:10). Nevertheless, his wrath and chastisement may affect all his creation, including cattle (bēʿir; see Ps 78:48).

Par is a very common term (especially in the Pentateuch) for a young bull, which figured prominently in sacrifices (Ps 50:9; 51:19 [21]; 69:31). It is used metaphorically in Psalm 22:12 [13] to denote the psalmist's enemies, particularly emphasizing their strength. Strength is also the primary meaning of the term ʿabbir, used in parallel to par in Psalm 22:12 [13], and also translated "bull" in Psalms 50:13; 68:30 NIV.

šôr is usually translated “ox” (Job 6:5). Their hard work ensured good crops (Prov 14:4). They were prized as possessions (Job 24:3), food (Prov 15:17, cf. Prov 7:22) and for sacrifice (Ps 69:31 [32]). Their value and esteem led to their images becoming objects of worship, especially in the fertility religions of the ancient Near East, and at times for apostate Israel (Ps 106:20). Idolatrous images of calves were also made. Psalm 106:19 refers to this use of the term ʿēgel, which is used with reference to Lebanon in Psalm 29:6 and the nations in Psalm 68:30 [31].

The term ʿelep occurs in Proverbs 14:4, which includes “cattle” among its various translations (Ps 8:7 [8]). This causes some difficulties in translating verses such as Psalm 144:14, where the NIV reads “oxen” with the footnote giving an alternative rendering of “chieftains.”

The wild ox (reʿēm) is mentioned in Job 39:9 and Psalms 22:21 [22]; 29:6 and 92:10 [11]. In the last of these references, the psalmist praises God for exalting his horn like that of the wild ox. This symbolism, using the image of a horn to express power and (sometimes arrogant) strength frequently occurs in the poetic literature of the OT (see Ps 18:2 [3]; 75:4, 5, 10 [5, 6, 11]; 69:31 [32]; 89:17, 24 [18, 25]; 112:9; 132:17; 148:14).

1.3. Horses. The horse (sūs) was vital to both trade and especially military endeavors in the OT period. Horses often symbolize strength (Job 39:19), especially finite natural power (see Job 39:18), in contrast to Yahweh’s unfailing might (Ps 20:7 [8]; 33:17; 76:6 [7]; Prov 21:31). Therefore, Yahweh delights in people fearing him rather than those relying on such natural strength (Ps 147:10).

Horses could imply status (Eccles 10:7), and are linked with royalty and office in the book of Esther (e.g. Esther 6:8-11). There were also the “fast horses especially bred for the king” (Esther 8:10 NIV, where the Hebrew term rammāk, possibly meaning “mare,” is used. Another term, rekeš, meaning “steeds,” is used in Esther 8:14).

Sometimes the need to control a horse with bit and bridle (Ps 32:9) or whip (Prov 26:3) is cited as a warning against a lack of self-control or foolishness.

1.4. Donkeys, Asses, Mules. Wild donkeys (pereʿ, see Job 6:5; 11:12; 24:5; Ps 104:11) were domesticated in early antiquity, generally to serve as beasts of burden. The wild donkey enjoys its freedom (Job 39:5), while in contrast its domesticated cousin often characterizes stubbornness and ill discipline, at least in Wisdom literature. As such, it becomes a metaphor for the fool, who requires the discipline of a rod as much as a halter is needed for the obstinate male ass (hāmôr) in Proverbs 26:3. A similar warning against imitating the foolish, uncontrollable nature of the mule (pered), the offspring of an ass and mare, is found in Psalm 32:9.

Job 24:3 implies that the he-ass (hāmôr) could be the most basic possession of the disadvantaged, in this case an orphan. However, the she-ass (ʿātôn), possibly due to its breeding potential and milk, is listed as a valuable commodity among Job’s possessions (Job 1:3, 14; 42:12).

1.5. Camels. Camels (gāmāl) were used for transport and carrying burdens. According to the Bible, this was true from the earliest patriarchal times, although some scholars have disputed this, alleging that the camel was not domesticated until the Iron Age. In addition to their milk, their legendary endurance without water made them valuable resources (e.g., Job 1:3, 17; 42:12).

2. Wild Animals.

2.1. Wild Cats: Lions and Leopards. Seven Hebrew words are used of lions throughout the OT, and it is almost impossible to discern the precise differences between the objects of each term, whether relating to age, prowess or even sex.

It is doubtful that kēpîr denotes a young lion, as was once thought. The NIV translates this term as “great lion” in Psalm 17:12 and Psalm 91:13. This creature’s roar is compared to a king’s rage in Proverbs 19:12 and Proverbs 20:2, while its boldness is an attribute shared by the righteous in Proverbs 28:1.

Often used in parallel with kēpîr, the Hebrew term ʾaryēh is used to denote lions as fearsome predators, growling (Job 4:10), lying in wait (Ps 10:9; Lam 3:10) and hungry for prey (Job 38:39; Ps 7:2 [3]; 17:12). As such they are often symbolic of the psalmist’s enemies (Ps 22:13 [14], 21 [22]; 35:17; 57:4 [5]), or wicked rulers (Prov 28:15, where the term ʾārî is used). It should, however, be noted that, while comparisons between wild animals and enemies often occur in the OT’s poetic and (generally ahistorical) Wisdom literature, they usually refer to nonspecific or personal foes. This is in contrast to some of the animal imagery found in the prophetic writings, which refer specifically to the threatening world armies of the Assyrian and Babylonian super powers (e.g., Hab 1:6-8).

Sāḥal is another term often used in parallel with kēpîr, (e.g., Job 4:10; Ps 91:13), or with ʾārî in Proverbs 22:13 and Proverbs 26:13, where the sluggard invokes the claim of a lion's presence to excuse his indolence. Job 28:8 declares that the stalking sāḥal (see Job 10:16) does not inhabit the earth's recesses; instead the ʾārî (like the leopards, see below) have dens in the mountains (Song 4:8).

Though the lion (layîš) is "mighty among beasts" (Prov 30:30), even lions must look to God for their food (Job 38:39; Ps 104:21). Before God's power the lion's teeth break (cf. Ps 58:6) and its prey disappears, leaving the cubs of the lion/lioness(?) (lābîʿ) to disperse (Job 4:10, 11). The psalmist declares that while even mighty lions may decline and deteriorate, those seeking Yahweh will not suffer lack (Ps 34:10).

Song of Songs 4:8 refers to the mountain haunts of the leopard (nāmēr), probably alluding to its habit of surveying the surrounding territory from a high vantage point.

2.2. Wild Dogs, Including Jackals and Foxes. Dogs (keleb) are portrayed as wild, snarling, prowling pack members (Ps 59:6 [7], 14 [15]) and so are seen as representative of either the psalmist's enemies (Ps 22:17) or threats to his life (Ps 22:20 [21]). In keeping with the negative connotations of dogs found elsewhere in the OT, the final degradation of having one's body devoured by dogs is alluded to in Psalm 68:23 [24]. Fools are compared to dogs (Prov 26:11) and meddlers to the trouble caused by a provoked dog (Prov 26:17). Ecclesiastes 9:4 demonstrates the vividness and practicality of OT wisdom—in contrast to abstract, speculative reasoning—preferring a live dog to a dead lion. Job 30:1 refers to sheep dogs.

The Hebrew word for jackal only occurs in the plural form tannîm in the OT. This howling, desert scavenger of the genus Canis is invariably referred to in contexts of ruin, destruction and desolation, usually due to Yahweh's judgment. It is mentioned in the NIV translations of Job 30:29 and Psalm 44:19, where the KJV reads "dragons," and in Lamentations 4:3, where AV has "sea monsters." The NIV reading is now preferred, as the KJV has read tannîn (see the entry on "Dragon" below). The KJV reads "foxes" in Psalm 63:10 [11], while the NIV translates another root, šûʿāl, as "jackals" in Lamentations 5:18, but "foxes" in Song of Songs 2:15. This reference sees such creatures as (small) annoying and interfering nuisances that are difficult to prevent.

2.3. Deer, Gazelles etc. The Hebrew term ʿōper indicates a male deer or stag. It is used figuratively to describe the male lover in Song of Songs 2:9, 17 and Song of Songs 8:14, paralleling šēbî, meaning gazelle (Prov 6:5), on each occasion. The female form of gazelle (šēbîyyā), translated "fawns" by NIV, is used in Song of Songs 4:5 and 7:3 [4] to describe the female lover's breasts.

Another term for stag is ʾayyāl. The fleeing leaders/princes of fallen Jerusalem are likened to stags that cannot find pasture in Lamentations 1:16, while the psalmist compares his desire for God to that of a deer panting for water in Psalm 42:1 [2]. (This text is sometimes emended to refer to a female deer, as the opening phrase employs a feminine verb.) The NIV also finds a reference to a deer in Proverbs 7:22, though the Hebrew text is uncertain.

In Job 39:1, God watches the female doe (ʾayyālā) give birth to her fawns, an event also recorded in the NIV footnote of Psalm 29:9 (though the main text reads the Hebrew term ʾayyālôt as a plural form of ʾayil, meaning "terebinth" or "oak"). The psalmist praises God for his aid in his preparation for battle, including his sure-footedness, which he compares to that of the doe (Ps 18:33 [34]).

Proverbs 5:19 likens the woman married in one's youth to "a loving doe" (ʾayyālā) and "a graceful deer," although the second Hebrew term, yaʿālā more properly describes a female mountain goat. Psalm 22 is set to a tune entitled "The Doe of the Morning."

The injunction employed by the female lover in Song of Songs 2:7; 3:5—"I charge you by the gazelles (šēbîyyā) and by the does (ʾayyālā) of the field"—is possibly a play on words, with the animals' nomenclature being very similar to the divine names šēbāʾôt (as in Lord of Hosts/Armies), and ʾēlōhim.

2.4. Bears. Though omnivorous rather than carnivorous, wild bears (dōb) could present a real threat to other animals and to humans, especially if food was scarce or their offspring endangered (compare Prov 17:12). The bear is an image of both danger and power. Wicked rulers are compared to bears attacking in Proverbs 28:15, while God's wrathful judgment on Jerusalem is likened to the mauling of a bear in Lamentations 3:10, 11.

(Job 9:9 and 38:32 refer to the constellation ʿayiš as a manifestation of God's creative power. The KJV translates Arcturus, though this is only a star in the constellation Ursa Major. The NIV and NRSV read "Bear.")

2.5. Pigs, Boars. Although prohibited and classified as unclean animals for the Israelites (Lev 11:7), Wisdom and poetic literature does not utilize any "unclean" imagery when referring to pigs. Instead, this prohibition made the pig effectively useless to the Israelite, resulting instead with concern about its "nuisance" value, for example, the wild, ravaging boar (hāzīr) of Psalm 80:13 [14].

Proverbs 11:22 compares an indiscrete, beautiful woman to a gold ring in a pig's snout.

2.6. Conies, Rock Badgers, Hyraxes. The wisdom and ability of these small creatures, denoted by the Hebrew šāpān, to make homes in the crags (Ps 104:18) is admired in Proverbs 30:26.

3. Birds.

3.1. Birds in General. ʿōp, from the verb ʿup, meaning "to fly," most commonly denotes birds (Job 12:7; 35:11; Ps 104:12), including carrion eaters (Ps 79:2) who were normally shunned as unclean, not only for allegedly hygienic reasons, but perhaps because of their association with the dead. The term may also refer to flying insects.

Another very common term for birds is šippōr (Ps 8:8 [9]), an allegedly onomatopoeic term, reflecting a bird's chirping cry, often heard in the early morning (Eccles 12:4). This term is used of both wild (Ps 11:1) and pet (Job 41:5 [40:29]) birds. Several verses using this term speak of birds fleeing from attempts to hunt (Lam 3:52) or ensnare them (Prov 6:5). Such imagery is used in various ways, for instance, warning against the hasty action of an unthinking bird (Prov 7:23), or, in contrast, to depict people escaping from their enemies, often through the aid of Yahweh (Ps 124:7).

The Psalmist also compares his solitude to that of a lone bird in Psalm 102:7 [8]. The NIV translates this term as "sparrow" in Proverbs 26:2 and Psalm 84:3 [4], the latter referring to the bird nesting near Yahweh's altar (compare Ps 104:17 and contrast Prov 27:8), so typifying delight, contentment and protection in the presence of God. Psalm 84:3 [4] and Proverbs 26:2 also refer to the swallow (dērōr), in the latter case as an example of ceaseless activity.

3.2. The Eagle and Other Birds of Prey. The biblical texts demonstrate some keen ornithological knowledge when describing the eagle (nešer) that soars and builds high nests (Job 39:27, cf. Prov 30:19), flying quickly into the sky (Lam 4:19) before swooping down on its prey (Job 9:26). This rapidity of movement depicts here, not sudden attacks against an enemy, but the swiftness of time passing. References to the eagle sprouting wings (Prov 23:5) and renewing its youth (Ps 103:5) may reflect its annual molting rather than its longevity, but it is clearly used of the invigorating renewal of strength imparted by Yahweh. However, the term nešer may denote other birds of prey as well, such as the vulture (see Prov 30:17 NIV, where the Hebrew reads bēnē nešer, "son of an eagle"). The reference to a vulture in Job 15:23 involves repointing the Hebrew text on the basis of the Greek Septuagint to read ʿayyā. This term is properly found in Job 28:7, where the subject's exemplary eyesight is reported, and is variously translated "hawk," "kite" or "falcon." It is used in parallel with ʿayīt, denoting some other unspecified (shrieking?) bird of prey. Job 39:26 uses the term nēš, probably referring to a hawk or falcon.

3.3. Other Birds. Similar difficulties of translation occur when seeking to identify other birds. The NIV translates (bat) yaʿānā in Job 30:29 as "owl," while other versions prefer "ostrich." (Compare Lam 4:3, though it is difficult to account for the heartlessness of this imagery, perhaps used here as a reprimand against those who treat their offspring badly.) The rēnānīm (birds with a ringing cry?) of Job 39:13 are also usually identified as ostriches. Again, there are negative connotations in the following verses, that speak of the bird's lack of care for its eggs, cruelty towards its young and a general lack of wisdom, in what seems to be a caricature of the ostrich's worst possible traits. These are not universally or even generally scientifically observed, but a comparison might be made with the equally inaccurate modern day belief that an ostrich "buries its head in the sand."

Job 39:13 contrasts this bird's wings, that flap joyfully but unproductively, with those of the hāsīdā. This bird has impressive pinions and feathers, and nests in pine trees (Ps 104:17), and has been identified as the stork, since it was deemed to be kind to its offspring (the root hsd means "kind, steadfast love").

Psalm 102:6 [7] uses the terms kōs and qāʾat, which may indicate some kinds of (desert?) owl, although qā'at may refer to the pelican. Whatever the precise identification of these birds, once again the imagery of solitude is invoked.

The dove (yônâ) may refer to a variety of birds from pigeons to rock- or turtledoves. The psalmist longs for the beautiful wings (Ps 68:13 [14]) of a dove in Psalm 55:6 [7] to fly from his present troubles, while the following psalm is most probably set to a tune titled "A Dove on Distant Oaks" (see Ps 56:1). Psalm 74:19 also uses yônâ in parallel to a reference to God's "afflicted people," for whom the psalmist craves mercy.

The cooing of the dove (tôr) is mentioned in Song of Songs 2:12. Song of Songs makes several figurative comparisons between the lovers and birds. The female is called a dove, a bird renowned for its loyalty to its mate (Song 2:14; 5:2; 6:9), a description that is also applied to both her (Song 1:15; 4:1) and her male lover's (Song 5:12) eyes. His hair is "black as a raven" (Song 5:11).

Clean birds could be eaten (Deut 14:11). God's provision of quail (šēlāw, Ps 105:40) is also reported in Psalm 78:27, using the general term, ôp. Conversely, God—who knows each individual bird (Ps 50:11)—provides food for them, even for the carrion-eating ravens (ôrēb, Prov 30:17). See Job 38:41 and Psalm 147:9 (and contrast 1 Kings 17:6!).

The notion found even today in common sayings that birds may pass on what they hear (e.g., "a little bird told me") is found in Ecclesiastes 10:20 (contrast Job 28:21).

Birds are literally described as "lords of the wing" (ba'al kânâp) in Proverbs 1:17 (cf. Eccles 10:20). God's care and protection is often described figuratively in terms of sheltering his people under his wings (see Ruth 2:12; Ps 17:8; 36:7 [8]; 57:1 [2]; 61:4 [5]; 63:7; 91:4).

4. Fish and Other Sea Creatures.

Fishing has long been an important activity in providing food for humans, although fish without fins or scales were prohibited for Israelites. Fish could be caught with hooks (Job 41:1 [40:25]), spears (41:7 [40:31]) or nets (Eccles 9:12). Due to such constant threats to their existence, fish therefore become representative of the transience and uncertainty of human life (Eccles 9:12). The fish of Egypt died during the first plague when the Nile turned to blood (Ps 105:29).

God has given humankind authority over the natural order, including the fish (dāg) of the sea (Ps 8:7, 8 [8, 9]). They are part of God's creation (Ps 146:6) and his general revelation (Job 12:8). The sea, and all its inhabitants ("everything in it," ûmēlô'ô) will rejoice in his kingship (Ps 96:11; 98:7). This includes the innumerable "creeping animals" denoted by the Hebrew remeš in Psalms 69:34 [35] and 104:25 (cf. Ps 148:10, where the same word seems to refer to the smaller land animals).

5. Insects, Reptiles and Other Miscellaneous Creatures.

5.1. Grasshoppers/Locusts. Nine words are used of locusts and grasshoppers throughout the entire OT, and it is not always possible to determine their exact meanings and distinctions. This plethora of words for locusts shows both the concern evoked by this creature, and expresses various images and traits associated with it. While a single locust would be no threat (Ps 109:23), their massive grouping in swarms, speedy travel and incredible consumption of crops made them a feared and irresistible terror (Job 39:20) to their victims.

Psalm 78:46 reports the plague of locusts afflicting the Egyptians using the words hāsîl (derived from a root meaning "to consume") and 'arbeh, the most common term for locust, indicating the vast size of the swarms, as in Psalm 105:34. This verse also uses the term yeleq, possibly indicating young locusts. Ecclesiastes 12:5 refers to another form of grasshopper, the hāgāb, while the locusts' wisdom in their regulated advance despite having no single leader is admired in Proverbs 30:27.

5.2. Frogs, Gnats and Flies. The plagues of flies ('ārôb), frogs (šēpardē'a) and gnats (kēn) that afflicted Egypt are recalled in Psalms 78:45 and 105:30, 31.

The term zēbûb (compare Baal-zebul/Beel-zebul, "lord of the flies") is used in Ecclesiastes 10:1 of the dead flies that contaminate ointment.

5.3. Ants, Bees and Spiders. The sluggard is instructed to consider the industrious ways of the ant (nēmālâ) in Proverbs 6:6. Their wisdom in preparing food during the summertime is admired in the only other occurrence of this word, in Proverbs 30:25.

In Psalm 118:12 a swarm of bees (dēbôrâ) becomes a metaphor for the nations that surround the psalmist, but who are defeated with Yahweh's help.

Job 8:14 refers to the flimsy web of the spider (‘akābīs), which Bildad compares to the fragile hope of the godless. The KJV reference to a spider in Proverbs 30:28 is now rejected, with “lizard” as the preferred meaning of the Hebrew šēmāmūt.

5.4. Moths and Worms. The moth (‘ās) is connected with ideas of destruction and weakness in the OT. The frailty of human existence is compared to the fragility of the moth in Job 4:19, and to its weakening and ultimate destruction of garments in Job 13:28. This also becomes a picture of God’s consumption of the wealth of sinful men (Ps 39:11 [12]), whose endeavours are as flimsy and unstable as a moth’s cocoon (Job 27:18).

The term rimmā for “worm” usually occurs in the context of decay, for example, the description of Job’s ailments in Job 7:5. Worms will feed on dead and decaying corpses (Job 21:26), while the associated ideas of suffering, death and decay are the future recompense of the wicked (Job 24:20). The term rimmā is used in parallel with šāḥat (“the pit, the grave, destruction, corruption”) in Job 17:14. It also occurs as a derogatory term in Job 25:6, used in parallel with tôlē‘ā, also translated “worm” (cf. Ps 22:6 [7]).

5.5. Slugs, Snails and Leeches. The slimy trail of the šabēlūl, translated “snail” (KJV) or “slug” (NIV) is interpreted as the animal “melting away” in Psalm 58:8 [9], to express the psalmist’s hope for the eventual demise and disappearance of unjust rulers.

Proverbs 30:15 mentions the ‘ālūqā in the context of four other objects that are never satisfied. Though not entirely certain, the term is usually translated as the blood-sucking leech.

5.6. Lizards and Roosters? The NIV translation of “lizard” is now preferred to the KJV’s “spider” for the term šēmāmūt, denoting a creature which, although prone to capture, can be found even in palaces. It occurs only in Proverbs 30:28, among a list of four small but wise animals.

The Hebrew phrase zar‘îr motnayim, found in Proverbs 30:31, literally means “girded at the hips/loins.” It is clearly intended to denote some animal with stately bearing, although the imagery may be a subtle warning against pride. Modern commentators prefer the NIV’s translation “rooster” to the “greyhound” of the KJV.

5.7. Snakes, Serpents. The Hebrew term peten is clearly associated with a venomous snake in Job 20:14, 16, with NIV translating it as “cobra” in

Psalm 58:4 [5] and 91:13. In this latter reference, it symbolizes, along with the lion, the threatening enemies against whom Yahweh provides protection and a refuge. Job 20:16 also uses the term ‘ep‘eh to indicate another venomous snake, usually translated “adder” or “viper.”

The most common word for snake in the OT, found especially in Genesis chapter 3, is nāḥās (see 2 Kings 18:4). In Psalm 58:4 [5] and in Ecclesiastes 10:11 it implies snake-charming, while the snake’s mysterious movement across (smooth?) rocks is marvelled at in Proverbs 30:19. As with peten, the nāḥās is also a threat to the unwary (Eccles 10:8), while the words of evil men (Ps 140:3 [4]) and the effects of strong drink (Prov 23:32) are compared to its venom. Other terms for snakes, variously translated “asps,” “serpents” or “vipers,” occur in these verses, specifically ‘akšūb in Psalm 140:3 [4], and šip‘ōni in Proverbs 23:32.

Nāḥās is used in Job 26:13 to refer to the “gliding serpent” pierced by God. It occurs in parallel to Rahab, a name given to the primordial sea monster of chaos, conquered by creator gods in extrabiblical creation myths. For further comment on these myths, see below.

It might also be noted that many of the creatures in this section that are associated with evil (snakes) or decay (worms) show no clear evidence of respiration to the average observer. This possibly suggested that they lacked “the breath of God” and so contributed to the negative imagery of such animals.

6. Mythological Creatures.

6.1. Leviathan. The Hebrew term liwyātān is consistently transliterated as Leviathan in the KJV, RSV and NIV texts of Job 3:8; 41:1; Psalm 74:14 and 104:26. Its description in Job 41:1, and an association with the Egyptian forces resisting the Exodus in Psalm 74:13, 14, has led to suggestions that this is the Nile crocodile. Other suggestions include various species of whale.

However, these contents of these texts have also been compared to certain extrabiblical mythologies that include many-headed (Ps 74:14) and serpentine monsters (the root lwy in Arabic means “to twist”). These can be responsible for eclipses (Job 3:8, 9), or are perhaps representative of chaotic and watery (Ps 74:13) forces that needed to be defeated in primordial history. Comparisons with the Babylonian creation myth involving the slaughter of Tiamat were especially popular in the past, often based on the now discounted link between the Hebrew word tēhôm, meaning depths (e.g., Ps 77:16 [17]), and the name of the god Tiamat.

It seems churlish to deny that the OT appeals to such myths in its poetic and Wisdom literature, as they are transformed in such a way so as not to lend them any literal credence, but rather to declare Yahweh's creative and conquering power over all other natural and cosmic forces.

6.2. Rahab. The Hebrew term rahāb literally means "pride," hence the KJV's translation of Job 26:12 as "he smiteth through the proud." Despite this, most modern translations transliterate the term as "Rahab" here and in Job 9:13; Psalm 87:4 and Psalm 89:10 [11]. As with Leviathan, an identification with the Nile crocodile has been postulated, especially as Psalm 87:4 uses the term symbolically of the Egyptian nation. More usually mythological associations are made, as Yahweh triumphs over the sea (yām, also the name of a Canaanite god) and crushes the primordial chaos monster, Rahab, in his triumphant creation work (see Ps 89:9-13 [10-14]).

6.3. Dragon, Whale, Sea Monster. The term tannīn is translated by the NIV as: "monster of the deep"; "monster" (in the waters) and "great sea creatures" in Job 7:12; Psalm 74:13 and Psalm 148:7 respectively. In Psalm 91:13 it is rendered "serpent." Other more specific literal translations have been offered, including whales, sea snakes or dolphins(?). Alternatively, as with Leviathan and Rahab, the term is considered to be symbolic of national forces or mythological monsters opposed to God.

It is noticeable that the three marine creatures above acquired mythical status among the ancient Israelites. This development may be due in part to the Hebrews' general dislike of the sea as the uncanny realm of chaos. Combined with what must have been very limited knowledge of the realm of the sea, the resulting awe and wonder from tales of such creatures almost certainly contributed to the legendary imagery associated with them.

6.4. Behemoth. The single reference to bēhēmōt in Job 40:15 has provoked much debate. Despite being an apparently plural form of bēhēmā ("beast"), it clearly refers to a single animal, probably implying some superlative creature (cf. Job 40:19). Whether it is to be identified with the hippopotamus, elephant or a majestic but mythical creature remains uncertain, but the emphasis of the passage is clearly on God's creative power. Indeed, the entire imagery of Job 38—41, with its mysterious allusions and grandiose variety of animal imagery, provides a subtle reminder of both humankind's ignorance and its awe before the exuberant and sovereign divine Creator.

See also FLORAL IMAGERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. O. Borowski, Every Living Thing: Daily Use of Animals in Ancient Israel (Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira, 1998); E. Firmage, "Zoology," ABD 6.1109-167; T. L. Forti, "Animal Images in the Book of Proverbs," Biblica 77 (1996) 48-63; idem, Animal Imagery in the Book of Proverbs (VTSup 118; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2008); P. Riede, Im Spiegel der Tiere: Studien zum Verhältnis von Mensch und Tier im alten Israel (OBO 187; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2002); R. A. Simkins, Creator and Creation: Nature in the Worldview of Ancient Israel (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); B. A. Strawn, What Is Stronger Than a Lion? Leonine Image and Metaphor in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East (OBO 212; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005); P. Wapnish and B. Hesse, "Archaeozoology," in Near Eastern Archaeology: A Reader, ed. S. Richard (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2003) 17-26.

P. T. Davies

ANTITHETIC PARALLELISM. See PARALLELISM.

APOCALYPTIC. See WISDOM AND APOCALYPTIC.

ARCHITECTURAL IMAGERY

A city's buildings provide the essential shelter and protection for its inhabitants. Archaeological excavations in the past century and more have unearthed many important architectural structures of the Bronze Age and Iron Age in all parts of the Near East, albeit fragmentary to some degree. Because there are virtually no ancient buildings that remain above ground, reconstructing the plan and design of any ancient architectural structure depends greatly on the evidence of excavations and archaeological reports (see DOTHB, Architecture). Accordingly, the symbolic meanings of ancient architectures have found their reference points in archaeologists' schematic reconstructions as well as from biblical texts. In the Psalter, Wisdom literature and Writings imageries of ancient buildings are numerous, and they can be categorized under residential and military architectures.

1. Residential Architecture
2. Military Architecture

1. Residential Architecture.

1.1. Household and Family. The word house denotes a dwelling place, which includes huts, palaces and temples. A typical house (bayît) in Iron Age Palestine was basically rectangular with either three or four rooms, normally divided by two rows of monolithic pillars. Entrance to the house was gained through a wooden door from the exterior courtyard, and situated at the back end of the house was a room that archaeologists have called a broadroom, which served as a storage space. The upper level of the house was used for sleeping, dining and entertaining (King and Stager, 28-29). Apart from daily family activities, the basic functions of an Israelite house involved storing items and stabling animals.

The basic symbolism of a house is the household or the family, where the man was the head (Esther 1:22; cf. Ruth 1:9). A house represented one's possessions, such as cattle (Ps 50:9) and offspring (Ruth 4:12; Sir 48:15), and to build a house was to produce a family (Ruth 4:11). One who feared the Lord was blessed with a fruitful family (Ps 128:3) and a house filled with glory, wealth and riches (Ps 49:16 [49:17 MT]; 112:3). Wisdom teachers often contrasted the house of the righteous with the house of the wicked. Whereas the house of the righteous would flourish, the house of the wicked would be destroyed (Prov 14:11; cf. Prov 15:25; 17:13). Unlike the house of the wicked, the house of the righteous gives sustenance and security (Prov 3:33; cf. Prov 7:27). During the Persian era the concept of *honor and shame came to be associated with one house (Herodotus Hist. 3.128-129). It was considered an utter shame to lose one's house to another person because it meant the loss of everything, including one's social status (Esther 8:1-2).

"The house of the father" and "The house of the mother" are used to refer to the place of residence of a virgin daughter or a widowed daughter (Ps 45:10; Sir 42:10; cf. Gen 38:11; Lev 22:13; Num 30:16; Deut 22:21; Judg 19:2-3; Ruth 1:8).

1.2. The Temple of Yahweh. Israel believed that God made his dwelling in a house, bayît (e.g., Ps 5:7 [5:8 MT]; 23:6; 26:8; 27:4; Lam 2:7; Sir 49:12 Gk; 50:1, 5), which was an assurance of his steadfast love (Ps 5:7 [5:8 MT]; 138:2). The house of Yahweh is also called the temple, which probably resembled the ground plan of a rectangular-house type, although no material remains of the first temple have been uncovered. It was divided into three units: the porch ('ēlām), the main room (hêkāl) and the innermost chamber (dēbîr). Reference to the main room (hêkāl) frequently indicated the temple itself (Ps 5:7 [5:8 MT]) and signified a heavenly palace (Ps 18:6 [18:7 MT]; 29:9). Prayers were directed to the heavenly palace (Ps 18:6), the innermost sanctuary (dēbîr) and the chamber of God (Ps 28:2).

Because of God's presence, his house (Ps 26:8; Add Esther 14:9), temple (Ps 11:4; 65:4; 79:1; 138:2; Sir 36:14 [36:19 Gk]; 49:12; 50:7) or sanctuary (Ps 63:2 [63:3 MT]; 68:35 [68:36 MT]; 96:6) is holy, glorious and majestic. It is in the house of Yahweh that his servants offer their service (Ps 134:1; 135:1-2), and the righteous are planted there like plants (Ps 92:13). From the house of Yahweh, God's people receive divine blessings, such as forgiveness of sins, agricultural harvest, economic well-being (Ps 65:4 [65:5 MT]; cf. Ps 92:13) and help (Ps 20:2 [20:3 MT]; cf. Ps 60:6 [60:8 MT]; 108:7). The house of Yahweh also came to mean the created universe, which, like the house of God, is filled with God's holiness (Ps 93:5) and satisfies both humankind and animals with nourishment and provision (Ps 36:8 [36:9 MT]).

The sanctuary, qōdeš (Ps 20:2 [20:3 MT]; 74:3; Sir 36:13) or miqdāš (Ps 73:17; 74:7; Lam 2:20; Sir 47:13; cf. 1 Kings 8:10-11; 2 Chron 5:11; 29:5, 7; 35:5), is another expression of the house of Yahweh. It refers to God's mighty firmament (Ps 150:1), and it is compared to the earth (Ps 78:69). Important to note, however, is that Israel, God's chosen people, has become the very sanctuary in which God dwells (Ps 114:2; cf. Lam 1:10).

1.3. Royal Palace. Although the term palace (hêkāl) refers to God's temple and heavenly palace, it primarily indicates the palace of the king (Ps 45:8, 15 [45:9, 16 MT]; Prov 30:28). There is not enough architectural data to make reconstructions of the palaces in Palestine. The royal palace is a representation of the king's nation (Ps 144:12) and a symbol of his empire (Esther 7:8; 9:4). The *imagery is set in the context of marriage and justice in the Psalter (Ps 45). As God's viceroy, the king rules from the royal palace, just as God rules from heaven. Contrary to the lavish decoration with ivory that indicates the disparity between the king and his people (cf. Jer 22:13-17), the beauty of the palace is a sign of divine blessing and presence (Ps 45:8 [45:9 MT]).

1.4. Wisdom House. In the wisdom tradition the image of a house is of great significance. It is used to portray the way of life and the character or works of a person. The way of folly is described as a ruined house (Sir 21:4; cf. Sir 21:18 Gk), which incurs the wrath of the deity (Job 15:28) and eventually will be overthrown (Sir 27:1-3 Gk). The house of the wicked woman is considered to be a dangerous place (Prov 7:8), filled with immoral pleasure rather than sustenance and security (Prov 7:27). Thus, young people are exhorted not to go near even its door (Prov 5:8), for it will lead them to death (Prov 2:18; 7:27). To enter the house of folly is to enter into the realm of foolishness, while to enter a house of wisdom is to enter into an intimate union with wisdom (cf. Wis 8:16).

The houses of the wicked and of the righteous are contrasted with, respectively, a spider web (J[Job 8:11-15] and a stone house (Job 8:16-19). The former is marked by its fragility (Job 8:11-15), and the latter is characterized by its strength (Job 8:16-19). The house of those who fear the Lord will be filled with wisdom (Sir 1:17), but disasters will come to the house of sinners (Sir 23:11 Gk; cf. Deut 5:11). The blessings of parents will strengthen the house of their children (Sir 3:9 Gk), but slanderous words will cause damage to the house of the great person (Sir 28:14 Gk).

The most significant description of the house of wisdom is found in Proverbs 9:1. It is built by wisdom with seven pillars (cf. Prov 14:1; 24:3), a design similar to an ancient aristocratic house capable of housing a large number of guests. The wisdom house is understood differently. In light of the fact that wisdom is thought to be a virtuous woman in Proverbs, and the house is set in the context of feasting and celebration (Prov 9:1-6), the house that wisdom built is best seen as a large Israelite house, with the number even symbolizing completeness or perfection (Waltke, 432-33) or the seven poems in Proverbs 2 (Skehan), which signify the abundant blessings of wisdom.

1.5. Human Body. The human body is pictured as a house, characterized by its form as clay and by its origin as dust (Job 4:19) and made up of various parts: arms, legs, teeth, eyes, mouth, ears (Eccles 12:3). Just as a house deteriorates when it gets old, so also does the human body (Eccles 12:3-7). In Song of Songs the word house often has sexual connotations. For example, "the house of the mother" (bêr 'ēm) depicts both the womb where one is conceived (Song 3:4; cf. Song 8:2) and the genitals of the female who is looking forward to offering her body to her lover (Song 8:2). Furthermore, "house of wine" points to a particular private place where the lovers meet for lovemaking (Song 2:4) rather than a literal "house of drinking wine" (Esther 7:8) or drinking house (Jer 16:8).

One picture that speaks of the beauty of the female body is that of a tower (migdāl). For example, the female's neck is compared to the tower of David (Song 4:4), filled with power and dignity, or an ivory tower (Song 7:4 [7:5 MT]), which suggests a strong and elegant neck. Her nose is likened to the beauty and greatness of the tower of Lebanon (Song 7:4), and her mature breasts are like towers (Song 8:10).

1.6. Death. The place where the dead congregate was thought to be built with houses, each one consisting of a door and windows (Reider, 102-3) and filled with all kinds of treasures (Job 3:15). A death in the family is pictured as "the house of mourning" (Eccles 7:2), and the grave is the house of the dead (Job 3:15). Indeed, death is the meetinghouse for all the living (Job 30:23) and a place of no return for anyone who goes there (Job 7:9-10). Ultimately, humankind would move from this earthly house to the house in another world, Sheol (Job 17:13).

1.7. Israel. The word house describes Israel as a community (Ps 114:1) as well as the twelve federation tribes (Ps 98:3; 115:12; 135:19). Rachel and Leah (and their respective maidservants) giving birth to the twelve sons of Israel are seen as building up the house of Israel (Ruth 4:11). When the term is used with a personal name, it bears the duty associated with that person. For example, the house of Aaron (Ps 115:10, 12; 118:3; 135:19) and the house of Levi (Ps 135:20) present Israel as a priestly people (cf. Ex 19:6; Is 61), and the house of David refers to the Davidic court in dispensing justice (Ps 122:5; cf. Ps 101:2, 7).

2. Military Architecture.

2.1. Fortress and Stronghold. To protect itself from the attacks of enemies, a city built on hills needs defense architecture. This defense architecture is a fortress, mēšûdâ (Ps 31:2 [31:3 MT]), or a stronghold, mišgāb (Ps 9:9 [9:10 MT]). The word fortress refers to a walled fortification on a high mountain (2 Sam 5:6-7), and the word stronghold can indicate any protected place. These two terms are interchangeable, describing an inaccessible, secured building of defense or fortification (Ps 18:2 [18:3 MT]) against enemies (cf. Ps 89:40 [89:41 MT]; 108:10 [108:11 MT]). Although defense architecture does not always provide safety for the city dwellers, it represents the most powerful image of security. In the Psalter primarily, God is portrayed as a fortress in the time of trouble (Ps 31:2-3) and a stronghold in the day of distress (Ps 59:9 [59:10 MT]). Such an image reflects the psalmist's rocklike trust in God's insurmountable power amidst life-threatening dangers (Ps 18:2 [18:3 MT]; 62:6 [62:7 MT]; 31:2 [31:3 MT]). For the psalmist, the ultimate protection is God, in whom alone one finds salvation and deliverance (Ps 18:2 [18:3 MT]; 71:3; 144:2) and steadfast love (Ps 59:17 [59:18 MT]). The presence of the Lord is like an impenetrable stronghold (Ps 46:7, 11 [46:8, 12 MT]), which his people experienced historically (1 Kings 18—20; cf. Is 36—38). This mighty fortress, however, ceases to protect the people when they sin against their rock of refuge (Lam 2:5, 7). Indeed, the state of strength and security is not without condition (Ps 62:1-12).

The word refuge (mā'ôz) is associated with a fortress/stronghold and indicates either a natural or any constructed place of shelter and protection (Ps 28:8; 31:2, 4 [31:3, 5 MT]). The most common use is a figurative one, designating God as the refuge for his people in times of trouble (Ps 27:1; 37:9; cf. Ps 48:3, 13 [48:4, 14 MT]; 122:7) and the "refuge of the head," mā'ôz rō'šî—that is, the chief fortress (Ps 60:7 [60:9 MT]; 108:8 [108:9 MT]). The righteous take refuge in God (Prov 10:29; Ps 43:2; 52:7 [52:9 MT]), but the wicked take refuge in their riches and wealth (Ps 73:7 [73:9 MT]).

2.2. Wall. Surrounding the fortress, as well as the city, is a huge wall (hêl; hômâ; qîr; gāder), which is unlike the stone fence that protects vineyards, orchards or gardens (Eccles 10:8; cf. Prov 24:31). The walls were built of mud brick or stone, enhanced with various features, such as glacis with supporting retaining walls, and dry moat. After the Solomonic era solid walls replaced casemate walls in Palestine. The massive wall, standing between the inhabitants and their enemies, provides the most basic and crucial protection to the city dwellers. The word wall, therefore, has become an important portrayal of divine protection and peace (Ps 48:13 [48:14 MT]; 122:7). In the wisdom tradition a wall is said to encircle wisdom's house, and those who encamp near it are wise. Not only are they able to learn wisdom, but also they find protection and security (Sir 14:24; 22:17 Gk).

The wall has negative connotations as well. A wrecked or broken wall expresses the meaning of defeat and God's judgment (Ps 80:12 [80:13 MT]; 89:40 [89:41 MT]; Lam 2:18; cf. Lam 2:7-8), and it is an image of a lazy or ill-disciplined person (Prov 24:31; cf. Prov 25:28). A thick wall of darkness has blinded the adulterers to their sins (Sir 23:18 Gk). The rich see their wealth as a high wall of security (Prov 18:11), but anyone who does not trust in God is in a precarious position like a leaning wall (Ps 62:3 [62:4 MT]). In Song of Songs the imagery of the wall is used in the context of sexuality and contrasted with the "door" (delet). Whereas the door indicates a promiscuous woman, the wall denotes chastity (Song 8:9-10; cf. Song 2:8).

2.3. Gate. The gate (ša'ar) is the only entrance to the walled city, and its breach implies the fall of the city (cf. Gen 22:17; 24:60). Thus the gate is considered to be the most vulnerable point of defense. The gate could also refer to a public concourse where social and judicial events take place (Job 29:7; 31:21; Ps 9:14 [9:15 MT]; 69:12 [69:13 MT]; 127:5; Prov 22:22; 31:23; cf. Prov 14:19). As a metaphor, it represents the entire city (Ps 24:7, 9; 87:2; cf. Ps 100:4), security (Ps 147:13) and the point of entrance to a certain realm, such as death (Job 38:17; Ps 9:13 [9:14 MT]; 107:18), Hades (Wis 16:13), deep darkness (Job 38:17) and righteousness (Ps 118:19). It is at the gate that the wisdom invitation is made (Wis 6:14), signifying that wisdom instruction is applicable to all people (Prov 1:21; 8:3). Through the gate of wisdom the wise obtain a happy life (Prov 8:34), but for fools it is a dead end (Prov 24:7).

2.4. Tower. A tower (migdāl) is part of the defense architecture, usually built at the corners on the wall (cf. 2 Chron 14:7), providing enhancement for the city walls and gates. From the towers the inhabitants could direct arrows and other projectiles at the enemies scaling the walls. The word tower renders God's protection against the enemies (Ps 61:3 [61:4 MT]) and indicates his eternal presence (Ps 48:12-14 [48:13-15 MT]). An immovable tower is used to describe the name of the Lord, which gives life to the righteous (Prov 18:10).

In summary, the imagery of architecture has at least two types of representation. With reference to residential building, it represents one's life, death, household, body, a nation or an empire, and the heavenly palace. As an image of military building, it conveys a basic meaning of protection and security.

See also ANIMAL IMAGERY; CREATION IMAGERY; FLORAL IMAGERY; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; PSALMS 6: ICONOGRAPHY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Z. Herzog, "Fortifications (Levant)," ABD 2:844-52; J. S. Holladay Jr., "House, Israelite," ABD 3:308-18; O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997); P. J. King and L. E. Stager, Life in Biblical Israel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); J. Reider, "Contributions to the Scriptural Text," HUCA 24 (1952-1953) 85-106; K.-D. Schunck, "מִצְדֵּי," TDOT 8:501-5; K. N. Schoville, "מִצְדֵּי," NI-DOTTE 2:1013-15; P. W. Skehan, "The Seven Columns of Wisdom House in Proverbs 1-9, in Studies in Israelite Poetry and Wisdom, ed. J. A. Fitzmyer (CBQMS 1; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1971) 9-14; B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); G. R. H. Wright, Ancient Building in South Syria and Palestine (2 vols.; HO 7; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1985); Y. Yadin, The Art of Warfare in Biblical Lands in the Light of Archaeological Discovery (London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1963); P. Zimansky, "Art and Architecture: Ancient Near Eastern Architecture," ABD 1:408-19. M. Phua

AROMATICS. See FLORAL IMAGERY.

ASAPH AND SONS OF KORAH

In addition to the five books into which the whole is arranged, the book of *Psalms also includes a number of smaller collections, several of which can be identified through their headings. These include the Songs of Ascents and several Davidic collections, as well as those associated with Asaph and the Sons of Korah. Psalms 50; 73—83 are associated with Asaph, while Psalms 42; 44—49; 84—85; 87—88 are associated with the Sons of Korah. Since Psalm 43 is clearly a continuation of Psalm 42, even though the canonical structure has separated it off, it too can be regarded as a Korah psalm. Psalm 88 is unusual in that it appears to have a double title that also associates it with Heman the Ezrahite, though he may have been a leading member of the group (cf. 1 Chron 6:33).

Although the exact function of the titles is disputed, it seems likely that they at least serve to indicate that these psalms are part of identifiable collections, so there is reason to treat them together. It is notable that although most of these psalms occur within the so-called Elohistic Psalter, the last four Korah psalms fall outside of this division. This would suggest some complexity in the canonical process, and that attempts to identify these psalms as northern on the basis of the preference for the name 'ēlōhīm may confuse a redactional process within the Psalter with evidence for their origin. On the other hand, the peculiar use of "Joseph" as a label for the nation in the Asaph psalms, complete with an unusual Hebrew spelling in Psalm 81:6 (81:5 ET) (uniquely yēhōsēp, suggesting "Jehoseph" as the form of the name), might suggest some northern echoes (Goulder 1996, 24-27).

The book of Chronicles also links both collections to bands of Levitical temple musicians initiated by *David (1 Chron 6:31-48), though internal evidence suggests a later date for the canonical collections, with Ezra-Nehemiah suggesting that both guilds were active after the exile. We are therefore dealing with psalms produced over a period by musical groups rather than by specific individuals whom we can identify. Nevertheless, the Chronicler suggests that these guilds embodied traditions that reached back to the time of David.

1. The Psalms of Asaph
2. The Psalms of the Sons of Korah

1. The Psalms of Asaph.

1.1. Identity of Asaph. Although several figures with the name "Asaph" are mentioned in the OT, the one most likely to be associated with these psalms is mentioned in 1 Chronicles 6:24 as a leader of one of the groups of temple singers established by David. Asaph appears as a worship leader in 1 Chronicles 15:17, 19, while in 1 Chronicles 16:5 he is in charge of *music when the ark was brought into Jerusalem. Subsequently, Asaph was left as a minister of the ark (1 Chron 16:37). 1 Chronicles 25 indicates that

Asaph was involved in leading a musical guild, while 2 Chronicles 5:12 shows him leading a guild of singers when the ark was brought to the temple by Solomon. Chronicles then traces a continuing role for this musical guild through the reigns of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 20:14), Hezekiah (2 Chron 29:13) and Josiah (2 Chron 35:15). 2 Chronicles 29:30 suggests that a collection of Asaph psalms must have existed at the time of Hezekiah, though we cannot determine the content of this collection, so their relationship to the canonical collection remains unclear. The importance of the reference is that it suggests that a recognizable group of Asaph psalms could be identified in the late eighth century BC. Ezra 2:41 (cf. Neh 7:44) notes that members of the guild returned from the exile, while Ezra 3:10 indicates that they were involved in the dedication of the second temple. Nehemiah 11:17, 22 suggest a continued role for the guild, while Nehemiah 12:46 makes clear that an Asaph collection also existed at the time of Nehemiah. Although we cannot be certain of the content of this collection, it is not unlikely that it bore at least some resemblance to the collection now included in the Psalter. It is clear from internal evidence that the collection includes pieces that originated across the whole of this period. That reference to the Asaph collection extends across such a body of texts renders unlikely the suggestion by Goulder (1996, 28) that Asaph did not exist, and that the name was developed to provide a title for a collection of northern psalms for which a senior musician at the time of David needed to be invented.

1.2. Content of the Psalms of Asaph. Comparatively few psalms contain direct historical references that enable us to date them with certainty, and the Asaph psalms are no exception. Nevertheless, there are enough datable references within the Asaph psalms to indicate that the exile was a significant trigger for the development of the canonical collection. Not all of the psalms necessarily originated with the exile, but the main collection (Pss 73–83) appears to be shaped by concerns generated by the fall of Jerusalem. This is preferable to the suggestion by Goulder (1996, 36) that the Asaph psalms originated at Bethel in the 720s BC, and that the references to Jerusalem derive from editing required to enable their reuse in Judah.

Psalm 50 stands apart from the main Asaph collection and appears to function as a divider between the first collection of the psalms of the Sons of Korah (Pss 42–49) and a collection of Davidic psalms (Pss 51–65) whose titles indicate specific connections with events in David's life recounted in the books of Samuel. This psalm's relationship to the exile is more difficult to determine, but its prophetic rejection of sacrificial worship alone and encouragement toward the offering of thanksgiving certainly would fit with the exile. However, it has a more immediate link with Psalm 51, which likewise downplays the importance of sacrifice as opposed to heartfelt praise. Psalm 50 encourages the nation to see *worship as being more than just the cult, just as Psalm 51 does for the individual. But Psalm 50 also links to the main body of Asaph psalms in that both it and Psalm 81 are "prophetic covenant liturgies" (Craigie, 363) that employ direct address from God within the psalm and call the nation to repentance.

The main body of Asaph psalms occurs in Psalms 73–83. A number of scholars have highlighted the importance of Psalm 73 for the shape of the whole of the Psalter (e.g., Brueggemann and Miller), but we should also understand it as introducing the remainder of the Asaph collection. It is an individual's testimony (Firth, 451–52), telling of a near loss of faith that was averted only through a worship experience in the temple, in which the psalmist realizes that the greatest good is to be found not in who has external prosperity but rather in the presence of God. This individual's testimony could have arisen at any time, but it suggests an answer to a larger issue that would also affect the nation with the fall of Jerusalem. Although a range of dates has been proposed, it seems likely that several of the Asaph psalms reflect quite directly on the destruction of the city and the temple by the Babylonians. Psalm 74:3–8 refers to the damage done to the temple by an unnamed enemy, while Psalms 79–80 refer to events surrounding the city's destruction. The meaning of covenant and the blessings that were supposed to go with it could then be openly discussed, so the placement of Psalm 73 at the head of the collection suggests that this individual's experience is also a paradigm for the nation. Psalms 82–83, which close the collection, can then be read against the experience of the exile as an appeal to God to act against all the nation's enemies, a prayer for the nation to experience what the individual has discovered in Psalm 73. God's justice for a penitent people is announced in Psalm 81, and these prayers look for this justice to be demonstrated.

The Asaph psalms are also marked by an interest in history. Although not unique to this collection (cf. Pss 105—106), it is particularly notable that its heart (Pss 75—80) is shaped by a strong historical consciousness. Thus, Psalm 75 announces that the nation recounts the wondrous deeds of God (Psalm 75:1), before describing God's activity in general terms, a pattern continued in Psalm 76. Against this, Psalm 77 is an individual complaint that sees reflection on history as a way toward resolution of a present crisis (Ps 77:10), a reflection that leads specifically to the exodus. Psalm 78 is the centerpiece of this group, an extended piece that provides instruction on the faithfulness of God through history from the exodus through to David. The psalm insists that God was consistently faithful in the face of national faithlessness, climaxing in the appointment of David as the shepherd of his people. Psalms 79—80 then draw on this historical awareness, while emphasizing that God is the nation's ultimate shepherd, to ask for restoration. Thus, the Asaph psalms are a tightly grouped selection in which covenant, individual testimony and national reflection can be applied to the sense of loss created by the exile.

2. The Psalms of the Sons of Korah.

2.1. Identity of the Sons of Korah. As with Asaph, there are a number of individuals known as Korah in the OT. Again, evidence for the most likely identification of Korah comes from Chronicles. 1 Chronicles 6:22 lists a Korah who was descended from Kohath, one of the three Levite clans responsible for the sanctuary. 1 Chronicles 6:33 includes this group among those organized by David for music in the sanctuary. This Korah is most likely the one who was engaged in a revolt against Moses (Num 16) and was destroyed in the wilderness (Num 16:32). 1 Chronicles 9:19, although in a genealogy of those who returned from exile, contains a telescoped reference back to the same Korah, suggesting that a group that traced its origin back to the time of David was still identifiable in the post-exilic period. Chronicles is not consistent in its usage, and at some points it refers only to the Kohathites (2 Chron 29:12; 34:12), and sometimes to the Korahites as a group related to but distinct from the Kohathites (2 Chron 20:19).

The list of gatekeepers in 1 Chronicles 26:1-19 refers to the Korahites in a nonmusical role, but we would expect such a dispersal of tasks across the clan. The MT of 1 Chronicles 26:1-2 links the Korahites to Asaph, but this text probably is corrupt, and we should follow the LXX [cf. REB] and read "Abiasaph," which also conforms to 1 Chronicles 9:19. The Sons of Korah mentioned in the titles of certain psalms are thus to be identified with a Kohathite musical guild that operated across the period of the monarchy and through to the period after the exile. The psalms within this collection could have developed at any point within this period.

2.2. Content of Psalms of the Sons of Korah. The psalms of the Sons of Korah contain even less datable information than do the psalms of Asaph. Given that proposed dates range across several centuries, there is comparatively little value in seeking supposed festal sequences (e.g., Goulder 1982, 1-22) that lie behind them. Rather, their themes are best explored through an examination of their canonical structure. This needs to consider their distribution into two main groups, Psalms 42—49 and Psalms 84—88 (excluding Ps 86, though by its placement it is linked to the Korah psalms), and the strong focus on Jerusalem that is found in all except the closing psalm of each block. Tied in with the theme of Jerusalem is an emphasis on the fact that God is the great king over all the earth, though the place of Israelite kings certainly is acknowledged.

These themes are immediately brought together in Psalms 42—44, which, along with Psalm 88, constitute the only complaint psalms within this collection. Psalm 42 is also closely linked to Psalm 88 in the use of water imagery, not least the comparison of a negative experience of God to a series of waves passing over someone who cannot swim (compare Ps 42:7 and Ps 88:7). The complaint in Psalms 42—43 is somewhat different from Psalm 88 in that it concerns a desire to be in the presence of God, and especially at the sanctuary, when it does not appear that this is possible. As the psalm develops, the psalmist gradually comes to a point of believing that there will be a chance to return to the sanctuary (Ps 43:3-4). This is a source of hope, but the negative experience of God remains. This theme is then expressed in terms of the nation in Psalm 44, which complains of a failure of God to be faithful to the nation even though they had not deviated from the covenant (Ps 44:17-19). As a result, the nation has been defeated in battle. Since it seems that the individual who speaks at some points within this psalm is the king, it is unlikely that the reference is to the exile, so the psalm must have been used at various points where the nation had been defeated in battle. The plaintive cry for deliverance with which it ends insists that the nation should have the same hope as that of the individual in Psalms 42—43.

It is against the background of this negative experience of God that we are to read Psalms 45—48, because they address this concern. Psalm 45 is a royal wedding song that also focuses on the military hope for the nation (Ps 45:2-5). The psalm insists on the close relationship between God and his king and prepares the way for the great affirmations about the reign of God that we find in Psalms 46—48. All these psalms focus on Jerusalem as the city of God. This is less explicit in Psalm 46, which celebrates the nation's ultimate security in God, in which the city remains unnamed but, as the city of God, clearly is Jerusalem. Psalm 47 likewise does not name the city, but it describes the journey of the ark up to the temple in Jerusalem as a celebration of victories achieved by Yahweh (Broyles, 149-50), thus linking back to Psalm 46. The *Zion theme is made explicit in Psalm 48, in which the people are invited to see the strength of the city as a reminder of the greater security offered by God. All of this is to the praise of God, praise that is summoned from all peoples. The opening collection closes with Psalm 49, which is an exploration of the hope of God's people in the face of adversity, a wisdom psalm that explicitly addresses the nations summoned to see the greatness of God in the preceding psalms.

The second Korahite collection follows immediately on from the Asaph psalms. Closely tied to the Asaph psalms (Wilson, 164), this group has less coherence, though themes from the first collection are retained. Thus, Psalm 84 and Psalm 87 celebrate the beauty of Zion with an additional prayer for the Lord's anointed (Ps 84:9). Psalm 85 prays for national restoration, while Psalm 88 is perhaps the bleakest individual complaint in the Psalter, though it also prepares readers for the national complaint of Psalm 89, with which it is paired. Thus, the Korah psalms are bound by dialectic that holds together honest complaint and the hope offered by the presence of God.

See also EDITORIAL CRITICISM; PSALMS 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. C. Broyles, "The Psalms and Cult-Symbolism: The Case of the Cherubim-Ark," in Interpreting the Psalms: Issues and Approaches, ed. P. S. Johnston and D. G. Firth (Leicester: Apollos, 2005) 139-56; W. Brueggemann, "Bounded by Obedience and Praise: The Psalms as Canon," JSOT 50 (1991) 63-92; W. Brueggemann and P. D. Miller, "Psalm 73 as a Canonical Marker," JSOT 72 (1996) 45-56; P. C. Craigie, Psalms 1-50 (WBC 19; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); D. G. Firth, "Psalms of Testimony," OTE 12.3 (1999) 440-54; M. D. Goulder, The Psalms of the Sons of Korah (JSOTSup 20; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1982); idem, The Psalms of Asaph and the Pentateuch (JSOTSup 233; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); H. P. Nasuti, Tradition History and the Psalms of Asaph (Atlanta: SBL, 1988); G. H. Wilson, The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (SBLDS 76; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985).
D. G. Firth

ASSONANCE. See POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; SOUND PATTERNS.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY

The OT contains a small number of texts that may be considered autobiographies, and a larger number of autobiographical texts. An awareness of how these texts function and what literary devices they employ can aid our understanding of their meanings.

1. Definition
2. Functions of Autobiography
3. Autobiographies in Old Testament Wisdom and Poetry
4. Conclusion

1. Definition.

Modern literary critics have found it difficult to agree on a precise definition of autobiography as a literary genre; indeed, J. Olney (3) described it as "the most elusive of literary documents." Some contend that true autobiographies appeared only following the Enlightenment with the rise of individuality (e.g., Smith and Watson; Weintraub), whereas others argue that such restrictions are culturally biased and unnecessarily reductionistic. J. Sturrock (286), for example, states that "there can be no timeless definition of autobiography,” arguing instead that the “the bounds of the ‘autobiographical’ will be measured differently from age to age” (see also Howarth, 84).

For the purposes of OT study, autobiography can best be defined as a text in which the author retrospectively relates select events and experiences from his or her own life from the perspective of the author’s present. Retrospection is significant because the author evaluates his or her past in light of present knowledge and circumstances—this unlike a diary, which lacks such distanced reflection. Also important is the selectivity of the account, as Sturrock (287) notes: “Whatever an autobiography contains it contains not simply because such has been the writer’s experience and he therefore had no option but to include it, but because this is his past as he has chosen to project it. What we are reading is already an interpretation and the writer an active, not a passive force.” The choice of events recorded in an autobiography is not accidental but deliberate, and all work together to fulfill the author’s purpose.

The distinction between an autobiography and an autobiographical text lies in the amount of the author’s life that is recorded. A brief reference to a past event from the author’s life (as in, e.g., Prov 4:3-9) cannot reasonably be described as an autobiography, but it nonetheless can employ the characteristic traits of the genre and thus be autobiographical.

2. Functions of Autobiography.

Autobiography differs from some other literary genres in that it is defined not by the form of the writing but rather by its content (unlike, e.g., a limerick, which must correspond to a specific pattern but whose subject matter is unconstrained). Consequently, autobiographers may employ a broad range of devices in order to convey their message. Nonetheless, the distinctive features of autobiography can themselves be employed to achieve particular ends, and awareness of these features is important for understanding the means by which authors convey their message as well as the message that they convey, and it may influence the author’s choice of autobiography as a means to best communicate the message.

2.1. Authority. The authority of a text is partially bound up with the credentials of the author, and so when autobiographical texts identify their authors, this may function to enhance their authority. This is apparent in the identification of *Solomon as author of wisdom material. It is important to note, however, that the identification of a text’s author is not necessarily made in order to enhance the text’s authority. D. G. Meade (72), for example, argues that pseudonymous texts could be considered to be authoritative in the ancient world in spite of their pseudonymity, and that the identity of the author could serve ends beyond establishing the text’s authority. However, it is also probable that recognition of deliberate deception regarding the author’s identity would undermine the authority of a text, particularly when the identification of the author is made specifically to enhance the authority of the text. For this reason it is significant that, although strongly implying identity with Solomon, neither *Qohelet nor the author of the frame (see Frame Narrator) of *Ecclesiastes ever makes the identification explicit (see Waltke, 35).

Although autobiography sacrifices the availability of the narrator’s omniscient viewpoint for the more limited perspective of an individual who can no longer make authoritative pronouncements on the inner thoughts and motives of others, this can have the effect of enhancing the authority of the text regarding the inner thoughts and motives of the author over that which would otherwise be described by an omniscient narrator by providing firsthand testimony to those thoughts and motives. This immediacy enhances the authority of texts whose authors are otherwise unknown, such as Proverbs 22:17—24:22; 24:23-34.

2.2. Empathy. One distinctive feature of autobiography is the first-person appeal to experiences, feelings and events that the author has personally encountered. An effect of this can be to heighten the link between the author and the audience, for the audience now engages directly with the author’s life—there is no intermediate narrator interposed between the two such that the events are further removed from the audience. This can serve to establish an empathic connection between author and audience, between the author’s experience and the audience’s experience. The first-person nature of autobiographical texts invites audience participation, particularly with forms such as psalms, where it is likely that the texts were recited and used liturgically. Empathy thus can be generated via the immediacy and inherent interiority of the autobiographical form, revealing the inner emotions more directly than in third-person descriptions. The empathic nature of autobiography is frequently exploited in modern autobiographies that, as G. Gusdorf (36-39) has noted, often function as an apology for the actions of the author's life.

Empathy, however, is not automatically or exclusively generated by autobiographical forms. There must be other elements within the text that allow the reader to identify with the author, and there must be nothing overly offensive about the author's character as depicted in the text. As such, the degree of empathy that a reader feels with an autobiographer may well be culturally determined.

2.3. Distance. In a number of examples of autobiography in the OT, the autobiographical text is embedded within a narrative (such as Qohelet's autobiography in the book of Ecclesiastes, and the Ezra and Nehemiah memoirs within Ezra-Nehemiah). In these instances the autobiography presents an alternative voice to the narrator of the text. As T. C. Eskenazi (126) has observed, this allows the text to present a personal but subjective viewpoint in the first-person voice of the autobiographer as well as a third-person assessment of the autobiographer from the narrator. These distinct viewpoints may allow the narrator to appeal to the autobiography for support of the case being made. Alternatively, however, they may allow the narrator to maintain distance from the autobiographical comments included within the narrative (see 3.3 below).

2.4. Instruction. The reflection on personal experience characteristic of autobiography allows authors to base advice and teaching to others on their past experiences, both to illustrate and to substantiate that teaching. Events are selected, shaped and linked in such a way as to lend support to the author's own purpose in writing. Such an approach is common in Wisdom literature and is employed in a number of other autobiographical texts from throughout the ancient Near East (see Longman 1991, 97-129). This is particularly apparent in Qohelet's autobiography: the events are related in order to substantiate the point that Qohelet ultimately wished to draw, the lesson that he has learned from his experiences (see Eccles 1—2; also Ps 73).

2.5. Achievements. Some West Semitic and Akkadian royal inscriptions served to highlight the personal achievements of the king through recitation of his major accomplishments as well as through comparison with the king's predecessors (Seow, 281-84). The inscription of these autobiographies was intended to stand as eternal testimony to the king and thus "to be the king's assurance of immortality" (Seow, 284). Sometimes these texts also have a didactic element—J. L. Crenshaw (128) highlights Egyptian instructions or royal testaments in which "the pharaohs or viziers collected their insights for the benefit of aspiring young rulers, whom they hoped to steer successfully along paths of wisdom. Such advice appeared in autobiographical form, constituting a king's legacy for his successors."

3. Autobiographies in Old Testament Wisdom and Poetry.

The identification of autobiographical texts in the OT has been less problematic than modern discussions of the genre might suggest. Texts identified as autobiographical are restricted to those that are written in the first-person singular and make reference to events and experiences in the life of the narrator. Although some maintain more subtle distinctions in genre (such as between memoir and autobiography), there is little indication that much is gained in preserving these distinctions (see Longman 1991, 43).

The OT contains a few autobiographies and more examples of autobiographical texts. The focus of the present article is on those found in the Writings, but we should note that the form does exist in other parts of the OT, such as Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Ezra-Nehemiah. Although these texts are not discussed here, their use of autobiographical forms shares some of the general functions of this form outlined above. Examples of autobiographical texts found within the scope of the present volume are discussed below.

Autobiography is particularly suited to Wisdom literature, which often bases its advice in the wisdom garnered by the sage from personal life experiences. This is seen both in the OT and in some of the Egyptian instructions that closely parallel biblical Wisdom literature (e.g., Eccles 1—2; cf. the Egyptian Instruction for Meri-ka-re).

3.1. Psalms. In the book of *Psalms, roughly two-thirds of the psalms include first-person references, although many of these do not fit the strict definition of autobiography. Psalm 51, for example, while appealing to events in David's life, does so from a perspective contemporaneous with those events rather than retrospectively. Some psalms, such as Psalms 18; 32; 73 and the apocryphal Psalm 151 (an autobiographical account of David's early years) do present reflections on events in the earlier life of the psalmist and so contain true autobiographical elements.

Autobiographical (and other first-person) references in psalms primarily function empathetically (see 2.2 above), although in conjunction with the *psalm titles' authorial ascriptions (e.g., "A psalm of David") the association with renowned historical figures also serves to lend a degree of authority to the words of the psalm. When wisdom psalms include autobiographical reflections (e.g., Ps 73), these also function to lend authority to the conclusions drawn on the basis of the author's experiences (see 2.4 above).

3.2. Proverbs. The book of *Proverbs contains a number of autobiographical passages that are too brief to be accurately described as autobiographies (e.g., Prov 4:3-9; 24:30-34; 30:1-9 [see Waltke, 26, 79, 275]). In Proverbs 4:3-9, for example, the writer's only appeal to a life experience is found in v. 3, where he recalls his father's advice to him. The advice itself is then reported, but without autobiographical reflection or appeal to the father's experience. In spite of this, the first-person speech does share some of the aforementioned functions ascribed to autobiography.

The recollections of Proverbs 7:6-20 are closer to true autobiography (Waltke, 81) and are followed by the "autobiography of wisdom" in Proverbs 8, which sufficiently incorporates the characteristics of the genre to qualify as true autobiography. It is written in the first person (Prov 8:4-36), and it relates events in wisdom's past (e.g., Prov 8:22-31). The autobiographical appeal to wisdom's role in creation as an aide to God affirms its divinely endorsed value and authority and underlines the validity of the supposition that at a fundamental level the creation operates in a manner consistent with the presuppositions of the wisdom movement (see Waltke, 407).

3.3. Ecclesiastes. Although the bulk of the book of *Ecclesiastes is phrased in the first-person, spoken by the sage *Qohelet, only the opening chapters (Eccles 1:12—2:26) explicitly relate events from Qohelet's life, and so only these chapters—often designated the "Royal Fiction"—are usually recognized as autobiography. The fact that Qohelet is depicted as a king and relates autobiographical details associates his writing with royal autobiographies (fictional and nonfictional) from the ancient Near East (Seow, 279 [cf. 2.5 above]). Longman (1991, 120-23; 1998, 18-19) has demonstrated formal parallels between Qohelet's words in their entirety (not just the first two chapters) and a subgenre of fictional Akkadian autobiographies, suggesting that the modern tendency to isolate the opening portion of Qohelet's words and identify them as autobiography imposes an anachronistic disjunction into the text as a whole that overlooks the impact that the autobiographical chapters have on the audience's reaction to the remainder of the work.

Scholars differ in their assessment of the significance of Qohelet's autobiography. The fact that Qohelet implies identity with Solomon in part through his autobiographical description of the great Solomonic deeds (Eccles 2:4-7; cf. 1 Chron 27:27-31) grants the words authority and overcomes any tendency of the reader to dismiss the difficult words as those of an erroneous sage (Fox, 153-54; Shields, 111-12; Sharp, 51). C. L. Seow (284) also suggests that Qohelet deliberately employs the royal autobiographical form—used elsewhere in the ancient Near East to exalt rulers and immortalize them through their achievements—to invert the expectation generated by this genre that the ruler had ultimately escaped the constraints of mortality by showing that the greatest of kings is ultimately left with nothing.

Finally, the inclusion of Qohelet's autobiography in the book of Ecclesiastes allows the narrator to maintain distance from the sentiments expressed in Qohelet's words. Qohelet is the *frame narrator's foil—a character presenting authoritative pronouncements as the wisest of the wise but permitting the narrator to avoid fully endorsing those assertions (see Shields 106-9; Longman, 1998, 38-39; contra Seow [396] and Fox [371], who claim that the epilogue fully endorses Qohelet's words). Whereas many people today find themselves empathizing with Qohelet, it is not immediately clear that this would have been the response of ancient audiences, who may have been more disturbed by his unorthodox conclusions than are modern readers.

4. Conclusion.

It is clear from both the ancient Near Eastern generic antecedents to OT autobiographies and the specific characteristics of autobiographical texts that the identification of this genre in the OT plays an important role in better understanding the meaning of the texts in which they are embedded. Autobiographical texts can operate in similar ways to other first-person accounts and often employ similar rhetorical devices, but also they offer an enhanced didactic element achieved through their authoritative reflection of past experiences.

See also FORM CRITICISM; FRAME NARRATIVE; QOHELET.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. L. Crenshaw, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (rev. ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); T. C. Eskenazi, In an Age of Prose: A Literary Approach to Ezra-Nehemiah (SBLMS 36; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); M. V. Fox, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Rereading of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); G. Gusdorf, "Conditions and Limits of Autobiography" in Autobiography: Essays Theoretical and Critical, ed. J. Olney (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1980) 28-48; W. L. Howarth, "Some Principles of Autobiography" in Autobiography: Essays Theoretical and Critical, ed. J. Olney (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1980) 84-114; T. Longman III, Fictional Akkadian Autobiography: A Generic and Comparative Study (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1991); idem, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); D. G. Meade, Pseudonymity and Canon: An Investigation into the Relationship of Authorship and Authority in Jewish and Earliest Christian Tradition (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); J. Olney, ed., Autobiography: Essays Theoretical and Critical (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1980); C. L. Seow, "Qohelet's Autobiography" in Fortunate the Eyes That See: Essays in Honor of David Noel Freedman in Celebration of His Seventieth Birthday, ed. A. B. Beck et al. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 275-87; C. J. Sharp, "Ironic Representation, Authorial Voice, and Meaning in Qohelet," BibInt 12 (2004) 37-68; M. A. Shields, The End of Wisdom: A Reappraisal of the Historical and Canonical Function of Ecclesiastes (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2006); S. Smith and J. Watson, Reading Autobiography: A Guide for Interpreting Life Narratives (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2001); J. Sturrock, The Language of Autobiography: Studies in the First Person Singular (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); K. J. Weintraub, The Value of the Individual: Self and Circumstances in Autobiography (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978).

M. A. Shields

B

BATTLE IMAGERY. See WARFARE IMAGERY.

BEN SIRA. See SIRACH, BOOK OF.

BIBLICAL THEOLOGY. See WISDOM AND BIBLICAL THEOLOGY.

BICOLON, BICOLA. See POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF.

BOAZ

Boaz is one of the three major characters in the book of *Ruth. His name means “in him is strength,” but the book does not exploit the meaning to advance its plot, as it does with *Naomi. According to Ruth 4:21 and 1 Chronicles 2:11, Boaz was the son of Salmon and so a descendant of Judah. Matthew 1:5 adds that his mother (or ancestress) was Rahab, presumably the harlot in Joshua 2. Boaz was a kinsman of Elimelech and, by means of levirate marriage to Ruth, became the great-grandfather of *David. It is unknown whether he was married to someone other than Ruth and had other children.

1. Boaz’s Context
2. Boaz’s Kindness
3. Boaz’s Legacy

1. Boaz’s Context.

According to Ruth 1:1, Boaz lived during the days of the judges, a time of apostasy, oppression and upheaval. The judges followed the events of the conquest of Canaan as narrated in the book of Joshua and preceded the rise of monarchy in Israel as described in the books of Samuel. According to the book of Judges, the tribes of Israel repeatedly disregarded Yahweh’s covenant with them and came under the domination of surrounding peoples. Before Boaz is first introduced (Ruth 2:1), Ruth 1:1 further mentions a famine that occurred in Israel at least ten years before Boaz and Ruth met. The book of Ruth does not explicitly interpret the famine as a Deuteronomic curse for covenantal infidelity (cf. Deut 28:15-48).

Although the famine is said to have driven Elimelech and Naomi from Israel to Moab, how the famine affected Boaz lies beyond the book’s interest. Ruth 1:6, however, mentions the blessing of Yahweh that ended the famine and presumably provided the climate for Boaz to succeed as a landowner, or at least add to his earlier estate. Ruth 2:1 describes Boaz as ’iš gibbôr ḥayil, which could be translated “a man of substance and character.” Although the expression could have a military connotation (cf. Josh 1:14; 1 Sam 16:18), nothing in the book of Ruth indicates that Boaz was a mighty warrior or a military hero (Block, 651). Rather, he was a godly man in a spiritually dreary era and a well-to-do resident of famine-stricken Bethlehem. The *Targum goes so far as to translate as “a powerful man, strong in the law” (Beattie, 22). Although the introduction of Boaz as a Torah scholar might be an overly expanded reading, the Targum has appreciably conveyed information about Boaz that becomes clearer throughout the remainder of the book: Boaz knew the law and followed it, even at personal cost.

2. Boaz’s Kindness.

Ruth 2 begins with Ruth’s “chance” wandering into the field of Boaz, about whom she at the time knew nothing. The kindness that Boaz showed Ruth was extraordinary. He told her to stay in his field and allowed her to glean beside the women who were binding cut grain, even though this part of the field normally was off limits to gleaners (Bush, 128). He gave Ruth access to the water supply and even ate with her.

He instructed his workers not to disturb her and so became her protector. Something else to note about Boaz's kindness is the vocabulary used of Ruth in chapter 2. Whereas Ruth called herself a foreigner (nokriyyā) in Ruth 2:10, and said that she was not on the same level as a servant girl (šiphā) of Boaz in Ruth 2:13, Boaz used "young woman" (na'ārā) in Ruth 2:5 and "my daughter" (bittī) in Ruth 2:8. Rather than emphasizing the social distance between him and Ruth and so belittling her, he affirmed her personhood and elevated her standing in the group (Berlin 1983, 89; Block, 659).

Far from being xenophobic, Boaz welcomed a foreigner, even a Moabite, onto his property. Although Deuteronomy 23:3 excluded Moabites from the assembly of Yahweh and prohibited Israelites from making a treaty of friendship with Moab, Boaz recognized Ruth's faith in Yahweh, as evidenced by her loving-kindness to Naomi, and properly regarded her as a member of the covenant community (see Dray, 35). He further invoked God's blessing on her for seeking refuge in the God of Israel. Boaz's own actions indicated his willingness to assist others, but he could not have known at this point how instrumental he would be in the realization of his prayerful blessing of Ruth (Ruth 2:12).

Ruth's initial reaction to Boaz helps the modern reader understand his magnanimity. She was astonished that the landowner would go so much beyond the requirement of the law. Surely Boaz's laborers observed and marveled too (Block, 666). When Ruth returned home at the end of the day, Naomi took note of Boaz's generosity and began to see the hand of God favorably at work in her situation. In Boaz, God's grace had a human face (Sakenfeld, 48). The references to Yahweh in his discussion with his laborers and Ruth indicate that an appreciation of God's grace to him lay behind his kind treatment of others (Block, 655; LaCocque, 65).

His kindness became even more extraordinary on the threshing floor when Ruth approached him to serve as *kinsman-redeemer for Naomi's husband, Elimelech, and her husband, Mahlon. After being awkwardly awakened in the middle of the night, he readily agreed to care for Ruth and Naomi, raise up an heir for their deceased husbands, and hold his deceased kinsmen's property in trust for the heir. When Ruth returned from the threshing floor and reported to Naomi that Boaz did not want her to return empty-handed (Ruth 3:17), Boaz signaled that he would relieve Naomi's earlier complaint about emptiness (Ruth 1:21). The same Hebrew word for "emptily" (rêqām) occurs in both verses. Not only would Boaz fill Naomi's stomach with food, but also he would take steps to fill her arms with a son to inherit Elimelech's property.

In essence, Boaz was willing to be the answer to his prayer in Ruth 2:12, but doing so would involve substantial cost to himself. The kinsman-redeemer had to look beyond any personal advantage to the promotion of a disadvantaged relative's full participation in the covenant community (Meyers, 21). The motivation involved belief in the unfailing promise of Yahweh to redeem his fallen creation, which Canaan anticipated, and give an eternal inheritance to his people, even those who had died. In the NT the theme of inheritance made possible by a kinsman-redeemer reaches fulfillment in the person and work of Jesus Christ (see 1 Pet 1:3-5).

Boaz contrasts with the nearer kinsman who was unwilling to put his own assets at risk in order to secure the attachment of Elimelech's name to his property and provide for the temporal needs of Naomi and Ruth. He who would not maintain the name of Elimelech with his patrimony and care for destitute widows remains anonymous (Trible, 190). He seemingly had no appreciation for grace, either received or given, but rather chose what LaCocque (111) calls "the letter of the law." By contrast, Boaz willingly assumed the usufructuary rights to Elimelech's land, married Ruth, and raised Obed, who later inherited Elimelech and Mahlon's patrimony. Boaz answered Ruth's petition on behalf of her deceased father-in-law and husband and thereby demonstrated a living, active and grace-appreciative faith. His name is honorably remembered in the royal and messianic line of David (Mt 1:5).

3. Boaz's Legacy.

Some scholars have concluded that the aristocratic Boaz fell in love with the attractive but socially inferior Ruth. His seemingly kind gestures supposedly had an ulterior and all-too-familiar motive (Fewell and Gunn). Other scholars draw attention to Boaz's alleged perpetuation of androcentrism. Rather than being heroic, Boaz only contributed to the ongoing problem of women's economic dependence on male provision (Sakenfeld, 10, 55-56). There is another way to understand the message of the book.

As seen especially in the closing genealogy, the book of Ruth shares the interest of the book of Judges in kingship as the solution to the woes and ills of the generations after Joshua. Whereas Judges documents the need for a king and indirectly makes an apology for David, Ruth actually names David as the hoped-for king who would put an end to the apostasy and anarchy of the period of the judges. Boaz appears in the genealogy of David and is honorably listed in the seventh position. Why?

The biblical writers associated David's kingdom with the kingdom of God. Aware of David's flaws, they nevertheless believed that Yahweh had made a covenant with David and would work out his plan of redemption through Davidic kingship. What Boaz and Ruth did is instructive for how God builds his kingdom. He uses the faithfulness of godly people in mundane circumstances to advance his purpose. Where there is warm adherence to the covenant, the mundane becomes the scene for the sacred, and otherwise average people contribute, often unknowingly, to a work of God that is much bigger than an individual act of faithfulness and compassion (see Berlin 1994, 259-60). For the biblical writers, Boaz (and Ruth) humbly participated in the establishment of God's reign through David and ultimately, according to the NT, though David's son, Jesus.

See also FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; KINSMAN-REDEEMER AND LEVIRATE; RUTH 1: BOOK OF; RUTH 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. R. G. Beattie, trans., The Targum of Ruth (ArBib 19; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1994); A. Berlin, Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative (BLS 9; Sheffield: Almond, 1983); idem, "Ruth and the Continuity of Israel," in Reading Ruth: Contemporary Women Reclaim a Sacred Story, ed. J. A. Kates and G. T. Reimer (New York: Ballantine Books, 1994) 255-60; D. I. Block, Judges, Ruth (NAC 6; Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 2002); F. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Dallas: Word, 1996); S. Dray, "Ruth 3:1-4:22: Living in Grace," Evangel 14 (1996) 35-37; D. N. Fewell and D. M. Gunn, Compromising Redemption: Relating Characters in the Book of Ruth (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1990); A. LaCocque, Ruth, trans. K. C. Hanson (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2004); C. Meyers, "The Family in Early Israel," in Families in Ancient Israel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997) 1-47; K. D. Sakenfeld, Ruth (IBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999); P. Tribble, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978).
D. Ulrich

BODY IMAGERY. See WASF.

C

CAESURA. See POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF.

CANON

The Greek term kanōn, derived from a Semitic root meaning “reed,” was first employed in what has become its technical theological sense (i.e., a recognized and fixed collection of authoritative sacred writings) by the church fathers in the fourth century AD. However, although the terminology is relatively late, the concept existed much earlier. It is implicit, for example, in the notion of “Scripture(s)” reflected in the NT, and it is generally also inferred from the peculiar talmudic expression “defile the hands” (probably indicating the necessity of ceremonial washing after handling sacred writings), used by Jews from the first century AD. Given the nature of Second Temple Judaism as “a religion of the book,” the roots of this concept of canonical Scripture presumably go back still further. To some extent this is confirmed by the testimony of the OT itself to the recognition of some such body of literature (e.g., 2 Kings 22:8–23:25; Neh 8:8–10:36; Dan 9:2; Zech 7:12). Such testimony, however, relates to the Pentateuch and the Prophets (two of the three major canonical sections of the Hebrew OT [Tanak]). With respect to the Writings (the third section of the Hebrew canon, and of particular interest for the present volume), there is no explicit OT testimony to the canonicity of its contents. Evidence for its canonicity must be sought elsewhere. Therefore this article will consider the following:

1. Canonicity and the Formation of the Old Testament Canon
2. Witnesses to the Canonicity of the Writings as a Whole
3. Canonicity of Particular Books within the Writings

1. Canonicity and the Formation of the Old Testament Canon.

The canonical Hebrew OT reflects a threefold division: the Law, the Prophets (subdivided into Former Prophets [Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings] and Latter Prophets [Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, the Twelve]) and the Writings (*Psalms, *Job, *Proverbs, the Five Scrolls or *Megillot [*Ruth, *Song of Songs, *Ecclesiastes, *Lamentations, *Esther], Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles). Admittedly, there is considerable variation in Jewish arrangements of the Writings or Hagiographa (see Beckwith, 452-64), but its contents are uniformly agreed upon. While the inclusion of Daniel in this third part of the Hebrew canon (rather than in the Prophets) may be explained (at least in part) by its distinct genre (apocalyptic), the presence of Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles, Esther and arguably Daniel may be due to the fact that the second canonical division was already closed. On the basis of this latter premise and the evidence from Qumran, many suggest that the content of the Writings, the final section of the Hebrew canon to be closed, was fixed sometime between the fifth century and the second century BC. The scholarly consensus in the mid-twentieth century suggested a much later terminus (AD 90), but now it is widely agreed that this was based on a faulty understanding of rabbinic discussions that took place at Jamnia (see 2.9 below). Moreover, it fails to give adequate cognizance to the evidence supporting an earlier date, to which we now turn.

2. Witnesses to the Canonicity of the Writings as a Whole.

2.1. Septuagint. The testimony of the Septuagint (LXX) with respect to canonicity is complicated by the fact that extant copies (codices from the fourth and fifth centuries AD) reflect a “larger” canon, interspersing a variety of apocryphal Jewish books among those traditionally recognized by Jews and Protestants as “Scripture.” However, there is evidence to suggest that this “larger” canon was not reflected in the original form of the LXX—for example, Philo never cites any of these apocryphal books, and the Jews subsequently replaced the LXX with Aquila’s Greek translation (which excluded all apocryphal books).

Besides having additional material, the LXX arranges the canonical books quite differently, appending Ruth to Judges, Lamentations to Jeremiah, including Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah and Esther with the Former Prophets, and grouping the poetical and wisdom books (Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs) together, along with *Wisdom of Solomon and *Sirach. From this arrangement one may conclude that either the MT’s tripartite division was unknown or, more probably, ignored by Christian copyists for polemical reasons.

2.2. Dead Sea Scrolls. Evidence from the *Dead Sea Scrolls (DSS) has raised significant questions with respect to the shape of the Jewish canon by the second century BC. These ancient Jewish scrolls or fragments attest to every book in the Hebrew OT except Esther, but the collections also contain some apocryphal and pseudepigraphal texts, as well as sectarian documents and commentaries. Given the uncertainties over the canonical status of the various materials reflected in these manuscripts, and the fact that it is unclear whether the entire Qumran library has survived, the testimony of the DSS must be handled cautiously. Although it certainly attests to the compilation of and respect for all the canonical OT books (except Esther) by the second century BC, its value for reconstructing the canon of this Jewish sect or of Second Temple Judaism more generally is rather limited.

2.3. Sirach. This apocryphal work, written in Hebrew by Jesus ben Sira around 180 BC (see Sirach, Book of), reflects some familiarity with material now found in the third section of the Hebrew canon (e.g., Psalms, Proverbs). Around 132 BC ben Sira’s grandson translated the book into Greek, adding a preface in which he refers three times to a tripartite division of the OT. However, while the first two divisions are given their traditional titles (“the law” and “the prophets”), the third is more vaguely described as “the others that followed them,” “the other books of our fathers” and “the rest of the books.” This third group is not identified more explicitly, but apparently the author is referring to “a quite specific and venerable block of books” (Miller, 18) known both to himself and to his readers. It is reasonable, therefore, to infer that these “other books” are some or all of the Writings. It is unclear, however, whether this collection was considered “closed” at this point or (pace Miller) precisely what status Sirach itself is presented as having vis-à-vis the Scriptures.

2.4. 1-2 Maccabees. The book of 1 Maccabees seems to grant canonical status to at least two books contained in the Writings (i.e., both Daniel and Psalms are cited as authoritative). In 2 Maccabees Nehemiah is said to have founded a library containing, among other things, “the books about the kings and prophets, and the writings of David” (2 Macc 2:13). Presumably, the latter included some or all of the Davidic psalms. In any case, a similar effort to preserve the nation’s literary heritage is accredited to Judas Maccabeus in the following verse (2 Macc 2:14). The precise contents of these libraries are unknown, but undoubtedly many were considered to be sacred Scripture (see 1 Macc 1:56).

2.5. Philo. Philo’s testimony is again of limited value. He does not sharply distinguish between inspired Scripture and inspired writers, nor does he quote from all the canonical books (Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel and Chronicles are never cited). Although it has been inferred from references to “psalms” (Contempl. 25) and “the holy writings” (Contempl. 28) that the author (most probably Philo [see Beckwith, 115-16]) had in mind the third and closed part of the Hebrew canon (see Leiman, 131-32; Beckwith, 116-17), the evidence is inconclusive; the first could refer simply to the Psalter, and the latter most likely refers to the entire OT.

2.6. The New Testament. While the NT’s citations of “Scripture” (Jn 10:35; 19:36; 2 Pet 1:20; cf. Mt 22:29; Acts 18:24; Rom 1:4; 2 Tim 3:15) and its several references to “law” (e.g., Jn 10:34; 15:25) or “the law and the prophets” (e.g., Mt 5:17; Acts 13:15) seem to imply that there was a fixed and recognizable OT canon, the precise contents of this canon are nowhere spelled out. Indeed, the only clear allusion in the NT to the tripartite Hebrew canon is Jesus’ reference to “the law, the prophets, and the psalms” (Lk 24:44). The last member of this group is taken by many scholars to refer to what later became known as “the Writings,” using one of the most significant books to describe the whole. The plausibility of this theory is enhanced by the traditional location of the Psalter at the head of the Writings (with Ruth serving merely as an introduction in some arrangements) and by the possibility that other first-century writers (e.g., Philo) may have employed similar nomenclature.

Further evidence that the Writings was known in its talmudic arrangement (i.e., bracketed at either end by [Ruth-]Psalms and Chronicles [see Beckwith, 452-64]) by at least the first century AD has been sought in Jesus’ statement concerning Zechariah’s murder “between the altar and the sanctuary” (Lk 11:51; cf. Mt 23:35). Taking this as an allusion to the incident recorded in 2 Chronicles 24:21, many scholars have detected implicit attestation here to a canon that began with Genesis and ended with Chronicles. In terms of chronology, the martyrdom of Uriah (see Jer 26:23) took place over a century later, making the reference to Zechariah’s murder rather anomalous, unless Jesus’ statement reflects the canonical shape of the text. However, despite the omission of the qualifying clause in one important ancient manuscript (Sinaiticus), the Matthean text explicitly identifies the victim as the “son of Berakiah,” presumably indicating the OT prophet of that lineage (see Zech 1:1), whose martyrdom, though nowhere explicitly recorded, is later attested in Jewish tradition (see the *Targum of Lam 2:20). In any case, unless we dismiss the qualifying phrase as a clumsy historical error (whether editorial or otherwise), we must conclude that too much weight has been placed on this text by those arguing that the OT canon was known in its final form by the early part of the first century AD. Although the NT suggests that some form of tripartite OT canon was recognized by this time, its precise contents, particularly with respect to the Hagiographa, remain uncertain. Some canonical books (e.g., Ezra, Nehemiah, Song of Songs, Esther, Ecclesiastes) are never cited, whereas Jude both cites 1 Enoch (Jude 14-15) and alludes to Assumption of Moses (Jude 9; cf. Heb 11:35b-38). Admittedly, these latter texts are not explicitly cited as authoritative (i.e., as “Scripture”), but their inclusion (as well as the absence of some canonical books) undeniably complicates attempts to use the NT to determine the precise boundaries of the Writings during the first century AD.

2.7. 2 Esdras. This first-century Jewish apocalypse includes an obviously fictitious account of how Ezra dictated to five scribes the contents of ninety-four books over a period of forty days and nights. Of these books, only twenty-four were to be published (2 Esdr 14:45). This is almost certainly a reference to the twenty-four books of the traditional Jewish OT canon. Although obviously not proving that the OT canon was fixed by Ezra, this text clearly intimates that the Hebrew canon was closed not during the first century AD but rather much earlier, and certainly long before AD 90.

2.8. Josephus. In a treatise written around AD 100, the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus draws attention to the fact that Jews, unlike their Greek opponents, have only twenty-two sacred books: “Five belong to Moses . . . the prophets, who were after Moses, wrote down what was done in their times in thirteen books. The remaining four books contain hymns to God and precepts for the conduct of human life” (Ag. Ap. 1.8). It is generally believed that the latter four books refer to Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs, and that the rest of the Writings have been incorporated in some way with the Prophets (cf. the arrangement in most English versions). Thus the total number that Josephus gives for the Prophets probably reflects a canonical arrangement of these books akin to that of the LXX (e.g., Daniel is counted with the Major Prophets, Ruth is included with either Judges or Psalms, Lamentations is appended to Jeremiah, and each of the following is counted as one book: Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah, the Twelve). This seems preferable to the idea that Josephus (cf. also Origen and Jerome) was simply crunching the numbers to make them tie in with the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, or that his canon was smaller (so, e.g., Talmon, 68) than that attested to in the contemporary 2 Esdras.

Like 2 Esdras, Josephus traces the fixing of the canon back to the time of Ezra: “the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, who reigned after Xerxes” (Ag. Ap. 1.8). Although this undoubtedly reflects popular belief rather than careful historical research, it nevertheless attests to the first-century Jewish conviction that the fixed OT canon could be traced far back into antiquity and certainly was no recent innovation.

2.9. Jamnia. Around the same time that Josephus was working on his treatise Against Apion, a group of rabbis gathered at Jamnia (or Jabneh), near Joppa, were debating, among other matters, which books “defiled the hands.” Whereas a previous generation of scholarship greatly exaggerated the significance of these discussions, a seminal study by J. P. Lewis in 1964 exposed significant misunderstandings and misreadings of the rabbinic evidence (cf. Beckwith, 276) and thus undermined the reigning critical consensus (i.e., that the Writings [hence, the OT canon] was “officially” closed by the so-called Council of Jamnia about AD 90). However, subsequent scholarship has interpreted the significance of Lewis’s findings in two quite different ways. Some scholars, such as R. Beckwith and S. J. Leiman, assume that canonization of the Writings predated Jamnia. For them, the focus of discussion at Jamnia centered more on whether certain books (i.e., Ecclesiastes and possibly Song of Songs) should be “withdrawn” from public use, not whether they should be included in the canon or be given some kind of official imprimatur. In contrast, other scholars, such as J. A. Sanders, insist that the “canonical process” was still ongoing, and that the Writings were not “stabilized” until later.

Thus Jamnia seems to throw little light on the question of the extent of the canon by the end of the first century AD, other than its indirect testimony to the fact that such a canon seems already to have been in existence (pace Sanders) that obviously included some or all of the Hagiographa.

2.10. The Talmud. As we noted (see 2.9 above), apparently only two OT books (Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs) came under rabbinic scrutiny at Jamnia. However, it is clear from elsewhere in the talmudic materials that some reservations were subsequently expressed over other books as well (namely, Ezekiel, Proverbs, Esther). However, as Beckwith (274-75) cogently argues, it is untenable to use these later disputes as evidence that the Writings (and hence, the OT canon) were still considered open. One of the five (Ezekiel) belongs to the Prophets, generally considered to have been closed centuries earlier. Moreover, the date of these rabbinic disputes would imply that the OT canon remained open for an incredibly long time (at least two centuries) after Jamnia. It seems safer, therefore, to conclude with Beckwith (275) that this later rabbinic debate “does not show that the canon was open at all.” Indeed, if Broyde is correct, a key talmudic expression has been grossly misunderstood; Broyde maintains that “defiling the hands” refers more to keeping such books separate from food (i.e., treated with extra care because they contained the divine name, Yahweh) than to their canonical status per se. It is difficult, nevertheless, to ignore the fact that apparently there were other rabbinic reservations with respect to the books in question (see 3.2, 3.4, 3.5, 3.7, 3.8 below) that prompted the more radical to consider their withdrawal from public use.

2.11. The Church Fathers. As we noted (see 2.8 above), both Origen and Jerome (the latter only in his preface to Samuel and Kings) attest to a twenty-two book OT canon. Others (e.g., Tertullian) give the number as twenty-four, whereas still others (e.g., Augustine) suggest a much higher total (Augustine’s “forty-four” most likely includes the OT apocryphal books embraced in the Roman Catholic canon). Thus, while some of the church fathers seem to confirm the traditional Jewish canon, others (particularly in the Western church) adopt the larger canon reflected in extant copies of the LXX. Moreover, some of the patristic testimony raises questions about the canonicity of particular books in the Hagiographa, such as Esther (see 3.8 below).

We may draw some conclusions from the foregoing discussion. A tripartite canon that incorporated some or all of the Hagiographa was certainly in existence by at least the second century BC (see Sirach’s prologue), was recognized as authoritative Scripture by first-century AD Judaism (see NT references; Philo; Josephus), had a fixed number of books (depending on how they were counted, twenty-two or twenty-four) by the end of the first century AD (2 Esdras; Josephus; cf. Origen; Jerome), and was traditionally believed to have derived from the Persian era (see 2 Esdras; Josephus). Obviously, some uncertainties over the Writings as a whole remain, but more can be said concerning the canonicity of the individual books. It is to the latter, in particular those that are the immediate focus of the present volume, that we now turn.

3. Canonicity of Particular Books within the Writings.

3.1. Psalms. With respect to the canonicity of the Psalter, the DSS (in particular, 11QPs^a) have introduced a number of issues, not least the mixture of psalms from the biblical Psalter with other, nonbiblical psalms. Moreover, according to Sanders (ABD 1.841), over twenty percent of the psalms in the Masoretic canon find no representation in any of the thirty copies of the Psalter at Qumran, even though no block of the Masoretic Psalter is missing. This, along with the additional psalms reflected in the Qumran library, may suggest that the sectarians had a different canon for the Psalter (so Sanders and others) but may just as easily be explained (so Haran) in terms of their liturgical practice (in which both canonical and noncanonical compositions were used, much like a modern hymn book that includes biblical songs or paraphrases).

There are also some minor differences between the Hebrew and the Greek Psalters. The latter combines two consecutive Psalms (Pss 9—10 and Pss 114—115), divides two others (Ps 116 and Ps 147) into separate psalms (Pss 114—115 and Pss 146—147), and includes an additional psalm at the end of the collection (Ps 151, whose Hebrew equivalent is attested to in the DSS). However, the fact that this additional psalm is described as being “outside the number” (i.e., the canonical Psalter) makes it less likely, despite the Qumran evidence, that the Psalter was still in a state of canonical flux in the second century BC. Rather, a collection comprising 150 psalms, ostensibly those reflected in the canonical Hebrew Psalter, clearly was recognized prior to its Greek translation for the LXX.

3.2. Proverbs. In the case of Proverbs, the DSS contribute little (together, the two Proverbs fragments attest to some 165 words or portions of words from various chapters, with only minor textual variants), other than corroborating the antiquity of the MT’s recensional base. However, there is indirect attestation to the canonical status of Proverbs through usage of the conventional formula for quoting Scripture (i.e., “for it is written” [cf. CD-A 11:20-21, citing Prov 15:8]).

Although there are notable differences between the Hebrew and Greek versions of Proverbs (e.g., as well as having some 130 additional lines, the LXX arranges the latter part of the book quite differently [Prov 22:17—24:22; 30:1-14; 24:23-34; 30:15-33; 31:1-9; 25:1—29:27; 31:10-31], most likely attempting to draw together material of non-Israelite origin), such differences seem to be of minor canonical significance. Admittedly, some additions (and omissions) in the LXX may reflect a different Hebrew Vorlage, but other variants apparently reflect either scribal corruption within the LXX itself or the attempt to present an idiomatic and culturally acceptable translation for a Hellenistic audience.

Later rabbinic misgivings expressed over Proverbs and some of the other wisdom books (Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs) relate either to its allegedly “secular” nature (expressing merely Solomon’s personal wisdom) or to its apparent internal contradictions (e.g., Prov 26:4, 5), which some rabbis obviously found difficult to harmonize (see Beckwith, 284). Obviously, such reservations were not shared by the majority.

3.3. Job. Although the book of Job’s precise location within the Writings has fluctuated (in Hebrew manuscripts generally following either Psalms or Proverbs [see Beckwith, 452-64]), its canonicity has never seriously been questioned. The presence of an Aramaic paraphrase (11QtgJob) at Qumran, as well as the notorious difficulties that even the earliest translators evidently faced (see the LXX), attest both to the book’s antiquity and, by implication, its perceived canonical status. Beckwith (73) tentatively suggests that the latter might also be reflected in the Hebrew text of Sirach 49:9 (which possibly associates Job with the prophets but may instead identify him with “strangers”). However, not only are the restored readings in this text uncertain, but also Beckwith’s conclusions are not self-evident; one could equally argue that either reading reflects the author’s relative ignorance of Job rather than his acquaintance with the canonical book. In any case, the canonicity of the book is amply attested apart from recourse to Beckwith’s more speculative arguments.

3.4. Ecclesiastes. Within the Hebrew Bible Ecclesiastes is located among the Megillot, or Five Scrolls, a collection of shorter books (Ruth, Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther) in the Hagiographa associated with particular festivals. Given the somewhat radical nature of its critique of traditional values (e.g., *wisdom), the canonicity of Ecclesiastes is remarkable. What is not surprising is the fact that it evoked considerable controversy in antiquity. Polarized positions were adopted by the rival schools of Shammai and Hillel in the first century AD. Even though positive, Hillelite assessment of the book’s canonicity prevailed, objections (see 2.9, 2.10 above) continued to be raised until at least the fourth century AD. Some have suggested that the inclusion of Ecclesiastes within the canon is due in no small part to the implicit associations of *Qohelet with Solomon, but the fact that other such books (e.g., the apocryphal Odes of Solomon and Wisdom of Solomon) remained excluded suggests that other factors played a much more significant role in recognizing its status as Scripture.

3.5. Song of Songs. Like Ecclesiastes, this unusual book may partly owe its inclusion within the canon to its associations with Solomon. Once again, however, other significant issues apparently were more decisive. It is also untenable to attribute its inclusion within the canon to the imaginative possibilities afforded by an allegorical interpretation. There does not appear to be much evidence of this among the LXX translators, whose work (c. 100 BC) contains no explicit allegorical tendencies. In any case, such a fanciful hermeneutic undoubtedly was prompted by the underlying premise that this book was already part of sacred Scripture.

As with Ecclesiastes, the status of Song of Songs clearly evoked rabbinic controversy, as is reflected most famously in Rabbi Akiba's strong affirmation recorded in the Mishnah: "No man ever disputed about the Song of Songs that it does not render the hands unclean, for all ages are not worth the day on which the Song of Songs was given to Israel: for all the Writings are holy, and the Song of Songs is the Holy of Holies" (m. Yad. 3:5). Whatever the precise nature of such rabbinic disputes (see 2.10 above), without doubt the erotic nature of Song of Songs fueled subsequent opposition in Christian circles, which evidently was met by the allegorical interpretations that lifted the poems above a sensual level.

3.6. Lamentations. The precise location of Lamentations within biblical codices has varied, but its canonicity has never seriously been questioned. This may be due in some measure to its association with Jeremiah in Jewish tradition (Lam 1:1 LXX attributes authorship to Jeremiah), a tradition that explains its location with the Prophets in the LXX and, through the influence of the Vulgate, in most English Bibles.

3.7. Ruth. Like Lamentations, the canonicity of Ruth has been almost universally accepted. Both the NT (Mt 1:5; Lk 3:32) and Josephus (Ant. 5.318-37) allude to its contents, and it is included in the earliest canonical lists, both Jewish (b. B. Bat. 14b) and patristic (e.g., Melito; cf. also Origin and Jerome). Indeed, apart from a mention in the context of the rabbinic dispute over the matter of "defiling the hands" (over which, with respect to Ruth, Song of Songs and Esther, rabbinic opinion allegedly was unanimous), the only direct challenge to the book's status came from an obscure Nestorian commentator in the ninth century AD. One may infer from the Mishnah (m. Yebam. 76b-77b) that any rabbinic reservations would have been compounded by difficulties in harmonizing Ruth's portrayal of *levirate marriage and redemption laws with that reflected in the laws and narratives of the Pentateuch, as well as Ruth's more positive approach to marriages between Israelites and Moabites (cf. Deut 23:3-6). Thus, the fact that the canonical status of such a book was never challenged within Judaism clearly attests to the antiquity of that status.

3.8. Esther. Of all the Hagiographa (indeed, of the OT as a whole), the canonicity of Esther undoubtedly evokes the most questions. At least three observations are pertinent: (1) Esther is the only OT book not attested among the DSS; (2) talmudic evidence attests to a long history of debate, going back at least to the second century AD; (3) Esther's canonical status was implicitly or explicitly denied in early patristic writings (e.g., it is absent from Melito's list and rejected by Athanasius, Gregory of Nazianzus and Theodore of Mopsuestia). The book's absence from Qumran may well have been because it clashed with the community's liturgical calendar (so Beckwith, 291-94), but the rejection of this book by others is much more problematic. At least two factors were involved. It seems that it was the apparent secularity of its contents that initially brought the book's canonical status into question. This certainly would explain the more overtly theological and religious content of the noncanonical Esther Additions* reflected in the LXX. The second problem (insofar as the rabbis were concerned) related to the institution of a non-Mosaic festival (cf. y. Meg. 1:5; b. Meg. 7a) (see Purim). It is clear, however, that rabbinic opinions questioning the canonicity of books such as Esther reflect a minority view and are cited primarily to be refuted. Moreover, even though the canonical status of this book has continued to evoke considerable debate, negative evaluations generally have resulted from a failure to appreciate its admittedly more subtle theology.

3.9. Apocryphal Books (Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon). Although these apocryphal books are considered deuterocanonical in the Roman Catholic and Orthodox traditions, they are excluded from Protestant Bibles on the grounds that they were never part of the Jewish canon (for a more detailed discussion, see Sirach; Wisdom of Solomon).

4. Conclusion.

According to Beckwith (275), four books of the Hagiographa (Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Daniel) “are among the Old Testament books which, individually, have the fullest attestation to their canonicity in the literature of the last few centuries B.C. and the first century AD.” As has been illustrated above, there is also considerable evidence for the canonicity of most of the other books as well. Although it is impossible to say exactly when it attained its final form, it seems fair to conclude that certainly by the second century BC, and possibly even earlier, this collection subsequently known as the Writings was widely recognized as the third and final section of the OT canon.

See also DEAD SEA SCROLLS; EDITORIAL CRITICISM; ESTHER 4: ADDITIONS; INTERTEXTUALITY; MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J.-M. Auwers and H. J. de Jonge, eds., The Biblical Canons (BETL 163; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2003); R. Beckwith, The Old Testament Canon of the New Testament Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); H. Blocher, “Helpful or Harmful? The ‘Apocrypha’ and Evangelical Theology,” EuroJTh 13.2 (2004) 81-90; M. J. Broyde, “Defilement of the Hands, Canonization of the Bible, and the Special Status of Esther, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs,” Judaism 44 (1995) 65-79; F. F. Bruce, The Canon of Scripture (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1988); S. B. Chapman, The Law and the Prophets: A Study in Old Testament Canon Formation (FAT 27; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); P. R. Davies, Scribes and Schools: The Canonization of the Hebrew Scriptures (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); S. Dempster, “An ‘Extraordinary Fact’: Torah and Temple and the Contours of the Hebrew Canon,” TynBul 48.1 (1977) 23-56; TynBul 48.2 (1977) 191-218; P. W. Flint, ed., The Bible at Qumran: Text, Shape, and Interpretation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); M. Haran, “11QPs^a and the Canonical Book of Psalms,” in Minhah le-Nahum: Biblical and Other Studies Presented to Nahum M. Sarna in Honour of His Seventieth Birthday, ed. M. Brettler and M. Fishbane (JSOTSup 154; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993) 193-201; M. Hengel, The Septuagint as Christian Scripture: Its Prehistory and the Problem of Its Canon (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2002); S. Z. Leiman, The Canonization of the Hebrew Scriptures: The Talmudic and Midrashic Evidence (TCAAS 47; Hamden, CT: Archon Books, 1976); J. P. Lewis, “What Do We Mean by Jabneh?” JBR 32 (1964) 125-32; L. M. McDonald and J. A. Sanders, eds., The Canon Debate: On the Origins and Formation of the Bible (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002); J. W. Miller, The Origins of the Bible: Rethinking Canon History (New York: Paulist, 1994); H. G. L. Peels, “The Blood ‘from Abel to Zechariah’ (Matthew 23,35; Luke 11,50f.) and the Canon of the Old Testament,” ZAW 113 (2001) 583-601; J. A. Sanders, “Canon,” ABD 1:837-52; idem, “The Stabilization of the Tanak,” in A History of Biblical Interpretation, 1: The Persian Period, ed. A. J. Hauser and D. F. Watson (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 225-52; A. Steinmann, The Oracles of God: The Old Testament Canon (St. Louis: Concordia, 1999); S. Talmon, “Heiliges Schriftum und kanonische Bücher aus jüdischer Sicht: Überlegungen zur Ausbildung der Grösse ‘Die Schrift’ im Judentum,” in Die Mitte der Schrift? Ein jüdisch-christliches Gespräch; Texte des Berner Symposions vom 6.-12. Januar 1985, ed. M. Klopfenstein et al. (JudChr 11; Bern: Lang, 1987) 45-79; J. Trebelle Barrera, The Jewish Bible and the Christian Bible: An Introduction to the History of the Bible, trans. W. G. E. Watson (rev. ed.; Leiden: E. J. Brill; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); E. Ulrich, “The Non-Attestation of a Tripartite Canon in 4Q MMT,” CBQ 65 (2003) 202-14; J. C. VanderKam, “Authoritative Literature in the Dead Sea Scrolls,” DSD 5.3 (1998) 382-402; idem, “Questions of Canon Viewed through the Dead Sea Scrolls,” BBR 11.2 (2001) 269-92.

P. R. Williamson

CANONICAL INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS.

CANTO. See STANZA, STROPHE.

CHAOS AND DEATH

The *imagery associated with chaos and death in the literature of the ancient world functions to inform human understanding of the realities of life under the principle of divine activity and design. Such texts are a reflex of cultural etiology—the search to understand and express primary causes and overarching structures in the divine and human realm. As such, these accounts grapple with the dark and difficult realities of human existence and interpret them as a subset of past and present struggles in the divine realm, often including the very process of creation. In the end, the portrayal of a divine act such as the ordering of chaos and the defeat of death acts as a pattern for understanding, preserving and transmitting religious and cultural traditions. Moreover, such stories work to express and codify societal order and codes of conduct as well as to vouchsafe for the efficacy of various religious rituals. Lastly, the study of the imagery of chaos and death in the OT has been both helped and hampered by the discovery of ancient Near Eastern texts having levels of similarity with various texts of the OT (particularly texts in *Job and *Psalms). These ancient Near Eastern texts can provide significant insight into the cognitive context of the biblical writer (and audience) and thus facilitate interpretive clarity and accuracy, but the search is riddled with irrational exuberance on the one hand and irrational avoidance on the other. With these possibilities and pitfalls in view, this article attempts to carefully navigate this search for meaning of chaos and death in the ancient Near East and the OT.

1. Chaos

2. Death as the Ultimate Expression of Chaos

1. Chaos.

1.1. Chaos in the Ancient Near East. The story of divine struggle against chaos (Chaoskampf) is commonly symbolized as a battle between a storm god (or a god whose fight is described via storm imagery) and a sea god/goddess (usually denoted via a primordial watery abyss along with a sea serpent/dragon). The narration of this battle between the storm god and the sea god/goddess is frequently found in the context of cosmogonical (stories that focus on the events and mechanics of creation) or cosmological (stories that focus on the meaning of creation) accounts. As with ancient flood accounts, Chaoskampf stories are attested in many cultures in the ancient Near East and beyond (e.g., Mesopotamia, Anatolia, Greece, Mari, Canaan, Syria, India, Egypt, Persia).

In a landmark study, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit (1895), H. Gunkel attempted to show that the Babylonian myth Enuma Elish, chronicling Marduk's defeat of the sea dragon Tiamat and subsequent creation of the world, was the backdrop for several OT texts involving the imagery of YHWH battling the sea and sea creatures such as Leviathan. This view received widespread support until the discovery and publication of the Ugaritic corpus, after which the OT's references to YHWH's control over the sea, sea monsters and so forth were proposed to actually reflect Syro-Canaanite mythological texts, particularly those concerning Baal's battles with the sea and death. M. K. Wakeman's God's Battle with the Monster (1973), J. Day's God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea (1985) and C. Kloos's Yhwh's Combat with the Sea (1986) typify this adjusted approach to the topic of chaos. However, R. S. Watson's recent Chaos Uncreated (2005) has challenged this adjusted approach by arguing that chaos imagery is found with too much variation in terminology, context and coordinated motifs to be able to be brought under a single unifying theme.

1.1.1. Mesopotamian Chaos Imagery. Mesopotamia has a long history of stories involving battles against dragon-like creatures of the primordial sea. For example, in a third millennium BC Sumerian text The Feats and Exploits of Ninurta, the Ninurta defeats a seven-headed serpent (as well as other multiheaded adversaries) and contains the (related) primeval waters of Kur before being awarded kingship by the pantheon (Kramer, 76-83). Similarly, Tishpak, the city god of Eshnunna (later associated with the Hurrian storm god Teshup), defeats a monstrous sea dragon in a storm context, a battle likely represented on three Old Akkadian cylinder seals depicting a snake-like dragon with seven heads (Wiggermann, 117-33). Also, an eighteenth-century BC text from Mari notes that the storm god Adad gave the king of Mari (Zimri-Lim) the weapons that he used in his battle against the sea. These noted, the most analyzed Mesopotamian text vis-à-vis the chaos motif is that of Enuma Elish (this title is a transliteration of the Akkadian words beginning the text, meaning, "When on high . . ."). This text (COS 1.111:390-402) opens with a primeval watery chaos consisting of the male and female procreative powers: the primordial freshwater father, Apsu, and the primordial saltwater mother, Tiamat (also portrayed as a serpentine sea dragon). As these waters mingle, the early generation of gods comes forth representing aspects of the newly differentiated cosmos. This progression, however, engenders conflict as the noise of the newer gods hinders the rest of Apsu. Thus, Apsu determines to destroy the lower gods, but his plan is found out by the “all-knowing” Ea (also known as Nudimmud), who casts a spell on Apsu and slays him. Ea then rests, and his son Marduk is born, while Tiamat plots her revenge along with a host of grotesque demons that she brings forth. With this threat at hand, a new champion is sought, and ultimately Marduk is chosen under the condition that he be granted the highest position in the divine assembly. During the battle, Tiamat opens her mouth to devour Marduk when Marduk uses the wind to prevent Tiamat from closing her mouth and then shoots an arrow into her inward parts, killing her. Afterward, Marduk begins to create the world, using half of Tiamat’s body as the firmament (waters) above and fixing a crossbar and posts to hold back these waters of heaven (cf. Gen 1:7-8). Marduk also kills Tiamat’s viceroy Kingu (Qingu) and from his blood makes humankind for the purpose of relieving the work of the lower gods. Afterward, the gods construct Esagila (terraced Marduk palace in Babylon) and give Marduk their fifty names (assigning him their authority), formalizing his supremacy.

1.1.2. Egyptian Chaos Imagery. Egyptian texts involving aspects of the chaos motif overlap with the political aspirations of ancient Egyptian political capitals. In addition, Egyptian accounts demonstrate a strong tendency to synthesize and incorporate earlier accounts (and deities) into later stories. From the Old Kingdom Pyramid Texts of Heliopolis (City of the Sun) we learn that an endless ocean of water known as Nun existed in complete darkness before the creation of the cosmos. This watery abyss is often portrayed in temples as a sacred lake and was considered to continue to surround the heavenly lights. From the chaos waters of Nun arises the self-generating sun god Atum, who was understood as being coexistent with the waters of Nun. Atum subsequently differentiated a portion of the waters into the created realm with the balance of the chaos waters understood as an ever-present threat. Atum is often cast standing on a raised pyramid-shaped mound, a pri-

mordial hillock identified as Heliopolis. Atum was considered to be the life spring of all other deities (beginning with the foundational group of deities known as the Ennead, or Pesdjjet) and perpetrator of Monad (the notion of totality and order). This Monad of Atum had both a constructive aspect, associated with the goddess Isis, and destructive aspect, associated with Seth, the god of chaos. The dynamics of the Monad also allowed for the integration of Atum with other aspects of the sun already in view by the time the Pyramid Texts were inscribed, most notably Re (Ra). In conjunction with the move of the capital to Memphis, the Memphite god Ptah was declared to have been the “First Principle,” thereby taking precedence over all other recognized gods (ANET, 4). Ptah is noted in the Shabaka Stone as having given life to the other gods of Egypt (including Atum of Heliopolis) by means of the desire of his heart together with the creative power of his word. In the cosmogonic account from the city of Hermopolis, the Ogdoad (eight primordial deities [four couples] made by the god Thoth [who was reconfigured to Atum-Re in the New Kingdom period]) represented the conceptualization (and personification) of the elements resident within the primeval chaos preceding creation, including the primordial waters, void, darkness and concealed dynamic force (see Hart, 20-24). These primeval elemental couples interacted with creative efficacy and produced a primeval hillock identified as the city of Hermopolis. Afterward, they create Atum and the Ennead of Heliopolis. Later, priests from Thebes adjusted the Hermopolis account to elevate Amun (the concealed dynamic force of the Ogdoad) as a transcendental deity who is above creation. Like Atum, Amun is later syncretized with Re.

1.1.3. Syro-Canaanite Chaos Imagery. A cache of cuneiform texts discovered on the north Syrian coast at the maritime city-state of Ugarit (Ras Shamra) includes six tablets commonly referred to as the Baal Cycle or Baal Myth (the original title is unknown). The Ugaritic Baal Cycle (KTU 1.1-1.6; COS 1.86:241-74) has three major sections: (1) the battle between the storm god Baal Hadad (usually referred to simply by his title Baal [lord]) and the sea god Yam(m/mu); (2) the building of a house (palace) for Baal; (3) Baal’s battle with Mot (death), ruler of the underworld. The specific sequence of these sections is subject to some dispute (see the summary in Smith, 2-25), partly because of the fragmentary condition of the tablets (Wyatt [1996, 21] estimates that no more than half of the original composition has survived). The Baal Cycle illustrates the drama behind a struggle among the sons of El for power and preeminence within the pantheon, most notably between Yamm and Baal. In addition to sea and river, Baal's adversary Yamm is represented also by monsters associated with the sea, specifically the sea dragon Tunnan (cf. Heb tannin ["dragon"]) and the seven-headed sea creature Lotan (cf. Heb liwyātān ["Leviathan"]), probably alternate names for the same creature (note their parallel usage in KTU 1.3.III.37-40; 1.83 [see Pitard, 279]). At first, Yamm is given permission from El to build a palace for himself, but as Yamm seeks to exert his authority (including seeking to have Baal handed over so that he could seize his gold), Baal resists and battle ensues. Yamm has the upper hand in battle until the craftsman god Kothar wa-Hasis (or Kothar) intervenes and provides Baal with two clubs, the second of which successfully takes out Yamm. It is in this context that Baal is called the "Rider of the Clouds" and described as having an "everlasting kingdom" and "eternal dominion." After Baal's defeat of the sea god, Astarte exclaims, "Yamm is indeed dead! Baal shall be king!" and work on Baal's palace begins. This noted, in another tablet (KTU 1.3), Baal's sister Anat also claims to have defeated the sea and its creatures.

1.2. Old Testament Chaos Imagery. As with the ancient Near Eastern texts noted above, the OT utilizes a variety of images from the realm of nature to portray what is chaotic and seemingly uncontrollable. In further similarity with numerous ancient Near Eastern Chaoskampf myths, these inimical forces are drawn from the aquatic realm—the deep powerful sea and its fearsome creatures. Conversely, as also attested in ancient Near Eastern texts, the imagery for the presence and activity of God is often mediated through that which accompanies the battering of the sea—storm imagery.

1.2.1. The Primordial Sea. The image of a raging personified cosmic deep (tēhôm) is perhaps the most pervasive symbol of chaos in ancient mythological texts. The cognate of the Hebrew term tēhôm occurs also in the Ugaritic corpus (thm/thmt) and designates the primordial cosmic waters in those texts (cf. KTU 1.100.1; 1.3.III.25). There may also be an indirect philological relationship between tēhôm and the saltwater goddess Tiamat of the Enuma Elish account (see Tsumura, 45-52).

In addition to the tēhôm, texts with a mythopoeic (mythopoetic) feel also speak of the waters (mayim), river(s) (nāhār) and flood(s) (e.g., mab bûl, šibbōlet), as seen in Psalm 93:3; Nahum 1:4; Habakkuk 3:8-9 (cf. KTU 1.2). The primeval waters were understood as being located both above the firmament and beneath the earth, with the "windows of heaven" understood as the entry point for water (rain) from above. The understanding of the cosmic deep extends to the realm of God, as YHWH is described as sitting enthroned over the flood as king forever (Ps 29:10) and praised as the one who "lays the beams of his upper chambers in the waters" (Ps 104:3). This is reminiscent of the location of the throne of Ea in the midst of Apsu (the primeval fresh waters) in the Babylonian Enuma Elish. Such texts also bring to mind the placement of the palace of the Syro-Canaanite god El, which is described in the Baal Cycle as being located on a cosmic mountain that serves as the source of the primordial oceans/water springs (see KTU 1.3.V.6-7; 1.4.IV.21-22; 1.6.I.33-34). In addition, certain poetic texts personify the waters as follows:

The waters saw you, O God; the waters saw you and writhed, even the deeps trembled. (Ps 77:16)

The deep sounded forth its voice; it lifted its hands up high. (Hab 3:10 [cf. Job 28:14; Ps 93:3])

Deep cries out to deep at the sound of your waterfalls. (Ps 42:7)

In addition to these examples, the usage of the deep in the blessings of Jacob and Moses could be construed as personifying the tēhôm (cf. Gen 49:25; Dt 33:13), and the absence of the article with "sea" in Job 9:8 and Psalm 78:13 has been noted as marking yām ("sea") as a proper name (although the absence of the article is commonplace in poetry).

On the other hand, YHWH is described as the one who has created the sea and continues to control it, as in Psalm 95: "To him belongs the sea; for he made it as well as the dry land which his hands formed" (Ps 95:5 [cf. Ps 104:6, 9; 146:6]). YHWH is shown to have sovereign mastery over the sea (e.g., "he tramples down the waves of the sea” [Job 9:8]) and everything else in the created realm (see Curtis, 255). In short, “Whatever YHWH pleases, he does—in heaven, in earth, in the seas, and in all deeps” (Ps 135:6 [cf. Jer 31:35]). Waters are described as controlled by God, the boundaries of the sea are noted as specifically set by God (Prov 8:28-29), and the sea is described as kept in place by YHWH (even imprisoned [see Job 38:8-11]). Such descriptions, especially when heard in their cultural context and in light of the details of other ancient Near Eastern texts, underscore YHWH’s mastery over the seemingly uncontrollable seas and thus foster trust and faith in YHWH’s power. Lastly, it should not be missed that the controlling of the sea and walking on the water demonstrated by Jesus recapitulates the divine mastery over watery forces and consequently shows his divine nature and royal status (Mt 8:23-27; 14:22-34; cf. Job 26:12; Ps 65:7; 89:9 [see Wyatt 1998, 855]).

1.2.2. Chaos Monsters of the Primordial Sea. In addition to the motif of the inimical waters (têhôm/deep; yām/sea; mayim/waters; nāhār/river) subjugated by YHWH, other texts intermix YHWH’s control over the waters with his mastery over aquatic opponent(s) having serpent- and dragon-like features. These creatures occasionally appear with the term for “snake,” providing a serpentine imagery for these monsters of the deep (as also seen in the various sea monsters attested in the various ancient Near Eastern stories noted above). It should be noted that the contextual proximity and interplay of these sea creatures with the oceanic deep makes it clear that they are either closely related to the image of the chaotic waters or perhaps even function as metaphorical synonyms. Attempts have been made to connect these creatures (as well as Behemoth [see Job 40:15-24]) with various animals (such as the crocodile and hippopotamus), but the imagery and descriptions used of these creatures make such identification untenable (if anything, prehistoric fish and dinosaurs would have the closest points of connection). Instead, these aquatic monsters probably are intended to have a mythological tone in line with the poetic intent of a given passage. This is consistent with the fact that a monstrous sea serpent was a common mythological symbol for chaos in the ancient Near East. Lastly, although the frequent parallel usage of these terms in the Bible and elsewhere (such as the Baal Cycle [see KTU

1.5.1.1]) implies that only one serpentine sea creature associated with the primordial deep is envisaged, the most common terms found in the OT (“Rahab,” “Leviathan,” “Tannin”) will be surveyed separately below.

The term Rahab (Heb rahab) appears six times in the OT and has no known cognates in other ancient Near Eastern languages. In two of these occurrences (Ps 87:4; Is 30:7) Rahab refers to Egypt (see 1.5 below). In the other four occurrences, however, Rahab seems to be a serpentine creature associated with the sea. For example, Job notes that God “with his power quieted the sea and with his understanding he crushed Rahab; with his wind [‘Spirit?'] the sky became clear; his hand pierced the fleeing serpent” (Job 26:12-13). Also, in a celebration of God’s mastery over the created realm Job notes that “the helpers of Rahab crouch down” beneath YHWH (Job 9:13). In like manner, the psalmist notes that God rules the swelling of the sea and stills the rising waves, and that he crushed Rahab “like a corpse” (Ps 89:8-10). Similarly, Isaiah notes that God “cut Rahab in pieces, pierced the dragon . . . the one who caused the sea to dry up, the waters of the great deep [têhôm]” (Is 51:9-10). As noted above, the parallel structure of these occurrences indicates a close relationship between Rahab and the sea (yām) in Job 26:12; Psalm 89:9-10; Isaiah 51:9-10; Rahab and the deep (têhôm) in Isaiah 51:9-10; Rahab and the gliding serpent in Job 26:13; as well as Rahab and the dragon (tannin) in Isaiah 51:9.

Another OT sea creature that evokes much comparative discussion is Leviathan (Heb liwyātān). This term occurs six times in the OT (twice in Is 27:1) and has the Ugaritic cognate ltn (“Lotan” or “Litan”). As with Rahab, the usage of Leviathan is associated with the sea (see Job 41:1; Ps 104:26), including the image of YHWH dividing the sea and controlling the rivers with his strength (Ps 74:13-15). In addition, Leviathan is used in conjunction with the serpent (nāhāš [Job 26:13; Is 27:1]), as well as the “dragon [tannin] that lives in the sea” (see Is 27:1). The overlap of this imagery can be appreciated from the following texts:

You divided the sea by your strength; you broke the heads of the sea dragons [pl. of tannin] upon the waters. You crushed the heads of Leviathan; you gave him as food for the people of the wilderness. You cleaved open springs and brooks; you caused the mighty rivers to dry up. (Ps 74:13-15)

On that day YHWH will punish with his fierce, great and mighty sword Leviathan the gliding serpent, yes, Leviathan the twisting serpent; he will slay the dragon that lives in the sea. (Is 27:1)

In addition, Leviathan's description as a "twisting" and "multiheaded serpent" that is associated with the sea and has been subjugated by God (see Job 41; Ps 73:13-14) is more than reminiscent of the "twisting" serpent with "seven heads" defeated by Baal (and Anat) in conjunction with their battle(s) against the sea god Yamm in the Ugaritic corpus:

Surely I smote Yamm [Sea], beloved of El; surely I made an end of Nahar [River], the mighty god; surely I choked Tunnan [Dragon] . . . I smote the twisting Lotan, the tyrant with seven heads. (KTU 1.3.III.37-40 [cf. KTU 1.5.I.1-4])

Yet, although this sea serpent is associated with the imagery of watery chaos and is subjugated by YHWH, it should not be missed that Leviathan is described as one of the creatures made by YHWH and dependant upon him for life (Ps 104:24-30). Lastly, the likely relationship between Leviathan and the creatures of the book of Revelation should be noted. These creatures—a "great red dragon having seven heads" that spews "water like a river from its mouth" (Rev 12:3, 15) and a beast from the sea having "seven heads" (Rev 13:1 [cf. Rev 17:3])—function as the personification of rebellion against divine order (i.e., chaos) and as such provide an ideal image for *Satan (cf. Rev 12:9; 20:2) in the unfolding of an overarching eschatological schema (see 1.6 below).

In addition to Rahab and Leviathan, another OT creature that seems to be some type of sea serpent or sea dragon is Tannin (Heb tannin). This term occurs fourteen times in the OT and has the Ugaritic cognate tnn (tunnan/tannin). A number of these occurrences are found in OT books outside the focus on the present study, including God creating the "great sea monsters [tanninim]" on day five in the Genesis creation account (Gen 1:21), Aaron's staff becoming a Tannin in the midst of Pharaoh and his servants

(Ex 7:9-12 [3x]), as a synonym for "snake" (Deut 32:33; Ps 91:13), and as a symbolic designation for the Babylonian Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 51:34) as well as the Egyptian Pharaoh (Ezek 29:3; 32:2). The inimical nature of the Tannin (and the sea) is implied in Job's question to God, "Am I the sea, or the sea dragon [tannin] that you have set a guard over me?" (Job 7:12). Other instances of Tannin tap into the Chaoskampf motif, such as God's piercing Tannin and cutting up Rahab in the ancient past (Is 51:9), God's breaking of the heads of Tannin in the waters and dividing the sea (Ps 74:13 [see above]), and God's slaying of the Tannin that lives in the sea on the day Leviathan is vanquished (Is 27:1 [see above]). A similar reference to the deity subduing the "water monster" occurs in the Egyptian Instructions to Merikare (COS 1.35:61-66). Similarly, recall that in the Baal Cycle Anat's claims of defeating Yamm included victory against Tunnan, cognate to tannin (KTU 1.3.III.40 [see above]). Given the stress of God's creation of and control over Tannin, the psalmist exhorts the Tannin and the deep (têhôm) itself to praise YHWH (Ps 148:7). These examples also show the parallel usage of Tannin with Leviathan, Rahab and the deep (têhôm). Lastly, we note that YHWH is portrayed as a fire-breathing dragon in Ps 18:8 in the rescuing of his people, a description similar to the smoke- and fire-snorting Leviathan in Job 41:18-21 (see ANEP, 671, 691). A "good dragon" image is also found in the Ugaritic corpus (KTU 1.83.5-7), and Baal is described as being enthroned "like the flood dragon" (RS 24.245).

1.2.3. God and Storm Imagery. As noted above, storm imagery is associated with the god that successfully overcomes the chaotic sea and its creature(s) in several ancient Chaoskampf myths. In like manner, the OT commonly portrays God's presence in conjunction with storm imagery (often called a "storm theophany"), such as strong winds, lightning and dark clouds. For example, God is noted as one who surrounds himself with clouds (Job 22:14; Ps 97:2), who walks upon the wings of the wind (Ps 18:10; Ps 104:3; cf. Job 22:14), who uses clouds as his chariot (Ps 104:3), who causes clouds to burst with lightning (Job 37:11), who clears up the sky with his wind (Job 26:13), whose voice brings forth abundant rain (Job 38:34; Ps 78:23) and whose thunders shake the earth (Ps 29). With respect to wind imagery, one complicating factor in understanding YHWH's relationship with the wind is the fact that the common Hebrew word for "wind" is the same as that used for God's "spirit" (as is the case for the Greek term in the NT). This detail aside, a number of these descriptions have points in common with the Syro-Canaanite storm god Baal Hadad, as Baal is understood to have hegemony over storm forces—wind, clouds, rain, thunder, lightning. Thus Baal, like YHWH, is described as riding on the clouds (Ps 68:4) and controlling the release of water via the windows (or floodgates) of heaven (Ps 104:13; cf. Gen 7:11; 8:2). Recall that Baal used the wind against the sea god Yamm in the Canaanite Baal Cycle. Likewise, in the Babylonian Enuma Elish account Marduk used the wind in his battle against Tiamat ("He made the flood wave and roused Tiamat . . . he created the four fearful wind . . . he made an evil wind"). Yet YHWH's mastery over such meteorological forces is not portrayed in any sort of battle context but rather stresses his omnipotence over all aspects of the created realm.

Another feature of storm imagery is that of darkness (which can be effected by dark clouds and/or control over the sun and other luminaries). Although the imagery of darkness is not a major part of the Baal Cycle or Enuma Elish (although a section near the end of the Baal Cycle seems to imply that the tnn [sea dragon] presents a danger to the sun [cf. Job 3:8]), it plays a sizable role in Egyptian accounts, partly due to the Egyptian understanding of a perpetual animosity between the sun disk (in its various divine manifestations) and the chaos serpent. Paintings in the tomb of Ramesses VI (twelfth century BC) indicate that the span of day and night is a cycle of the Egyptian sky goddess Nut swallowing and then birthing the sun god Re, who transverse the sky in the Sun Barge. During this nightly passage, the darkness-dwelling chaos serpent Apep (often known by the Greek name "Apophis") attempts to destroy the sun. In the OT, God's creation and control of light and darkness (Ps 139:12; Is 45:6-8) and control over the domain of both (Ps 104:19-23) mitigates against such a mythological nuance. Instead, God is described as the one who made the constellations of the sky and the one who transforms darkness into morning (and vice versa) on earth (Amos 5:8). This noted, it is striking to see the parallel relationship between God's oversight of light and darkness and his control of societal order (peace) and disorder (chaos) in the human realm (cf. Is 45:7; see 1.4 below). The NT builds on this imagery of light and darkness by heralding Jesus as the light of the world (Jn 1:4-5; 8:12) and describing believers as children of light (Eph 5:8-14). Lastly, it is striking to recall that in the perfect cosmos of the new creation there is no sea and no night—that is, darkness (Rev 21:1, 25)—both of which characterize the opening scene in Genesis. Instead, God himself will be a perpetual source of light in the new creation.

1.3. Chaos and Creation. OT texts that invoke imagery of YHWH's mastery of the primordial waters and its creatures are frequently found in the context of creation texts. Likewise, in a number of ancient Near Eastern accounts creation is juxtaposed to the subjugation of a cosmic ocean that seems to exist in a dark default eternity. In this schema, the created order arises out of a disordered mass of undetermined matter that is negative or even hostile. The accounts differ at various points, but some type of engagement of a cosmic ocean (and its monsters[s]) functions as a key development in the creation schema. Typically, detail is provided along the lines of a progressive differentiation of matter, such as separating the cosmic waters (e.g., waters above and waters below), separating the heavens from the earth, light from darkness, and land from (primeval) water (Levenson, 122).

For example, in the Mesopotamian Enuma Elish the first-generation elemental gods are pictured as undifferentiated and amorphous entities that are progressively differentiated into the ordered created realm. This transformation is underscored by syntax; stative verbs describe the primordial beings while fientive verbs describe the change and progressive differentiation of these primordial elements. The order of this transformation of undifferentiated matter in Enuma Elish is quite similar to the order of creation in Genesis 1 as well as poetic summaries of creation such as Job 38–41; Psalm 104. In addition, in the Egyptian Hermopolitan creation account the interaction and differentiation effected by the four primordial elements have points of similarity with the opening scene of Genesis, with the primeval waters (tēhôm) likened to Nun, the darkness with Kek, the formless void (Heb tōhû wābōhû) with Heh, and the energetic Spirit of God likened to Amun.

Given that the OT begins with the image of a dark primordial ocean (the têhôm of Gen 1:2 [see above]) and unfolds in a comparable manner vis-à-vis incremental differentiation of matter, it is possible to understand the dark têhôm (along with the enigmatic and oft-discussed expression tôhû wābôhû) as conveying a subtle sense of watery chaos at the onset of creation (cf. Ps 24:2, which notes that YHWH founded the earth upon the seas). Moreover, it has been construed that the structure of Genesis 1 presents the darkness and sea as uncreated (chaotic) realities. Such views are bolstered by the presence of the imagery of a chaotic, unruly sea along with multiheaded sea dragons in poetic texts lauding creation, such as Job 9 (cf. Job 9:8, 13), Job 26 (esp. Job 26:12-13); Job 38—41 (esp. Job 38:8-11; 41), Psalm 74 (esp. Ps 74:12-17), Psalm 89 (esp. Ps 89:9-14), Psalm 104 (esp. Ps. 104:6-9), Proverbs 8 (cf. Prov 8:29) and Isaiah 51 (cf. Is 51:9-10). All told, the process of creation from this perspective would be understood as an out-working of God subjugating, limiting and controlling preexistent chaotic elements into the functioning, ordered cosmos (Levenson, 123, 127).

These points of connection between creation and images of chaos in the OT and points of similarity with ancient Near Eastern cosmogonies causes some to consider the biblical story of creation to be connected (causally or otherwise) with YHWH's conflict with the primordial sea and its monster(s) (see Day, 3). From this perspective, the creation accounts of the Hebrew Bible are understood as presupposing and adopting mythopoeic accounts found elsewhere in the ancient Near East (although it should be stressed that the Baal Cycle does not portray Baal as creator, nor does the Baal Cycle even contain the story of creation). Yet, although the points of connection between the creation details of Chaoskampf myths and OT texts with chaos imagery are compelling and informative (especially regarding the cognitive context of the OT), the reality that the creative process delineated in Genesis 1 transforms the unformed and unfilled world into the ordered realm without any sort of cosmic resistance or struggle cannot be overlooked (complex and convoluted attempts at showing various degrees of demythologization notwithstanding [see Levenson, 58-59; Wyatt 1996, 30]). It should also be noted that the path of least resistance is employed in showing "similarities" between the OT and other ancient texts.

For example, references to the created order in the Egyptian hymn to the sun disk Aten find numerous points in common with those of Psalm 104 (esp. Ps 104:1-2, 19-24), including descriptions of the deity and his creative efficacy, creation of seasonal and temporal markers, activities of the created realm, and so forth. Nevertheless, comparison charts for these texts typically omit parts of verses that illustrate important distinctions, such as the statements that portray YHWH not only as creator but also as sustainer of creation, as well as doxological intermezzos (e.g., Ps 104:24). In addition, most of the opening (Ps 104:3-18) and closing (Ps 104:28-30) of the psalm are not included in such comparisons although the cosmological and etiological content of these verses stress the sovereign design and oversight of every detail of the cosmos (Ps 104:3-18) as well as the role of God's Spirit in sustaining the created order (Ps 104:28-30). In light of such details, Psalm 104 could actually be a polemic against the Egyptian ideology of a divine sun! Beyond this, numerous biblical texts stress that God created everything, making the notion of an eternal cosmic sea untenable (Ps 33:6-9; cf. Is 44:24; Col 1:16-17; Heb 11:3). In addition, although YHWH's presence is associated with meteorological and chthonic phenomena (see above), he is not portrayed as being these elements but rather as wielding them to accomplish his purposes. Moreover, in sharp distinction to ancient Near Eastern accounts, biblical texts totally lack any sort of theogony (story of the birth of god[s]) or change in God in creation texts (Knight, 141-42). Lastly, it should be pointed out that in Psalm 89 YHWH's ownership of the earth is shown as being rooted in his creation of the world rather than his victory over the symbols of chaos.

1.4. Chaos, Society and Kingship. The motif of bringing order to the undifferentiated (chaotic) aspects of the primordial realm (see above) had a direct bearing on the social structure of ancient societies such as Israel. Put another way, that which begins at the cosmic level with God's defeat (and subsequent control) of chaotic forces extends into the social, political and religious order on earth. Such order is not abstract but rather is purposeful with respect to the realm of humankind. In the same way that boundaries mark the circuits of the heavenly lights and the boundaries of the seas, boundaries (ethical, moral and otherwise) are integral to the realm of humankind (Ps 19; cf. Lev 20:24-26). These boundaries underscore the fact that the subjugation of chaotic forces into an ordered cosmos has a moral as well as a physical dimension. As J. C. L. Gibson (213) notes, "Many of the allusions to Yahweh's defeat of chaos in its various watery or monstrous disguises do carry a connotation of his power over evil." The OT repeatedly affirms that the created realm was founded on YHWH's faithfulness, righteousness and justice (see Ps 33:4-7; 89:8-18), facets of divine nature frequently connected with the notion of *wisdom in texts lauding YHWH's work of creation (Prov 3:19-20; 8:22-31; Jer 10:12 [see Knight, 145]). As J. D. Levenson (118) notes, the issue of holiness "is as fundamental to cosmic order as the separations through which God first brought order out of chaos." Moreover, God's ability to bring order to the created realm via holiness functions as the basis for trust in God's saving power (see Ps 74:12 [see Ollenburger, 56-58, 66; Wyatt 1998, 864]). This connection also underscores the biblical interest in heralding divine-human community within the ordered world, an interest ultimately formalized by covenant (Clifford, 199, 201).

Although the connection between holiness and cosmic ordering is especially pronounced in the OT, the societal dimension to the order of the cosmos is also implicit in other ancient Near Eastern Chaoskampf accounts. For example, the principal of moral and cosmic orderliness implicit in YHWH's creation of the world is parallel to the Egyptian concept of Ma'at* (Knight, 149). This notion, commonly translated as "order," "correctness," "truth," "righteousness" and the like, was established at creation and embraced all aspects of reality—from the expanse of the universe to the social and moral aspects of human existence. In the human realm Ma'at was especially related to foundational areas of life, including kingship, law, wisdom, agriculture, war and religion (Knight, 139). Moreover, the Pharaoh was understood as having been appointed by the god Re to uphold Ma'at (order) and eliminate Isfet (disorder) in Egyptian society. Similarly, in the Ugaritic texts Yamm's power in the Baal Cycle is analogous to the chaotic powers of evil that disrupted civilization's existence, and Baal's victory is a victory for peaceful human society. Hence, Baal's victory over Yamm (and Mot [see below]) had great significance for the social world of gods and humans (Clifford, 198). In Babylon the annual recitation of Enuma Elish was seen as assuring Marduk's continued mastery over chaos (political, social, natural or otherwise) and his continued oversight of justice and cosmic order for another year. Note that the chaos of social disorder and anarchy in the Babylonian Erra myth implies Marduk's occasional negligence in maintaining an ordered creation.

As we noted, the understanding of social order in the human realm is a reflection of the divine order achieved at the cosmic level. This achievement of cosmic order is typically underscored and celebrated through the motif of divine kingship (enthronement) and subsequently appropriated through the social structure of human *kingship. In ancient Near Eastern Chaoskampf accounts the storm god who conquered chaos functions as the "foundation of centralized political power" in human society (Green, 281). In several of these texts, such as the Sumerian Ninurta, the Babylonian Enuma Elish and the Syro-Canaanite Baal Cycle, the divine subjugation of chaos is followed by inauguration of divine kingship, celebration and palace building. Thus, Ninurta is awarded kingship after his mastery of the primeval waters and the seven-headed serpent, Marduk receives the names of the gods in becoming their chief after defeating Tiamat, and Astarte declares, "Yamm is indeed dead! Baal shall be king!" following Baal's victory over the sea god. Moreover, as with the palace built for Marduk at Esagila following his victory over the sea goddess Tiamat, the assembly of the gods builds a palace for Baal following his victory over the waters of chaos. Such palaces function as a tangible and spatial expression of divine dominion over chaos and governance of the created realm (Clifford, 192, 197; Fischer, 318-20).

Because some biblical texts (e.g., Pss 29; 93) speak of YHWH's reign and kingship together with imagery of mighty waters, the sea and the flood, it is commonly proposed that the focal point of these texts ultimately pertained to royal ideology, and that the social context of these writings (Sitz im Leben) was the enthronement of the king (see Wyatt 1998, 854, 865-67; Levenson, 69; Day, 21). In this approach, the motif of divine control over chaos has been appropriated by the human king, who is understood to have been given the divine mandate to control human chaos. In an OT framework the covenant functionaries of prophet, priest, king and judge are commissioned by God to facilitate social, political and religious order. Nevertheless, it is the king who is the most prominent official charged with preventing societal chaos and upholding order (i.e., righteousness) via divine law. Note that part of God's establishing *David as king (with likely *messianic implications) includes giving him dominion over the sea and the rivers (Ps 89:25). With this in mind, we note that the royal palace functioned as a symbol of stability within human society (Wyatt 1998, 840). In analogy to the Egyptian throne being founded on the cosmic principle of Monad (see above), Psalm 89 lauds the Davidic throne as being established upon cosmic righteousness (Ps 89:1-31 [see Anderson, 83]). Yet, although YHWH's mastery of the aquatic realm is indeed connected with his present lordship over creation, the absence of the human king in such texts makes the presumed Sitz im Leben of the enthronement of the human king questionable at best. Instead, these texts are heralding the power and sovereignty of God by poetically illustrating his power over the seemingly uncontrollable forces of nature (see 1.7 below).

1.5. The Historicization of Chaos. The imagery of divine conflict with the sea and its dragon is also applied to the historical enemies of Israel in various periods (likewise the Egyptian chaos god Seth was used of Egypt's enemies). For example, texts describing God's deliverance of the Israelites at the Red (Reed) Sea incorporate a considerable amount of storm and water imagery (see Ex 15; Ps 77:17-21; 106:9). In addition, Egypt is referred to by one of the names of the sea dragon, "Rahab," in Isaiah 30:7 (and probably in Ps 87:4), and the Egyptian Pharaoh is referred to as the "great monster that lies in the midst of his rivers" in Ezekiel 29:3 (cf. Ezek 32:2). Similarly, the image of raging waters is applied to the advancing Assyrian army in Isaiah 8:5-8. Storm and chaos imagery is also appropriated to show God's efficacious deliverance at the individual level, as with Psalm 18, where YHWH's rescue of one in the midst of the mighty waters is portrayed through a host of meteorological and chthonic phenomena, including the shaking of the earth, trembling of the mountains, thick darkness, smoke (from God's nostrils), fire (from God's mouth), thunder, hail and lighting (see Ps 18:3-19). Lastly, in light of such imagery, appeals for divine deliverance at both the individual and the national level are frequently rooted in God's victories over the symbols of chaos—Rahab, Tannin (dragon), Tehom (deep), Sea and the like (see Is 51:9-11).

1.6. The Eschatologization of Chaos. In addition to historicizing the motif of divine conflict with the dragon and the sea, other OT texts use this imagery to describe a future eschatological defeat of chaos—a future of hope absent from other ancient Near Eastern myths. This is noteworthy, as the forces of chaos, though subjugated and limited (see Job 38:8-11; Ps 104:5-9), are portrayed not as completely defeated but rather as ever threatening to divine order and human life structures (Levenson, 65). Thus, texts that speak to the final eradication of chaos strike a chord in the human heart. A vivid example of this usage, although found outside the OT books under study here, is worth considering:

On that day YHWH will punish with his fierce, great and mighty sword Leviathan the gliding serpent, yes, Leviathan the twisting serpent; he will slay the dragon that is in the sea. (Is 27:1)

In this text (found within the so-called Isaianic Apocalypse [Is 24—27]) several of the creatures associated with past divine victory over chaos (cf. Ps 74:12-17) are used to describe a future subjugation of chaos: Leviathan, the gliding serpent and the Tannin (dragon), which lives in the sea. Similarly, in the apocalyptic vision of Daniel 7 God battles four monsters from the sea that stand against his dominion. Such future cosmic struggles against the forces of chaos and evil no doubt factor into NT apocalyptic texts, particularly God's battle with the seven-headed beasts from the sea found in the book of Revelation (e.g., Rev 12:3; 13:1; 17:3) culminating with permanent divine victory over these serpentine beasts (Rev 20; cf. Rom 16:20), a new created order (i.e., a new heavens, a new earth, a new Jerusalem) and everlasting divine reign (Rev 11:17; 19:6). It is in this context that the statement that there will be "no more sea" in this new cosmos (Rev 21:1) should be understood: no longer will there be any residue of seemingly uncontrollable and chaotic forces in God's new creation.

1.7. The Hermeneutics of Chaos (or Vice Versa). As evidenced above, there is a degree of tension between OT texts that mirror ancient Near Eastern myths concerning a primordial battle between the storm god and the sea deity (chaos) and texts that stress that YHWH is the sole, transcendent creator of the cosmos (including the sea and the creatures of the sea). Much biblical scholarship (particularly from segments having a negative or nuanced view of biblical veracity) opts to propose various streams and stages of demythologization used by later writers/redactors on texts with a mythological feel, but this is more a matter of presuppositions than biblical exegesis. Instead, the possibility must be considered that rather than a process of demythologization taking place, the usage of poetic expression included intentional mythologization of various chaos motifs for the purpose of poetic impact and expression. Certainly it seems clear that the “God language” of the Canaanites and Israelites (as well as the Egyptians and Mesopotamians) had numerous points of cultural and linguistic contact (see Smick 1982, 88). Moreover, the brevity and the subtleness of references to ancient Near Eastern Chaoskampf accounts suggest a grid of understanding and familiarity with these stories on the part of the biblical writers and the ancient audience. Yet, there is a significant difference between borrowed imagery and borrowed ideology/theology. In short, the ancient Israelite writers may well have used broadly attested mythopoeic imagery and language for poetic purposes (and/or polemical purposes [note the application of Baal’s cosmic mountain Zaphon to Mount Zion at Ps 48:2]) without incorporating the thought and ideology attached to such imagery and language.

It is noteworthy that scholars who argue for a biblical adaptation of ancient Near Eastern cosmological and cosmogonical systems of belief freely adjust the biblical text because they find a given poetic colon “overloaded,” “intrusive” and the like. Not surprisingly, such adjustments lend even further “support” to their views on the origins of OT mythopoeic language. Similarly, such scholars tend to begin with the a priori assumption that Israel’s understanding of God, creation, and so forth is basically the same as that of its neighbors and then proceed (in what amounts to circular reasoning) to read various ancient Near Eastern mythological concepts into the biblical material in a manner that amounts to a hermeneutical and interpretive axiom.

A close look at the literary and contextual usage of chaos terminology suggests that the meaning of this imagery tends to differ based on the genre in which it is found. In narrative literature, for example, the use of such imagery is not attested with clarity (recall the attempt to extract chaos imagery out of Gen 1:2, noted above). In prophetic literature the chaos motif tends to be historicized (e.g., Is 30:7; Jer 51:34), with the figures of chaos applied to Israel’s enemies of the time (see above). In apocalyptic literature the chaos imagery functions as a literary medium to express eschatological themes, such as the complete elimination of evil and cosmic strife at the end of time (Is 27:1; Dan 7; Rev 12–13). Lastly, in poetic literature (including wisdom literature written in poetic line) usage of chaos imagery frequently has a mythopoeic feel reminiscent of the various ancient Near Eastern texts surveyed above. Given that the usage of chaos imagery is overwhelmingly attested in the poetic genre, the authorial purpose (Tendenz) for such usage must be considered in light of the literary features of this genre. In short, poetic literature utilizes evocative expression in order to create a sensory impact on the hearer or reader as over against other literary types. Such emotive and metaphorical stylistics of poetry can be appreciated by comparing the narrative renderings of the crossing of the Red Sea and the Israelite battle against the army of Sisera with the poetic celebrations of these same events that follow in the biblical text (Ex 14–15; Judg 4–5).

In order to facilitate this emotive quality of poetry, ancient writers (including OT authors) commonly employed the vivid sensory images of nature. In addition to demonstrating models of order and beauty (Ps 19:1-6; Prov 6:6-11; Jer 8:7), the natural realm also provides apt imagery and symbolism for the forces of chaos and disorder. As E. B. Smick (1978, 214-15) notes, “Nature is a theme which frequently evoked mythological language: the storm, fire, the sea, the heavens and the earth and creatures in both spheres.” Hence, in poetic descriptions of the crossing of the Red Sea and the Jordan River, aspects of the created realm are commonly personified as combatants for impact (Terrien, 119-20). For example, the waters and the deep are described as “seeing” God and responding in “fear” and “anguish,” the sea “looks and flees,” the Jordan “retreats,” and mountains “skip like rams” (Ps 77:16-20; cf. Ps 114:1-8). Although such poetic imagery personifies elements of the natural realm for literary effect, it is naïve to conclude that these elements were considered living entities. Likewise, although certain poetic passages in the OT personify the sea and present it as an inimical force that YHWH subdues, the purpose of these passages is to show the power and sovereign mastery of YHWH over the seemingly “uncontrollable” elements of nature (see Job 9; 26), not to present the sea as a living foe. Hence, it is not surprising that such texts utilizing mythopoeic images are woven together with confessions of faith and expressions of praise (Longman and Reid, 77). In short, “chaos” terminology is utilized to show comprehensive divine sovereignty and to adjure readers and listeners to have commensurate faith in God for all things large and small (see Ps 77).

2. Death as the Ultimate Expression of Chaos.

Death is the ultimate expression of chaos for the human realm, the final culmination of moral and social disorder (rebellion). Death, like chaos, is a by-product of crossing boundaries established by God. Indeed, the land of death is described as a place “without any order” (Job 10:22). As P. S. Johnston (73) notes, death is “cosmologically opposite to ‘heaven.’” Like chaos, death is also connected with images of a tempestuous watery abyss (e.g., Ps 124:2-5; 69:14-15 [see Johnston, 114-24]), partly due to the sense that one sinks down into darkness in both (see Watson, 85-93; Wyatt 1996, 102). Similarly, Job 38:16-17 juxtaposes the gates of the underworld with the depths of the sea, and Job 26:5 places the rēpāʾim (departed spirits) beneath the waters. In Egyptian images of the netherworld the ka (soul) of the dead sailed through waters of the abyss and its gates and chambers facing various tests and trials (Wright, 16). Similarly, the Mesopotamian understanding of death included a netherworld river journey. The place of death is also associated with the underworld (“belly”) of the earth (Tromp, 23-46). In the Syro-Canaanite Baal Cycle the realm of death is controlled by Mot (cognate to the Hebrew word for “death”), who is called “the Beloved of El” (see KTU 1.4.VII.46-47; 1.5.I.6-8). Although Mot is one of the sons of the god El (bn ilm [KTU 1.6.II.13; 1.6.VI.24]) and understood to be the king of the underworld (see KTU 1.6.V.27ff.), Mot is not part of the Ugaritic pantheon and is absent from Ugaritic cultic offering lists, implying that he was not worshiped. Nevertheless, Mot certainly was an inimical force to be appeased and feared (see KTU 1.23). As F. M. Cross (116) notes, Mot “represents the dark chthonic powers which bring sterility, disease, and death.” Mot is depicted in Ugaritic texts as being wide of throat and having an insatiable appetite for gods and people (e.g., KTU 1.6.II.21-23). In the battle between Baal and Mot, Baal is at first swallowed up by Mot (a picture of death) and is brought to the confines of the netherworld, a place of darkness and decay beneath the earth. However, Baal is brought back from the realm of death (a picture of rebirth) with the aid of Anat. The battle between Baal and Mot is sometimes considered to be a metaphor for seasonal changes, with Mot representing the heat and agricultural “death” of the dry season, and Baal representing the moisture and “life” of the rainy season. Although there is a strong connection between seasonal cycles and rituals in ancient cultures (including Israel), there are several problems with this understanding of the Baal Cycle, including the need to change the order of the texts and the concurrent reign of Baal and Mot (see Smith, 60-75; Cassuto, 78-79; Clifford, 195).

In the OT death appears in conjunction with related terms that speak of the realm of the dead, including “destruction,” “Abaddon” (place of destruction), “the pit,” “Sheol” and “the grave” (Johnston, 83-85; Tromp, 21-98). As with Mot in the Baal Cycle, Sheol/Death enlarges its appetite (Hab 2:5), opens its throat wide (Is 5:14), swallows people (Ps 69:15; Prov 1:12) and is never satisfied (Prov 27:20; 30:15-16; Hab 2:5). In addition to the Baal-like image of an insatiable swallower, death is personified as a hunter of sorts, complete with traps, snares and netting (Job 18:9-13; Ps 18:4; Prov 13:14; 14:27 [see Tromp, 172-75]). As such, death can seize a person suddenly and unexpectedly (Eccles 9:12). Like the realm of Mot, the realm of death in the OT is described with city features, such as gates and bars (see Job 17:16; 38:17; Ps 9:13; 107:18), implying a specific spatial realm of the dead (Johnston, 70-79). This realm of death is a place of darkness (Job 10:21; 38:17), a place of bitterness, terror, distress and sorrow (Ps 116:3; Eccles 7:26), a place of forgetfulness (Ps 88:12), a place of inactivity (Eccles 9:10) and where people are cut off from the Lord and cannot praise him (see Ps 6:5; 30:9; 88:5, 12; 115:17). Death’s power over humankind is seen in the fact that all people die (see Ps 89:48), and that those who go to the grave do not return to life (Job 7:9-10; 10:21).

This grim description of death notwithstanding, it is significant to note the biblical emphasis on God's power over death and the grave. By contrast, Baal's battle with Mot does not produce a victor; rather, it ends in a cosmic stalemate (Smith, 105). In short, God's power, sovereignty and omniscience extend into death's realm (Job 26:6; 34:22; Ps 139:8; Prov 15:11; Amos 9:2). Moreover, unlike Baal, God cannot die; his existence is "from everlasting to everlasting" (Ps 90:2). The wayward can "make a covenant with death" and be "in agreement" with Sheol (Is 28:15), but God (demonstrating his power over death) can annul this covenant and cause the agreement not to stand through the messianic cornerstone that he lays in Zion (Is 28:16-18). Thus, God will not abandon his children to Sheol (Ps 16:10) but rather redeems his chosen ones from the power of the grave (Job 19:25-27; Ps 49:5-15) and brings them into (everlasting) life (Ps 16:8-11; 73:24; Dan 12:2). The imagery of death as voracious swallower (see above) meets an ironic reversal when we learn that YHWH will permanently "swallow up death" (Is 25:8; cf. 1 Cor 15:54; Rev 21:4). Since death is the ultimate opponent of divine order, the death of death represents the establishment of the ultimate divine order.

See also AFTERLIFE; CREATION IMAGERY; CREATION THEOLOGY; DESTRUCTION; PSALMS 6: ICONOGRAPHY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. F. Albright, Yahweh and the Gods of Canaan: A Historical Analysis of Two Contrasting Faiths (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990); B. W. Anderson, From Creation to New Creation: Old Testament Perspectives (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); J. B. Burns, "The Mythology of Death in the Old Testament," SJT 26 (1973) 327-40; U. Cassuto, "Baal and Mot in the Ugaritic Texts," IEJ 12 (1962) 77-86; R. J. Clifford, "Cosmogonies in the Ugaritic Texts and in the Bible," Or 53 (1984) 183-201; P. C. Craigie, "The Comparison of Hebrew Poetry: Psalm 104 in the Light of Egyptian and Ugaritic Poetry," Semitics 4 (1974) 10-21; F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973); A. H. W. Curtis, "The 'Subjugation of the Waters' Motif in the Psalms: Imagery or Polemic?" JSS 23 (1978) 245-56; J. Day, God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea: Echoes of a Canaanite Myth in the Old Testament (UCOP 35; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985); L. R. Fischer, "Creation at Ugarit and in the Old Testament," VT 15 (1965) 313-24; R. S. Fyall, Now My Eyes Have Seen You: Images of Creation and Evil in the Book of Job (NSBT; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002); W. A. Gage, The Gospel of Genesis: Studies in Protology and Eschatology (Winona Lake, IN: Carpenter Books, 1984); J. C. L. Gibson, "The Theology of the Ugaritic Baal Cycle," Or 53 (1984) 202-19; C. H. Gordon, "Leviathan: Symbol of Evil," in Biblical Motifs: Origins and Transformations, ed. A. Altmann (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1966) 1-9; A. R. W. Green, The Storm-God in the Ancient Near East (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2003); J. H. Grønbæk, "Baal's Battle with Yam: A Canaanite Creation Fight," JSOT 33 (1985) 27-44; H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit: Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung über Gen 1 und Ap Joh 12 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1895) = Creation And Chaos in the Primeval Era And the Eschaton: A Religio-historical Study of Genesis 1 and Revelation 12 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); G. Hart, Egyptian Myths (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990); P. S. Johnston, Shades of Sheol: Death and Afterlife in the Old Testament (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (New York: Seabury Press, 1978); C. Kloos, Yhwh's Combat with the Sea: A Canaanite Tradition in the Religion of Ancient Israel (Amsterdam: G. A. van Oorschot; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1986); D. A. Knight, "Cosmogony and Order in the Hebrew Tradition," in Cosmogony and Ethical Order: New Studies in Comparative Ethics, ed. R. W. Lovin and F. E. Reynolds (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985) 133-57; S. N. Kramer, Sumerian Mythology (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1961); J. D. Levenson, Creation and the Persistence of Evil: The Jewish Drama of Divine Omnipotence (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988); T. Longman III and D. G. Reid, God Is a Warrior (SOTBT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); D. J. McCarthy, "'Creation' Motifs in Ancient Hebrew Poetry," CBQ 29 (1967) 87-100; B. C. Ollenburger, Zion, City of the Great King: A Theological Symbol of the Jerusalem Cult (JSOTSup 41; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1987); W. T. Pitard, "The Binding of Yamm: A New Edition of the Ugaritic Text KTU 1.83," JNES 57 (1998) 261-80; E. B. Smick, "Another Look at the Mythological Elements in the Book of Job," WTJ 40 (1978) 213-28; idem, "Mythopoetic Language in the Psalms," WTJ 44

(1982) 88-98; M. S. Smith, The Ugaritic Baal Cycle, 1: Introduction with Text, Translation and Commentary of KTU 1.1-1.2 (VTSup 55; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994); S. Terrien, "Creation, Cultus, and Faith in the Psalter," TE 2 (1966) 116-28; N. J. Tromp, Primitive Conceptions of Death and the Nether World in the Old Testament (BibOr 21; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1969); D. T. Tsumura, The Earth and the Waters in Genesis 1 and 2 (JSOTSup 83; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1989); M. K. Wakeman, "The Biblical Earth Monster in the Cosmogonic Combat Myth," JBL 88 (1969) 313-20; idem, God's Battle with the Monster: A Study in Biblical Imagery (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); R. S. Watson, Chaos Uncreated: A Reassessment of the Theme of "Chaos" in the Hebrew Bible (BZAW 341; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2005); F. A. M. Wiggermann, "Tishpak, His Seal, and the Dragon Mushhushshu," in To the Euphrates and Beyond: Archaeological Studies in Honour of Maurits N. van Loon, ed. O. M. C. Haex, H. H. Curvers and P. M. M. G. Akkermans (Rotterdam: Balkema, 1989) 117-33; J. E. Wright, The Early History of Heaven (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000); N. Wyatt, Myths of Power: A Study of Royal Myth and Ideology in Ugaritic and Biblical Tradition (UBL 13; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, 1996); idem, "Arms and the King: The Earliest Allusions to the Chaoskampf Motif and Their Implications for the Interpretation of the Ugaritic and Biblical Traditions," in "Und Mose schrieb dieses Lied auf": Studien zum Alten Testament und zum Alten Orient; Festschrift für Oswald Loretz zur Vollendung seines 70. Lebensjahres mit Beiträgen von Freunden, Schülern und Kollegen, ed. M. Dietrich and I. Kottsieper (AOAT 250; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, 1998) 833-82.

F. J. Mabie

CHIASM

A sequence of components repeated in inverted order is known as a chiasm (named for the crossover pattern of the Greek letter chi: X). Repetition may occur at the level of phonemes (similar sounds), lexemes (whether identical or synonymous words), grammatically equivalent components (e.g., subject, verb, object :: object, verb, subject) or conceptually related components (see examples from Prov 1 in 1.2 below). Any number of terms may comprise a chiasm, forming either a fully doubled scheme (e.g., A, B, C :: C', B', A') or a scheme with an isolated center (e.g., A, B, C : D : C', B', A').

Attention to three aspects helps the reader appreciate chiasm in biblical composition: range of use, reliable detection and resulting enrichment.

1. Range of Use
2. Reliable Detection
3. Resulting Enrichment
4. Conclusion

1. Range of Use.

The extent to which authors of wisdom, poetry and writings in the Hebrew Bible employed chiasm may best be grasped by considering varied genres, span of text and frequency with which this device occurs.

1.1. Genre Employing Chiasm. Conceived primarily as a device of poetry, chiasm appears in prose as well (largely at the concept level). D. A. Dorsey (170) recognizes in prose portions of *Job a seven-member prologue sequence that recurs, inverted, in the epilogue. For *Ruth, C. Bovell (178) proposes a chiasm contrasting the two wives of Elkanah, centering in the phrases "the name of the one was Orpah / the name of the second was Ruth" (spanning Ruth 1:1-6).

1.2. Span of Text. A span as compact as one poetic stichos (often comprising a single biblical verse) may contain a chiasm at the grammatical level as the sequence of verb-subject-object reverse order in the second iteration: "shall return, his toil, upon his head :: and upon his pate shall his violence descend" (Ps 7:16 [note that awareness of the underlying Hebrew word order in Ps 7:17 MT is necessary to detect the inversion]). Alternatively, an adjacent pair of verses may be joined by lexical chiasm: "lips, mouth :: mouth, lips" (Prov 18:6-7). Encompassing a still larger span, a concept-level chiasm, or palistrophe (from Gk palin ["again"] plus "strophe"), may encompass multiple verses, as in the sophisticated composition "The Appeal of Wealth" (Prov 1:10-19 [palistrophe distinguishes extended chiasms from shorter, stichos-level inversions]).

"The Appeal of Wealth" (Prov 1:10-19)

A. Dual Theme Introduction (v. 10)

1. Gang's Enticement (v. 10a)
2. Father's Warning (v. 10b)

B. Enticement by the Gang (vv. 11-14)

1. A Capital Plan: Inflicting Death on Others (vv. 11-12)
2. Rationale for Enlistment: Monetary Ends (v. 13)

- 3. Call to Enlist (v. 14)
- B'. Warning by the Father (vv. 15-18)
 - 3. Call to Withdraw (v. 15)
 - 2. Rationale for Withdrawing: Violent Means (v. 16)
 - 1. Capital Consequences: Receiving Death for Oneself (vv. 17-18)
- A'. Conclusion (v. 19)

The remainder of Proverbs 1 appears similarly structured, a palistrophe dominating “The Appeal of Wisdom” (Prov 1:20-33, with palistrophe spanning Prov 1:22-33 [a comparable rhetorical analysis was first introduced by Trible]). Following an introduction, unit A (Prov 1:20-21), the palistrophe breaks into fairly balanced halves, B and B' (Prov 1:22-27; 1:28-33). Only a lengthy (tricola) dramatic climax imbalances unit B, portraying the devastating retributive storm to be unleashed against obdurate invitees precisely at the palistrophe's core (Prov 1:27). References to invitees digresses from second-person engagement in unit B to third-person reporting in unit B', creating a form-related segmentation endorsing the content-related palistrophic pattern hinging at Proverbs 1:27. Why should Lady Wisdom (see Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly) make this digression, recounting the report of “their” hopeless misfortune, if not in hopes that still others—eavesdropping bystanders among the sage's audience—might listen and gain wisdom? The close produces a logical climax as in Proverbs 1:32-33 a palistrophically reprised summary of characters dismisses two met earlier (naïve and fool) while nominating a new, third character: in the place of the scoffer (Prov 1:22), the receptive hearer (Prov 1:33)!

- “The Appeal of Wisdom” (Prov 1:20-33)
- A. Introduction of Lady Wisdom (vv. 20-21)
- B. Wisdom's Speech, Part 1 (vv. 22-27)
 - 1. Character Survey and Summons (vv. 22-23a)
 - 2. Wisdom's Proposition: A Choice Offered (v. 23b-c)
 - 3. Cause for Wisdom's Abandoning the Fools (vv. 24-25)
 - 4. Response of Wisdom to Fools' Plight (v. 26)
 - 5. Description of Disaster (v. 27)
- B'. Wisdom's Speech, Part 2 (vv. 28-33)
 - 4. Response of Wisdom to Fools' Plight (v. 28)
 - 3. Cause for Wisdom's Abandoning the Fools (vv. 29-30)
 - 2. Wisdom's Principle: A Choice Made (v. 31)

- 1. Character Survey and Conclusion (vv. 32-33)

1.3. Frequency of Occurrence. Assured chiasm in poetic material occurs fairly frequently at the levels of grammar and lexeme/synonym, offering a conscious alternative to parallelism so ubiquitous in Hebrew poetry (Kugel, 19). Many prose chiasms similarly have been proposed, often operating at the concept level (see the volume by Dorsey, with its insightful introduction followed by numerous potential chiasms across the OT). However, diligence must be exercised lest the text grow silent beneath the weight of imposed patterns.

2. Reliable Detection.

Two extremes hazard the path of chiasm recognition: underdetection and overdetection. For two reasons, chiasm may go undetected. First, readers accustomed to linear presentations tend to overlook concentric patterns. In this regard, Western readers may be particularly disadvantaged. Second, most grammatical and virtually all phonemic chiasms defy effective translation—for example, the aforementioned grammatical inversion in Psalm 7:16 evident only in Hebrew (Ps 7:17 MT), and similarly the phoneme-level chiasm of Ecclesiastes 7:1: “A good name is better than fine perfume,” which limps rather lamely alongside the smoothly pivoting original: îôb šēm miššemen îôb.

Overdetection similarly hazards the path, particularly when concept-level discoveries only invent hopeful chimeras of chiasm. Along a vector of diminishing concern, one should be suspicious of the following scenarios: (1) when segments of the text must be overlooked to achieve chiasm; (2) when form-related markers clearly segmenting the text conflict with chiastic divisions; (3) when titles proposed for chiastic segments seem forced, not reflecting cogently their actual content; (4) when length of chiastically balancing segments is severely lopsided. Criteria such as these may help assess relative merits of conflicting proposals (cf. conflicting palistrophes offered by Shea and by Webster accounting for the whole of *Song of Songs).

3. Resulting Enrichment.

Chiasm may enrich a composition threefold: text-critically, aesthetically and rhetorically.

3.1. Text-Critical Enrichment. Chiasm may alternatively reinforce or raise questions concerning integrity of a given text. Omission of Proverbs 1:16 from two important Greek manuscripts has inclined some to treat it as secondary, an insertion from Isaiah 59:7 to illuminate the fowler saying in Proverbs 1:17 with a second ki (“because”) clause (so Clifford, 39, with BHS notes). However, when viewed against the backdrop of its palistropic counterpart, the contribution of Proverbs 1:16 grows much more distinct. Whereas Proverbs 1:13 (element B.2.) provides the gang’s “Rationale for Enlistment” with a glitter of monetary ends, Proverbs 1:16 (element B’2.) rebuts with the father’s “Rationale for Withdrawing” by turning a spotlight on how reprehensible are the gang’s violent means (see 1.2 above). Rather than treating ki (which opens both Prov 1:16 and Prov 1:17) as signaling two rather redundant explanatory statements supporting the call to withdraw (Prov 1:15), we now may affirm ki of Proverbs 1:16 as explanatory, while the same word in Proverbs 1:17 functions asseveratively (“surely” or “indeed”), adding emphasis to the fowler saying. Thus, detection of a palistrophe enveloping Proverbs 1:16 may reinforce integrity of this verse and may further aid its interpretation (see Welch, 12).

When incomplete, a chiasmic pattern may raise the question of whether a balancing member may have been corrupted or lost. Two of three members in Job 17:7a recur chiastically in Job 17:7b (“dimmed with sorrow is my eye :: and my limbs like a shadow—all of them”). Modifying phrases occupy second position (“with sorrow” [B] and “like a shadow” [B’]), while body parts dominate the core (“my eye” [C] and “my limbs” [C’]). However, the verb “dimmed” (A) finds no balancing verb in “all of them” (A’). By revocalizing the consonants comprising the phrase “all of them” (klm), M. Dahood (124) proposes that stichos B’ should read “and my limbs like a shadow are wasted,” thereby balancing the verb “dimmed” (A) with “wasted” (A’), thus completing a three-member chiasm.

3.2. Aesthetic Enrichment. At the stichos level chiasm may achieve little more than variety of expression “to break the monotony of persistent direct parallelism” (Watson, 145). Thus the “verb-object :: object-verb” chiasm in both Psalm 26:4 and Psalm 26:5 may signal simply a change-up from parallelism of surrounding lines: “I did not dwell with vain men, and with crafty ones I will not go; I hated [the] assembly of evildoers, and with wicked folk I will not dwell.” To appreciate simple chiasms as these, a modern reader need only savor the shuffling of word order, attentively tracking the train of thought as it turns back on itself.

3.3. Rhetorical Enrichment. In a palistrophe, particular attention should be paid to the central member(s). Often the careful reader will find there a climax either of urgency or logic. Palistrophes in full may also serve to reinforce credibility and create reversal (for additional functions of chiasm, see Watson, 145-48).

3.3.1. Climax of Urgency. In “The Appeal of Wealth” (see 1.2 above) it is precisely at the palistropic core that, back-to-back, both gang and father produce their most urgent pleas (Prov 1:14-15 within Prov 1:10-19 [note that logic swells unabated until Prov 1:19]). Again, in “The Appeal of Wisdom” (see 1.2 above) it is at the core that the storm rages with greatest dramatic ferocity against those who foolishly declined Wisdom’s invitation (Prov 1:27 within Prov 1:22-33 [logical climax does not appear until “hearer” of Prov 1:33]).

3.3.2. Climax of Logic. When a logical climax coincides with a palistropic core, the conjunction unfolds vital insight for the composition as a whole. So, because it is located at a palistropic core, the heartening hope of Lamentations 3:31-33 should impact the reader more pervasively than do the dismal tones that run toward the end of the chapter (Watson [159], who similarly points out that the theme of divine rescue at the core of Ps 12 should be recognized as overshadowing and dominating the ensuing expansion of wickedness).

3.3.3. Reinforcing Credibility. E. Assis (286-87) observes that narrative advice-giving may be palistropically structured to convey reasonableness and thereby reinforce credibility. The same impact obtains for poetic advice giving (see 1.2 above, and compare the tightly formed palistrophes in “The Appeal of Wealth” in Prov 1:10-19 and “The Appeal of Wisdom” in Prov 1:22-33 [Trible]).

3.3.4. Creating Reversal. In the palistrophe of “The Appeal of Wealth” (Prov 1:10-19 [see 1.2 above]) the father’s statements construct a logical exposé of the gang’s deceptive invitation. Point by point he rebuts their claims. Although rebuttal could have been arranged in an A, B, C // A’, B’, C’ parallel pattern, use of the palistropic A, B, C :: C’, B’, A’ pattern produces structural reversal formally endorsing content reversal contained in the exposé. The result is a remarkably compact and cohesive piece of persuasion, clinching the argument as the logical climax reveals nothing less than witless suicide as the ultimate outcome of the gang's arrogant schemes (Prov 1:19).

4. Conclusion.

Attention to chiasmic structures, compact or extended, greatly enriches the reader's grasp both of the literary craft and persuasive impact of biblical compositions, narrative as well as poetic.

See also ACROSTIC; AMBIGUITY; ELLIPSIS; HEBREW LANGUAGE; INCLUSIO; MERISM; METER; PARALLELISM; POETICS; TERMINOLOGY OF; REFRAIN; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; RHYME; SOUND PLAYS; TERSENESS; WORD PLAY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Assis, "Chiasmus in Biblical Narrative: Rhetoric of Characterization," Prooftexts 22 (2002) 273-304; C. Bovell, "Symmetry, Ruth and Canon," JSOT 28 (2003) 175-91; R. J. Clifford, Proverbs (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999); M. Dahood, "Chiasmus in Job: A Text-Critical and Philological Criterion," in A Light unto My Path: Old Testament Studies in Honor of Jacob M. Myers, ed. H. N. Bream, R. D. Heim and C. A. Moore (GTS 4; Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1974) 119-30; D. A. Dorsey, The Literary Structure of the Old Testament: A Commentary on Genesis-Malachi (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1999); J. L. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); W. H. Shea, "The Chiasmic Structure of the Song of Songs," ZAW 92 (1980) 378-96; P. Tribble, "Wisdom Builds a Poem: The Architecture of Proverbs 1:20-33," JBL 94 (1975) 509-18; W. G. E. Watson, "Chiasmic Patterns in Biblical Hebrew Poetry," in Chiasmus in Antiquity: Structures, Analyses, Exegesis, ed. J. W. Welch (Hildesheim: Gerstenberg, 1981) 118-68; E. C. Webster, "Pattern in the Song of Songs," JSOT 22 (1982) 73-93; J. W. Welch, "Introduction," in Chiasmus in Antiquity: Structures, Analyses, Exegesis, ed. J. W. Welch (Hildesheim: Gerstenberg, 1981) 9-16.

P. Overland

CHRISTOLOGY. See HERMENEUTICS; MESSIAH.

COLON, COLA. See POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF.

COMPARATIVE STUDIES. See ECCLESIASTES 2:

ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND.

CONFIDENCE, PSALMS OF

Scholars agree that the book of *Psalms contains three clear and primary genres: the *hymn, the *laments and the *thanksgiving psalm. Each of these genres is marked by its own form and content. Other genres have been proposed but have not been universally recognized, mainly because these other genres are said to be united by content only and not by any particular form (see Form Criticism). The psalms of confidence are in the latter category. Some scholars (e.g., Collins, Wilson) do not list psalms of confidence in their treatment of genre in the Psalms, while others do (e.g., Clifford, Coogan). This article proceeds on the judgment that there is a group of psalms that can be distinguished from other psalms by their sustained focus on confidence in God in the face of adverse circumstances. Such psalms are called psalms of confidence or psalms of trust.

1. The Place of the Psalms of Confidence
2. The Extent of the Psalms of Confidence
3. The Character of the Psalms of Confidence
4. The Invitation of the Psalms of Confidence
5. The Challenge of the Psalms of Confidence

1. The Place of the Psalms of Confidence.

The psalms of confidence lie somewhere on a continuum between the lament and the thanksgiving psalms. Whereas some scholars see the psalms of confidence as a development of the expressions of confidence that often bring the laments to a close, others associate the psalms of confidence more closely with the thanksgiving psalms (see Lucas). Reasons exist for both of these connections.

The psalms of confidence are like the laments in that both articulate some kind of trouble that the psalmist is experiencing at the moment. This distinguishes the psalms of confidence from the thanksgiving psalms, where trouble clearly is in the past. The trouble in the psalms of confidence is not, however, as painful, as pressing, as is the case in the laments. The trouble seems a bit further away, though it is still felt. In keeping with this, the dominant, negative mood found in the laments is replaced by an overall positive tone in the psalms of confidence. This positive tone is much more like the mood encountered in the thanksgiving psalms, and both express undoubted assurance in God's power to save, whereas the laments are often filled with agonizing questions in this regard.

The psalms of confidence are thus neither laments nor thanksgiving psalms. They lack the deep anguish and the structural elements that characterize the laments. Though confident in God's power to save, the poets who wrote the psalms of confidence had not yet experienced that salvation at the time of composition, as had the authors of the thanksgiving psalms. Although the poets who wrote the psalms of confidence seem to have moved beyond the deep agony of the lament, they are still waiting for the day when a psalm of thanksgiving for salvation gained can be sung (Bullock).

2. The Extent of the Psalms of Confidence.

Given these fuzzy boundaries, it is not surprising that scholars differ to some degree over which psalms belong to this genre. For example, T. Longman includes Psalms 11; 16; 23; 27; 62; 91; 121; 125; 131, whereas C. H. Bullock lists Psalms 4; 16; 23; 27; 62; 73; 90; 115; 123; 124; 125; 126. The present article regards the following as psalms of confidence: Psalms 16; 23; 27; 62; 73; 91; 115; 121; 125; 131.

3. The Character of the Psalms of Confidence.

Although the psalms of confidence have no unifying structural shape, they are united by one distinguishing characteristic: unwavering and sustained confidence or trust in God's ability and willingness to provide deliverance from adverse circumstances.

3.1. The Tone of the Psalms of Confidence. Psalm 27 exemplifies the positive tone of the psalms of confidence.

The LORD is my light and my salvation—whom shall I fear?

The LORD is the stronghold of my life—
of whom shall I be afraid? (Ps 27:1 NIV)

Though an army besiege me, my heart will not fear;
though war break out against me,
even then will I be confident. (Ps 27:3 NIV)

I am still confident of this:
I will see the goodness of the LORD

in the land of the living. (Ps 27:13 NIV)

3.2. The Imagery of the Psalms of Confidence.

The basis for this confidence is rooted in the character of God and often comes to expression through the imagery used for God in these psalms. The most frequent image is God as refuge (see Protection).

Keep me safe, O God,
for in you I take refuge. (Ps 16:1 NIV)

The LORD is the stronghold of my life—
of whom shall I be afraid? (Ps 27:1b NIV)

My soul finds rest in God alone;
my salvation comes from him.
He alone is my rock and my salvation;
he is my fortress, I will never be shaken.
(Ps 62:1-2 NIV)

I will say of the LORD, "He is my refuge and my fortress,
my God, in whom I trust." (Ps 91:2 NIV)

What is arguably the best known and most beloved image for God in the Bible, God as shepherd, occurs in a psalm of confidence.

The LORD is my shepherd;
I have all that I need. (Ps 23:1 NLT)

Implicit in another psalm of confidence is perhaps the tenderest image of God found in the Psalms, God as the mother of a weaned child.

But I have stilled and quieted my soul;
like a weaned child with its mother,
like a weaned child is my soul within me.
(Ps 131:2 NIV)

Psalm 121 uses the image of guardian for God six times (Ps 121:3, 4, 5, 7 [2x], 8), and Psalm 125 likens God's surrounding presence to that of the mountains that surround Jerusalem.

Just as the mountains surround and protect Jerusalem, so the LORD surrounds and protects his people,
both now and forever. (Ps 125:2 NLT)

3.3. The Nature of Confidence in the Psalms of Confidence. The expressions of confidence in this genre are “expressions of faith, not cries of victory” (Bullock, 168). These psalms articulate a confidence that has moved the psalmist away from the deep anguish of the lament and toward the joy of the psalm of thanksgiving. Although the psalmist is confident that help is on the way, the help has not yet arrived. This is clear from the oblique allusions and references to present trouble found in these psalms, as well as from the petitions found in the psalms of confidence.

Keep me safe, O God,
for in you I take refuge. (Ps 16:1 NIV)

Hear me as I pray, O LORD.
Be merciful and answer me! (Ps 27:7 NLT)

So many enemies against one man—all of them trying to kill me.
To them I'm just a broken-down wall or a tottering fence. (Ps 62:3 NLT)

I lift up my eyes to the hills—where does my help come from?
(Ps 121:1 NIV)

4. The Invitation of the Psalms of Confidence.

In the psalms of confidence the poets not only articulate their own confidence in God but also invite others to share their confidence.

Wait patiently for the LORD.
Be brave and courageous.
Yes, wait patiently for the LORD.
(Ps 27:14 NLT)

Although it is possible that here the psalmist is addressing himself, or that a priest is addressing the psalmist, it is more likely that the psalmist is addressing another (Wilson). Interpreting this line in the context of similar lines in other psalms in this genre leads to this conclusion, as the following lines demonstrate.

Trust in him at all times, O people;
pour out your hearts to him,
for God is our refuge. (Ps 62:8 NIV)

O house of Israel, trust in the LORD. . . .
O house of Aaron, trust in the LORD. . . .
You who fear him, trust in the LORD. . . .
(Ps 115:9-11 NIV)

O Israel, put your hope in the LORD
both now and forevermore. (Ps 131:3 NIV)

5. The Challenge of the Psalms of Confidence.

While bringing great comfort, the psalms of confidence also bring a great challenge. It is one thing to sing a hymn when all is well, or a lament when trouble is on all sides, or a psalm of thanksgiving when God has delivered us from distress. In each of these cases our psalm and our circumstances match. However, it is quite another thing to express profound confidence in God when help has not yet come. In this case there is a disconnect between our psalm and our situation. As we have seen, however, our confidence is rooted not in our circumstances but in the character of God. God is our refuge, our shepherd, our mother, our guardian, our surrounding mountain. Ultimately in the book of Psalms, God is our king, who reigns over our lives and the world that he has made. So we can sing with the psalmist,

But as for me, it is good to be near God.
I have made the Sovereign LORD my refuge.
(Ps 73:28 NIV)

See also DIVINE PRESENCE; LAMENTS, PSALMS OF; SUFFERING; THANKSGIVING, PSALMS OF; THEODICY; THEOPHANY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. W. Anderson, Out of the Depths: The Psalms Speak for Us Today (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2000); C. H. Bullock, Encountering the Book of Psalms: A Literary and Theological Introduction (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2001); R. J. Clifford, Psalms 1-72 (AOTC; Nashville: Abingdon, 2002); J. J. Collins, Introduction to the Hebrew Bible (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2004); M. D. Coogan, The Old Testament: A Historical and Literary Introduction to the Hebrew Scriptures (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006); H. Gunkel, The Psalms: A Form-Critical Introduction, trans. T. M. Horner (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); T. Longman III, How to Read the Psalms (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1988); idem, “Psalms,” in A Complete Literary Guide to the Bible, ed. L. Ryken and T. Longman III (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1993) 80-91; E. C. Lucas, Exploring the Old Testament: A Guide to the Psalms & Wisdom Literature (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2003); J. C. McCann, “Psalms,” NIB 4.641-1280; G. H. Wilson, Psalms, Volume 1 (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2002).

M. D. Futato

CONSONANCE. See SOUND PATTERNS.

COSMETICS. See FLORAL IMAGERY.

COSMIC BATTLE. See CREATION IMAGERY.

COSMOGONY. See CREATION IMAGERY; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY.

COVENANT. See WISDOM AND COVENANT.

COVENANT FESTIVAL. See CULT, WORSHIP; PSALMS.

CREATION IMAGERY

Creation imagery describes a group of literary (poetic) activities and pictures that are used throughout the OT to dramatize the Israelite worldview. These include *imagery involving, for example, the heavens, earth, world, seas, mountains, sun, moon, limits and other facets of nature, as well as activities such as forming, creating, making and establishing. Together, these images and their corresponding worldview give way to a deeper *creation theology wherein God has made and ordered the world with primordial purposes in mind. Creation imagery is prominent throughout the Wisdom literature (*Job, *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes) and *Psalms (see Mays, 75-77). Significantly, the creation images in these books do not directly expound a creation theology; rather, their function is to show and display theological truths in persuasive, unitary, comforting and provocative ways in order to engage the oral and literary traditions of the ancient Near East and thereby display the superiority of the faith, worldview and God of the OT over against the religions, myths and ideologies of surrounding cultures. The poetic tapestry of creation images in these books includes at least seven discernible categories: cosmic battle, *kingship, *theophany, *lament and *theodicy, cosmogony, redemption, *wisdom and order. Although these categories are treated independently here, their role in Israel's worldview makes them inseparable, interdependent, even synthetic images.

1. Cosmic Battle
2. Kingship
3. Theophany
4. Lament and Theodicy
5. Cosmogony

6. Creation and Redemption
7. Wisdom and Creation Order
8. Conclusion

1. Cosmic Battle.

The books of Job and Psalms in particular draw upon imagery of heaven, earth and seas (or waters) in ancient texts such as Genesis and the Egyptian Book of the Dead to depict their own literary and/or theological pictures. These images appear often in Psalms (Ps 8:7-8; 19:1; 33:6-8; 36:5-6; 69:34; 96:11; 104:1-2; 135:6; 146:6) and have at least two related functions. On the one hand, they exalt the goodness of creation. The earth (Ps 104) and the waters (Ps 46:3; 65:7-9; 74:15; 104:6-12; 133:3) are sources of provision and abundance and therefore lead to rejoicing (Ps 19:1-6; 136:2-9; 148:1-14). This supports the second and larger implication, that God has made, established and overcome the powers of the ancient Near Eastern world (Ps 24:1-2; 46:2-4; 65:6-7; 77:16-19; 78:69; 89:11; 93:3-4; 104:5-6; 109:9; 114:5-8; 115:14-18). The earth, waters and chaos are thus transformed from the threatening powers within other ancient worldviews into the one true God's powers of blessing within his creation (see Chaos and Death). Psalm 104 uses cosmic imagery in an especially clear way wherein God makes the waters (Ps 104:10), in order for trees to sprout branches, upon which dwell birds, whose singing brings pleasure to humanity (Ps 104:12).

Similarly, the book of Job applies creation imagery to the mystery of Job's suffering. Life on earth for Job and his friends is depicted as an imprisoned condition that gives way to a sense of hopeless toil and ignorance (J[Job 3:23; 7:1-3, 21; 18:17-18; 20:12, 20-22 [cf. Ecclesiastes]). Although wisdom does not promise to solve the ambiguities of life on earth, it does uphold God's good, orderly and powerful control of the creation. For example, God is portrayed as the maker and victor over the cosmic powers of earth, water and Rahab (Job 26:10-14). The divine speeches (Job 38—41) also picture God as the maker and owner of the heavens, earth, seas and all that are in them (Job 38:29-30; 41:11), and as the master of Behemoth and Leviathan (Job 40:15; 41:1). Although Job does not necessarily understand the reason for his suffering, the images of creation (Job 26; 28; 38—41) uphold God's sovereign power and ownership of the world.

2. Kingship.

Yahweh's cosmic battle complements and promotes the images of his kingship over the nations and forces of nature. Psalm 98 proclaims Yahweh's "righteousness," "salvation" and "judgment" before all the nations (Ps 98:1-3, 9) and calls upon Israel (Ps 98:3-6) and the sea, world, rivers and mountains (Ps 98:3-6, 7-9) to rejoice before "the King, Yahweh" (hammelek yhw [Ps 98:6]). Psalm 97 also speaks of Yahweh "reigning" (mālāk) and his ownership of clouds, fire and lightning (cf. Ps 95:1-5). As a result, "the earth sees and trembles" (Ps 97:4b), and "the mountains melt like wax before Yahweh, before the Lord of all the earth" (Ps 97:5). There is also an interesting correspondence between the creation imagery in Psalm 24 and Psalm 29, which proclaim God as the "King of glory" (Ps 24:8, 10) and "God of glory" (Ps 29:3) (see Mays, 78-80). God's reign over the nations and the earth are also proclaimed clearly in Psalms 2; 72; 111, often integrating God's kingship with the other seven categories of imagery listed here above.

3. Theophany.

The temple, *mountain and high hill are ancient images that communicate the power, dwelling and presence of deities on earth. O. Keel (113) observes that ancient Egyptian sanctuaries claimed a high hill as the "glorious hill of the primordial beginning." Mesopotamia also understood its "pure hill" (du-ku) as a place of primordial beginnings. Furthermore, as Keel notes (113-14), "in the Ugaritic sphere, the conquest of Chaos is also closely related to mountain (hill) and temple."

The Psalter engages this hill imagery through its references to hills, mountains, Sinai, Horeb and *Zion. For the writer in Psalm 121, help comes not from the "hills" but from "Yahweh, the maker of the heavens and earth" (Ps 121:1-2). Furthermore, although Horeb is not the highest mountain, its superiority causes the glorious and many peaked mountain of Bashan to look on it with hatred (Ps 68:8, 14-17). God's victories and mighty acts in Psalm 89 are praised, and the heavens and the earth are ascribed to Yahweh as Tabor and Hermon "shout your name in joy" (Ps 89:5-12). By far, Zion is the predominant choice of mountain or hill imagery in the Psalter, appearing some thirty-nine times in thirty-one psalms. Psalm 48 exalts Zion most emphatically, making clear that this is the place where Yahweh makes himself known (Ps 48:1-3, 10-11; cf. Ps 84). This imagery not only demonstrates Yahweh's reign over the mountains but even declares that he created them to sing his praises.

Job's appeal to appear before God's divine courts (Job 13:3; cf. Ps 73) also unites creation images with God's presence (see 4 below). N. C. Habel notes the use of the phrase "he who stretches out the heavens" or the "north" (Job 26:7; Ps 104:2) as images of a sanctuary or divine dwelling within creation. We thus find the creation images of theophany and chaos or suffering intersecting with the biblical themes of lament and theodicy.

4. Lament and Theodicy.

As we noted, theophany, or God's presence (see Divine Presence), is a creation theme frequently appealed to in suffering, lament and the face of evil. On several occasions Job calls out in his affliction, wishing to stand in God's presence and be vindicated (Job 13:3, 24; 19:15-27; 23:9, 15, 17). When Job finally receives a response in the divine speeches (Job 38—41), God rehearses extensive evidence of the order and purpose built into creation. In the end, Job's comfort and repentance are never said to be on the basis of understanding how his suffering fits into the created design or in having his challenges answered—the text remains conspicuously silent in this regard. He finds satisfaction in that he has finally "seen" God (Job 42:5), referring to the substance of God's speeches about his work in creation (Job 38—41), which represent the personal and intimate presence that Job has longed for.

This same pattern is also apparent in Psalm 73, where the supplicant is perplexed by the prosperity of the wicked until entering the sanctuary of God. Although the sanctuary brings an encouraging reminder of the final destiny of the wicked (Ps 73:17), comfort is emphatically attributed to the presence of God (Ps 73:21-28), who gives *"life" and whose nature is greater than anything in the heavens or the earth (Ps 73:25) (cf. Ps 18:2-5; 42:2; 61:2; 62:1-7). This comfort in the promise of life is a common creation image for both the wisdom sages and the psalmists, whose faith in "life," "the path of life" (Ps 16:11; 27:13; 30:5; 42:2; 52:5; 116:9; 133:3; 142:5; Prov 2:19; 3:2, 16, 18; 4:10, 23; 6:23; 8:35; 9:11) and the “land of the living” (Ps 27:13; 52:5; 116:9; 142:5) brings constant eschatological hope.

5. Cosmogony.

Origins are another major category of images in ancient creation myths and writings as found in the Babylonian Atrahasis epic and the Enuma Elish. R. J. Clifford helpfully corrects a modern proclivity to restrict cosmogony to the world and “solar system,” which overlooks the ancient concern for the origin of nations and societies in the world (Clifford, 511-12). Although this type of cosmogony is more apparent in the Pentateuch, the Wisdom literature and the Writings also declare that God made (‘āšūtā) the nations (Ps 86:9; cf. Ps 22:27-28) and “made us [Israel]” (‘āsānū [Ps 100:3; cf. Ps 77]). In fact, the use of cosmogony in wisdom and Psalms is as much concerned with the origins of the individual (Job 10; Ps 94:9; 139:13-16) as it is with the heavens and the earth (world) (Job 38:33; Ps 90:2; 95:5; 104:26; 119:90; Prov 3:19-20; 8:22-31; 30:4). With regard to the emphases on the individual, W. P. Brown highlights the concern with human origins in the prayers in Job (Job 10) and Psalm 139. Cosmogonous images therefore have at least two purposes: serving as grounds for comfort and complaint, and testifying to the “craftsmanship” and “reliability” (Keel, 205) of the creator (Ps 8:3; 19:1-6; 24:2; 33:4; 74:16-17; 89:11; 95:5; 102:25; 104:5; 119:73; 144:12).

6. Creation and Redemption.

R. J. Clifford (508) also makes note of the sometimes misleading theological construct of “creation-fall-redemption” as a summary of the OT narrative. Instead, he suggests that creation imagery is always, in a sense, cosmogony and therefore implicitly redemption imagery. Thus it is Yahweh’s creative power that brings salvation to Israel (Ps 77:16-19), Zion (Ps 46) and the *king (Ps 18:7-15). Echoing Genesis 1—3, God’s creative powers are a saving victory over chaos (Ps 74:13-14; 89:9-18; cf. Ps 142; 144) (see Keel, 215). In this way, we see that creation imagery represents both the context in which Israel will be saved and the paradigm for God’s power to do it (Ps 95), such that redemption ultimately is not anthropocentric but rather cosmic. Israel thus understands its salvation as an act of re-creation that includes the redemption of the land (all creation) (Ps 74; cf. Is 48:6-8; 65:17-25; Rom 8:18-25; 2 Cor 5:17).

7. Wisdom and Creation Order.

Finally, most of the creation imagery in wisdom texts attests to the order in God’s creative work. R. C. Van Leeuwen describes the effect as one portraying the “carved” nature of the created order wherein God has purposed a fitting place and function for everything that he has made. Job, in his affirmation of this order, feels compelled to understand his suffering in the light of the “boundaries” and “horizons” that God has placed in the world (Job 26:10). This order is apparent also in the metaphor in Proverbs 3:18-20, where wisdom is a “tree of life” and the agent by which God created the world (cf. Ps 104:24). The boundaries and limits within the created order are most emphatic in Proverbs 8:22-31, signified by the repeated use of the Hebrew hōq (“limit”) and hāqaq (“carve” or “engrave”) in Proverbs 8:27, 29. Psalm 104 resonates closely with these images, singing not only of the “place” and “boundary” for the mountains and valleys (Ps 104:8-9) but also ultimately of the wisdom that God used to make all things (Ps 104:24; cf. Job 26:10; Prov 3:19; Col 1:15-29). Even the book of Ecclesiastes, in all its irony and ambiguity, chooses to express stability through the rich and orderly images of eating, drinking, working (Eccles 2:24-25; 3:12-13, 22; 5:18-20; 8:15) and marriage (Eccles 9:7-10) as the good “gifts” that God has carved into creation for humanity (see Provan, 38).

8. Conclusion.

Throughout a variety of OT genres creation imagery puts on display an interconnected set of theological truths. In so doing, it illustrates the most basic contours of Israel’s worldview, wherein Israel’s relationships with God, the earth and the surrounding nations are grounded in God’s primordial purpose and design for the whole creation. What emerges is a worldview adorned with pictures of God’s kingship, presence and power along with images of Israelite origins, the nature of suffering, the context of redemption and the way to wisdom and knowledge. Over time, this imagery establishes and sustains a corporate memory in Israel with its constant reminders of the order and purpose in God’s creation, and, more importantly, the incomparable wisdom, power and glory of the Creator.

See also ANIMAL IMAGERY; ARCHITECTURAL IMAGERY; CREATION THEOLOGY; FLORAL IMAG-

ERY; IMAGERY; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; PSALMS 6: ICONOGRAPHY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. P. Brown, "Creatio Corporis and the Rhetoric of Defense in Job 10 and Psalm 139," in God Who Creates: Essays in Honor of W. Sibley Towner, ed. W. P. Brown and S. D. McBride (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000) 107-24; R. J. Clifford, "The Hebrew Scriptures and the Theology of Creation," TS 46 (1985) 507-23; N. C. Habel, "He Who Stretches Out the Heavens," CBQ 34 (1972) 417-30; O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and The Book of Psalms (New York: Seabury Press, 1978); J. L. Mays, "Maker of Heaven and Earth: Creation in the Psalms," in God Who Creates: Essays in Honor of W. Sibley Towner, ed. W. P. Brown and S. D. McBride (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000) 75-86; P. D. Miller, "The Poetry of Creation: Psalm 104," in God Who Creates: Essays in Honor of W. Sibley Towner, ed. W. P. Brown and S. D. McBride (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000) 87-103; I. W. Provan, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2001); R. A. Simkins, Creator and Creation: Nature in the Worldview of Ancient Israel (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); R. C. Van Leeuwen, "Liminality and Worldview in Proverbs 1-9," Semeia 50 (1990) 111-44.

R. O'Dowd

CREATION THEOLOGY

It has long been recognized that "Wisdom thinks resolutely within the framework of a theology of creation" (Zimmerli, 316). Biblical Wisdom literature speaks of God primarily in terms of God's role as creator rather than in terms of God's covenant relationship with Israel or God's involvement in Israel's history. The biblical wisdom books—*Job, *Ecclesiastes, *Proverbs, *Song of Songs—do not speak of history or of God's special revelation to Israel. Rather, they speak of the world as we know it—its pleasures, its hardships, its paradoxes, its beauty—the world of human society and of God's cosmic creation. Given the witness of these texts, virtually all biblical scholars would agree with this assessment by L. Perdue (340): "Each of the wisdom texts finds its theological center in creation."

Creation theology, then, is a vital topic in the study of the biblical Wisdom literature. It also occupies a key place in the study of the book of *Psalms, where concerns for both salvation history and creation theology are expressed (see Pss 8; 19; 24; 74; 89; 104). The Lord, the God of Israel, is acclaimed as the Creator of the world; and Israel, along with the whole creation, is called on to praise its Creator (Pss 148-149).

One cannot speak of a single "creation theology" in the Bible or in the Wisdom literature and Psalms. All the texts proclaim that the God of Israel is the creator of the world, but they differ significantly on other issues, particularly the issue of humanity's place in creation. Despite these differences, however, all the texts address some central questions: What is God's relationship to creation? What is the role and place of humanity in creation? What kind of world is this? How do nonhuman creatures relate to God and to humanity? This article will explore the varied answers to these questions found in the biblical Wisdom literature and in the book of Psalms, using the general categories of creator, creation and humanity to discuss the major emphases of the creation theologies found in these texts.

1. Creator
2. Creation
3. Humanity

1. Creator.

All of biblical tradition, including the Wisdom literature and Psalms, proclaims that God created the world, established order in it, and continues to sustain it. Given this unified biblical witness to God as creator, however, it is interesting to note the different emphases in different texts on God's role in creation. The Wisdom literature and Psalms make various theological claims about God as creator. A few of the more prominent themes are discussed here.

1.1. God and Chaos. The well-documented ancient Near Eastern motif of the Chaoskampf—the battle between the creator god and the forces of *chaos—is referenced in the Wisdom literature and Psalms. In the book of Job, for instance, the myth is referred to a number of times by the character of Job, in reference to God's absolute power (Job 3:8; 7:12; 9:8, 13; 26:12-13). The Sea (a symbol of chaos in the ancient Near East) and the sea monster Leviathan also occupy prominent places in the speeches of God at the end of the book (Job 38:8-11; 41:1-34). In these speeches, however, the Sea and Leviathan are described not as forces of chaos that threaten to overwhelm the world but as wild and beautiful forces in which God takes delight. In a remarkable image, God attends the birth of the Sea and uses clouds and thick darkness to swaddle the rambunctious newborn infant (Job 38:8-11). The divine speeches describe at great length the sea monster Leviathan, who is called a “king” (Job 41:34). God takes obvious pride in the Sea and Leviathan and gives them a place in creation, even as God also prescribes boundaries for them (Job 38:11; 41:10-11, 33).

Psalms 104 speaks in similar terms of Leviathan, as a creature that God created and in which God takes pleasure (Ps 104:26). In fact, in Psalm 104 God creates Leviathan as something of a bathtub toy, placing the chaos monster in the sea so that God can “play” or “sport” (śhq) with it. In other psalms, however, Leviathan and Rahab (both names for the primordial sea monster) are described in the traditional terms of the Chaoskampf myth. In Psalms 74; 89, God’s act of crushing or breaking Leviathan/Rahab is recalled as evidence of God’s great power over the forces of chaos (Ps 74:13-14; 89:10). In both instances the use of the motif is combined with a lament over the current state of affairs for the psalmist and for Israel: the destruction of the temple and the fall of the Davidic dynasty. God’s primordial victory over chaos is held in sharp contrast to the apparent victory of historical forces of chaos over God’s chosen people. God is called upon to rise up as of old and defeat the forces of chaos that have overwhelmed his people. As J. Levenson (19) observes, the psalmist “acknowledges the reality of militant, triumphant, and persistent evil, but he steadfastly and resolutely refuses to accept this reality as final and absolute. Instead he challenges YHWH to act like the hero of old, to conform to his magisterial nature.” In each instance the theme of God’s creating the world through the defeat of chaos monsters is used to urge God to re-create the world in which the psalmist lives in order that it might conform to the good order established at that primordial beginning.

1.2. God and Wisdom. Perhaps the best-known “creation” text in Wisdom literature is the description of creation through the eyes of *Woman Wisdom in Proverbs 8:22-31. The Lord creates (or “begets”) Wisdom “the first of his ways” (Prov 8:22). Before God brings forth mountains, hills and springs of water, Wisdom is created. She is beside God as he establishes the heavens and the foundations of the earth, as he gives the sea its limits. In Proverbs 8:30 she is beside God as an ’āmôn (“master worker” [another possible reading is “little child”]). Wisdom delights in creation, rejoicing and playing before God daily, being herself God’s “delight,” rejoicing in the “inhabited world” and taking delight in humanity (Prov 8:31).

There is debate among scholars over Woman Wisdom’s role in creation. Is Wisdom in this text a “created co-creator” (Fretheim, 215), a being who participates in and indeed helps God in God’s act of creating? The translation of ’āmôn as “master worker” in Proverbs 8:30 would support such an interpretation (Fretheim, 214), as would the reference in Wisdom of Solomon 7:22 to Wisdom as “the fashioner of everything.” On the other hand, if one understands ’āmôn as “little child,” the image of Wisdom in Proverbs 8 is that of a child who plays before God and delights in God’s creation (Perdue, 91; Fox 2000, 287-89). She is, in this interpretation, more of a fascinated observer than a participant in the act of creating. Such an interpretation is supported by the verbs associated with begetting and birthing at the beginning of this passage (qnh [“beget” or “acquire”] in Prov 8:22; hūl [“give birth”] in Prov 8:24). Both verbs are used in reference to God’s activity in creating Woman Wisdom.

Whether Woman Wisdom is a created co-creator or a little child in Proverbs 8, it is important to note that she is neither a full-blown deity in her own right nor simply one creature among many. Woman Wisdom is not depicted as an ancient Near Eastern goddess like Asherah (1 Kings 15:13; 18:19), but neither is she insignificant (Fox 2000, 334-41; Davis 2000, 67). Woman Wisdom is the first of God’s ways, created before anything else in the world, and she is God’s constant companion during the whole process of creation, from the foundation of the earth to the fashioning of humanity. She is quite possibly God’s skilled assistant in the creation of the cosmos, and she is at the least God’s “delight,” playing before him and rejoicing with him at the exquisite beauty of the created world. Woman Wisdom, as depicted in Proverbs 8, is an integral part of the whole created order.

1.3. God’s Delight in Creation. The playfulness of Woman Wisdom in Proverbs 8 points to an important theme in the Wisdom literature and Psalms: God’s delight in creation. E. Davis (2000, 68) says of the creation theology of Proverbs 8, “God’s decision to create the world was a matter of absolutely free choice. . . . Yet a free choice is not an arbitrary one. God created the world, including and even especially humanity, for the sake of God's own pleasure, as the twofold mention of 'delights' [in Prov 8:30-31] suggests. These two, freedom and delight, belong together, in divine play just as in children's play."

The word used for Woman Wisdom "playing" (šhq) before God is used also in Psalm 104:26 of God's "playing" or "sporting" with Leviathan. Many English translations of Psalm 104:26 are similar to that of the NRSV: "There go the ships, and Leviathan that you formed to sport in it [the sea]." The verse can also be translated: "There go the ships, and Leviathan that you formed to play with." In order to make the antecedent of "it" the sea, one has to go back to the previous verse. It is more likely that the antecedent of the pronoun is found in the same verse, in the name "Leviathan." God "plays" or "sports" with Leviathan as one would with a bath toy or a pet.

In either translation, of course, the element of play is present in the creation of Leviathan. This element of play and delight is not absent from the rest of the psalm. Psalm 104 as a whole evokes the image of a creator God who delights in what is created. God makes springs gush forth to water the earth abundantly (Ps 104:10-13). God creates not only food to sustain the life of his creatures but also wine "to make joyful [šmh] the human heart," and oil "to make the human face shine" (Ps 104:15). What makes God himself joyful (šmh) at the end of the psalm is "his works," those things and creatures that God has created (Ps 104:31). Such language describes a God who creates not out of any necessity but rather out of freedom and gratuitousness; a God who values and takes delight in what is created.

This same delight in creation can be seen in the divine speeches of Job (Job 38—41). These speeches are a God's-eye view of creation in all its complexity and beauty. God describes the founding of the earth, "when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted with joy" (Job 38:7). God then goes on to describe the birth of the sea, the establishment of the meteorological forces, the stars, the realm of the wild animals, and the two mythological creatures Behemoth and Leviathan. The element of playfulness apparent in Proverbs 8 and Psalm 104 is not lacking in the divine speeches of Job. The same word used in those passages, šhq ("sport, play, laugh"), is used in Job to describe the activity of a number of the wild animals: the wild donkey, the ostrich, the warhorse and Leviathan (Job 39:7, 18, 22; 41:29 [MT 41:21]). In most cases the object of these animals' laughter is humanity or humanity's inventions (see 3.2 below). In Job 40:20, however, the verb is also used of the "play" of the wild animals on the hills. Given the attention accorded to laughter and play in the divine speeches, and the exquisite detail with which God describes the creation, God himself seems to take pleasure in that playfulness. All these texts evoke the image of a proud Creator who delights in his beautiful creation.

2. Creation.

Creation—the nonhuman natural world—has a large part to play in the biblical narrative. In earlier biblical interpretation an anthropocentric bias, exemplified in a focus on human "salvation history," can be discerned. In any careful reading of the Wisdom literature and Psalms, such an anthropocentric bias is difficult to maintain. Creation has its own relationship to its Creator, quite apart from human beings. God created the world, cares for it, and in turn receives praise from it. Human beings are, of course, a part of the created order, but they are by no means the only part. Animals, trees, mountains and celestial bodies, along with the rest of creation, have an integral role to play in the biblical story of God's relationship with the world.

2.1. Order in Creation. Any exploration of creation theology has to address the fundamental question "What kind of world is this?" The biblical wisdom writers were interested in that question and offered various answers based largely on observation of the world around them. The sages of the book of Proverbs, for instance, observed a certain order to the world, an order that could be discerned by human beings seeking wisdom. Many scholars equate the wisdom concept of such an "order" in creation with the Egyptian concept of maat (Kayatz, 93-119; Murphy, 161-62). "Ma'at is right order in nature and society, as established by the act of creation, and hence means, according to the context, what is right, what is correct, law, order, justice, and truth" (Morenz, 113). In the biblical Wisdom literature such order was understood as the gift of God and was thought to be discernible at least in part through observation of the natural world.

The ant provides a lesson in hard work and good planning (Prov 6:6-11). Natural elements and creatures provide analogies for human relationships in many passages (e.g., Prov 17:12; 20:2; 25:26; 26:1-2). The ant, the badger, the locust and the lizard are extolled as small but "very wise" (Prov 30:24-28). In all these instances, and many others, the sages of Proverbs discern a certain order in creation, established by God and conducive to the good life, if human beings conform to it. "The LORD by wisdom founded the earth; he established the heavens by understanding" (Prov 3:19). The person who wants to prosper will seek to understand that wisdom, that order, by which the cosmos is established.

The book of Ecclesiastes is, of course, much more skeptical than the book of Proverbs. *Qohelet ("the Teacher"), the primary speaker in Ecclesiastes, spends a lot of time observing the world around him, but mostly what he sees is hebel: "All is hebel" (Eccles 1:2b). Traditionally translated "vanity," hebel is better understood as something like "the absurd" (Fox 1999, 30-33). There is much that is absurd in the world that Qohelet observes: "There is nothing new under the sun" (Eccles 1:9); "For there is no lasting remembrance of the wise man or the fool. For in the days yet to come, all will have been forgotten. Alas! The wise man dies like the fool" (Eccles 2:16); "For the fate of human beings and the fate of animals is one fate. As one dies, so dies the other, and there is one breath for all. Humanity has no advantage over the animals, for all is absurd [hebel]" (Eccles 3:19).

To be sure, Qohelet notices a certain order in the world: the sun rises and sets (Eccles 1:5); the wind blows to the north and south (Eccles 1:6); humans and animals are made of dust and return to dust (Eccles 3:20). This order, however, is wearisome to Qohelet. "Locked in an endless cycle of sameness, the cosmos is stripped of all vitality and majesty" (Brown 1996, 124). Even out of his strong sense of the absurd, however, Qohelet is able to affirm certain things: enjoyment is to be found in food, drink and work (Eccles 2:24; 3:13; 8:15); God is to be feared (Eccles 7:18; 8:12-13; 12:13) (see Fear of the Lord). In perhaps the most famous passage from the book Qohelet speaks of *time: "For everything there is a time, and a season for every activity under heaven" (Eccles 3:1). What follows is a catalogue of human activities: birth and death, killing and healing, weeping and laughing, war and peace. Finally, Qohelet speaks of God's activity: "He has made everything beautiful [or 'suitable'] in its time" (Eccles 3:11a). Such an affirmation seems to echo the more traditional wisdom of Proverbs, with its view of a God-ordained order in the world; and yet in the same verse Qohelet denies that humanity is able to understand any such divine activity: "He has also put eternity in their hearts, but humanity cannot find out what God has done from the beginning to the end" (Eccles 3:11b). There may be a certain God-ordained order to the world, but ultimately, according to Qohelet, God's ways are inscrutable.

In the book of Job the question "What kind of world is this?" takes on a certain urgency. The Job of the prologue (Job 1—2) and his companions in the dialogue (Job 3—37) subscribe to a traditional wisdom view: God has ordered the world in such a way that the righteous prosper and the wicked are punished (e.g., Job 1:9-10; 4:7-9; 8:3-7; 11:13-20). Even when he is afflicted unjustly, the patient Job of the prologue accepts his hardships as the traditional wisdom teachers of Proverbs might expect, without complaint: "My son, do not reject the LORD's discipline; and do not loathe his rebuke. For the LORD reproves those he loves, as a father the son with whom he is pleased" (Prov 3:11-12). Though he has done nothing to deserve punishment, the Job of the prologue still seems to believe that God has established a good order in the world: "the LORD gives and the LORD takes away. Blessed be the name of the LORD" (Job 1:21b).

Such a belief system accords well with the world that Job inhabits in the prologue, a world that he describes with longing in Job 29. C. Newsom (187-91) aptly describes this world as a highly structured, hierarchical one in which Job occupies the central position. Surrounding him are family and peers and, on the margins, the poor and powerless, to whom Job offers protection. Outside of this structured world are the wilderness and the wild animals. Job considers this world of wilderness God-forsaken and uses its imagery to speak of his personal desolation: "I have become a brother of jackals, and a companion of ostriches" (Job 30:29). The world of the prologue—the world that Job occupies at the beginning of the book—has no place for wilderness or wild animals. Everything in this world is ordered and structured according to a strict act-and-consequence system: the wicked are punished, and the righteous are protected from anything that might harm them, including dangerous forces of the natural world.

After the *Satan afflicts him, Job descends into chaos. He perceives no particular order to the world. The last word of his first lament names this experience: "What comes is rōgez [turmoil, agitation]" (Job 3:26). "Rōgez is to the order of lived experience as chaos is to cosmic order" (Newsom, 94). The structured world of the prologue has descended into chaos, as far as Job is concerned. Far from being the creator of order in the world, God is perceived by Job to be the source of the chaos: "The earth has been given into the hand of the wicked. . . . If it is not he, who then is it?" (Job 9:24). The system of reward and punishment that Job once believed in—the system that his friends still believe in—has been turned upside down, in Job's estimation, so that the wicked prosper, while he, a righteous man, is oppressed by a capricious God (Job 10:1-7; 21:7-13).

In the divine speeches God corrects both visions of the world: that of the friends, in which a strict act-and-consequence pattern governs existence; and that of Job, which sees only chaos and a capricious deity. God proudly puts the world on display: wild animals of every kind, the mythological creatures Behemoth and Leviathan, and the sea, that ancient symbol of chaos. The very structured vision of the friends is incorrect, as God gives a place in the world to wild and dangerous elements; but neither is Job's vision correct, as God places limits on those elements: "Who fenced in Sea with doors when it came bursting out from the womb . . . and said, 'Thus far you will come and no further. Here shall your proud waves be stopped?'" (Job 38:8, 11). J. Janzen (235) puts the matter succinctly: "All systematic attempts to read existence . . . according to a principle of justice involving strict recompense or retribution break themselves against the fact that the sea is given a place in the cosmos. All attempts to exegete the Book of Job in such a way as to arrive at the conclusion that God there is indifferent to matters of justice overlook the fact that the place of the sea in the cosmos is delimited by divine decree."

The divine speeches describe a world ordered by God; the forces of chaos are not allowed free rein. This world, however, is filled with wild and beautiful creatures that are allowed the freedom to be and become what they were created to be. Job's original vision of a tightly ordered world is broken open to envision creation in its entirety: a place not entirely safe for human beings, but a place in which they too are called to freedom.

2.2. Creation's Praise of God. Creation praises its Creator over and over again in the OT. Most of the references to such praise occur in Psalms and Isaiah (for a list of these occurrences, see Fretheim, 267-68). The morning stars sing together at the dawn of creation (Job 38:7). The heavens tell the glory of God (Ps 19:1). The trees of the forest sing for joy (Ps 96:12). Even the seas and floods, ancient symbols of chaos, clap their hands and rejoice at the coming of the Lord (Ps 98:7-8). In the most exuberant example of this motif the writer of Psalm 148 calls on everyone and everything in creation to sing a "hallelujah" chorus: sun, moon, stars, sea monsters, deeps, fire, snow, wind, mountains, hills, fruit trees, cedars, wild animals, cattle, creeping things, birds and people of every age and station in life. "Let them praise the name of the LORD. . . . Praise the LORD [halēlū-yāh]!" (Ps 148:13a, 14b).

Some of these texts that speak of creation's praise of God are oriented to a future, eschatological time. In Psalms 96; 98, for instance, creation bursts into joyful praise because the LORD is coming to judge the earth (Ps 96:13; 98:9). Such an eschatological interpretation is appropriate for many of the prophetic passages in which this motif occurs (Is 35:1-2; 49:13; 66:22-23). Other texts, such as Job 38:7, speak of creation's joy at the beginning of time, at the establishment of the earth. In the majority of occurrences of this motif, however, the orientation is to the present moment, and the creatures of the natural world praise God simply because that is what they are created to do.

Psalm 148 is instructive in this regard. The psalmist calls on all creation to praise the LORD "because he gave the command and they were created. He established them forever; he gave a decree that will not be broken" (Ps 148:5-6). Created things are to praise their Creator because they exist, because God has brought them into being. Praising God is integral to their being. Later the psalmist sings, "Let them praise the name of the LORD, for his name alone is exalted, his majesty is over earth and heaven" (Ps 148:13). Here the concern is for the exaltation of God's name, making God's name known. As T. Fretheim (259) asserts, "These are the two central facets of praise: the honor of God and the witness to others. . . . The one always entails the other.” The natural world is made to praise God for who God is and thereby also to witness to humanity of God’s goodness and majesty.

Commentators have noted the environmental implications of this motif of creation’s praise of God (Fretheim, 257-58, 265; Davis 2001, 35). When humanity damages the earth and its inhabitants, the earth’s ability to praise is diminished. A polluted river cannot praise God with full voice. “The heavens declare the glory of God” (Ps 19:1), but not as clearly when they are clouded with smog. In other words, the sin of environmental degradation is sin not only because it endangers or damages the lives of human beings but also because it diminishes creation’s ability to praise its Creator. The psalmist writes of the day of judgment, “Let the field exult, and all that is in it. Then all the trees of the forest will shout for joy before the LORD, for he is coming, for he is coming to judge the earth” (Ps 96:12-13a). For the fields, the sea, the forests and all the creatures that inhabit them, the fact that God is coming to judge the earth is very good news indeed. In that day sin, with its pollution and defilement, will be wiped away, and the creation will at last be able to be what it was created to be: a witness to God’s glory, singing with full and clear voice in praise of its Creator.

2.3. Paradise Restored. Song of Songs is filled with images of creation: lush and verdant vegetation, flowers, vineyards, wild and domestic animals, fruit, sensual fragrances and, of course, human lovers. The book is in many ways unique in the OT and has engendered many different interpretations over the centuries. Is it a love song? An erotic poem? An extended metaphor about the love between God and Israel, or Christ and the church? However one might read this book, one thing is clear: the created world, with all its abundant fertility and life, is a major part of the story.

Picking up on the imagery of the natural world, both P. Tribble and E. Davis argue that the key to understanding Song of Songs is to read it through the lens of Genesis 2–3, the story of the garden of Eden. As Tribble (144) says, “the Song of Songs redeems a love story gone awry.” Plants and animals, created in Genesis, are named in Song of Songs and used as metaphors for love: the fig tree (Song 2:13), the pomegranate (Song 4:3, 13; 6:7), the cedar (Song 5:15), gazelles (Song 2:9; 4:5), doves (Song 4:1), goats (Song 4:1). The woman herself is called a “garden” (Song 4:12, 16; 5:1; 6:2), like the “garden” of Eden. According to Tribble, then, Song of Songs uses the imagery of the natural world to depict the restoration of the original goodness and mutuality of human erotic love, first described in Genesis 2.

Davis, while agreeing with Tribble’s assessment, argues that Song of Songs restores three relationships damaged in the garden of Eden: not only the relationship between man and woman but also the relationship between humanity and God and the relationship between humanity and the earth (Davis 2000, 232). This last point is of particular interest in delineating the creation theology of Song of Songs.

The world of Song of Songs overflows with lush vegetation, fruit, animals, exotic spices and abundant water. The male lover describes the woman: “Your limbs are a paradise of pomegranates with choice fruit, henna with nard, nard and saffron, calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense, myrrh and aloes, with all choice perfumes; a garden spring, a well of living water, and flowing waters from Lebanon” (Song 4:13-15). The text describes not so much a person as a land full of the verdant growth and waters of spring. Here there is no serpent; here there are no thorns to curse the earth (Gen 3:1, 18). Instead, the land produces abundant fruit and verdant vegetation for the pleasure of all (Song 2:11-13). “The winter is past; the rains are over and gone. The flowers appear on the earth; the time for singing has come” (Song 2:11-12a). Song of Songs returns us to the garden of Eden, where human love is full and mutual, where the earth is a garden of delights, and where the love between humanity and God is restored (Davis 2000, 251).

This connection with the garden of Eden provides a useful interpretative lens through which to read Song of Songs. It must be noted, however, that the restoration to the garden is not complete. There is an “already and not yet” quality to the vision of Song of Songs. The book describes at length the love of the man and woman for each other, a love expressed in words and actions while the lovers are present with each other (Song 1:2-4; 2:1-13; 4:1-16; 5:1; 7:1-13). It also speaks at various points, however, about the woman seeking her lover and not finding him (Song 3:1-2; 5:2—6:3). Although Song of Songs returns us to the garden of Eden, then, it also acknowledges that the restoration is not yet complete, and it sharpens our desire for that completion, for heaven itself (Davis 2000, 302). Although that desire is not fully satisfied in Song of Songs, the text gives us a taste of what that world will be like, when the shadow of sin cast over the good creation (Gen 3:18; Rom 8:19-22) is lifted, and paradise is restored.

3. Humanity.

Both Job and the writer of Psalm 8 ask God the question “What is humanity?” (Job 7:17; Ps 8:4). The psalmist asks the question in wonder and thankfulness; Job asks it in a parody of the psalmist, out of grief and anguish. The question itself is an important one to raise in any discussion of creation theology. What is humanity? What is humanity’s place in creation?

The Wisdom literature and Psalms offer varied answers to this question. For the purposes of this investigation, two of those answers will serve as representative. One is from Psalm 8; the other from the divine speeches in Job (Job 38—41).

3.1. “A Little Less Than God.” The psalmist asks, “What is humankind, that you are mindful of them; mortal man, that you take care of him? You have made him a little less than God, and crowned him with glory and honor” (Ps 8:4-5). The psalmist goes on to assert that God has made human beings rulers over the rest of the created order, including domesticated animals and wild animals, birds and fish, and “whatever passes through the paths of the seas” (Ps 8:8).

R. Simkins (221) traces this “lofty” view of humanity to Israelite royal theology and argues that the psalm elevates all human beings to royal status. It might even be said that humanity is understood by the psalmist to participate in divinity, as beings just a little lower than God. A similarly high view of humanity is found also, of course, in the Genesis creation accounts, especially the Priestly creation account of Genesis 1:1—2:3. There, human beings are made in the image of God and, as in Psalm 8, given dominion over the rest of the created order, including animals both domesticated and wild.

In both Psalm 8 and Genesis 1 humanity is the crown of creation. In Genesis God’s fashioning of humanity is the culmination of the creation of all the animals, and it is only humanity that is created in the image of God. It is also only after humanity is fashioned that creation is pronounced not just “good,” but “very good” (Gen 1:31). In Psalm 8 humanity rules over creation and occupies a place only a little lower than God himself. In both passages God gives humanity dominion over all the rest of creation. The psalmist asks in wonder, “What is humanity?” (Ps 8:4). The answer that he offers comes out of a very high view of humanity indeed.

3.2. “Look at Behemoth, Which I Made with You.” In contrast to Psalm 8 and Genesis 1, the divine speeches of Job 38—41 answer the question “What is humanity?” with a decidedly more humble view. The divine speeches are notable for their detailed description of creation, a description that ranges across the realms of cosmology, meteorology, zoology and mythology. In this whole vision of creation, however, human beings are given little or no attention.

Earlier in the book Job asks the question “What is humanity?” in an apparent parody of Psalm 8 (Job 7:17). Job answers the question by asserting that God is inordinately concerned with human beings, watching and waiting for them to sin. “Will you not look away from me? Will you not leave me alone until I swallow my spittle?” (Job 7:19). Eliphaz asks the same question, and he answers it with a very low view of humanity: “What is humanity, that they can be clean? . . . The heavens are not pure in God’s eyes. How much less one who is abominable and corrupt; human beings, who drink perversity like water!” (Job 15:14-16). Bildad, in a similar statement, calls human beings “maggots” and “worms” (Job 25:4-6; cf. Job 4:17-21).

The divine speeches give credence to neither of these views of humanity. In the speeches human beings are not worms, but neither are they the center of God’s attention. In fact, the divine speeches answer the question “What is humanity?” with a deafening silence. Human beings appear only as creatures peripheral to the world that God describes: dawn shakes “the wicked” out of the earth; the wild ass mocks the tumult of the city; the eagle drinks up the blood of slain warriors (Job 38:13; 39:7, 30).

The relative insignificance of human beings in the divine speeches is underscored by a question that pointedly implies that humanity is not the center of creation: “Who has made a trench for the flood, and a way for the thunderbolt, to make it rain on an uninhabited land, the wilderness where no person lives?” (Job 38:25-26)

Rain is reserved not just for places of human habitation but also for the wilderness, which is inhospitable, even dangerous, to humanity. God also cares for the wild animals and the mythological creatures Behemoth and Leviathan. These creatures “laugh at” or “mock” (shq) humanity and humanity’s inventions. The wild donkey laughs at the tumult of the city, that quintessential human habitation (Job 39:7); the ostrich laughs at the horse and its human rider (Job 39:18); the sea monster Leviathan laughs at human weapons, which bounce off its impenetrable scales (Job 41:29 [MT 41:21]). These creatures, like the wilderness itself, can be neither controlled nor used by humanity.

Psalm 8 and Genesis 1 speak of humanity’s dominion over the animals; the divine speeches of Job subvert this creation theology. God says to Job, “Look at Behemoth, which I made with you” (Job 40:15). Job is equated with a wild creature, albeit one of immense strength. God created them both and does not make one master over the other. Job had earlier claimed to be like a “king” (Job 29:25); however, in the divine speeches it is Leviathan, not Job, who is designated by God as “king over all proud beings” (Job 41:34). In the divine speeches the wild animals serve no human purpose but instead are celebrated as “icons of freedom and dignity” (Brown 1999, 366).

Given the striking absence of humanity from the description of creation in the divine speeches, it must also be noted that the speeches are addressed to a human being. Although designed to put Job “in his place,” the speeches at some level acknowledge that he does indeed have a place in creation; he is, after all, the sole passenger on this grand tour of the cosmos.

The divine speeches at the end of Job offer a radically nonanthropocentric view of creation. In contrast to the worldview presented in Genesis 1 and Psalm 8, the divine speeches assert that humanity is neither the center nor the crown of creation. The world is not made primarily for the use of human beings. There exist in the world wild and beautiful things not under human control, and God takes delight in those things. God cares for every part of creation, including those places and creatures unused and unusable by human beings. In other words, there is no land or creature that can properly be called “God-forsaken.” Wilderness and wild creatures have a value to God (and to humanity) quite apart from any “use” that humanity can make of them. God takes delight in all creation, not just in human beings.

The creation theologies of the Wisdom literature and Psalms are as rich and varied as the texts themselves. From the cycle of the sun in Ecclesiastes to the lush gardens in Song of Songs, from the singing hills and trees in Psalms to the hard-working ants of Proverbs, from playful Woman Wisdom in Proverbs to the wild beauty of the divine speeches in Job, the natural world plays a vital role in the ongoing story of God’s relationship not only with human beings, but with all that God has created.

See also ANIMAL IMAGERY; CHAOS AND DEATH; CREATION IMAGERY; FLORAL IMAGERY; GOD; MAAT; THEODICY; THEOPHANY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. P. Brown, Character in Crisis: A Fresh Approach to the Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); idem, The Ethos of the Cosmos: The Genesis of Moral Imagination in the Bible (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); E. F. Davis, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs (WestBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2000); idem, Getting Involved With God: Rediscovering the Old Testament (Cambridge, MA: Cowley, 2001); M. V. Fox, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Rereading of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); idem, Proverbs 1-9 (AB 18A; New York: Doubleday, 2000); T. E. Fretheim, God and World in the Old Testament: A Relational Theology of Creation (Nashville: Abingdon, 2005); J. G. Janzen, Job (IBC; Atlanta: John Knox, 1985); C. Kayatz, Studien zu Proverbien 1-9: Eine form- und motivgeschichtliche Untersuchung unter Einbeziehung ägyptischen Vergleichsmaterials (WMANT 22; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1966); J. D. Levenson, Creation and the Persistence of Evil: The Jewish Drama of Divine Omnipotence (2nd ed.; Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994); S. Morenz, Egyptian Religion (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1973); R. Murphy, The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature (3rd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); C. A. Newsom, The Book of Job: A Contest of Moral Imaginations (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003); L. G. Perdue, Wisdom and Creation: The Theology of Wisdom Literature (Nashville: Abingdon, 1994); K. M. Schifferdecker, Out of the Whirlwind: Creation Theology in the Book of Job (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2008); H. H. Schmid, “Creation, Righteousness, and Salvation: ‘Creation Theology' as the Broad Horizon of Biblical Theology," in Creation in the Old Testament, ed. B. W. Anderson (IRT 6; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) 102-17; R. A. Simkins, Creator and Creation: Nature in the Worldview of Ancient Israel (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); P. Tribble, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); W. Zimmerli, "The Place and Limit of the Wisdom in the Framework of the Old Testament Theology," in Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, ed. H. M. Orlinsky and J. L. Crenshaw (New York: KTAV, 1976) 314-26.

K. Schifferdecker

CULT, WORSHIP: PSALMS

*Worship is "the attitude and activity designated to recognize and describe the worth" of one to whom homage is paid (Davies, 879). The book of *Psalms contains one of Scripture's most profound and extensive expressions of this "attitude" toward God. Indeed, the psalms praise, laud and give thanks to God for his just and redeeming acts (Ps 75:2-10) and for his incomparable might and grace (Ps 93; 95—99; 118:1-4). The Hebrew title of the book, "Praises" (ṭehillim), seems to suggest further that even psalms that complain and petition God represent worship because they are grounded in faith in God's character and actions on behalf of those who seek him.

While the Psalter expresses the attitudinal aspect of worship directly, it also gives witness to the "activity" of worship, albeit indirectly in most cases. The psalms mention performance of songs by singing (Ps 81:1-2; 144:9; 147:7) and playing instruments (Ps 81:2-3; 144:9; 147:7; 149:3; 150:3-5) (see Music, Song). They contain references to ritual clapping and shouting (Ps 47:1), dancing (Ps 149:3), processing to the holy place (Ps 132:7) and making sacrifices (Ps 118:27 [although the NRSV renders "bind the festal procession with branches," the word hag is perhaps better understood as "festal sacrifice"; see the same term in Mal 2:3]). Biblical scholars often refer to this activity as "cult," which denotes an established set of rituals and the liturgy that accompanies them, in which communion with God is ordered, defined and celebrated. Although the English word worship can refer broadly to homage in private and personal forms, the "cult" connotes more narrowly address to God that is regulated and public. In the twentieth century scholars of the psalms focused much attention on the point that the psalms served originally as the liturgy of Israel's cult, and they attempted to describe the cultic acts that served as the setting for certain psalms. Many such efforts assumed that the particular cult setting was the worship in the Jerusalem temple. Some now believe, however, that many psalms are the products of cult practices that developed in the Diaspora, when Jews were dispersed throughout the ancient Near East after 587 BC.

The purpose of this article is to survey the nature of various psalms that suggests that this material was related to the cult and to summarize some of the leading theories of how psalms specifically were used in cultic practice. Some attention will be paid to the types of questions that remain unanswered in such study.

1. Nature and Centrality of the Cult in Ancient Israel
2. Study of the Relationship of the Psalms to the Cult
3. Signs of Cultic Use of the Psalms
4. Cultic Settings
5. Identity of Cultic Leaders and Participants
6. Current Questions

1. Nature and Centrality of the Cult in Ancient Israel.

For modern Western readers, worship may suggest an activity reserved for one hour of the week that thus is separated from the rest of life. For ancient Israelites, however, all of life was punctuated by sacral activity of a communal and ritualistic character. Hence, the cult permeated life in a way that worship does not in the contemporary community of faith (Buss). Although ancient people certainly practiced prayer and piety apart from the community ("worship" in the more general sense of the word), there was no sense that private expressions of piety would substitute for the cultic. The cult facilitated contact with a "life-creating, order-establishing, and meaning-giving power" (Stolz, 7). Hence, the psalms speak of "seeing God's face" in the holy place (Ps 17:15), or they refer to the temple as the place in which God's justice is made known (Ps 73:15-20). For this reason, the psalmist longed to be among worshipers, because apart from such company, God seemed absent and the enemies more powerful (note that Ps 42—43 is spoken at a distance from the temple and is punctuated by a taunt from opponents, "Where is your God?" [Ps 42:3, 10]). Given the power attributed to participation in the cult, and given the close relationship between the psalms and this established set of rituals, it is understandable that many scholars have been concerned to discern the particular ways and settings in which the psalms were performed.

2. Study of the Relationship of the Psalms to the Cult.

The recognition of the psalms' origins in the cult may be traced to the work of scholars in the "History of Religions" school, whose leading representative was German scholar H. Gunkel (his books and articles appeared between 1904 and 1933 [see Stamm, 34-41; Gerstenberger 1974, 179-88]). When Gunkel began his work, most scholars considered psalms to be artistic pieces that they could interpret in light of the circumstances of their authors, and they spent much effort trying to identify the psalmists and the events that gave rise to particular psalms (Haller, 378-83). But Gunkel thought that the language of these poems was too general and stereotyped to recover any such historical information. He noted that the psalms do not contain personal and historical references, in contrast to a poem such as 2 Samuel 1:19-27, in which "David mentions Saul and Jonathan by name" (Gunkel and Begrich, 7). In fact, Gunkel noted, the psalms contain almost no specific references that allow the scholar to reconstruct the exact circumstances under which a psalm was composed. Gunkel concluded that the generic quality of the psalms was due to their origin in the public and official events of Israelite community life, most notably in the cult. Therefore, he insisted that the main interpretive work was to categorize the psalms according to genre and to identify the social setting (Sitz im Leben) that gave rise to each genre (Gunkel and Begrich, 7). That is, he thought that the main task was to recover the types of events that lay behind the psalms (not particular historical occurrences). In other words, the main question became, "How were the psalms used in the cult?" (Gunkel thought that the "wisdom psalms" were an exception, being set among "the old men in the gate or in the market" [see Gunkel and Begrich, 21]). It should be noted, however, that Gunkel thought that the psalms in present form were products of personal piety based on cultic originals; so, Gunkel's real question involved how certain speech forms that appear in the present Psalter were used originally in cultic events. Gunkel's student S. Mowinckel would argue that the psalms as they now appear in the Psalter are the cultic originals. Hence, this difference of opinion shapes the debate in important ways: some scholars assume that the psalms are the actual words used in the cult; others think that the psalms have been influenced by the language of worship but are themselves not "cultic." In any case, all psalms scholars since Gunkel have had to come to terms with the relationship between the psalms and the cult, regardless of the exact view of that relationship.

3. Signs of Cultic Use of the Psalms.

3.1. Implicit Evidence. Although there is little direct information on how the psalms were used in the cult, there is important implicit evidence, some of which is outside the Psalter. For example, psalms that ask God to "arise" (Ps 68:1) or "return" (Ps 132:8) are illuminated by Numbers 10:35-36, which links such language to the procession of the ark to the sanctuary. It reports that when the ark moved from its place, Moses would say, "Arise, O LORD, let your enemies be scattered, and your foes flee before you" (Num 10:35), and likewise when the ark came back to its place, he would say, "Return, O LORD of the ten thousand thousands of Israel" (Num 10:36). Hence, talk of God "arising" or "returning" in the psalms should be heard as part of a ceremony that had as its centerpiece a procession of the ark in celebration of the victory of God over his enemies (see particularly Ps 24:7-10 [Cross, 91-111]).

There is also implicit evidence in the psalms themselves. The antiphonal quality of many psalms suggests cultic use. For example, Psalm 118 opens with an invitation to praise, "O give thanks to the LORD, for he is good" (Ps 118:1a), followed by a statement of God's worthiness to be praised, presumably spoken by the congregation, "His steadfast love endures forever" (Ps 118:1; cf. Ps 118:29). The response in Psalm 118:1 then recurs throughout the next three verses, showing that the psalm is to be spoken publicly, as various groups (Israel [Ps 118:2]; house of Aaron [Ps 118:3]; those who fear the Lord [Ps 118:4]) are called to utter the words "His steadfast love endures forever" (see also Ps 115:9-11; 135:19-20; 136). The alternation of voices appears in some psalms as a shift in voice, from third to first person, perhaps indicating the presence of multiple worship leaders. Psalm 75 begins with a declaration of praise spoken by a worshiper (Ps 75:1). Then Yahweh himself speaks for the rest of the psalm (Ps 75:2-10). Similarly, Psalm 81:1-5a expresses a call to worship and a congregation's response, but Psalm 81:5b introduces "a voice I had not known," the voice of God, who speaks to the end of the psalm (Ps 81:6-16). Such features give these psalms a dramatic character. They probably indicate the participation of a cultic prophet who utters the words of God (see esp. Johnson).

3.2. Explicit Evidence.

3.2.1. Texts Outside the Psalms. There is also some explicit evidence that the psalms were used in the cult. At least two texts outside the Psalter attest directly to this point. According to 1 Chronicles 15:1-16:36, *David led a procession of the ark to Jerusalem. When the ark was in place, David "appointed the singing of praises to the LORD by Asaph and his kindred" (1 Chron 16:7). The content of their praises is reported to be a combination of segments of Psalms 105; 95; 106 (1 Chron 16:8-34). To be sure, the original version of this event in 2 Samuel 6 is less elaborate and does not include these details related to the psalms (it says only that David and company brought up the ark with shouting and the sound of the trumpet [2 Sam 6:15]), but it is significant that the Chronicler, who is supremely interested in worship, connects the psalms and this event.

Jeremiah 33:10-11 likewise associates a particular psalm with a cultic act. The passage reports Jeremiah's prophecy that when the Lord restores good fortune to Judah, once again there will be occasion to bring thank offerings to the temple (see Lev 7:11-18). Such offerings, Jeremiah declares, will be accompanied by the words of Psalm 136:1: "Give thanks to the LORD of hosts, for the LORD is good, for his steadfast love endures forever!" (Jer 33:11). The implications of this passage, however, are not limited to the use of this particular verse or psalm. The common expression "give thanks" comes from the same root word (yadā) as the name of the thanksgiving offering in Hebrew (tôdā [Lev 7:12]). Hence, it is reasonable to assume there is a connection between the thanksgiving offering and words such as "give thanks" and "I give thanks," wherever they appear. The Jeremiah text indicates that the act of making a thanksgiving offering (Ps 116:12-19; cf. Job 33:19-28) appeared in tandem with offering thanks in song (Ps 116:1-11).

3.2.2. Psalm Headings. Perhaps the clearest indicator of the cultic use of psalms within the Psalter itself is psalm superscriptions (see Psalms 5: Titles). This information in the headings falls into three main categories. Some psalm titles include notes about an occasion on which a psalm was used or was to be used. For example, the heading of Psalm 30 identifies the psalm as "a song at the dedication of the temple," presumably a reference to the dedication of the second temple in 515 BC; the title of Psalm 38 identifies the work that it introduces as "for the memorial offering," a reference that, though clear enough in content, cannot be identified further; Psalm 92's heading designates the psalm as "a song for the Sabbath." The headings of Psalms 120-134 may also indicate cultic use. They all contain the note "A Song of Ascents" (see the slightly different form of the title in Ps 121). This element of the title likely designates these psalms for use in pilgrimages to Jerusalem (Crow, 1-27).

Psalm titles contain a variety of comments that appear to be musical directives (Gunkel and Begrich, 349-51). Although their meaning is uncertain in most cases, it seems clear that these comments originally involved the manner in which a psalm was performed: "with stringed instruments" (Ps 4:1; 6:1; 54:1; 55:1; 61:1; 67:1; 76:1); "for the flutes" (Ps 5:1); "according to . . ." (Heb ʿal plus any of a variety of terms—e.g., "the deer of the dawn" [Ps 22:1]; "the Lilies" [Ps 45:1; 69:1]; "the Dove on Far-off Terebinths" [Ps 56:1]). Note the use of this type of direction in relation to musical performance in 1 Chronicles 15:20-21. The elusive term selā may also be classified with information in psalm titles, even though it appears at breaks in the bodies of the psalms (Tate, 33 n. 5a).

These various notes on the performance of psalms almost certainly were added secondarily in a later stage of development when the psalms became written documents. In the case of Psalms 120-134, the grouping as a whole shows signs of having been edited for use in pilgrimage to Jerusalem in the postexilic period (Crow, 159-87). Hence, there is evidence at different levels that some psalms were adapted for a particular cultic use.

4. Cultic Settings.

Space limitations here do not allow a comprehensive survey of theories on the cultic events that lie behind the psalms. The examples that follow are representative of hypotheses put forward.

4.1. Community Psalms and Israel's Festivals. S. Mowinckel was one of the most influential scholars in the study of the relationship between the psalms and the cult, particularly on the matter of what cultic events might lie behind the psalms. Mowinckel proposed certain cultic settings based on what is known of the Babylonian cult, particularly Babylon's New Year festival, or the Akitu. The Babylonian festival featured a declaration of the kingship of Marduk, the chief deity of the Babylonian pantheon. It also included a significant role for the Babylonian king, as actor/leader of cultic activity and as a character in the dramatic celebration. For Mowinckel, this information was essential for understanding the use of psalms in Israel's worship. He proposed a New Year festival in the fall in Israel, at the time identified in later texts with the harvest festival (Ex 23:16; 34:24; Lev 23:23-44). He thought that the center of this celebration was a claim of Yahweh's kingship. The key psalms in his schema were the "enthronement psalms," which have at their center the claim or description of Yahweh as king (Pss 47; 93; 95—99). Mowinckel believed that the final day of the festival was a grand enactment of Yahweh's enthronement, marked by a procession of the ark to the temple. Hence, the words "The LORD is king" (Ps 93:1; 97:1; 99:1) should be rendered "The LORD has become king." He believed that this line constituted a cultic shout at the culmination of the parade to the holy place (Mowinckel, 1.106-92).

Mowinckel thought further that this celebration of Yahweh's kingship was led in large part by the Israelite king, whose rule was also reaffirmed and celebrated in various rituals during the New Year festival, as was the case in Babylon. He rightly saw that the "royal psalms" presented the human king's earthly rule as parallel to the heavenly rule of God, and that these psalms presented the king as God's appointed representative (Ps 2; 89:2-39; 110). Read in light of Babylonian records of the Akitu festival, this delineation of Israel's king indicated to Mowinckel that the king, as God's representative, stood at the center of the New Year celebration and of the cult in general. For Mowinckel, the "I" of the psalms was read in most cases as the voice of the king. The king, speaking as "I," was not, for the most part, expressing personal complaints; rather, he was representing Israel's "corporate personality." So the king's reign, but also his struggle with enemies, his victories and defeats, was ritually enacted in the festival (see Eaton; Croft).

Reactions to Mowinckel's work reflect the difficulty of the question and the scarcity of direct evidence. Three prominent opinions on Mowinckel's theory are illustrative.

(1) Some scholars reject Mowinckel's notion of a central festival. They note that the OT contains no direct evidence of such a celebration. Moreover, some critics have pointed out that Mowinckel relies too heavily on rabbinical material (which dates to the first two centuries AD) to reconstruct festivals in the monarchical period (Mowinckel, 1.121-25; Stamm, 48-49).

(2) Other scholars not only accept Mowinckel's view that a Babylonian-like event occurred in Israel but also postulate that Israel's cult fit a general pattern in ancient Near Eastern religious expression. Among the more radical proposals was that put forward by scholars in the "Myth and Ritual" school. They held that the Israelite king stood in the place of God in the cult and was himself understood as a semidivine character. Thus the adherents of the Myth and Ritual school pressed Mowinckel's ideas in ways that he did not intend (Gerstenberger 1974, 216).

(3) Perhaps the most common reaction to Mowinckel's work, however, was general agreement, but with suggested modifications. Two such reactions illustrate the nature of the debate. Gunkel agreed with Mowinckel that a New Year festival was celebrated in ancient Israel, and that the ceremony centered on Yahweh's kingship. Gunkel disagreed, however, on the cultic nature of the enthronement psalms as they now appear in the Psalter. Gunkel's objection was based on the fact that the enthronement poems occur in bits and pieces also in Isaiah 40—66, a portion of the book of Isaiah that dates to the Babylonian exile (587-539 BC) or afterward (Is 40:10; 44:23; 49:13; 55:12; 59:19; 60:1; 62:11). For the great prophet of the exile, these poetic lines are eschatological in that they look forward to God's reign, which will be displayed in the return of Judah to its homeland. Gunkel thought it logical that the prophet had reinterpreted the enthronement material for his own historical situation. Since the enthronement ment psalms in the Psalter are identical in form and content to what we have in the latest strands of Isaiah, it also seemed to follow that these psalms are not the cultic originals but rather are later eschatological poems influenced by Isaiah 40–66 (Gunkel and Begrich, 80-81).

A. Weiser also shared many of Mowinckel's assumptions but argued that the festival setting for the majority of the psalms was a "covenant festival of Yahweh" in which the Sinai covenant was remembered and renewed. His reconstruction is based on two primary pieces of data. First, the covenant and its renewal predominates in the Hexateuch (Genesis—Joshua) and therefore should be taken as the primary cultic emphasis of early Israel (see Josh 24). Second, Weiser notes that very few psalms (Pss 65; 67; 85; 126) contain emphases that would be at home in the agricultural festivals, which he believes were later developments away from Israel's original emphasis on covenant (Weiser, 27). His theory made sense of the so-called anticlitic psalms (Ps 40:6; 50:14; 51:15-17; 69:31), which stand theologically close to the prophets who criticized the practice of ritual without ethics (Amos 5:21-26) (see Szörenyi, 320-33; Clines, 107.). It also accounted for the fact that sacrifice and the agricultural festivals are hardly mentioned in the psalms, a point that some have used to deny the psalms' origin in the cult (Ridderbos, 241). It is interesting to note, however, how Weiser (35) begins his discussion of the liturgy of the covenant festival: "No proper ritual of the Covenant Festival of Yahweh has been handed down to us from Old Testament times, such as has been preserved, for instance, from the Babylonian New Year Festival and the Akitu Festival at Uruk, giving instructions for the execution of the cultic acts and for the recitals of the priests." And yet, Weiser (35) proceeds to say with confidence, "The liturgy which we find in Psalm 50 is part of the order of the feast of the renewal of the Covenant which was celebrated at the Temple of Jerusalem." Weiser's criticism of Mowinckel's theory, that the OT never mentions an enthronement festival, turns back upon his own thesis, for the covenant festival too remains a reconstruction that, however attractive, remains hypothetical (Szörenyi, 213-14).

4.2. Cultic Rituals and the Psalms of the Individual. Just as there are competing theories regarding how the psalms were used in national cultic events, there are also many and various views of how the poems functioned in ceremonies centering on individuals. As we have already seen, some scholars, following Mowinckel, understand the "I" of these psalms to be the king. There are several interrelated theories, however, that attempt to explain how some psalms functioned in the lives of ordinary Israelites. Mowinckel located numerous individual complaint psalms in occasions of sickness and requests for healing (applied to ordinary Israelites but perhaps composed originally for the king). He believed that these psalms should be read against the particular backdrop of sickness caused by curses or "spells" cast by the psalmists' enemies, enemies labeled "evildoers" (Ps 10:15). Mowinckel imagined that healing from such maladies took place in the temple in rituals designed for such circumstances and carried out by priests (Mowinckel, 2.1-8).

H. Schmidt proposed some of these psalms that included a protestation of innocence actually grew out of a judicial process in which an accused person sought vindication through a trial in the temple. The notion that such a procedure was available is supported by numerous texts (Deut 17:8-13; 21:1-8; 1 Kings 8:31-32). Deuteronomy 17:8-13 most clearly identifies the temple and the Levites on duty as the locus of judgment. Psalm 17 is a parade example of a psalm that might be read against this backdrop. It begins with a call for hearing, "Hear a just cause, O LORD" (Ps. 17:1-2), and the rest of the psalm is filled with images of adversaries who falsely accuse the psalmist. The fact that the psalmist asks for God's favorable judgment and for the Lord to confront the accusers (Ps 17:13) lends credence to Schmidt's proposal (see Schmidt). His thesis has continued to maintain adherents. W. Beyerlin supported and expanded the theory, proposing that Psalms 3; 4; 5; 7; 11; 17; 23; 26; 27; 57; 63 have such a judicial process as their setting (see the summary in Gerstenberger 1974, 203-5). L. Delekat proposed a setting similar to that of Schmidt and Beyerlin, but he emphasized the overnight stay in the temple, which is implied in many of the psalms in question. Delekat describes in detail what took place during the night, how the accused received oracles, had dreams, and underwent ordeals. He proposed that the psalms expressing this experience were inscribed on temple or sanctuary walls by the accused (see Delekat). Recently,

K. van der Toorn has revised these theories that focus on a judicial process by focusing on the ordeal that the accused underwent during the night in the temple. He proposes that the psalmist submitted to a drinking ordeal like that described in Numbers 5:11-31, hence the frequent references to a cup in these psalms (Ps 11:6; 16:5; 23:6) (see van der Toorn). This final expression of the thesis in a general way illustrates both the strengths and weaknesses of them all. Van der Toorn is right to emphasize the temple setting of the psalms in question because there are frequent references to seeing God's face (Ps 11:7) or dwelling in the holy place (Ps 23:6). To make the psalms fit the details of his thesis, however, he must apply some of the data in ways that seem contrary to their intention. For example, it is unlikely that the references to a cup in these psalms refer to ordeals, since they connote celebration (Ps 23:5), they symbolize God's protection (Ps 16:5), or they refer to judgment upon the psalmist's enemies (Ps 11:6) (see Johnston).

Particularly important for understanding the cultic background of the psalms is the body of material uncovered in 1929 at Ras Shamra (ancient Ugarit) near the coast of Syria. These works continue to be translated and evaluated for their comparative value. Drawing largely from this material, for example, P. K. McCarter has proposed that psalms using water as a symbol of distress originated in river ordeals meant to determine guilt or innocence (Ps 18:18; 32:6; 66:10-12) (see McCarter). In the end, however, such theories suffer from the same weaknesses as those mentioned above. The proposed ritual (or ordeal in this case) is not mentioned elsewhere in the OT, and the evidence of the psalms must be manipulated too much to fit the pattern of the comparative material.

E. Gerstenberger offers a promising explanation for some psalms that seem to arise from situations of illness. Using sociological models, OT narratives that depict the nature and setting of prayer, and Mesopotamian ritual texts, Gerstenberger proposes that many of these psalms grew out of family ceremonies of healing facilitated by a local cult figure, an "expert" in healing. To support the notion of such a ceremony in the home, he notes, for example, that Hezekiah seeks a "ritual expert" (Isaiah) when he is sick (Is 38). Likewise, 2 Samuel 12 depicts David practicing penitence at home. According to Gerstenberger, these examples raise the possibility, indeed the likelihood, that many psalms had their setting apart from the temple (Gerstenberger 1980, 165). He proposes that many psalms of sickness reflect a kind of "group therapy" process in which a ritual expert from the clan or tribe restores the infirmed to full communion with the family group (Gerstenberger 1980, 167-69).

5. Identity of Cultic Leaders and Participants.

The question naturally arises of who led cultic events and who participated in the cult. The answers are necessarily hypothetical (as illustrated by Gerstenberger's thesis [see 4 above]), but the types of persons involved in the cult may be sketched out in a general way from explicit evidence in OT texts. As we have already noted, the king was an integral part of the cult. Even if Mowinckel's proposal concerning a New Year festival is off base, the royal psalms evince the monarch's involvement. For example, Psalms 2 and 72 have at least some relationship to coronation ceremonies; Psalm 45 is set in a royal wedding; Psalm 20 is a prayer for the king before battle; Psalm 21 gives thanks to God for protecting and blessing the ruler (see also Pss 18; 89; 101; 110; 132). Also, prophets, Levitical singers and musicians almost certainly had important roles in the cult (see Ps 81:6-16 for evidence of cultic prophets). Psalm headings that associate certain collections with the Korahites (Ps 42—49; 84—89) and *Asaph (Ps 50; 73—83) give witness to the central place that the Levitical guilds had in worship (see 1 Chron 15—16). These groups were exclusively male, but *women also had a formal role in the cult. Psalm 68:25 describes a procession to the sanctuary in which female participants had a recognized place ("the singers in front, the musicians last, between them girls playing tambourines"). Although little more is certain, it is possible that some psalms originally were spoken by women. Psalm 131 is the best example, with Psalm 131:2 seeming to indicate that a woman, a mother, spoke the words "My soul is like the weaned child that is with me" (Miller, 239-43). This should not be a surprise, given the portrait of Hannah making a vow and praying in 1 Samuel 1:9-18.

6. Current Questions.

This survey indicates that the psalms were inte-

grally related to Israel's worship, including the ritual activities that comprised Israel's cult. Despite that rather certain fact, however, numerous questions persist concerning the nature of the psalms and their place in worship. Many of these questions are related in one way or another to the problem of whether the psalms as they now appear in the Psalter are cultic originals, works based on cultic originals, or purely literary works. The number of psalms that originated in the first temple and the question of whether any psalms survived from that period are uncertain. The psalms of *thanksgiving may provide the most certain link to the worship in Solomon's temple (as Jer 33:11 indicates), but they were adapted for a different use in the Second Temple period. For example, Psalm 30 bears the classic signs of the song of thanksgiving (description of being rescued [Ps 30:1-3, 11], inclusion of terminology for giving thanks [Ps 30:12]), but apparently it was used in a very different way in the Second Temple period, according to its superscription ("A song at the dedication of the temple"). Similarly, the language of individual thanksgiving dominates Psalm 129 (Ps 129:1a, 2-4), but the work was adapted for community use, as the phrase, "let Israel say" (Ps 129:1b) attests. The so-called royal psalms also pose problems. Although these works have some relationship to cultic ceremonies related to the monarch (and thus to the first temple), the form in which they now appear in the Psalter indicates they were reshaped for a later theological purpose. Indeed, the fact that they do not contain the names of particular kings, in contrast to practically every such poem from the ancient Near East, indicates that they came to be used as reflections on monarchy or to express hope in a future, idealized ruler (see Starbuck).

The question of how psalms were edited or reshaped for use at a later time has become particularly important because of the current interest in the Psalter as a literary product. Psalm 2:10-12 illustrates the problem. J. J. M. Roberts (132) proposes that the address to the "kings of the earth" had in mind vassals—that is, rulers of Israel's subservient territories—who were present for an Israelite king's coronation. He finds support for this view in records of similar Egyptian ceremonies in which vassals were instructed to pay homage to Pharaoh. The discussion by Roberts is quite helpful for understanding the possible origins of these poetic lines. Nevertheless, the fact that Psalm 2:12a warns the foreign kings with language so similar to Psalm 1:6b raises the possibility that the end of Psalm 2 was brought into its present form in the Psalter to enhance its connection to Psalm 1 as a dual introduction to the book (see Editorial Criticism). Regardless of which perspective is right, it is interesting that this dynamic in current scholarship brings us back, albeit by a different path, to the debates between Gunkel and Mowinckel concerning the enthronement psalms: are the psalms in present form cultic, or do they merely draw from cultic forms and language?

See also CULT, WORSHIP: WISDOM; FORM CRITICISM; KINGSHIP PSALMS; MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS; MUSIC, SONG; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. J. Buss, "The Meaning of 'Cult and the Interpretation of the Old Testament,'" JBL 32 (1964) 317-25; D. J. A. Clines, "Psalm Research Since 1955: I. The Psalms and the Cult," TynBul 18 (1967) 103-26; S. J. L. Croft, The Identity of the Individual in the Psalms (JSOTSup 44; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987); F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1974); L. D. Crow, The Songs of Ascents (Psalms 120-134): Their Place in Israelite History and Religion (SBLDS 148; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996); G. H. Davies, "Worship in the OT," IDB 4.879-83; L. Delekat, Asylie und Schutzorakel an Zionheiligtum: Eine Untersuchung zu den privaten Feindpsalmen (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1967); J. Eaton, Kingship and the Psalms (SBT 32; London: SCM, 1976); E. S. Gerstenberger, "Psalms," in Old Testament Form Criticism, ed. J. H. Hayes (San Antonio, TX: Trinity University Press, 1974) 179-223; idem, Der bittende Mensch: Bitritual und Klagelied des Einzelnen im Alten Testament (WMANT 51; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1980); H. Gunkel and J. Begrich, Introduction to Psalms: The Genres of the Religious Lyric of Israel (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998); M. Haller, "Ein Jahrzehnt Psalmforschung," TRu 1 (1929) 377-402; A. R. Johnson, The Cultic Prophet and Israel's Psalmody (Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1979); P. S. Johnston, "Ordeals in the Psalms?" in Temple and Worship in Biblical Israel, ed. J. Day (LHBOTS 422; London: T & T Clark International, 2005); B. O. Long, "Recent Field Studies in Oral Literature and the Question of Sitz im Leben," Se- meia 5 (1976) 35-49; P. K. McCarter, "The River Ordeal in Israelite Literature," HTR 66 (1973) 403-12; P. D. Miller, They Cried to the Lord: The Form and Theology of Biblical Prayer (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship (2 vols.; London: Blackwell, 1962); N. H. Ridderbos, "Psalmen und Kult," in Zur Neueren Psalmenforschung, ed. P. H. A. Neumann (WF 92; Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1976) 235-46; J. J. M. Roberts, "The Religio-Political Setting of Psalm 47," BASOR 221 (1976) 129-32; H. Schmidt, Das Gebet der Angeklagten in Alten Testament (BZAW 49; Giessen: Töpelmann, 1929); J. J. Stamm, "Ein Vierteljahrhundert Psalmenforschung," TRu 23 (1955) 1-68; S. R. A. Starbuck, Court Oracles in the Psalms: The So-Called Royal Psalms in Their Ancient Near Eastern Context (SBLDS 172; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1999); F. Stolz, Psalmen im nach-kultischen Raum (ThSt 129; Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1983); A. Szörenyi, Psalmen und Kult im Alten Testament: Zur Formgeschichte der Psalmen (Budapest: Sankt Stefans, 1961); M. E. Tate, Psalms 51-100 (WBC 20; Waco, TX: Word, 1991); K. van der Toorn, "Ordeal," ABD 5.40-42; A. Weiser, The Psalms: A Commentary (4th ed.; OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1962).

J. F. D. Creach

CULT, WORSHIP: WISDOM

The sages' views of public worship vary over the centuries of sapiential tradition, although it is clear from a careful reading of their writings that they valued this sphere of corporate life, participated in its important rituals and sacred times of divine veneration, and even wrote different psalms in praise of the creator. Some of these even found their way into the Psalter. Their instructions taught their students to inculcate within their character the "fear of Yahweh" and to participate in the worship of God.

1. Wisdom and Worship in Previous Scholarship
2. Identifying Characteristics of Wisdom and Corporate Worship
3. Understandings of Wisdom and Corporate/Public Religion in Israel and the Ancient Near East
4. Motivations for Participation in Cultic Religion
5. Decorum within the Sphere of the Holy
6. The Sages' Criticism of Cultic Religion
7. Did the Sages Compose Cultic Literature?

1. Wisdom and Worship in Previous Scholarship.

Earlier generations of wisdom scholars during the nineteenth century and the first seventy years of the twentieth century usually held, with some exceptions, that the *sages and *scribes of Israel and Judah did not view the religious sphere of public *worship (temple, priesthood, worship, sacred times and space) as an area for their own analysis and teaching. This did not mean that the sages did not believe in the gods or that they refrained from private piety. But the general position in past scholarship was that the sages did not instruct their students to participate in public worship, in particular the cultic expressions of state religion. Indeed, some of these scholars even suggested that the sages rejected cultic religion and offered another approach to the determination of meaning and its import for authentic life. There were three reasons for this. First, the early generations of Christian scholars, under the influence of theological liberalism (e.g., Friedrich Schleiermacher, Adolph von Harnack, Albrecht Ritschl, Ernst Troeltsch), emphasized reason, the fatherhood of God and the moral teachings of Jewish religion while denigrating the Torah and Second Temple religious practice leading to the rise of early Judaism as contributing to a sterile legalism, devoid of the true spirit of religion. Second, this view led some biblical scholars to point to the classical prophets of the eighth through the sixth centuries BC as the apex of Israelite Jewish religion with their emphasis on social justice, individual piety and moral behavior. Thus, sapiential texts, normally dated in the Second Temple era, were generally ignored due to their presumed encrustation with the legalism that developed especially beginning with Ezra and continuing into early rabbinic Judaism. When viewing the canonical wisdom texts, they tended to reach the conclusion that this literature also was rather sterile and lacking in moral and individual piety that was to characterize a person's behavior. Third, under the influence of liberal theology, other biblical scholars tended to portray the sages and scribes as humanists and rationalists who considered the cult to represent a primitive form of religious expression that should be abandoned. Thus, the wise were particularly concerned to steer their students away from participation in the rituals and sacred seasons to a more philosophical and reflective life that sought to capture the major ethical values of human community: love, diligence, patience, proper use of language, and charity. Three examples of these related views of wisdom and the wise are seen in the writings of Johannes Fichtner and, much later, John Priest and William McKane.

1.1. Johannes Fichtner. In his important study of wisdom in 1933 J. Fichtner (36-46) follows the views of liberal theology in arguing that the sages of Israel and the ancient Near East were not concerned with fulfilling the legal requirements of cultic law but rather sought to set forth significant ethical concerns. Thus, for example, sacrifices were to be offered, not as cultic obedience to divine dictate but rather as a means by which the poor are fed. No participant in worship experienced communal acceptance without particular attention to providing for the needs of the poor.

1.2. John Priest. In 1968 J. Priest contended that humanism, in his view, was “the rational analysis of human experience.” This was key for Priest’s understanding of OT theology because he considered it to result from a humanistic enterprise that sought to determine human interests. Thus, creation is a fundamental theological dogma in the OT and rests on a humanistic enterprise. Yahweh, as creator of the world and maintainer of its continuation, was one of the data of rational investigation. This observation even encompassed divine actions in history. However, in the Second Temple era, due to conquest and Judah as a client state and then colony, the sense of divine action in history became, so Priest contends, increasingly attenuated. The developing view of the law as a static entity contained in a written code led to the “killing of the spirit.” However, Priest argues that the intellectual tradition of wisdom continued even then to examine and evaluate religious and moral dimensions of Israelite life. Yet there were also sapiential critics of traditional wisdom. *Job and *Ecclesiastes, in the Second Temple era, moved into a view of skepticism, even pessimism, about the claims of their more conservative colleagues and forebears. These two wisdom texts participated in the humanistic goal to determine meaning in existence and to assess what was true and false, although their conclusions were far more skeptical. This moved beyond law and cult in reaching the height of humanistic analysis. By implication, Priest’s argument casts aside the mystery and “magic” of cultic teachings and participation in public religion and leads to a fully humanistic view of theology and human existence in the world.

1.3. William McKane. In his 1970 commentary on *Proverbs W. McKane reorders its materials by following his view of the differentiation between the secular and the moral and religious spheres. He argues that the early sages were in essence humanists not concerned with matters of religion, and that it was only much later in Judah’s history that the tradition was theologized and became more focused on religious matters.

The weaknesses of these three illustrations from earlier scholarship become obvious. Indeed, the more extreme argument has been made that the wise saw the realm of the cult to be an order of superstition and magic that should be held in disdain, overtly criticized, and repudiated as a valid way of understanding God and moral behavior. The most glaring defect in this view is the assumption of an ancient dichotomy between the secular and the profane or, stated another way, a contrast between a rational, empirical approach to the determination of meaning and its guidance in moral conduct and a revelatory approach by which the priests receive divine teaching through theophanic teaching, the casting of lots, dreams, and the gift of divine Torah. In my view, the “fear of God/Yahweh” was the foundation of the sapiential worldview from its inception (see Fear of the Lord). This means that the sages, from the earliest days of their appearance in the first temple, held that religious faith and piety were the basis upon which their teachings rested.

2. Identifying Characteristics of Wisdom and Corporate Worship.

One of the essential issues to be addressed before we proceed further is the determination of what wisdom means in the sapiential traditions of Israel and the ancient Near East. First, we note the general view that wisdom is a body of knowledge—that is, a tradition that sets forth an understanding of God, the world and nature, humanity and human society. Second, wisdom is understood as discipline—that is, both a curriculum of study and a structured form of behavior designed to lead to the formation of character. Character was shaped through study, reflection and the actualization of virtue in both discourse and action. This embodiment of moral virtue led the sage to live in harmony with the cosmos, society and the Creator. The result of this type of existence was well-being that included both a sense of internal peace and contentment and the external accoutrements of honor, respect, integrity and dignity. Long life, prosperity and joy became the possession of the one who was wise. Third, wisdom is moral discourse and behavior that constructed and legitimated a cosmology in which righteousness, both correct and just behavior as well as proper decorum, ordered the world, society and individual existence. Through the attainment of wisdom the sages were able to enter into and dwell within an aesthesis of beauty, order, justice and life (Schmid 1974).

A second essential issue at the outset involves what the meaning of corporate or public worship implies among the religions of Israel and the ancient Near East in the periods of Israel's and Judah's first and second temples (1200-63 BC). In its broadest terms, corporate/public religion is the ordered response of a community to its belief that a deity has appeared in its midst and has established a relationship with its people, both in terms of their present existence and their future destiny. From this relationship derives a way of life that is understood as living in response to the requirements of this deity and gaining the benefits from this association. To maintain this relationship, the community is expected to worship this divine being as the chief of those gods whom they may recognize and to live in accordance to his or her teachings. On a public level these included rituals and sacred seasons as well as righteous behavior based on the community's public laws believed to have been given by their chief deity. National and regional religions usually include a temple or other sacred space where, the community believes, the deity has appeared and may continue to be encountered; holy seasons in which there were festivals, feast days and other types of times for gathering together to worship and to commune with the high god/goddess; a priesthood that mediates between the deity and the community; and rituals that comprise things such as sacrifices of various types, communal hymns and laments, and prayers, especially of intercession calling for divine aid, forgiveness for sins, and redemption.

3. Understandings of Wisdom and Corporate/Public Religion in Israel and the Ancient Near East.

In approaching the views of the sages and scribes of Israel about cultic religion and to suggest their ways of participating in this aspect of life, we begin with the sages and scribes in the other regions of the ancient Near East: Mesopotamia, Syria and Egypt. One fundamental affirmation to which the sages of the ancient Near East held is that of cosmic order. According to the sages, cosmic order is expressed by numerous terms, among which are maat* in Egypt, me in Sumer, mešari in Akkadian cultures and šēdaqâ ("righteousness") in Israel and Judah. This order in conceptual or mythological terms was established at creation by the high god who formed and shaped the world. He placed within nature and society a pervasive order that regulated both the structure and the continuation of the world and its various components, ranging from the heavenly bodies, to fertile soil, to the existence and behavior of the species of life on the earth, to anthropological and communal life. The sages taught that the wise were to exist in life-giving harmony with this order in each of its various compartments (Schmid 1968).

3.1. The Sages and Scribes of Egypt. The Egyptian sages sought to observe, understand and then place into their teachings the regulations of maat in order to provide guidance to their students who were in quest of knowledge and life. Armed with this knowledge and its incorporation in behavior, the youth were able to begin their journey to obtain well-being in all of its facets, ranging from longevity, to happiness, to honor (see The Instruction for King Meri-ka-Re [ANET, 417]). The sages worshiped publicly the high gods of ancient Egypt, but their greatest attention was given to the praise of the various gods of creation (Amon, Re, Amon-Re). The divine creator, or perhaps a god who belonged to his divine council*, observed human behavior both in regard to the responsibilities of the performance of the prescribed duties of worship and individual moral behavior. This god, often called ntr, a generic term that avoided the complexities of Egyptian polytheism but did not imply monotheism, was the one who was charged with adjudicating justice, either by himself or through a surrogate, who engaged in rewarding the pious and virtuous wise, and who punished the fool and the recalcitrant sinner. Scholars sometimes have incorrectly argued that this principle of retribution was automatic and gave no room for compassion and forgiveness. This is not the case in Egyptian wisdom. Appeals could be made to the gods for absolution, and it at times was given.

Unique among the sages in the ancient Near East is the belief that the king is divine. Born as Horus, who ruled the world in order and justice, at death the king became Osiris, the ruler of the underworld. Sages were the servants of the king, active in the vast bureaucratic state, although the especially noteworthy ones became honored as teachers whose wisdom was written down and transmitted through the generations, often for many centuries (see “The Instruction of Ptah-hotep” [Lichtheim 1973, 61-80]).

These views did not remain constant throughout the history of Egypt. Certainly they are transparent in the Old Kingdom (c. 2686-2180 BC), but the devastation of the First Intermediate period (c. 2180-2133 BC) led some of the sages to question their essential beliefs (especially the effectiveness of mortuary religion for gaining life in the next world [the West]) (see “A Dispute over Suicide” [ANET, 405-7]; “The Admonitions of Ipu-wer” [ANET, 441-46]; “In Praise of Learned Scribes” [ANET, 431-32]). The wisdom texts of the Middle Kingdom (c. 2133-1670 BC) are decidedly more political in emphasizing loyalty to the king. Still, the king’s responsibilities to maintain and participate in the important cults of Egypt are everywhere apparent in the sapiential texts of the time (see “The Instruction for King Meri-ka-Re” [ANET, 414-18]). This emphasis on royal and sapiential religious responsibilities continues through the New Kingdom well into the period of Egypt as a Hellenistic kingdom ruled by the Ptolemies (Perdue 1977, 19-64). Texts mentioning public religion in a favorable manner as an important part of sapiential participation include “The Instruction of Ani” (ANET, 420-21), in which the sage teaches his young son both the importance of giving prompt consideration to mortuary provisions in order to make the successful transition to the future life and the value of living the life of the “silent man,” whose character exudes dispassionate self-control, in contrast to the “heated man,” whose passions and garrulous behavior lead to disaster. These two contrasting human types participate in cultic activity, with blessing coming to the former and punishment to the latter for having disturbed the sanctity of the temple and the god. The young sage is admonished to offer sacrifices and to prostrate himself before the god, thereby pleasing his deity and avoiding divine wrath (see “The Instruction of Amen-em-Opet” [ANET, 421-24], a text that instructs a student in cultivating the character of a priestly scribe). In two classical texts from the Late Dynastic and Hellenistic periods, teachers also admonish their hearers to pay attention to cultic responsibilities to their gods (“The Instruction of ‘Onsheshonq” [Lichtheim 1980, 159-84]; “The Papyrus Insinger” [Lichtheim, 1983, 93-106]). Thus, corporate religion occurring with the temples of ancient religion was to be practiced by those preparing to become scribes and sages. The only major teaching that fell under criticism was the necessity of mortuary preparations believed in the Old Kingdom to be necessary for eternal life.

3.2. The Sages of Sumer, Assyria and Babylonia.

Although the affirmation of cosmic order was more transparent in Egypt, it was also the case that cosmic, social and anthropological compartments of order were significant to the teachings of the wise in these cultures. The myth of “Inanna and Enki: The Transfer of the Arts of Civilization from Eridu to Erech” lists on four occasions more than one hundred elements of creation, each of which has its own me, or law regulating its behavior (Kramer, 64-65). These laws originated at creation and continued to bind together and manage the compartments of nature, society and anthropology. In doing so, order and peace were achieved. Wisdom, a gift of the gods to humankind, enabled people both individually and corporately to exist in a relationship of harmony. However, although the high gods (e.g., Anu, Marduk, Assur, Sin) generally were viewed as just and beneficent (see “Advice to a Prince” [Lambert, 112-15]) and thus as maintaining social order, they also were thought to act capriciously and destructively on occasion. This inconsistency, so the Mesopotamians believed, led to periods of tranquility, on one hand, and chaos, on the other (see “The Babylonian Theodicy” [Lambert, 63-91]; “The Dialogue of Pessimism” [Lambert, 107-9]). Even so, the sages rarely advocated the abandonment of worship, in particular of one’s personal god, but rather continued to emphasize the importance of religious devotion, all the while hoping for salvation of nation or individual (see “I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom” [Lambert, 21-62]). Subsequently, although cultic observance within corporate religion was taught by the sages of Mesopotamia, there was the unsettling belief that the caprice of the gods could even annul faithful and loyal devotion and bring about the destruction of even the pious.

3.3. The Sages of Israel and Judah. Israel’s and Judah’s sages also affirmed the presence of cosmic and social order, which provided the basis for their teachings (Perdue 1990, 457-58). When it came to corporate worship, the traditional, more conservative sages admonish their students to observe religious requirements and to participate in public praise of God (sacrifice, prayer, the making of vows, the priestly casting of lots [Prov 3:9-10; 15:8, 29; 16:33; 17:1; 20:25; 21:3, 27; 28:9; 31:2]). Some of the references in these verses could imply private devotion, but the preponderance of the evidence points to corporate worship in most cases. In addition, students were to avoid dalliance with the “Strange Woman” (at times the *personification of *folly, at times Canaanite fertility religion, at times a foreigner [see Prov 7:1-27]). The sages were quick to demarcate the folly of worship brought by the wicked with evil intent and the wise worship of the righteous, whose lives were the basis for their participation in public religion and testimony to others who observed them in life. The narrative Job is also faithful to his cultic responsibilities and adulation of Yahweh, even in the face of great adversity (Job 1—2; 42:10-17). The poetic Job, however, questions the justice of God, who singles out even the righteous and faithful for destruction (Job 9—10). No doubt exists about the emphasis of Job’s opponents (Eliphaz, Zophar and Bildad) on faithful obedience to cultic requirements (see esp. Job 5). Indeed, they encourage their suffering friend to seek God in faithful worship, to acknowledge being sinful, and then to wait for forgiveness and restitution to health and well-being. Their assumption is that Job has engaged in some grievous transgression to merit such vile punishment from God. Job denies that he has sinned so egregiously that he should receive such horrible treatment from God. He demonstrates this in the oath of innocence (Job 29—31), when he engages in a judicial means of proving his innocence by means of sacred oath. Among the sins that he forgoes is that of cultic apostasy (Job 31:26-28). Finally, although Job is found innocent of wickedness and disloyalty to God in the concluding narrative and then is restored to his former prominence with the gift of new children, he is required to give a sin offering on behalf of his friends, who became his enemies in the course of the dialogues, in order for them to be forgiven for not “speaking correctly” about Yahweh (Job 42:8-10).

The other sapiential books, including Ecclesiastes, *Sirach and *Wisdom of Solomon, also give an important place to public worship. Although *Qohelet speaks of the transcendent God, who remains hidden to human understanding, he does not reject his worship by sages (Eccles 5:1-7). In issuing four admonitions to his students, he stresses the importance of guarded caution in the realm of the holy, the judicious practice of silence and the uttering of few words, a warning against making hasty vows that go unfulfilled, and the deceitful attempt to pass off a willful sin as an unconscious one. While pointing to the hidden and secretive qualities of God, the teacher still believes that cultic participation is an element of sagacious life. Wise decorum, including especially caution, however, should be practiced in corporate worship. Sirach is filled with emphases on the importance of corporate worship, sacrifices, the temple, festivals and support of the priesthood and singers (e.g., Sir 7:29-31; 39:5-6). Sirach’s two most important emphases are the association of *Woman Wisdom with the cult (Sir 24) and the praise of the high priest Simon (II?) in Sirach 50:1-26, which concludes the “Praise of the Pious” (Sir 46—51). Finally, Wisdom of Solomon, composed by a Jewish rhetorician of the first century AD, includes a lengthy “digression” (Wis 13—15) that praises the best of pagan religion, the teachings of philosophy and nature religion, condemns idolatry (the woodcutter, the sailor, the potter), criticizes Egyptian animal worship, and contrasts the faithfulness of Israel with the pagan opponents. The author also assaults the mystery religions, in particular the popular royal Alexandrian cult of Dionysus (disguised as the religion of the Canaanites) for their “detestable practices,” “sorcery,” “unholy rites,” merciless slaughter of children, and the “sacrificial feasting on human flesh and blood” (the last pointing to the Legend of Pentheus and the eating of Dionysus in worship). This text even engages in an assault of the divine status of Ptolemaic kings and the royal cult that worshiped them by contrasting them with *Solomon, the wisest and greatest of the kings, who nevertheless was mortal (Wis 7:1; 9:5). Finally, Wisdom becomes a divine hypostasis and appears to be contrasted to the popular goddess Isis.

3.4. Summary and Conclusions. When one surveys the classical sapiential literature of Israel and the ancient Near East, it is noteworthy to recognize that, save for a few scattered sayings incorporated in various types of texts, only one major piece of this literature completely rejects the value and meaning of cultic religion: “The Dialogue of Pessimism,” a Babylonian text from the period of the Cassite rule. Even this is not surprising, however, for this text leads to an emphatic denial of all meaning. If read as a dour or humorous satire, it still denies the possibility of finding the proper course of action that makes life worthwhile. The two dialogue partners in this text, a noble and his wise sage, finally realize that it is impossible to discover anything of value in human existence or to gain any security and sense of well-being in a world that is filled with chaos and domination by the client state’s Cassite lords. The contemplated recourse is suicide.

Thus, one necessarily concludes, on the basis of the sapiential traditions in Israel and the ancient Near East, that the sages not only engaged in teaching their students about various topics and practices of cultic religion but also instructed them to participate in its various dimensions of expression. One assumes from these teachings that the sages themselves participated in cultic religion, even though their own approach to life was at times distinctive from that of the priests. However, as one would expect, the traditional sages who supported the state and its rulers as “men and women of the king” in general agreed that the various rituals and teachings of cultic religion were unquestioningly valid and indeed important to observe. This does not mean that the critical traditions in wisdom in the domains of Israel and the ancient Near East refrained from taking to task some of the assumptions and theological understandings of cultic religion and the priests. But this is true of other traditions, including those of the more conventional wise and even, on occasion, the prophets and seers.

4. Motivations for Participation in Cultic Religion.

The traditional sages believed that there were numerous blessings that derived from the deity whose cult, rituals and teachings were honored and practiced. Some among these conservative teachers placed the results in the negative: divine punishment and misfortune in various forms, ranging from dishonor, to poverty, to poor health, to defeat and even death in war, awaited those communities and individuals who neglected their cultic responsibilities. Then too there was the motivation that touched upon the social conscience of the sages, for their gifts and offerings not only honored their deity but also provided for the deity’s priests and the community’s poor. Finally, it seems that the sages recognized within the human spirit the desire to praise and honor the divine being who presided over their community and at times, on a grander scale, nature, creation and human history.

5. Decorum within the Sphere of the Holy.

The sages instructed their students on how to behave within the sphere of the holy during sacred times. When offering their sacrifices, the students were taught to engage in self-examination in order to insure that they were righteous and were carefully following the guidance of their teachers. Only the worship of the wise, righteous participant in cultic religion was acceptable to the deity. The wicked and the foolish who dared to approach the realm of the holy were, according to the traditional sages, subject to punishment and even destruction for violating the sanctity of the cultic sphere and the righteous deity who was encountered there. Foolish and garrulous behavior placed the worshiper at threat of punishment and even death. And other dimensions of the cultic life—for example, the making of a vow before the deity—were serious matters to be undertaken and then completed. Even Qohelet, the more critically inclined sage, issued this warning (Eccles 5:1-7).

6. The Sages’ Criticism of Cultic Religion.

The critical sages pointed to what they considered to be unfounded claims of priests and cultic religion and even regarded this approach to life to be spurious and misleading. Several Sumerian satirical proverbs from the third millennium BC lampoon the pomposity of the Kalu priests, while Papyrus Insinger, of the Ptolemaic period (third century BC), warns the chief priest not to ignore his responsibility to engage in intercession on behalf of the worshipers, for this neglect would result in his death. Even Ben Sira gently nudges the priests with whom he served in the temple administration to fulfill their duties responsibly. Thus, sages kept priests under their watchful eye and were quick to point out their shortcomings. One proverb from Israel emphasizes that the decision obtained from the casting of lots (Urim and Thummim) came not from the magic of the chief priest but rather from God (Prov 16:33). Idolatry proved to be a topic for discussion among the sages of the ancient Near East. In Egypt both The Instruction for King Meri-ka-Re (twenty-second century BC) and The Instruction of Ani (1500 BC) wrestled with the difficulty of a transcendent deity who was also present in an idol. Idolatry was mentioned by the sages in Wisdom of Solomon, composed by a Jewish rhetorician likely in Alexandria during the first century BC. This Jewish sophist underscored his view that idolatry arose from the making of an image of a deceased son by a grief-stricken father and was a foolish type of ritual activity practiced by the foolish pagans to their loss (Wis 13–15). He adds that all types of wickedness accrue from this wicked practice, including adultery in lusting after nude and seminude idols of fair goddesses.

During periods of national crisis the sages often blamed the gods and the teaching of their priests. This is apparent in Egyptian wisdom from the strong criticism leveled at mortuary religion and the view that eternal life depended upon it (see “A Dispute over Suicide” [ANET, 405–7]). Elsewhere the creator, Re, along with the divine pharaoh, is blamed by the sage Ipuwer (eighteenth-seventeenth century BC) for the injustice that exists among humans that occasions *chaos, *suffering and death. The author of The Babylonian Theodicy, written during the Cassite dark ages in Babylonia (fifteenth-thirteenth century BC), likewise points the finger of responsibility to the failure of the patron deity of the sage to deliver him from suffering and death. The sufferer in this dialogue asks his friend-turned-opponent of what use is cultic observance offered to such a faithless god. In addition, the Babylonian lord in I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom (from the Cassite dark ages) comes close to abandoning his patron deity, Marduk, until at the end, when he expresses his faith that his faithful devotion will lead to salvation. From among the biblical wisdom texts, it is especially the character Job in the poetic book who holds God responsible for injustice and attacking to destroy even the righteous. Of course, during the period of the Ptolemaic rule of Judah in the third century BC, Qohelet levels a devastating criticism against cultic religion for assuming that its rituals will lead to redemption. For this sage, God has become a deus otiosus—a deity far removed from human knowing and often inactive but not completely. Thus he certainly is to be feared.

7. Did the Sages Compose Cultic Literature?

There is abundant evidence that there were both educated priests and scribes who were members of the temple staffs. They may even have attended the same primary schools that the sages attended. These cultic personnel composed a variety of texts to be used in the instruction of priestly novitiates and in setting forth the esoteric knowledge needed by priests in their ritual activities. This does not mean that the sages were the authors of cultic texts, including lists of omens and signs and ritual procedures, but there were priestly sages and the scribes they employed who were such authors.

In Israel and Judah it is apparent that the sages composed wisdom psalms for private prayers and public devotions in corporate worship. These psalms, bearing the language of instructions, sayings and reflections common to wisdom literature, often are combined with more traditional genres of psalms (*laments, *thanksgiving, *hymns), which spoke of and were used in the worship of God. These include the following: Psalms 1; 19A and 19B; 32; 34; 37; 49; 73; 111; 112; 119; 127. Psalms 1; 19B; 119 express the Torah piety common to traditional wisdom from the period of Ezra into the beginnings of rabbinic Judaism. Within the biblical and deuterocanonical wisdom corpus itself one finds similar psalms: Proverbs 3:19–20 speaks of the harvest, while Proverbs 8 contains three aretalogies of Woman Wisdom (Prov 8:2–11, 12–21, 22–31), which are then concluded by her dissemination of a paraenetic instruction inviting her “children” to follow her teachings in order to discover life and avoid death (Prov 8:32–36). In Sirach one finds numerous wisdom psalms: Sirach 1:1–10; 17:1–24; 18:1–14; 24:1–34; 39:12–35; 42:13–43:33. Ben Sira indicates that his students engaged in the singing of wisdom psalms, and that he himself composed some. Thus, in Sirach 39:15 he admonishes his students, “Ascribe majesty to his name and give thanks to him with praise, with songs on your lips, and with harps; this is what you shall say in thanksgiving." What follows this exhortation is a thanksgiving hymn to God concerning the goodness of creation and the affirmation of divine justice (Sir 39:16-34). He concludes this poem with a synonymous imperative: "So now sing praise with all your heart and voice, and bless the name of the Lord" (Sir 39:35).

Biblical wisdom psalms are similar to those found in the scrolls of the library of Qumran. These include 4Q411, a fragmentary sapiential hymn that praises Yahweh's act of creation; 4Q426; 4Q498, a fragment of which appears to be a wisdom hymn; 4Q528. Another creation hymn is 11QPs^a XXVI (cf. 11QPs^b; 11QPs^c; 11QPs^d; 11QPs^e).

Wisdom psalms are present also in the sapiential literature of ancient Egypt in the forms of hymns, aretalogies and panegyrics. Some of the better-known ones are In Praise of Learned Scribes; The Lament of Khakheperre-sonbe; The Hymn to Refound in the "Instruction of Ptahhotep; The Hymn to Imhotep. Lichtheim also includes in her translation five texts from the Ramesside period that she categorizes as "Prayers Used as School Texts." These include hymns and intercessory prayers.

Wisdom psalms are also present in the Sumero-Akkadian wisdom literature, including what Lambert calls "perceptive hymns." Among these are The Hymn to Shamash; The Blessing of Nisaba by Enki; A Bilingual Hymn to Ninurta. The Shamash hymn sings praise to the god of justice. The Nisaba blessing includes, in a section of the hymn in honor of Enki, a hymnic blessing of this goddess of wisdom as "the all-knowing sage of the gods." In the Ninurta hymn the worshiper sings praise to the deity and provides lists of evil actions of the wicked.

While on occasion the sages mentioned worship in their sayings (Prov 15:8, 29; 21:3, 7; 28:9), important attestations also occur in the instructions (Pss 32; 34; Prov 3:9-10), the dialogues of Job, the reflection on theodicy (Ps 73) and didactic poems (Prov 3:19-20).

See also CULT, WORSHIP: PSALMS; WISDOM THEOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. L. Crenshaw, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); J. Fichtner, Die altorientalische Weisheit in ihrer israelitisch-jüdischen Ausprägung (BZAW 62; Giessen: Töpelmann, 1933); S. N. Kramer, Sumerian Mythology: A Study of Spiritual and Literary Achievement in the Third Millennium B.C. (Harper: New York, 1961); W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1960); M. Lichtheim, Ancient Egyptian Literature: A Book of Readings, 1: The Old and Middle Kingdoms (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973); idem, Ancient Egyptian Literature: A Book of Readings, 2: The New Kingdom (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976); idem, Ancient Egyptian Literature: A Book of Readings, 3: The Late Period (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980); idem, Egyptian Wisdom Literature in the International Context: A Study of Demotic Instructions (OBO 52; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1983); W. McKane, Proverbs: A New Approach (OTL; Louisville: Westminster, 1970); L. G. Perdue, Wisdom and Cult: A Critical Analysis of the Views of Cult in the Wisdom Literatures of Israel and the Ancient Near East (SBLDS 30; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977); idem, "Cosmology and the Social Order," in The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. J. G. Gammie and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990) 457-78; idem, The Sword and the Stylus: An Invitation to Wisdom in the Age of Empires (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); J. Priest, "Humanism, Skepticism, and Pessimism in Israel," JAAR 36 (1968) 311-26; H. H. Schmid, Gerechtigkeit als Weltordnung: Hintergrund und Geschichte der alttestamentlichen Gerechtigkeitsbegriffe (BHT 40; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1968); idem, Altorientalische Welt in der alttestamentlichen Theologie (6th ed.; Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1974); G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972). L. G. Perdue

CURSES. See IMPRECATION.

D

DAVID

The Bible is a book about *God. Subsequently, the book of *Psalms communicates a very comprehensive and complex view of God. However, in the process of learning about God in the Psalms, we also discover a view of David, to whom a vast number of psalms has been attributed. The titles or superscriptions provided in the psalms help us understand their historical context and help identify some of their authors (see Psalms 5: Titles). One hundred and sixteen psalms have such superscriptions, while thirty-four have no title and thus can be classified as anonymous. Seventy-three of the psalms have lĕdāwīd in their superscription. While the preposition lāmed (ל) is most often translated “to” or “for,” it can also be translated “of,” and thus it can be used to denote authorship. Gesenius (GKC 419-20) affirms that “the introduction of the author, poet, etc., by this lamed auctoris is the customary idiom also in the other Semitic dialects, especially Arabic.” Conceptual parallels, linguistic and thematic analogies between the psalms, and the Samuel/Chronicles parallels make the claim of Davidic authorship most probable. Besides grammatical and linguistic evidence, external evidence from other biblical books points to some Davidic authorship of the psalms. Both Jesus and Peter attest to David’s authorship of some psalms (Mark 12:35-37; Luke 20:42; Acts 2:24-36). Furthermore, biblical material supports the fact that David was a prolific writer of sacred poetry. The psalms that bear his name sought to extol and thank God for who he is and what he does, and at the same time they give us a window on one whose soul struggles in an imperfect world. A true reconstruction of David’s life, however, must be dependent on the material about him in the historical books of 1-2 Samuel and 1 Kings. Even if one does not accept the Davidic authorship of the psalms attributed to him, a panoramic picture of David emerges from the psalms in their canonical form.

1. Yahweh According to David
2. David’s Confessions
3. David’s Trust
4. David’s Portrait

1. Yahweh According to David.

David’s view of God is comprehensive. God is revealed in David’s psalms as the creator and sustainer of the universe (Pss 8; 18; 19). He is good (Ps 25:8; 34:8; 145:9), righteous (Ps 7:11; 11:7; 19:9; 145:17), just (Ps 33:5; 37:28; 103:6; 140:12; 146:7), gracious (Ps 103:8; 145:8), faithful (Ps 31:5; 145:13), loving (Ps 25:10; 33:5; 52:8; 62:12; 86:5; 101:1; 103:8; 143:8) and compassionate (Ps 86:15; 103:8; 103:13; 145:8). For David, Yahweh is a personal God. David calls Yahweh “my God” twenty-two times (Ps 3:7; 7:1, 3; 13:3; 18:6, 28; 22:2; 25:2; 30:12; 31:14; 35:23, 24; 38:15, 21; 40:5, 8, 17; 42:6; 43:4; 59:1; 86:2, 12). The Lord is also “my rock” (Ps 18:2, 46; 28:1; 31:3; 42:9; 62:2, 6, 7; 144:1), “my shield” (Ps 3:3; 7:10; 18:2; 28:7; 144:2), “my fortress” (Ps 18:2; 31:3; 59:9, 17; 62:2, 6; 144:2), “my redeemer” (Ps 19:14) and the “God of my salvation” (Ps 18:46; 25:5; 27:9; 51:14). David epitomizes the person who knows that Yahweh is the one who hears and answers prayer. Twenty times David calls or cries out to the Lord (Ps 3:4; 4:1, 3; 17:6; 18:3, 6 [2x]; 22:2; 27:7; 28:1; 30:8; 31:17; 55:16; 56:9; 57:2; 61:2; 86:3, 7; 102:2; 141:1). But David does not pray to some deaf, motionless, distant God; rather, David is confident that Yahweh hears, answers and saves him (Ps 3:5; 4:3; 17:6; 18:3, 6; 55:16; 57:3; 86:7). For David, Yahweh is the sovereign king, who reigns over all creation, and he describes Yahweh’s *kingship in mythopoetic language. Yahweh is king, and his kingdom and kingship are superior to any political or mythological ruler. David describes Yahweh as “my king” (Ps 5:2; 44:4; 68:24; 145:1), the king who reigns forever (Ps 10:16; 29:10), the king of glory (Ps 24:7-10), the king over all the earth (Ps 47:2, 7), king over the nations (Ps 22:28; 47:8), the great king (Ps 48:2), king over Jacob (Ps 59:13) and king over all (Ps 103:19).

2. David's Confessions.

The psalms do not present David as one who can do no wrong, and they do not hide his shortcoming and sins. David is portrayed as being aware of his sins and his need to confess them. The psalmist often refers to “my sin” (Ps 32:5; 38:3, 18; 51:2, 3) and “my iniquity” (Ps 31:10; 32:5; 51:2) and acknowledges, “I have sinned” (Ps 41:4; 51:4), even when he has to confess to committing murder (Ps 51:14) (contra Goulder). The sins committed against God and his neighbors produce in David's heart a need for confession (Ps 32:5; 38:18), restoration (Ps 51:12; 60:1), healing (Ps 6:2; 41:4; 147:3) and forgiveness (Ps 25:18; 86:5; 103:3). David is confident in Yahweh's mercy and grace and knows that only God can repair their damaged relationship (Ps 23:6; 25:6; 28:2, 6; 30:8; 31:22; 40:11; 51:1; 55:1; 69:16; 86:6; 103:4; 140:6; 142:1; 143:1; 145:9). David realizes that character, not competence, is the main ingredient for a representative of Yahweh on the throne of Israel.

3. David's Trust.

The psalms portray David as one who experiences anguish at the hands of many foes. David's opponents are defined as enemies (Ps 3:7; 7:4; 9:3, 6; 13:2; 18:17; 25:2; 41:11; 42:9; 54:5; 61:3; 64:1; 143:3), and, showing the personal anguish that David experienced, the expression “my enemy/enemies” appears sixty times in the psalms that name David in their superscript. David's enemies also appear as adversaries (Ps 27:2, 12; 31:11; 42:10; 143:12) and evildoers (Ps 5:5; 6:8; 14:4; 28:3; 36:12, 53:4; 64:2; 101:8; 141:4, 9), and quite frequently David's rivals are described as wicked (Ps 3:7; 7:9; 11:2; 17:13; 36:11; 55:2; 101:8; 139:19; 141:10) (see Tate, 60-64). Their relentless and destructive actions against him cause him sorrow (Ps 13:2; 31:10), grief (Ps 6:7; 31:9) and tears (Ps 6:6; 39:12; 42:3; 56:8; 102:9). Many *laments are David's songs in times of sorrow. Despite the fact that his enemies are trying to destroy him (Ps 3:1; 56:2; 57:1; 59:1), mock him (Ps 41:6; 102:8), and lie about him (Ps 4:2; 144:8; 11), David trusts in Yahweh. The expression of trust is a key element in the structure of laments (see Longman), and David is portrayed as one who trusts in the Lord. The expression “I have trusted/trust/will trust” occurs eleven times (Ps 13:5; 25:2; 26:1; 31:6; 31:14; 52:8; 55:23; 56:3, 4, 11; 143:8). Besides conveying his trust in God, David expresses his trust in Yahweh's loyal love (Ps 18:50; 25:10; 33:5; 52:3, 8; 62:12; 86:5; 86:15; 101:1; 103:4, 8; 143:8; 145:8).

4. David's Portrait.

The psalms give us a fairly comprehensive image of David. The shepherd-turned-king emerges from the psalms as a spiritual leader who is in constant conversation with the Lord. Besides the verbs employed (qr', pll, z'q), the multitude of jussives employed point to David's intense prayer life (e.g., Ps 5:11; 7:7, 9; 9:19, 20; 10:2; 11:6; 14:7; 16:10; 17:2; 19:13, 14; 25:2, 20; 30:1; 31:1, 17, 18, 24; 32:6; 33:8, 22). David emerges from the psalms as a grateful man who gives thanks to Yahweh for his *protection and provision (Ps 7:17; 9:1; 26:7; 28:7; 30:12; 44:8; 54:6; 57:9; 69:30; 86:12; 108:3; 109:30; 138:1, 2) and exhorts others to join him in expressing gratitude (Ps 30:4; 33:2; 50:14; 100:4; 147:7). Furthermore, David praises God for who God is and what he has done and is doing in his life and in the life of the Israelites. The main verbs depicting David's praises are zmr (Ps 7:17 [7:18 MT]; 9:2 [9:3 MT]; 27:6; 57:7 [57:8 MT]; 59:17 [59:18 MT]; 61:8 [61:9 MT]; 101:1; 108:1 [108:2 MT]; 144:9; 146:2), hll (Ps 22:22 [22:23 MT]; 35:18; 56:4 [56:5 MT]; 69:30 [69:31 MT]; 109:30; 146:2) and ydh (Ps 18:49 [18:50 MT]; 30:12 [30:13 MT]; 35:18; 52:9 [52:11 MT]; 139:14). The imperative halēlū (“praise”) appears fifty times in the three separate Hallel collections, the Egyptian Hallel (Pss 113—118), the Great Hallel (Pss 120—136) and the Concluding Hallel (Pss 146—150) (see Mowinckel). Twenty-eight times halēlū occurs in the Concluding Hallel, which is attributed to David. Even though David was a great military leader and groundbreaking king, the psalms portray him as a humble man who concerns himself with the interests of the poor. Even though some scholars describe David as a person whom one might want to invite to dinner (see Halpern) or as one who is “wild and greedy in his relationship with women” (Valler, 130), he describes himself as “poor and needy” (Ps 40:17; 86:1; 109:22) and recognizes that the Lord is the one who lifts up the humble (Ps 147:6) and gives them salvation (Ps 149:4). David’s humility can be deduced also from his portrayal of himself as a servant (Ps 19:11, 13; 31:16; 35:27; 86:2, 4, 16; 143:2, 12; 144:10). Even though David makes statements such as “How long, O LORD? Will you forget me forever?” (Ps 13:1), the psalms portray David as one who patiently waits for Yahweh’s answer and deliverance (Ps 25:5, 21; 27:14; 37:7; 38:15; 39:7; 40:1). But David is also portrayed as very human indeed. When in deep anguish and pain, he invokes curses and judgment on his enemies (Pss 35; 58; 59; 69; 139) (see Retribution). David certainly was powerful and talented, but he was not sinless, and he is not meant to be a portrait of morality for us, but rather a mirror for identity.

See also SOLOMON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. S. Childs, “Psalm Titles and Midrashic Exegesis,” JSS 16 (1971) 137-50; C. Feinberg, “The Date of the Psalms,” BSac 104 (1947) 426-40; M. Goulder, The Prayers of David (JSOTSup 102; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1990); C. Gulston, David: Shepherd & King (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1980); D. M. Gunn, The Story of King David: Genre and Interpretation (JSOTSup 6; Sheffield: Sheffield University Press, 1978); B. Halpern, David’s Secret Demons: Messiah, Murderer, Traitor, King (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); D. M. Howard, “David,” ABD 2.41-49; T. Longman III, How to Read the Psalms (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1988); K. P. McCarter, “The Historical David,” Int 40 (1986) 117-29; S. L. McKenzie, King David: A Biography (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000); S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel’s Worship (Nashville: Abingdon, 1962); Y. Natan, The Jewish Trinity (Chula Vista, CA: Aventine, 2003); M. Reiss, “Strife in the Household of Kind David,” JBQ 28 (2000) 227-32; P. E. Satterthwaite, “David,” DOTHB 198-206; E. Slomovic, “Toward an Understanding of the Formation of Historical Titles in the Book of Psalms,” ZAW 91 (1979) 350-81; E. B. Smick, “Mythopoetic Language in the Psalms,” WTJ 44 (1982) 88-98; M. Tate, Psalms 51-100 (WBC 20; Dallas: Word, 1990); M. Travers, Encountering God in the Psalms (Grand Rapids: Kregel, 2003); S. Valler, “King David and ‘His’ Women: Biblical Stories and Talmudic Discussions,” in A Feminist Companion to Samuel and Kings, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 5; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994) 129-42.

T. Rata

DEAD SEA SCROLLS

The contribution of the ancient manuscripts found in the vicinity of Khirbet Qumran to the understanding of *Psalms has been a keen focus of study over the past decade and has now reached the stage where the evidence can be summarized with a good measure of clarity. The same cannot be said of the biblical wisdom books, for which the evidence is much more limited and fragmentary and the secondary literature more sparse.

This scarcity needs to be placed in perspective. Of the nine hundred or so manuscripts represented among the DSS, nearly one-third (about 220) are biblical texts. Of the remaining two-thirds, the overwhelming majority are related to the Bible in some manner, as commentary, “rewritten Bible,” or development upon biblical topics. It is no overstatement to describe the worldview of the people who wrote, copied, and preserved the manuscripts of the caves as Bible-centered.

That said, the nature of that “Bible” was very different from that of the later canonical listings either of Christian or Jewish Scriptures (see Canon). Of the books that become the Hebrew Bible and the Christian OT, priority clearly was given to the Pentateuch—89 of the 220 manuscripts. Beyond this, only two further books of the Bible figure as prominently: Isaiah (21 copies) and Psalms (36 copies [the largest share of all biblical manuscripts]). The “Bible-within-the-Bible” of Qumran can be said to consist of Genesis (20 copies), Deuteronomy (30), Isaiah (21) and Psalms (36). The centrality of these works is emphasized by the recognition that Deuteronomy, Isaiah and Psalms are the books quoted or alluded to most frequently in the rest of the Qumran literature.

The significance of this summary will be seen in this article. On the one hand, the largest section below addresses the psalms and the impact that the DSS of the psalms have for our understanding of their place in the history of the Bible and interpretation. On the other hand, the fact that biblical *wisdom is represented by at most four manuscript copies of any one book means less space is needed to describe them. This imbalance between Torah and the rest of the Bible may be partly due to the accident of preservation; it could be that there were more of some of these books but they were subject to more serious deterioration and destruction. The more likely reason, however, appears to relate to the stage of development in the “canon” during the period of the creation of these manuscripts.

1. The Psalms
2. Biblical Wisdom at Qumran
3. The Rest of the Writings

1. The Psalms.

The evidence of the DSS regarding the psalms touches on a wide variety of topics relating to biblical studies. The significant number of manuscripts and the plurality of texts represented provide important data for *textual criticism and the history of the biblical text for OT studies. The differing order of the psalms in relation to the MT, inclusion of otherwise unknown psalms, and whole manuscripts of noncanonical psalms offer insight into the development of the corpus during the late Second Temple period. The presence of “commentaries” on some of the psalms further adds to our understanding of the interpretation of the psalms in this period and thus, in view of the high degree of citation of psalms in the NT, for NT studies.

1.1. Manuscripts. The manuscript evidence regarding the psalms may be presented in a variety of ways. The first is to count the scrolls. By P. W. Flint’s (1997a, 257-64) count, there are thirty-nine psalms scrolls from locations along the Dead Sea: thirty-six from the eleven Qumran caves, one from Nahal Hever, two from Masada.

The second is to place these numbers in context. We have already noted that the Qumran psalms scrolls represent the largest number of manuscripts of any single biblical book at Qumran. They also come from the widest variety of locations, with copies found in Caves 1, 4, 5, 6, 8 and 11. Two of the Cave 11 manuscripts are among those containing the largest extent of surviving text. Besides these manuscripts containing only psalms, there are seven other texts that include significant citations of the psalms. Together, these psalms scrolls represent nearly twenty percent of biblical manuscripts found.

That said, we need to be cautious with regard to the extent of the original content of these manuscripts. Many of them are too fragmentary to allow any speculation about how many psalms were in the complete scroll. For example, 4QPs^j consists of some twenty (MT) verses in eight fragments from Psalms 48, 49 and 51; 4QPs^k contains a fragmentary column of Psalm 135 and another of Psalm 99 (in that apparent order); 4QPsⁿ consists of one fragment of a portion of Psalm 42:5. Altogether, nineteen of the manuscripts are similarly minute, and no conclusions can be drawn as to whether each of these represents the existence of a complete psalms scroll. In light of this count, the evidence for evaluating collections of psalms is limited to no more than twenty manuscripts.

1.2. Collections. There is no scroll that contains all of the biblical psalms, nor are all the biblical psalms extant (only 126). In fact, it appears that none of the manuscripts would ever have contained them all. One reason is that such a scroll would have been very large and unwieldy. Flint points out that 11QPs^a, containing forty-nine psalms, is 5 meters long; a full 150 psalms would mean a scroll 15 meters in length. In comparison, 1QIsa^a measures just over 7 meters, and 11QT^a just over 8 meters. It is unlikely any manuscript was ever that long.

Of the longer manuscripts, most appear to have contained psalms only from Psalms 1—89 MT, while others only from beyond Psalm 90. This has given birth to the theory that a corpus of *David psalms reached essentially their canonical shaping prior to this period, with the rest of the Psalter still in process of growth.

This can be highlighted by considering the manuscripts that overlap this division. 1QPs^a, for example, consists of twenty-two fragments containing portions of Psalms 86; 92; 94; 95—96; 119. Little speculation is possible about how extensive this manuscript may have been. Yet, that these fragments come from psalms relatively close to each other makes it conceivable that they represent what is left of the end of a manuscript that concluded with Psalm 119.

In another example, 4QPs^e contains portions between Psalms 76 and Psalm 130, but without Psalm 119. Psalm 118 is followed immediately by Psalm 104, Psalm 105, then Psalm 120. On the other hand, 11QPs^b, beginning with Psalms 77—78, includes Psalm 119 followed by Psalm 118. What has not commonly been observed of both of these is that although they contain psalms earlier (i.e., in MT numbering) than Psalm 89, none is earlier than Psalm 72, which in the MT contains the note “The prayers of David son of Jesse are ended.” Thus, these may represent collections reflecting development beyond the fixed Psalms 1–72.

One manuscript includes a later psalm within a collection of earlier psalms. 11QPs^d contains fragments from Psalm 6 to Psalm 86 (though not in the MT order), with Psalms 81; 86; 115–116 situated between portions of Psalm 78. Again, there is no way of knowing the original extent of this manuscript. However, if the order of fragments is correctly discerned, the insertion into the account of Israel’s faithlessness in Psalm 78 with psalms of supplication and *thanksgiving gives this manuscript an exegetical or liturgical slant that is not seen in other manuscripts. This leaves the question of whether this is a collection of psalms or an exegetical text.

The six fragments of 1QPs^b include portions of Psalms 126–128, raising the possibility that this manuscript may have contained only the Songs of Ascent. If so, this would mean that we now have manuscript evidence for these as a separate unit prior to inclusion in the larger corpus of the Psalter. However, the point cannot be pressed too far on the basis of such (literally) scant evidence.

The ground is even less stable for pondering what to make of the absence of some psalms from collections. 4QPs^b contains text of Psalms 91–118 and apparently ended with Psalm 118. In this manuscript Psalm 103 is found at the end of one column, and the next column starts with Psalm 112. The implication may be that the missing psalms, Psalm 104–111, once formed an independent unit. Again, this is an attractive idea for the light that it may shed on the formation of smaller collections, as well as for the question as to why, if these were an existing collection, the MT split them into Book IV and Book V of its Psalter. But these remain speculative questions.

1.3. Excerpted Texts. Whereas some psalms manuscripts were large collections (“Psalters”), others clearly contained only a selection of psalms. We have noted that large scrolls, up to 15 meters in length, would be unlikely as well as cumbersome for either study or quick reference. Undoubtedly, some scrolls were created for more ready access. We speculated above on a possible exegetical purpose for one text, but there are other potential purposes for such scrolls. One suggestion is that some psalms are

“excerpted” from a larger collection for particular purposes (Tov 1995a).

Psalm 119 seems to have held a place of importance among the psalms at Qumran. Two manuscripts are likely to have consisted of only this one psalm in a handy “pocket version.” The manuscript 4QPs^g is only 8.4 centimeters high, with no more than eight lines per column; the whole would have been twenty-five columns long. The text is written out in poetic form (stichometrically), with four lines per stanza. 4QPs^h is taller but shorter, with twenty-one lines per column, extended to nine columns.

It is not difficult to imagine the reason for multiple copies of this psalm existing in a community that lived to contemplate and keep Torah, and that was called to a “perfect walk” (1QS I, 7-9: “in order to welcome into the covenant of kindness all those who freely volunteer to carry out God’s decrees; in order to be united in the counsel of God and walk in perfection in his sight, complying with all revealed things” [cf. Ps 119:1]).

Psalm 104 is another that receives this sort of treatment. 4QPsⁱ is a single fragment that clearly is a small scroll. The text is presented in stichometric lines little more than 4 centimeters long, which would make for six columns of text, or a handy 35-40 centimeters of leather (Skehan, Ulrich and Flint, 128).

There are other features unique to Psalm 104. In three of the five scrolls that include this psalm the text differs in form from the biblical text. This too seems to have important exegetical significance at Qumran. Additionally, this psalm of thanksgiving begins, “Bless, O my soul, the LORD,” the inspiration for another text found at Qumran, Barki Napshi, of which five copies survive (4QBarki Napshi^{a-c}). This does not appear to be a sectarian text; that is, it does not originate with the Qumran community, but it is considered to be a core sectarian text. The Thanksgiving Hymns, or Hodayot (1QH^d), also show affinity to Psalm 104. These factors point to a common strain of development from this psalm.

A third excerpt of interest, 4QPs⁸⁹, contains Psalm 89. Interpretation of this manuscript is an illustration of the indistinct territory between what is a “biblical” text and what is “something-else-but-not-quite-biblical” among the DSS. At its first publication this manuscript was described as a source for the canonical Psalter version (Mi-lik 1966, 94). However, P. W. Skehan (1981, 439) argued that this manuscript was based on the canonical psalm, and J. P. M. van der Ploeg (475) viewed it as similar to early Christian testimonia, or collections of messianic prooftexts, rather than a psalm. The DJD editors have placed it among the biblical psalms manuscripts.

The ambiguity arises from the arrangement of the psalm with a different order to the verses (20-22, 26, 23, 27-28, 31) and possible Aramaic influences. If it is the canonical psalm, it is a different version. The difficulty in deciding how this relates to the canonical Psalm 89 is further complicated by the early date given to this manuscript—dated on palaeography by J. Milik (1966, 95) as having been copied in the period 175-125 BC, making it one of the oldest psalms scrolls. The conclusion that we might draw from the evidence is that on the one hand, Psalm 89 appears to be a firm part of the Davidic collection by this time, and on the other hand, the existence of this version indicates that the text itself was still fluid at least in the second century BC (see Dahmen).

That each of these examples might be viewed as having been excerpted from a collection for reasons of theological importance has implications for our understanding of the role of the psalms in the Second Temple period and in their subsequent canonical shape—the various ways a single psalm is presented may differ from setting to setting, with a different theological function. Interpretation of a psalm cannot be divorced from the purpose of its setting (Brooke, 8).

1.4. “Noncanonical” Psalms. Thus far we have looked at psalms only in comparison to their canonical, “biblical” counterparts. One of the significant aspects of the Qumran psalms scrolls is the inclusion of “noncanonical,” or “apocryphal,” psalms in a significant number of manuscripts.

The so-called apocryphal psalms are those previously known from Psalters besides the MT. The LXX includes Psalm 151, with a superscription that clarifies it is as supernumerary to the proper Psalm 150, although it is affirmed as having been written by David himself. This psalm and four others also appear in Syriac manuscripts (Sanders 1965, 53). The Syriac translation of the Scriptures is a Christian version, clearly later in provenance than the LXX version, and thus has been regarded as a late witness to the psalms tradition. As such, the psalms that are extra to the MT have been regarded as of later composition. Now, all of these appear in the most complete Qumran psalms scroll, 11QPs^a. This factor has forced a reevaluation of their pedigree, so that now the Syriac psalms are seen to be a faithful reflection of the Psalter extant in Palestine at the turn of the era. These apocryphal psalms must be seen as authentically authoritative texts for a significant portion of Second Temple Judaism and early Christianity prior to the fixing of the corpus at some point late in the process of canonization.

The Cave 11 Psalter includes two other previously known compositions, Sirach 51 and the “Last Words of David” from 2 Samuel 23. This scroll begins with MT Psalm 101 and ends with LXX/Syriac Psalm 151, within twenty-eight extant columns. The psalms do not follow the MT order, and they include Psalm 93. The chief divergence is seen following Psalm 145 in column 17: Psalm 154 (Syriac equivalent) “Prayer for Deliverance” Psalm 139:8-24 Psalm 137:1 Psalm 138:1-8 Sirach 51 (vv. 13-20, 30) “Apostrophe to Zion.” The final two columns begin with the “Last Words of David,” followed by a prose epilogue called “David’s Compositions,” then Psalm 140:1-5 Psalm 134:1-3 Psalm 151.

Besides the “Prayer for Deliverance” and the “Apostrophe to Zion,” the Qumran scrolls also include hitherto unknown compositions. 11QPs^a contains four of the six or seven unique psalms. Two appear here only: the “Hymn to the Creator” and “David’s Compositions.” The latter serves as the epilogue to this Psalter, to give the total of David’s psalms as 4,050. This is broken down into 3,600 psalms, plus other types of songs besides those set for the whole of the liturgical calendar. The purpose of this seems to be to plant the seal of David’s authority firmly over all the compositions and thus serves to determine the context for interpreting them.

Two other new psalms, “Apostrophe to Zion” and “Plea for Deliverance,” are shared with 11QPs^b, and the latter with 4QPs^f. 4QPs^f in turn contains a further two new psalms, one entitled “Eschatological Hymn,” and the other “Apostrophe to Judah.”

The observation to note here is that new psalms stand alongside texts common to other Psalters, and thus they must be considered of the same importance or validity. They stand as evidence of the breadth of possibilities still open for collections beyond that known in the Masoretic tradition at the time of publication of these texts.

There is another set of manuscripts that need to be taken into consideration but are not normally considered to be “biblical” scrolls. These contain psalms without the inclusion of any material known from the MT or the LXX but are clearly “psalmlike.” 4Q380 is a fragmentary collection of compositions: a “Zion Psalm,” laments and wisdom psalms (see Schuller, 77). The one complete title reads “Prayer of Obadiah”—whether referring to the prophet or to another person of that name is unclear. 4Q381, similarly, includes ascriptions to “Manasseh,” “the man of God” and a “king of Judah” whose name is lost in a lacuna. G. J. Brooke (12) argues that these texts must be included in any theory of the development of the Psalter, not only at Qumran but also in pre-Qumran. This is a valid point that must not be quickly dismissed. It is the nature of scholarship’s MT orientation when discussing the psalms that the evidence of manuscripts outside the canonical Psalter is easily disregarded as irrelevant. The implication of the presence of noncanonical psalms within manuscripts containing “canonical” psalms for Psalms studies is that the place of noncanonical psalms scrolls such as 4Q380 and 4Q381 must be recognized too. In a period when the collection was not yet fixed, the possibilities for inclusion are broader than has been commonly considered.

1.5. The Growth and Editing of the Psalter.

1.5.1. Growth of the Psalter(s). 11QPs^a, containing some forty-nine psalms, beginning with the canonical Psalm 101, is dated to the middle of the first century AD. The existence of a version so different from the canonical Psalter, and so late in the Second Temple period, has opened a window on the process of the formation of the Psalter.

The official editor of this scroll, J. A. Sanders (1966), argued that this represented a genuine Psalter, establishing that the “canon” of the psalms was not closed at this time. In his view, the process of fixing the text was already virtually complete for Psalms 1–100, but the rest were still capable of rearrangement. S. Talmon (1966) took issue with this thesis, rejecting the idea that these could be considered biblical psalms, because of the inclusion of the prose “David’s Compositions.” He contended instead that they are intended for liturgical and homiletical purposes. The liturgical argument was picked up by P. W. Skehan (1978, 169), who further argued that the Cave 11 collection is based on knowledge of the canonical 150 psalms. The fact that eight noncanonical psalms appear among the last eleven canonical psalms indicated for him their late insertion into a fixed order.

These arguments are based on the premise that the MT 150-psalm Psalter was already settled by the time of the translation of the LXX, presumed to have been complete by the second century BC (see Beckwith, 6). On this basis, a much later manuscript such as 11QPs^a must be seen as a derivative text without canonical pretensions. This could be argued as long as 11QPs^a was viewed as a one-off text. But the publication of the rest of the Qumran biblical manuscripts, with their evidence of the pluriformity of biblical texts into the first century AD, and particularly the psalms scrolls from Cave 4, has changed the landscape.

P. W. Flint (1997a), who completed the editing of the psalms scrolls begun by P. W. Skehan and E. Ulrich, has put forward the most comprehensive proposal for the relation of the various Psalters and psalms collections to each other. His thesis is that there were three literary Psalter editions: the first consists of Psalms 1/2–89; the second consists of the first edition plus the 11QPs^a Psalter; the third is the MT Psalter. In other words, the Psalters took form in two parts. First, Psalms 1–89 (the first three books of the MT Psalter) were an established collection at an early date, based on Davidic authorship, most certainly preceding the formation of the Qumran community. Second, the psalms collections continued to develop gradually over the course of one or two centuries, with great flexibility in contents and order of material. We have manuscript evidence of at least three Psalters existing simultaneously in late Second Temple Judaism: an MT type, a Cave 11 type and the LXX type. It is not unreasonable to consider that there could be even more options found within the Qumran scrolls, undetectable, however, due to their fragmentary nature.

Flint’s thesis continues by arguing that the Cave 11 Psalter was composed in relation to the solar calendar in use by the Qumran community, among others, representing a 52-piece collection with strong Davidic emphasis. The establishment of organizing principles such as this tends to confirm the nature of the collection as a Psalter, especially when the Psalters are compared as G. Wilson (1997, 463-64) has done. Wilson looks at the shaping of both the MT and the Cave 11 scroll as a whole and sees the Qumran scroll focusing on the need for divine deliverance for Jerusalem. The hope for this deliverance is found in David. The Davidic *messiah's role is prominent, forming the final vision and hope of the Psalter. In contrast, the MT Psalter concludes with the focus on the kingship of Yahweh, with the yhwh mālāk psalms (missing from 11QPs^a) and the closing doxology on his creative power (Pss 145–150). David's role is diminished. The LXX version of Book V, which differs from the MT largely in the addition of more superscriptions of authorship to David plus the added Psalm 151, seems to Wilson to hold a mediating place between the two Psalters.

Looking at the Psalters in this way sheds helpful light on the editorial intentions to be found in the received canonical Psalter. The move away from messianic expectation parallels the downplaying of that element of Judaism following the disaster of the Jewish Revolt, in contrast to the heightened messianism of the pre-Revolt Cave 11 Psalter. When viewed in this way, the MT Psalter increasingly appears to be the latest to be finalized, although it is this Psalter that has the final word.

1.5.2 Editing the Psalter. The questions relating to the nature of the Psalter(s) in the DSS have provoked an awareness and appreciation of editorial purpose in the placing of individual songs and smaller collections in relation to each other. In this respect too, G. Wilson (1985) has helped by drawing attention back to the superscriptions and book divisions of the MT. Psalm 1 provides the clue to how to read the Psalter: it is to be meditated on day and night, as Torah. The Psalter may then be read chronologically, from David himself (Books I-II), to the loss of the kingdom (Book III), exile (Book IV) and expectation of the coming rule of God (Book V). These insights into the shaping of the Psalter are most valuable not for understanding individual psalms on their own but rather for seeing psalms in relation to each other. Ultimately, the insight gained into the purposes of the editor(s) gives insight into the late first century AD, when this Psalter reached its final form. As such, the study of the MT Psalter places us in the very midst of the NT world!

1.6. Conclusion. The Qumran scrolls grant us a view of the psalms that the finished Psalters of the MT and the LXX, being complete and fixed, cannot do. They show us the very process of creation in midpoint of development. We see something of the dynamic that the individual compositions display in their changing relations to each other prior to being cast in the permanency of immovable print. This was a living corpus during the very time that the NT and early Christianity itself were developing. Perhaps some of that dynamic can be seen to continue even beyond the finalization of the canon.

2. Biblical Wisdom at Qumran.

As we noted in the introduction, the evidence for the biblical wisdom books at Qumran is sparse. There are manuscripts of *Job, *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes and also *Song of Songs (see 3.1 below) among the DSS, but these are among the most fragmentary and least copied at Qumran. None of these appear in more than four copies, and apart from Cave 4, they appear only in the minor cave finds of the Qumran vicinity.

It is not the case that there is no Wisdom literature among the DSS. To the contrary, there is a large corpus of wisdom material preserved in the cave finds, but most of it shows clear development away from the rational, observation-based approach of biblical wisdom toward a wisdom that is based on revelation, particularly a revelation of the raz nihyeh, or “mystery that is to be/come.” This enigmatic but frequently repeated phrase may be a development of “mystery” as found in the book of Daniel (Harrington, EDSS 1.589), an indicator of the eschatological, if not apocalyptic, interests of Qumran wisdom that are in keeping with the preoccupation with the last days found in other genres of literature found among the DSS (see Wisdom and Apocalyptic). This development may explain the relative scarcity of biblical wisdom books at Qumran. These new wisdom texts are beyond the scope of this article, and the evidence of the biblical texts can be summarized in relatively brief fashion.

2.1. Job. The evidence for the book of Job is of two types: *Hebrew and Aramaic, or *Targum Job, manuscripts.

2.1.1. The Hebrew Fragments. There are four manuscripts of Job. 2QJob consists of one fragment, dated palaeographically to the Herodian era (c. 50 BC to AD 50), containing portions of five words. These have been confidently identified as coming from Job 33:28-30.

4QJob^a is dated to the Hasmonean era (c. 100-50 BC). 4QJob^a is the most extensive of the Job manuscripts, with twenty-six fragments. These preserve text from Job 31:14-19; 32:3-4; 33:10-11, 24-26, 28-30; 35:16; 36:7-11, 13-17, 32-33; 37:1-5, 14-15. Unfortunately, the portion of Job 33:28-30 preserved in this text does not overlap with the Cave 2 fragment. Two fragments (7 I-II; 16 I-II) contain column margins that allow the editors to deduce that there would have been sixteen lines per column, with each column an estimated 10 centimeters high.

4QJob^b consists of six fragments, containing Job 8:15-17; 9:27; 13:4; 14:4-6; 31:20-21. The editors date it a little later than 4QJob^a, perhaps to the middle or latter part of the first century BC.

4Qpaleo-Job^c is considered to be the oldest of the Job manuscripts. The fragments contain portions of Job 13:18-20, 23-27; 14:13-18. They are written in the paleo-Hebrew script (sometimes called Phoenician or proto-Hebrew script), one of a small number of biblical manuscripts written this way. These tend also to be among the oldest manuscripts; this one dates somewhere between 225 BC and 150 BC. This date means that this was copied prior to the formation of the Qumran community that preserved it, and therefore it was brought to Qumran from elsewhere. Other than Job, almost all of the manuscripts in this script are Torah scrolls. This would seem to indicate the priority given to the Torah from early days, and the inclusion of Job in the number suggests to some that traditional ascription of Mosaic authorship for Job may be the reason (Newsom, 412).

In spite of the fragmentary nature of the manuscripts of Job at Qumran, they provide some important insights into the status of the biblical text of this time. First, two of the Cave 4 texts were written in stichometric, or "poetic," format. Second, whereas the Cave 2 fragment can tell us little about its relation to the MT, 4QJob^a diverges in several places in terms of orthography and grammatical forms and textual variants, while 4QJob^b shows no textual variants. 4Qpaleo-Job^c has only a couple minor variants. The divergences are of minor significance but are evidence of the "fluid" nature of the biblical text in the centuries prior to the Jewish Revolt. The scribal practice in spelling shows further interesting variety. 4Qpaleo-Job^c reverts to plene spellings (the use of the consonants as vowel signs) less even than does the MT, in comparison to the tendency of the later manuscripts toward fuller spellings. Third, 2QJob, 4QJob^a and 4QJob^b contain text from the Elihu speech (Job 32—37); if this portion was a later addition to Job, as some commentators have hypothesized, then the editorial work was done by the first century BC.

2.1.2. The Targum of Job. There are two manuscripts of a Targum of Job among the DSS.

4QtgJob consists of only two fragments, one of which is too small to determine its identity. The other contains text from two separate columns, from Job 3:5-6; 4:7—5:4. Milik (1977) dated this to the second century BC, but A. S. van der Woude places it in the middle of the first century BC. The text is virtually identical to the Hebrew of Job.

11QtgJob, on the other hand, preserves about fifteen percent of the text of Job, some ten columns from the end of the book of Job (Job 37:10—42:11). Van der Woude follows M. Sokoloff in suggesting a date for composition of the Targum in the late second century BC, considering the Aramaic to be somewhere between biblical Aramaic and 1QapGen ar. He dates the copy of the manuscript to the early first century AD on the basis of the Herodian script of the *scribe. As to the Aramaic, U. Glessmer (917) follows J. A. Fitzmyer's designation of the Targum of Job, together with the 1QapGen ar and the Targumim Onqelos and Jonathan, as "Middle Aramaic" (200 BC to AD 200). Whatever the dating, this manuscript remains the oldest extant Targum and therefore provides valuable insight into the development of the *Targumim and of the Aramaic language.

As to the translation of Job, it is generally agreed that the underlying Hebrew text is essentially that found in the MT. However, there are a number of places where the translation diverges notably from the Hebrew text, and these are of exegetical interest. Van der Woude perceives a tendency toward rationalism at Job 38:7, where the morning stars shine, rather than sing, together; and embarrassment for Job is avoided by omitting his prayer in Job 31:10 that other men "kneel over" his wife.

Perhaps the most significantly noticeable divergence is found at the end of the book of Job. First, Job does not repent and despise himself but rather maintains his innocence to the very end. Second, God explicitly forgives the sins of Job's friends at his prayer. Third, the text of the Targum ends with Job 42:11, apparently omitting the account of the extravagant restoration of Job's fortune and family. This may be in keeping with the conservatism of the translator found elsewhere, by leaving out mention of the daughters' names.

It is in this history of interpretation of Job, perhaps, that 11QtgJob is of most value.

2.2. Proverbs. Two manuscripts of Proverbs are represented by fragments. 4QProv^a consists of two adjoining fragments, and 4QProv^b of seven fragments containing portions of Proverbs 13–15.

4QProv^a includes the right-hand and bottom margins with the text of Proverbs 1:17–2:1. With this information the editors are able to deduce a column of thirty-six lines at about 27 cm in height. The scribal hand is described as transitional Herodian, from 50 BC to early first century AD, and the text is arranged poetically. The text is the same as the MT, as opposed to the LXX, with only one variant: mošēbēt ("cord") appears for the MT's mēsūbat ("backsliding") at Proverbs 1:32, rendering the "cords of the simple" in place of "backsliding of the simple." The editors (Skehan and Ulrich) compare this to the "cords of Orion" in Job 38:31. This seems most likely to be a kāp/bēt confusion.

4QProv^b contains Proverbs 13:6-9; 14:5-10, 12-13, 31-35; 15:1-8, 19-31. It is possible that one fragment preserves portions of two words from Proverbs 7:9-11, but this remains open to question. The scribal hand is of a similar dating and script to 4QProv^a, but the poetic arrangement differs both in line division and in consistency. The editors consider it to be copied by an inexperienced scribe. There are two variants that draw attention: the hāsēr at Proverbs 14:34 agrees with the LXX and the Syriac against the MT's hesed; at Proverbs 15:28 the manuscript omits yehgeh ("meditates"). Neither variant is of exegetical interest.

2.3. Ecclesiastes. Two manuscripts of Ecclesiastes were found in Cave 4. 4QQoh^a is among the oldest of the scrolls, dated paleographically to between 175 BC and 150 BC. The dating is of significance for two reasons. First, it places the origins of the manuscript prior to the Qumran community, having been brought there from somewhere else (the archaeology of Qumran is placed no earlier than 150 BC, and possibly as late as 100 BC). Second, it drives the date of composition of this book back at least to the third century BC. This rules out of contention any theory of the Herodian or even Hasmonean period for the origin of the book. Further, the fact that there are only minor differences from the MT of Ecclesiastes, including the order of the sections and verses, dismisses theories of multiple editions or a confusion of manuscript leaves (see Jarick, 178).

4QQoh^a is in six fragments, containing Ecclesiastes 5:13-17; 6:1(?), 3-8, 12; 7:1-10, 19-20. The most interesting feature is a space for 15-20 letters between Ecclesiastes 7:6 and Ecclesiastes 7:7. This seems to support previous theories calling for an emendation at this point, such as Proverbs 16:8 (see BHS margin).

4QQoh^b is dated quite generally to the Herodian era, the second half of the first century BC or early first century AD. There are only two fragments, with text from Ecclesiastes 1:10-14.

The fact that the book of Ecclesiastes is not cited anywhere else in Qumran literature raises the question of the importance of this book for the community that preserved these two scrolls. Clearly, the book was being read, but we have no way of knowing to what extent it was used.

3. The Rest of the Writings.

When we turn to look at the remainder of the manuscript evidence in the Ketubim, or Writings, it raises more questions about what is absent than what is present. On the one hand, there are more manuscripts among the scrolls representing *Ruth and *Lamentations than Ecclesiastes or Proverbs. On the other hand, *Esther seems to be wholly absent, and the existence of Ezra through Chronicles (MT order) is a matter of debate. Add to this extremely fragmentary physical evidence the fact that there is no use of or allusion to Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, or Ruth in the rest of the Qumran corpus, and we have a snapshot of the relative authoritative status of the third category of the Hebrew Bible: it is truly the "miscellaneous" section of the canon, which is still undefined at the time of the copying of the DSS. That is, at the end of the first century BC and the beginning of the first century AD the status of these books is ambiguous as far as the scriptural authority that later becomes canonical is concerned.

3.1. Song of Songs. Song of Songs is sometimes included in the classification of Wisdom literature, so we turn to the evidence of this book first by way of continuity with the previous section. The evidence of the DSS manuscripts introduces variations not seen in any of the texts discussed above but that are shared with some of the others that follow.

There are four copies found at Qumran, three from Cave 4 and one from Cave 6. The notable feature of each is in their size and contents. The height of the scrolls is between 8 centimeters and 10 centimeters, and the column widths between 5 centimeters and 8 centimeters. 6QCant has only seven lines per column and is written with a bold script. These figures can be compared to 4QPs^a, for instance, with thirty-five lines per column of about 12 centimeters in width and 20 centimeters in height, and written in a small script that fits in up to seventy-three letters and spaces. The scrolls of this little book would have been “pocket-sized.”

4QCant^c consists of one fragment, with one complete word and two fragmentary words from Song of Songs 3:7-8. 6QCant contains one full column and a portion of a second, with text from the beginning of the book, Song of Songs 1:1-7. It is 4QCant^a and 4QCant^b that present the most information for us. 4QCant^a preserves portions of three columns, Song of Songs 3:4-5; 3:7-4:6; 4:7; 6:11-7:7. 4QCant^b is in three fragments, including text from Song of Songs 2:9-3:2; 3:5, 9-4:1-3, 8-11a; 4:14-5:1.

Both of these manuscripts are described by E. Tov (1995b) as “abbreviated texts,” and by J. Jarick as “Reader’s Digest Song of Songs” because of the clear omission of significant portions of the book as we know it. After Song of Songs 4:7 in 4QCant^a there is a blank line, then the text picks up at Song of Songs 6:11. The editor hypothesizes that similarity of content may be a reason for the omission of the material in between. However, it is useful to note that it is the description of the male body that is passed over (Song 5:10-16). On the other hand, 4QCant^b omits Song of Songs 4:4-7, leaving a closed paragraph space after Song of Songs 4:3 before continuing with Song of Songs 4:8. This time it is the description of key parts of the female body that is omitted. This copy of the book comes to an end at Song of Songs 5:1—the last word of the verse comes at the end of a column, and there is empty manuscript space following. The reasons for this shortening of the text are a matter of pure speculation, with possible reasons such as censorship or liturgical purposes. What is not speculation, given the differences in omission between the two manuscripts, is that the scribes were shortening a full text of the book that already existed.

3.2. Ruth. The most significant fact regarding the book of Ruth is that there are more manuscripts of Ruth than of either Proverbs or Ecclesiastes, and that there is more of the text extant for this book than any other of the “Festival Scrolls” (see Megillot and Festivals). Two manuscripts were found in Cave 2, and two manuscripts in Cave 4. 4QRuth^a, one large fragment of fourteen lines of Ruth 1:1-12, and 2QRuth^a, seven fragments, containing portions of Ruth 2:13-3:8; 4:3-4, are dated to the middle of the first century BC. 4QRuth^b, four fragments from two columns comprising Ruth 1:1-6, 12-16, is possibly as late as the beginning of the first century AD, and 2QRuth^b, one small fragment of seven partial lines of Ruth 3:13-18, is placed middle of the first century AD (Baillet, 71-74; Skehan and Ulrich). There is not enough evidence available in these fragments to make any conclusive observations regarding the development of the text.

3.3. Lamentations. The four manuscripts of Lamentations come from three separate caves. There is no comprehensive theory advanced to suggest why different manuscripts appear in different caves, but it is at least of interest to note that this book is among two of the lesser scroll finds. One comes from Cave 3, notable chiefly as the source of the Copper Scroll; the only other biblical manuscripts found were from Ezekiel and Psalm 2. The two small fragments of Lamentations contain only a few words from Lamentations 1:10-12; 3:53-62, one of which is the Divine Name written in Paleo-Hebrew script. Two fragmentary manuscripts come from Cave 5, dating to the first century AD. 5QLam^a contains fragments from six separate columns, spanning from Lamentations 4:5 to Lamentations 5:17. 5QLam^b is in one fragment of Lamentations 4:17-20 in four lines. Neither provides enough evidence to offer any suggestions of relationships to either the MT or the Greek versions.

The Cave 4 copy, which preserves substantial portions of three columns containing Lamentations 1:1-18 and a fragment of Lamentations 2:5, in contrast, offers some valuable clues for understanding the development of the text. The text is copied out in prose form (a “careless” semiformal script not meant for a public copy [Cross 2000, 229]), but F. M. Cross (1983, 152) argues that it nevertheless reveals the structure of the meter of the poetry. Further, whereas the text is “badly corrupt” in places, it also has readings considered better than the MT (Cross 1983, 140). These two aspects can be seen together by reference to the *acrostic pattern in which each chapter of Lamentations 1–4 is a complete acrostic. In the MT the poems of Lamentations 2–4 reverse the usual alphabetical order of the letters ‘ayin and pê, while Lamentations 1 places the verses in this “normal” order. 4QLam, however, maintains the reverse order (pê then ‘ayin) in the first poem. The MT’s inconsistency may suggest that there were differences of sequence to the alphabet in some parts of society at the time (Jarick, 175).

There are two further manuscripts that appear to be related to Lamentations, and possibly dependent on it: 4QapocrLam A and 4QapocrLam B. Jarick (175) surmises that the existence of these alongside Lamentations points to a liturgical use with regard to commemoration of the destruction of Jerusalem.

3.4. Esther. Discussion of Esther is an argument from silence. There is no manuscript evidence of the book in the caves by the Dead Sea. In early years the explanations for this absence left open the possibility that some fragments might yet be identified with Esther. Publication in 1992 of an Aramaic text closely related to Esther (Milik 1992), later dubbed 4QProto-Esther, raised hopes that Esther had at last been found. Subsequent analysis is uniquely unanimous (for DSS studies) in the conclusion that this manuscript is not Esther, nor is it a source for the MT or Greek Esther, although it may be related much as are the Greek “additions,” or as the Prayer of Nabonidus is to the book of Daniel (White Crawford 1996, 325). The new title given for this manuscript is “Tales from the Persian Court.”

Given that the book of Esther is longer than the other little scrolls for which multiple copies survive, it now seems certain that no copy was ever present in the Qumran caves. This leaves open the question as to why Esther would be excluded. A common early conjecture was that its relation to *Purim had led to its rejection by the anti-Hasmonean Qumran sectarians. This explanation still finds adherents (Jarick, 180), while S. Talmon (1995, 266) rejects ideological grounds to argue from rabbinic evidence that it simply had not yet achieved “canonical” status even by the third century AD. This begs the question as to the many other books present at Qumran that never achieved “canonical” status. This question remains open.

3.5. Ezra through 2 Chronicles (MT Order).

Three fragments of a single manuscript of Ezra survived in Cave 4, dated to the middle of the first century BC (Ulrich 2000a, 291). Ezra 4:2-6, 9-11; 5:17-6:5 are preserved in extremely fragmentary form, with no more than about fifty words legible. What does survive is virtually identical to the MT, except for the correct forms of two scribal errors that appear in the MT.

A single fragment is all that remains of the books of the Chronicles, from 2 Chronicles 28:27–29:3, which is of a similar date to the Ezra manuscript. Two textual variants disagree with both the MT and the LXX. The fragment contains writing from the last lines of two columns, and the single word identifiable at the end of the first column does not correspond to any of the versions. This discrepancy could be explained as a citation of Chronicles in another work, which would be a strong argument for viewing Chronicles as an authoritative text. Treballe Barrera finds this unlikely (Treballe Barrera, 2000), suggesting rather that this text may be a fragment of a psalm or prayer, or is part of another historiographical work (Treballe Barrera, EDS 1.129). Ulrich argues that if this is the case, it is evidence of the “canonical” status of Chronicles.

Missing from the manuscript evidence is any copy of Nehemiah—a fact often forgotten when the assertion is made that only Esther is not found in the Qumran caves. That said, it is reasonable to assume that Ezra and Nehemiah would have been found together in one scroll. The paucity of evidence for these works is worthy of comment. On the one hand, there is considerable evidence of interest in and affinity to Chronicler material in other Qumran manuscripts, such as the Temple Scroll (Swanson, 237-39), to indicate that these books were well known at Qumran. On the other hand, the lack of interest in copying the books may suggest that they did not yet have authoritative status, or perhaps had not yet reached their final form, that would put them an a par with other “canonical” books.

Considerations such as this reveal to what extent, when examining the manuscript evidence for each of the books in this section of the Hebrew Bible, we are looking at the formative period of "canon" development, a period that is not complete until well beyond the NT period.

See also CANON; TEXT, TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Baillet, "Textes des Grottes 2Q, 3Q, 6Q, 7Q à 10Q," in Les "petites grottes" de Qumrân: Exploration de la falaise; les grottes 2Q, 3Q, 5Q, 6Q, 7Q à 10Q: le rouleau de cuivre (2 vols.; DJD 3; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1962) 1.45-164; R. T. Beckwith, "The Early History of the Psalter," TynBul 46 (1995) 1-27; K. Beyer, Die aramäischen Texte vom Toten Meer: Samt den Inschriften aus Palästina, dem Testament Levis aus der Kairoer Genisa, der Fastenrolle und den alten talmudischen Zitate; aramaistische Einleitung, Text, Übersetzung, Deutung, Grammatik/Wörterbuch, deutsch-aramäische Wortliste, Register (3 vols.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1984-2004); J. Blenkinsopp, "Books of Ezra and Nehemiah," EDSS 1.284-85; G. J. Brooke, "The Psalms in Early Jewish Literature," in The Psalms in the New Testament, ed. S. Moyise and M. J. J. Menken (London and New York: T & T Clark International, 2004) 5-24; F. M. Cross, "Studies in the Structure of Hebrew Verse: The Prosody of Lamentations 1:1-22," in The Word of the Lord Shall Go Forth: Essays in Honor of David Noel Freedman in Celebration of His Sixtieth Birthday, ed. C. L. Myers and M. O'Connor (ASORSVS 1; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1983) 129-55; idem, "Lamentations," in Qumran Cave 4.XI: Psalms to Chronicles (DJD 16; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2000) 229-38; U. Dahmen, Psalmen- und Psalter-Rezeption im Frühjudentum: Rekonstruktion, Textbestand, Struktur und Pragmatik der Psalmenrolle 11QP^a aus Qumran (STDJ 49; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003); R. de Vaux and J. T. Milik, Qumrân Grotte 4.II: I. Archéologie; II. Tefillin, Mezuzot et Targums (4Q128-4Q157) (DJD 6; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1977); J. A. Fitzmyer, "Some Observations on the Targum of Job from Qumran Cave 11," CBQ 36 (1974) 503-24 (= "The First-Century Targum of Job from Qumran Cave XI," in A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays [SBLMS 25; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979] 161-82); idem, "The Phases of the Aramaic Language," in A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays (SBLMS 25; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979) 57-84; P. W. Flint, The Dead Sea Psalms Scrolls and the Book of Psalms (STDJ 17; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997a); idem, "Appendix: Psalms Scrolls from the Judaean Desert," in The Dead Sea Scrolls: Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek Texts with English Translations, 4A: Pseudepigraphic and non-Masoretic Psalms and Prayers, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and H. W. L. Rietz (PTSDSSP; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997b) 287-90; U. Glessmer, "Targumim," EDSS 2.915-18; D. J. Harrington, Wisdom Texts from Qumran (LDSS; London: Routledge, 1996); idem, "Mystery," EDSS 1.588-91; J. Jarick, "The Bible's 'Festival Scrolls' among the Dead Sea Scrolls," in The Scrolls and the Scriptures: Qumran Fifty Years After, ed. S. E. Porter and C. A. Evans (JSPSup 26; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997) 170-82; N. Jastram, "Book of Proverbs," EDSS 2.701-2; J. Milik, "Fragment d'une source du Psautier (4QPs89) et fragments de Jubilés, du Document de Damas, d'un phylactère dans la grotte 4 de Qumrân," RB 73 (1966) 93-104; idem, "Les modèles araméens du livre d'Esther dans la grotte 4 de Qumrân," RevQ 15 (1992) 321-99; idem, "Targum de Job," in Qumrân grotte 4.II: I. Archéologie, II. Tefillin, Mezuzot et Targums (4Q128-4Q157) (DJD 6; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1977), 89; J. Muilenburg, "A Qoheleth Scroll from Qumran," BASOR 135 (1954) 20-28; C. A. Newsom, "Book of Job," EDSS 1.412-13; J. A. Sanders, The Psalms Scroll of Qumrân Cave 11 (11QP^a) (DJD 4; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1965); idem, "Variorum in the Psalms Scroll (11QP^a)," HTR 59 (1966) 83-94; idem, The Dead Sea Psalms Scroll (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1967); E. Schuller, "Non-Canonical Psalms," in Qumran Cave 4.VI: Poetic and Liturgical Texts, Part 1 (DJD 11; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1998) 75-172; P. W. Skehan, "Qumran and Old Testament Textual Criticism," in Qumrân: Sa piété, sa théologie et son milieu, ed. M. Delcor (BETL 46; Paris: Duculot; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1978) 163-82; idem, "Gleanings from Psalm Text from Qumrân," in Mélanges bibliques et orientaux en l'honneur de M. Henri Cazelles, ed. A. Caquot and M. Delcor (AOAT 212; Kevelaer: Butzon & Bercker; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1981) 439-52; P. W. Skehan and E. Ulrich, "Proverbs," in Qumran Cave 4.XI: Psalms to Chronicles (DJD 16; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2000) 187-94; P. W. Skehan, E. Ulrich and P. W. Flint, "Psalms," in Qumran Cave 4.XI: Psalms to Chronicles (DJD 16; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2000); P. W. Skehan, E. Ulrich and

J. E. Sanderson, Qumran Cave 4.IV: Palaeo-Hebrew and Greek Biblical Manuscripts (DJD 9; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992); M. Sokoloff, The Targum to Job from Qumran Cave XI (BSNCLC; Ramat-Gan: Bar Ilan University, 1974); D. D. Swanson, The Temple Scroll and the Bible: The Methodology of 11QT (STDJ 14; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); S. Talmon, “Pisqeh be’emsa’ pasuq and 11QPs^a,” Textus 5 (1966) 11-21; idem, “Was the Book of Esther Known at Qumran?” DSD 2 (1995) 249-67; E. Tov, “Excerpted and Abbreviated Biblical Texts from Qumran,” RevQ 16 (1995a) 581-600; idem, “Three Manuscripts (Abbreviated Texts?) of Canticles from Qumran Cave 4,” JJS 46.1-2 (1995b) 88-111; J. Trebolle Barrera, “First and Second Books of Chronicles,” EDSS 1:129; idem, “Chronicles,” in Qumran Cave 4.XI: Psalms to Chronicles (DJD 16; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2000) 295-97; E. Ulrich, The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Origins of the Bible (SDSSRL; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999); idem, “Ezra,” in Qumran Cave 4.XI: Psalms to Chronicles (DJD 16; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2000a) 291-94; idem, “Qoheleth,” in Qumran Cave 4.XI: Psalms to Chronicles (DJD 16; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2000b) 221-28; J. P. M. van der Ploeg, “Le sens et un problème textuel du Ps LXXXIX,” in Mélanges bibliques et orientaux en l’honneur de M. Henri Cazelles, ed. A. Caquot and M. Delcor (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1981) 471-81; J. P. M. van der Ploeg and A. S. van der Woude, Le targum de Job de la grotte XI de Qumrân (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971); A. S. van der Woude, “Targum of Job,” EDSS 1.413-14; G. Vermes, The Complete Dead Sea Scrolls in English (London: Penguin, 2004); S. White Crawford, “Five Scrolls,” EDSS 1.295-97; idem, “Has Esther Been Found at Qumran? Proto-Esther and the Esther Corpus,” RevQ 17 (1996) 307-25; G. Wilson, The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (SBLDS 76; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985); idem, “The Qumran Psalms Scroll (11QPs^a) and the Canonical Psalter: Comparison of Editorial Shaping,” CBQ 59 (1997) 449-64.

D. D. Swanson

DEATH. See AFTERLIFE; CHAOS AND DEATH; DESTRUCTION; IMPRISONMENT IMAGERY.

DEBATE. See DISPUTATION.

DELIVERANCE. See SALVATION AND DELIVERANCE IMAGERY.

DEMOCRATIZATION OF PSALMS. See ROYAL COURT.

DESTRUCTION

The concept of destruction is expressed by more than a dozen Hebrew words within the OT books under study within the major Bible translations. For some of these terms, “destruction” is part of the primary semantic domain of the word itself, whereas for other terms (such as bl’, usually “swallow”) the context of the passage suggests a figurative or metaphorical usage of the term signifying destruction. Depending on the term, a word translated as “destruction” in one Bible translation may be rendered in other translations with semantically similar terms such as “doom,” “ruin,” “desolation” and “annihilation.” This semantic overlap can be further appreciated by noting that in the LXX, the Greek translation of the OT, one particular Greek verb is used to translate thirty-eight different Hebrew words related to destroying and destruction.

In addition, the image of destruction may be communicated through nominal or verbal clauses. In the case of nominal clauses, the image of destruction may overlap with that of a place of destruction or even a being of destruction, while in verbal instances, the verbs typically communicate a stative or factitive notion—that is, a (resulting) condition or state of being. This image of destruction usually applies to a physiological entity such as a person or an object, although immaterial notions such as human plans and ambitions may also come to destruction. In the case of individuals, the most common thread throughout the OT books under consideration is that unrighteous behavior (i.e., destructive actions) leads to divinely rendered destruction at the physical or metaphysical level. Lastly, while certain verbal roots such as ’bd (usually “perish”) may be moderately connected to the motif of destruction in certain contexts, they are more clearly related to this image when conjugated in the intensive verbal stems (notably the Piel stem).

1. Destruction in Psalms
2. Destruction in Wisdom Literature (Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes)
3. Destruction in Other Texts (Lamentations, Esther, Ruth, Song of Songs)
4. Destruction in Death and Beyond

1. Destruction in Psalms.

In the book of *Psalms the imagery of destruction is most frequently portrayed as the ultimate destiny of the sweeping category of the wicked (Ps 1:6; 9:5; 37:20, 38; 49:5-9; 68:2; 73:18-19; 92:7; 145:20). This presentation of destruction may be in contrast to the ultimate destiny of the righteous (e.g., Ps 1) or as a broader component of God's rebuke of the (unrighteous) nations (e.g., Ps 9). In addition, the appeal for YHWH to bring the wicked to destruction is found in several psalms that have elements of *imprecation (see Ps 35:8; 83:14-18; 143:12) or as part of the theological understanding of the psalmist wherein the wicked are also the afflictors of the righteous (Ps 55:23; 63:9). Destruction is also described in the psalms as the final destiny of liars (Ps 5:6), those who do not submit to God (Ps 2:12), the enemies of the righteous (Ps 9:3), and the enemies of God (Ps 9:6; 21:8-10; 92:9). Even the very names of God's enemies are subject to destruction (see Ps 9:5-6). Destruction is also the ultimate end for the (godless) plans of humankind (Ps 146:4) as well as the (godless) desires of the wicked (Ps 112:10) and the (godless) nations in general (Ps 10:16). The imagery of destruction is likewise employed to speak of the end of those who are far from God (Ps 73:27) and even of God's people who persist in unfaithfulness (Ps 80:3-16; also cf. Ps 106:17-18 with Num 16:30-33), as also reflected in several covenantal texts (e.g., Lev 26:38; Deut 28:20, 63). In addition, destruction is that which the tongue of the deceitful person devises (Ps 52:2), what the enemy of the righteous seeks to do to the righteous (Ps 38:12), and what constitutes the very inward parts of the wicked (Ps 5:9). The image of destruction is also used to describe what will eventually befall the heavens and the earth (Ps 102:25-26)—an aspect of God's righteous judgment precipitating the creation of a new heavens and earth. As such, this destruction of the earth is described as something warranting awe and praise (Ps 46:9). Lastly, destruction in the psalms is also portrayed as something that the faithful will not see (Ps 16:10) and that is mitigated by taking delight in YHWH's instruction, Torah (see Ps 119:92). Nevertheless, the avoidance of destruction by God's people is fundamentally a facet of God's compassion rather than human accomplishment (see Ps 57:1; 78:38; 106:23).

2. Destruction in Wisdom Literature (Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes).

In OT Wisdom literature (*Job, *Proverbs, *Ec-clesiastes) the motif of destruction is also frequently used to describe the final end of the wicked (Job 18:12; 21:30; Prov 6:12-15). Similarly, destruction is what will come to the "house" (i.e., posterity) of the wicked (Prov 14:11), the memory and name of the wicked (Job 18:17), the arm (i.e., strength, power, authority) of the wicked (Job 38:15), and the (godless) ambitions and desires of the wicked (Prov 10:28; 11:7). Destruction is also that which awaits liars and deceitful people (Job 6:15-18; Prov 19:9; 21:28), those who forget God (Job 8:11-13), and those who facilitate iniquity (Job 4:7-9; 31:2-3). Destruction is also portrayed as that which the unrighteous brings upon the good (Eccles 9:18), and that which befalls the wealth of the immoral person (Prov 29:3). The image of destruction also portrays the self-inflicted punishment of the adulterer (Prov 6:32). Destruction is also the destination of those who associate with unstable persons (see Prov 24:21-22) and those who do not respond to reproof (Prov 29:1). Moreover, it is the end result of God's judgment against sinful speech (Eccles 5:6). Lastly, note that destruction is commonly described in Wisdom literature as being preceded by pride and human arrogance (e.g., Job 20:4-9; Prov 16:18; 18:12; 29:1)—telltale attributes of the fool in wisdom texts (see also Ps 49, a wisdom psalm). Indeed, in the two-path focus of Wisdom literature (the way of the righteous and the way of the foolish), the path of the fool leads to destruction (see Prov 1:20-33). Similarly, it is the fool whose words destroy self (Eccles 10:12 [cf. Mt 15:18]), neighbor (Prov 11:9) and father (Prov 19:13). Hence, God mocks the looming destruction of fools who scorn his ways (Prov 1:26-27).

3. Destruction in Other Texts (Lamentations, Esther, Ruth, Song of Songs).

In the book of *Lamentations a wide range of terms is used to poetically describe the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 586 BC. Such devastation is described as having come not only upon the city of Jerusalem (destruction "as vast as the sea" [Lam 2:13]) but also upon all the inhabitants of the southern kingdom (Lam 2:2), palaces (Lam 2:5), symbols of stability and *protection (Lam 2:9) and even the strength of the prophet Jeremiah (Lam 3:18). Much of this far-reaching image of destruction is summarized in Lamentations 3:47: "Terror and dread have come upon us; devastation and destruction."

Moreover, this imagery of destruction is also reflected in the poetic refrain of Lamentations 2—4: “because of the destruction of the daughter of my people” (Lam 2:11; 3:48; 4:10). Thus, it is not surprising to see that the imprecatory remarks in Lamentations look for the destruction of the enemies of God’s people (see Lam 3:66). Yet, it must be emphasized that Lamentations makes it clear that YHWH destroyed Jerusalem’s strongholds (Lam 2:5), his appointed meeting place (Lam 2:6) and Jerusalem’s wall (Lam 2:8).

In the book of *Esther the image of destruction is used repeatedly in the context of Haman’s plot against the Jews and subsequent decree by King *Ahasuerus authorizing the Jews to defend themselves. In both cases the imagery of destruction is commonly presented via a verbal trilogy (smd, ’bd, hrg) that underscores complete elimination. Thus, after the affront of *Mordecai, Haman’s motive in approaching the king is that of bringing such complete destruction to all Jews (Esther 3:6-13). Mordecai’s appeals to Esther via Hathach, the royal eunuch, stress this looming elimination of the Jews (Esther 4:7-8), and he reminds Esther that this destruction will be the fate of her father’s house if she does not take action (Esther 4:14). Esther’s appeal to King Ahasuerus stresses the potential destruction to her and her people as a result of Haman’s plot (Esther 7:4), and the king’s response (ironically) empowers the Jews (through the verbal triplicate noted above) to destroy their would-be assassins (Esther 8:11). Lastly, the Feast of *Purim relates specifically to Haman casting Pur (lot) with the intended outcome of the destruction of Jews and the implicit divine deliverance rendered via Mordecai and Esther (Esther 9:20-28).

In *Ruth and *Song of Songs attention to “destruction” is scarce, with the book of Ruth using the image to refer to the (first-in-line) *kinsman-redeemer’s perception of what he would bring to his own inheritance by marrying Ruth (Ruth 4:6), and Song of Songs using destruction (Song 2:15) to describe what foxes do to vineyards (and hence that the beloved should come and catch these destructive foxes).

4. Destruction in Death and Beyond.

With respect to individuals (or groups such as ungodly nations), destruction is most commonly associated with death—that is, the (physical) destruction of a person’s life that ends earthly existence. As such, this portrayal of destruction is found together with various images describing the state of death, such as dust, darkness, shadows and silence. In addition, destruction may also denote the place of the dead and is used in conjunction with notations of the underworld such as the grave, the pit, Sheol and Abaddon. Similarly, in the Talmud “Destruction” is one of the seven names for Gehenna. Moreover, note that Abaddon, Death and Sheol receive *personification in Job 28:22; Proverbs 27:20, giving rise to the sense of a being of destruction (cf. Rev 9:11). These observations aside, the question at hand is whether this physical image of destruction as death in these OT texts is solely the termination of life or whether the imagery of destruction in certain instances transcends beyond the grave and into the *afterlife—in other words, whether the physical portrayal of the destruction of individuals has metaphysical aspects as well that might be understood along the lines of an eschatological destruction. Certainly, the idea of perishing versus eternal life is a clear dichotomy in the NT, but whether this is seen in some sense in the OT texts under consideration is another issue. Moreover, the issue of poetic impact and stylistics cautions against forcing preconceived ideas onto earlier texts. Holding these caveats in mind, we may note that there are a number of texts (especially Davidic psalms) that may be expressing elements of an OT notion of the hereafter and at the very least are consistent with fuller biblical teachings on post-death actualities. For example, *David in Psalm 9 notes that YHWH has blotted out the name of the wicked “forever and ever” (Ps 9:5), and that the ultimate lot of such individuals is “unending ruin” (Ps 9:6; cf. Ps 55:23). In addition, although the iniquity of the wicked seems ever expanding, this reality is explained in light of God’s intent to bring them to everlasting destruction (Ps 92:7). Moreover, David in Psalm 22 implies some type of post-death consciousness by noting that all who “go down to the dust” (i.e., die) will bow before the Lord (Ps 22:29). Conversely, David declares in Psalm 103 that YHWH will redeem the life of his people from the pit (Ps 103:4), and in Psalm 16 that YHWH will not abandon their souls to Sheol (Ps 16:10). Similarly, in the book of Job Elihu declares that God not only spares his people from the pit but also enlightens them with the “light of life” through ransom, redemption and acceptance (see Job 33:18-30). This is the same phraseology utilized by the Sons of Korah (see Asaph and Sons of Korah) in Psalm 49, which speaks of the impossibility of a person to redeem the soul of another “that he should live forever” but declares that God can do so—the ultimate solution to eternal destruction (see Ps 49:7-15). Lastly, note that the Hebrew expression “he will take me” (yiqqāhēnî) in this psalm (Ps 49:15 [49:16 MT]) uses the same style of expression (i.e., God as subject taking his faithful servant to his presence) as that found when God takes Enoch to his presence in Genesis 5:24, and Elijah to his presence in 2 Kings 2:10-11.

See also AFTERLIFE; CHAOS AND DEATH; FEAR OF THE LORD; LIFE; RETRIBUTION; SUFFERING; WARFARE IMAGERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. J. Austel, “חַיִּים,” TWOT 2.935; R. L. Harrison, “חַיִּים,” TWOT 1.3-4; E. Jenni, “חַיִּים,” TLOT 1.13-15; P. S. Johnston, Shades of Sheol: Death and Afterlife in the Old Testament (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms, trans. T. J. Hallett (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997); F. Merkel, “Destroy, Perish, Ruin,” NIDNTT 1.462-70; E. H. Merrill, “חַיִּים,” NIDOTTE 4.93-94; R. E. Murphy, “Ṣaḥat in the Qumran Literature,” Bib 39 (1958) 61-66; B. Otzen, “חַיִּים,” TDOT 1.19-23; J. Schüpphaus, “חַיִּים,” TDOT 2.136-39; N. J. Tromp, Primitive Conceptions of Death and the Nether World in the Old Testament (BibOr 21; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1969); C. Van Dam, “חַיִּים,” NIDOTTE 1.371; L. Wächter, “חַיִּים,” TDOT 14.595-99.

F. J. Mabie

DEVOTIONAL INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS.

DIRGE. See LAMENTATIONS 1: BOOK OF.

DISCOURSE IN PROVERBS

In contrast to the “sentence” literature of *Proverbs (the two-line aphorisms that make up the bulk of Prov 10–29), the “discourses” are extended texts of more than a single verse that carry forward a sustained argument. A text such as Proverbs 11:2 (“Pride comes and disgrace comes, but with the humble is wisdom”) is an individual proverb, but a text such as Proverbs 1:8-19 is a sustained discourse on criminal gangs. The word discourse is somewhat misleading in that such texts are always poetry and never prose. But there are *wisdom poems that are not discursive in nature, and thus not every wisdom poem is a discourse.

1. The Two Discourse Types
2. The Great Appeal: Proverbs 1:8–9:18
3. The Young Man as Implied Reader
4. Structure and Interpretation within the Parental Discourses
5. The Date of the Composition of the Discourses

1. The Two Discourse Types.

1.1. Formal Characteristics. Two types of discourse are found in Proverbs. The first and most common is the parental appeal, in which a parent urges a son or sons to be obedient to the precepts of wisdom (e.g., Prov 1:8-19). Proverbs 4:3 indicates that the parent who makes the appeals in Proverbs 1–9 is the father, although the mother is also mentioned (Prov 1:8; 6:20). The second type is the wisdom appeal, in which Woman Wisdom (see Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly), a *personification of the ideal of wisdom, calls on the young man to heed her instruction (e.g., Prov 1:20-33). M. Fox (1997) argues that these two—the father with his plain-spoken appeals and Woman Wisdom with her heavenly perspective—speak in counterpoint. The practical advice of the father draws upon and is vindicated by the sublime truth that fills all creation.

Parental appeals usually have several formal features. First, there is an entreaty to listen, which typically has three parts: (1) the implied parent calls out to the implied son (usually calling him “My son”); (2) the parent exhorts the son(s) to listen (“Hear, O sons, a father’s instruction” [Prov 4:1]); (3) the parent gives some general reasons that the son should listen (“I give to you good traditional teaching” [Prov 4:2]).

Second, the entreaty to listen is followed by the main body of the appeal. This typically encourages the young man to seek wisdom and to flee from some specific evil (such as criminal behavior or immoral women). The main appeal usually offers the young man an explanation or motivation for doing what is right (such as in Prov 4:6: “Love her [wisdom], and she will guard you”). Although the main body is generally dominated by commands and prohibitions, other types of speech are present. For example, Proverbs 7:6-23 is a lengthy anecdote on a young man's fall into immorality, and Proverbs 2 is essentially a large conditional statement (if the young man embraces wisdom, he will be saved from evil and trouble). Proverbs 4:1-9 includes a retrospective on the teacher's childhood. Two appeals, at Proverbs 5:1-23; 7:1-27, contain a secondary entreaty to listen within the body of the appeal.

Third, parental appeals end with a summarizing conclusion in the form of one or more proverbs (as in Prov 3:35: "The wise will inherit honor, but fools gain disgrace"; Prov 4:19: "The way of the wicked is darkness; they do not know over what they stumble"). The summarizing conclusion is not always present. Proverbs 4:20-27 has as its body (in Prov 4:23-27) a series of exhortations to persevere in the task of achieving virtue; its ending at Proverbs 4:27 is part of that series and is not a summarizing conclusion. Thus, as is common, not every text has all the formal features for its type. Biblical poets did not write according to a template.

It is very important, nevertheless, to distinguish the entreaty to listen from the body of the appeal. Entreaties to listen are not unimportant, but the interpreter who tries to determine the topic of a passage from the entreaty to listen will be confused and probably will focus on the wrong issues. The actual topic—the main thing that the teacher wants to get across—is found in the main body.

The formal pattern of the wisdom appeal is similar to that of the parental appeal. It begins with an introduction to Woman Wisdom, presenting her in a public place calling out to young men who pass by (as in Prov 1:20: "Wisdom cries aloud in the plaza, in the markets she raises her voice"). In the body of the appeal Woman Wisdom speaks in the first person, describing her qualities, promising benefits to those who listen, and issuing warnings to scoffers (as in Prov 1:24-26: "Because I called and you refused to listen . . . I will mock when what you dread comes"). Finally, the wisdom appeal concludes with a series of proverbs (such as Prov 1:32-33).

As indicated above, not every wisdom poem can be called a discourse. There are also wisdom epigrams, which, although more expansive than a single proverb, do not have the discursive features of introduction, sustained argument and appeal, and conclusion. An example of a wisdom epigram is Proverbs 30:11-14, which lists four types of wicked people (cursers of parents, the unrepentant, the proud, the violent). The epigram, in Proverbs, is essentially a poetic list of virtues or vices.

1.2. The Parental Appeals. Various scholars divide the text somewhat differently (see, e.g., the structural analyses in Murphy; Fox 2000; Waltke; Longman). Based on the criteria described above, however, we can say that the discourses of Proverbs include the following parental appeals:

Proverbs 1:8-19: Avoid the violent life of the criminal gang

Entreaty to listen: 1:8

Body: 1:9-16 (the appeal of the gang in this section forms an inclusion with the appeal of Woman Folly in 9:13-18)

Conclusion: 1:17-19 (a proverb based in fowling at 1:17, with commentary in 1:18, and a second concluding proverb in 1:19: rapacious greed is fatal)

Proverbs 2:1-22: Wisdom protects against temptations from criminal men and immoral women

Entreaty to listen/Body: 2:1-20 (a general call to listen, with the allurements of crime in 2:12-15 and of promiscuity in 2:16-19 representing the two great temptations to the young man)

Conclusion: 2:21-22 (two proverbs: the upright will live, and the wicked will die)

Proverbs 3:1-12: Exhortations to faithfulness, humility and piety

Entreaty to listen: 3:1-4

Body: 3:5-11 (the explicit admonitions to piety here—trusting the Lord in 3:5, making regular offerings in 3:9—are quite unusual in Proverbs)

Conclusion: 3:12 (a proverb: the Lord repays those whom he loves)

Proverbs 3:21-35: Behaving rightly toward one's neighbors

Entreaty to listen: 3:21-26

Body: 3:27-34 (the exhortations here focus on respecting the rights of others)

Conclusion: 3:35 (a proverb: the wise get honor, and fools get disgrace)

Proverbs 4:1-9: Wisdom is a heritage worth maintaining from generation to generation

Entreaty to listen: 4:1-2

Body: 4:3-6, with a resumption at 4:8-9 (the teacher's recollection of his childhood sets his appeals for the young man to pursue wisdom in the context of a family heritage)

Conclusion: 4:7 (a proverb: the beginning of wisdom is determination to get it, with an exhortation at 4:8-9 that resumes the appeals of the body)

Proverbs 4:10-19: The two ways

Entreaty to listen: 4:10

Body: 4:11-17 (the way of wisdom, full of life, is contrasted with the way of evil, full of restlessness and then death)

Conclusion: 4:18-19 (two proverbs: the wise are in light, but the wicked stumble in darkness)

Proverbs 4:20-27: Persevere in maintaining integrity

Entreaty to listen: 4:20-22

Body: 4:23-27 (the exhortation to moral integrity and clarity of purpose employs metaphors from the body: heart, mouth, eyes, feet)

Conclusion: Not present

Proverbs 5:1-23: Flee the sexual enticements of the immoral woman

Entreaty to listen: 5:1-2, with a secondary entreaty to listen at 5:7 that makes more urgent the appeal to flee from the promiscuous woman

Body: 5:3-6, 8-20 (sexual pleasures—the real but deadly kind from the immoral woman and the wholesome kind from the good wife—are at the heart of this text)

Conclusion: 5:21-23 (three proverbs to the effect that the Lord watches human behavior so that the wicked die in their folly)

Proverbs 6:20-35: Adultery leads to death

Entreaty to listen: 6:20-23

Body: 6:24-33 (the focus is on the suffering that immorality brings)

Conclusion: 6:34-35 (a proverb and comment asserting that a jealous husband has implacable fury)

Proverbs 7:1-27: An example of a young man destroyed by an immoral woman

Entreaty to listen: 7:1-5, with a secondary entreaty to listen at 7:24, again emphasizing how earnestly the father wants the young man to avoid promiscuity

Body: 7:6-23, 25-26 (an anecdote explaining how easily a young man is taken in by the promiscuous woman)

Conclusion: 7:27 (a proverb: the prostitute's house is the way to death)

Proverbs 31:1-9: Warnings on women and wine to King Lemuel from his mother.

Entreaty to listen: 31:2

Body: 31:3-9 (a king should not use his power to indulge in women and wine)

Conclusion: Not present

Proverbs 2:1-22 is unusual in that the entire body of the appeal is one great entreaty to listen. Thus, the formal entreaty to listen and the body are combined here. This is very significant for the macrostructure of Proverbs 1:8–9:18, as described below.

Proverbs 31:1-9 is slightly unusual in that it specifically names the addressee (although we do not actually know who *Lemuel was) and in that it is expressly from the young man's mother rather than his father. Formally, its entreaty to listen (Prov 31:2: "What, my son? And what, O son of my womb? And what, O son of my vows?") is unlike those we see in the other parental appeals (such as "My son, give heed to my wisdom" in Prov 5:1). But the "What?" is rhetorical. It is an implied call for the son to reflect on how he should live and thus is, in effect, an entreaty for him to listen. This text also lacks the proverbial conclusion, but not every parental appeal has that. Even so, the teaching of Lemuel's mother is explicitly a parental appeal, and formally it sufficiently fits the pattern. Clearly, it was not composed with those in Proverbs 1–9 (as Proverbs itself indicates) and is not part of that collection, but it is the same type of text. Proverbs 31:10-31, the poem in praise of the virtuous wife, should not be considered part of the appeal by Lemuel's mother. The "virtuous wife" is a self-contained poem (it is an alphabetic *acrostic) that has nothing in common with Proverbs 31:1-9. It is in fact a large epigram, listing all the virtues and benefits of the good wife. Significantly, Proverbs 31:1-9 is for a king while Proverbs 31:10-31 concerns a middle-class bourgeois household. Apparently, the poem of the virtuous wife was thought to be a fitting conclusion to the whole of Proverbs; it has no specific tie to the teaching of Lemuel's mother.

Proverbs 6:1-19 is not a parental appeal. The passage begins with "My son," but after that it moves into five discrete epigrams (entanglements in loans [Prov 6:1-5]; the lessons of the ant [Prov 6:6-8]; the nature of the sluggard [Prov 6:9-11]; the marks of a schemer [Prov 6:12-15]; aspects of immoral behavior as described by metonymy with the human body [Prov 6:16-19]). The disjointed nature of this passage is unlike what we see elsewhere in the parental appeals, and it appears that the five epigrams have been collected here and given the heading "My son" for the sake of giving the collection a formal parallel to the adjacent parental appeals.

We should observe that there is a good deal of variety in the parental appeals. Proverbs 5:1-23; 6:20-35; 7:1-27 all warn against going to the immoral woman, but each does so in a distinctive manner. In Proverbs 5:1-23 the alluring but deadly enticements of the prostitute are set in contrast to the wholesome sexual pleasures of the good wife. In Proverbs 6:20-35 the focus is on how an affair with another man's wife leads to disgrace and ruin (in particular because of the anger of the cuckolded husband). Proverbs 7:1-27 is a story, almost a morality play, on the fall of the naïve young man to the wiles of the promiscuous woman.

1.3. The Wisdom Appeals. There are three wisdom appeals in Proverbs:

Proverbs 1:20-33: The calamities that befall those who reject Woman Wisdom

Introduction: 1:20-21 (Wisdom cries out in the streets)

Body: 1:22-31 (When calamity strikes, Wisdom mocks those who scorned her)

Conclusion: 1:32-33 (two proverbs: the fools are destroyed by folly, but the prudent are secure)

Proverbs 8:1-36: Woman Wisdom recommends herself by describing her benefits and her origin with Yahweh

Introduction: 8:1-3 (Wisdom calls out at the gates and crossroads)

Entreaty to listen: 8:4-11

Body: 8:12-33 (8:12-21 describes Wisdom's benefits—she gives shrewdness, ability to govern, wealth—and 8:22-31 describes her origin with God)

Secondary entreaty to listen: 8:32-33

Conclusion: 8:34-36 (three proverbs, beginning with a beatitude and followed by two sayings that those who find wisdom live and those who do not die)

Proverbs 9:1-18: A final appeal from Woman Wisdom is set in contrast to an appeal from Woman Folly

Introduction to Woman Wisdom: 9:1-3 (Wisdom has built her house, made a sacrifice, and invites young men to come)

Body of Woman Wisdom's Appeal: 9:4-6

Conclusion: 9:7-12 (six proverbs asserting that scoffers are incorrigible, that the *fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, that wisdom gives life, and that everyone must choose which path to take and bear the results)

Introduction to Woman Folly: 9:13-15 (she is loud, seductive, and calls to passers-by)

Body of Woman Folly's Appeal: 9:16-17

Conclusion: 9:18 (the fool does not know that her way leads to death)

Proverbs 9:1-18, the last appeal of Proverbs 1—9, is striking for setting Woman Wisdom against Woman Folly and for ending Woman Wisdom's appeal with six proverbs, making it the longest conclusion of any appeal. These proverbs reiterate the main theme of the book: the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. They also segregate humanity into two camps, the scoffers and the wise, forcing the reader to choose between the two. Woman Folly, calling out in the street to men who pass by, clearly is modeled on the street prostitute. By contrast, the good wife who concludes the whole book (at Prov 31:10-31) is in a sense the real counterpart to the personification Woman Wisdom (so also the good wife as lover in Prov 5:18-19 corresponds to "loving" and "embracing" Woman Wisdom at Prov 4:6-8). The implication is that promiscuity and adultery are the quickest way to folly, while marital fidelity to the good wife concretely works out the young man's path to wisdom.

There is also a brief hymn to wisdom in Proverbs 3:13-18. The hymn has an implied but no direct appeal to seek wisdom, and Woman Wisdom herself does not speak. Thus, it cannot be considered a wisdom appeal. It would not appear to be part of the parental appeal of Proverbs 3:1-12, both because the topic of that text is distinct from the topic of the wisdom hymn and because Proverbs 3:12 fulfills the role of a concluding proverb. The wisdom hymn is an interlude, and it anticipates the portrayal of Woman Wisdom with its account of the relationship of wisdom to creation in Proverbs 8:22-31.

2. The Great Appeal: Proverbs 1:8—9:18.

When viewed as a whole, Proverbs 1:8—9:18 has the same structure as the parental appeal, with an entreaty to listen, a main body of teaching and exhortation, and a conclusion. We might call this text the “Great Appeal.” The entreaty to listen is in Proverbs 2:1-22, in which, as described above, the entire main body is a call for the young man to give heed. The main body of the Great Appeal (Prov 3:1—8:36) is in three parts, with each part containing one or more parental appeals but each terminating in a text that is not a parental appeal (first in the wisdom hymn [Prov 3:13-20], then in the ethical epigrams [Prov 6:1-19], then in Woman Wisdom’s great appeal [Prov 8:1-36]). The three parts progress from a foundational appeal to maintain piety and humility, to the core lessons of the text, then to a reemphasis on the need to avoid promiscuity. The wisdom appeal in Proverbs 9:1-12, with its final series of six proverbs (Prov 9:7-12), fulfills the part of the summarizing conclusion.

The Great Appeal is bounded, moreover, by a two-part prologue (Prov 1:8-33) and, as an epilogue, the appeal of Woman Folly (Prov 9:13-18). The prologue and epilogue are decidedly dark in tone, beginning with the appeal of the criminal gang (Prov 1:8-19) and ending with the appeal of the prostitute-like Woman Folly (Prov 9:13-18). Even Woman Wisdom’s prologue speech is dark, focusing on the destruction that befalls those who reject her (Prov 1:20-33). The prologue and epilogue present corruption and death as the stark alternative to the Great Appeal.

Within the Great Appeal, several common elements tie the whole together. These include the aforementioned parallel between the gang’s appeal and Woman Folly’s appeal, reference to Woman Wisdom at creation in Proverbs 3:19-20; 8:22-31, as well as the presentation of ethical behavior via the metonymy of body parts in Proverbs 4:23-27; 6:16-19. Thus the structure of the Great Appeal is as follows:

1. Prologue (Prov 1:8-33)

The appeal of the gang and the death that it brings (Prov 1:8-19)

Woman Wisdom scorns all who reject her (Prov 1:20-33)

2. Entreaty to Listen: The benefits of heeding wisdom with an implied warning against the temptations of criminal men and immoral women (Prov 2:1-22)

3. Body of Discourse (Prov 3:1—8:36)

First series of ethical and sapiential lessons: foundational matters (Prov 3:1-20)

Maintain humility and piety (Prov 3:1-12)

The hymn to wisdom (Prov 3:13-20)

Second series of ethical and sapiential lessons: core teachings (Prov 3:21—6:19)

Respect for one’s neighbors

(Prov 3:21-35)

Maintain the family tradition of wisdom (Prov 4:1-9)

Understand the two ways (Prov 4:10-19)

Maintain integrity (Prov 4:20-27)

Flee the immoral woman (Prov 5:1-23)

Ethical epigrams (Prov 6:1-19)

Third series of ethical and sapiential lessons: the special danger of the immoral woman against the glory of Woman Wisdom (Prov 6:20—8:36)

Adultery leads to death (Prov 6:20-35)

An example story of the immoral woman (Prov 7:1-27)

Woman Wisdom’s great appeal

(Prov 8:1-36)

Conclusion

Woman Wisdom’s final appeal with six concluding proverbs (Prov 9:1-12)

Epilogue: the appeal of Woman Folly and the death that she brings (Prov 9:13-18)

Other scholars, of course, have different analyses of the structure of Proverbs 1–9. B. Waltke, for example, argues that it is a *chiasm in eight parts, while other scholars see in these chapters no macrostructure at all.

3. The Young Man as Implied Reader.

The fixation in these appeals on the immoral woman as the source of personal destruction perhaps seems odd to the modern reader. Do these appeals originate in a misogynistic dread of women? Does the text imply that women are lustful, but that young men, if not corrupted by women, are innocent? We should bear in mind that the addressee in the discourses is the young man (always called “my son” [the NRSV’s “my child” in, e.g., Prov 1:8; 2:1; 3:1, is misleading and unfortunate]). The nature of the addressees, that they are young men and not some other group (young women, small children, slaves, elderly people), determines the content of the address. The two principal moral dangers to the young man are the enticement to easy money through crime and the enticement to easy sex through the prostitute. The first temptation that the book actually addresses, in Proverbs 1:8-19, is the appeal to join a violent gang. If the addressees in Proverbs were young women, we may presume, the content of these appeals would be substantially different.

4. Structure and Interpretation within the Parental Discourses.

The interpretation of the parental appeals is generally not difficult. They directly call on the young man to flee immorality, to heed wise teachers, and to fear God. By contrast, the identity and literary origin of the figure of Woman Wisdom is much debated. Suggestions include that she is a personification of divine omniscience, that she is a personification of the wisdom that God built into the world, that she is an Israelite version of *Maat (the Egyptian goddess of justice and order), that she is a literary antagonist to the Canaanite fertility goddess, and that she is a demythologized Israelite goddess (see Whybray). Early Christians uniformly took her to be the Logos, the second person of the Trinity. For all this, the essential message of her appeals—the young man should learn and obey the precepts of wisdom—is not obscure.

5. The Date of the Composition of the Discourses.

The date and Sitz im Leben for the composition of the discourses is disputed. Many scholars have argued (or assumed) that the complex discourses are a later, evolutionary development from an earlier stage in which sages taught with pithy aphorisms and proverbs. There is, however, no reason to think that discourses were a later historical development and that the individual proverbs were earlier (as Kitchen has demonstrated, discourses and aphorisms appear together in ancient wisdom texts from the very beginning). Discursive wisdom certainly antedates the Israelite monarchy (analogous appeals occur in, for example, the teaching of The Eloquent Peasant from the Middle Kingdom of Egypt—a full millennium prior to the reign of *Solomon). W. McKane argues that the discourse genre of Proverbs 1–9 was brought into Israel from Egypt during the reign of Solomon. But, again, the proverb form is found also in early Egyptian wisdom literature. The important point here is that neither the discourse nor the aphorism, as a formal genre, can be said to antedate the other.

On the other hand, Fox (2000) argues that Proverbs 1–9 is later than Proverbs 10–29, not on the grounds of formal genre but on the grounds that in Proverbs the discourses are written as an introduction for the aphorisms. Responding to C. Maier, who argues on the basis of the social conditions evident in Proverbs 1–9 that these chapters come from the Achaemenid period, Fox demonstrates that nothing in these chapters distinctively corresponds to what we know of life in Judea under the Persians. Maier, for example, claims that attacks on the “strange woman” in Proverbs are motivated by the concerns over exogamy in evidence in Nehemiah 13:23-27. But, as Fox remarks, the strange woman of Proverbs is not a foreigner and is not trying to marry the foolish young man. Fox himself argues that Proverbs 1–9 comes from the Hellenistic era, on the grounds that these chapters appear to have come from an intellectually cosmopolitan age. This is indeed the case, but the intellectual environment of Proverbs is decidedly more classical Egyptian than Hellenistic. A. Steinmann argues on linguistic grounds that Proverbs 1–9 is an early text and dates from the Solomonic period. Ultimately, however, the provenance of Proverbs 1–9 must be examined within the framework of a larger discussion of the date and origin of the book of Proverbs as a whole.

See also FORM CRITICISM; RHETORICAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Fox, “Ideas of Wisdom in Proverbs 1-9,” JBL 116 (1997) 613-33; idem, Proverbs 1-9 (AB 18A; New York: Doubleday, 2000); K. A. Kitchen, “Proverbs and Wisdom Books of the Ancient Near East,” TynBul 28 (1977) 69-114; T. Longman III, Proverbs (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, 2006); C. Maier, Die “fremde Frau” in Proverbien 1-9: Eine exegetische und sozialge- schichtliche Studie (OBO 144; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1995); W. McKane, Proverbs: A New Approach (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970); R. Murphy, Proverbs (WBC 22; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998); A. Steinmann, "Proverbs 1-9 as a Solomonic Composition," JETS 43 (2000) 659-74; B. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); R. N. Whybray, The Book of Proverbs: A Survey of Modern Study (HBI 1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995). D. A. Garrett

DISPUTATION

The term disputation indicates an argument between two or more parties (Murphy, 175-76). Another term for this is debate. A disputation centers on an issue for which the parties present arguments in favor of their opinion. Disputes can be rational and reasoned, passionate and angry, or a combination of the two. A literary disputation allows for the presentation of two or more sides of an issue. The dispute could end without resolution, but if it does come to a conclusion, then the genre serves the purpose of showing how one position on a matter is better than another.

The disputation form occurs in different parts of biblical literature. The prophets, for example, often used disputation to challenge their audience to confront their betrayal of God and his law* (Graffy). Malachi, in particular, is shaped by six individual disputations (Mal 1:2-5; 1:6—2:9; 2:10-16; 2:17—3:5; 3:6-12; 3:13—4:3). The prophetic corpus, however, is outside the scope of the present volume. Accordingly, this article focuses on the use of disputation in the book of Job*.

The genre of Job as a whole has been variously identified, some even concluding that it is sui generis. There is no question, however, that the book heavily depends on the debate form to carry forward its message. Thus, it is important to explore the nature of the genre to understand the book of Job.

1. Disputation in Job
2. The Scope of Disputation in Job
3. Resolution
4. The Rhetorical Function of Disputation
5. Ancient Near Eastern Disputation
6. Summary

1. Disputation in Job.

Job clearly contains disputation in Job 4—27.

Disagreement exists over how extensive the form is in the book. We will consider some other candidates for this literary label after describing the argument between Job and his friends. As we enter the discussion, we should note that the disputation form itself utilizes many different literary forms and devices. R. Alden (35) names the following: "word pictures, metaphors, similes, tightly reasoned logic, prayers, irony, insults, insinuations, protestations, exaggerations, fabrications, and interrogations." In addition, the author of Job makes extensive use of complaints, laments and lawsuits.

1.1. Job and His Three Friends (Job 4—27).

The heart of the book of Job features a disputation between Job and his three friends. The argument begins in Job 4 in the context of Job's suffering*. The prose preface of the book introduces Job as a pious man who enjoys the blessings of God. An accuser ("the Satan*") raises questions about Job's motivation, suggesting to God that his godly behavior is motivated by reward and not by true devotion. God then allows Satan to afflict Job in two phases (Job 1:13-22; 2:7-10) to see if Job would turn against God. Job passes the test, whereupon he is visited by three friends: Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar. They come to console him and sit with him for seven days in silence (Job 2:11-13).

Finally, the silence is broken by Job, who utters a heartrending lament, bemoaning his condition and wishing he would die, indeed that he had never been born (Job 3). This lament transforms Job's comforters into disputants as they argue over the cause of and solution to his suffering. This debate continues from Job 4 to Job 27 and takes place in three rounds with each of the three friends speaking in turn with Job responding to them individually.

1.1.1. The Issue: Wisdom. It is true that Job's suffering is the trigger of the argument, but a deeper issue emerges as the debate proceeds. As they offer opinions about the cause and solution to Job's suffering, the friends present themselves as wise men. On one level, wisdom is a very practical concept in the ancient Near East, including ancient Israel. Wisdom involved a skill of living, knowing how to maximize success and minimize problems, and how to get out of a problem as quickly and easily as possible. The admonitions, warnings and observations of Proverbs 10—31, for example, serve the purpose of giving principles of living that allow for such success.

The three friends claim to have the wisdom necessary to help Job. They identify Job's problem as sin. They operate with the assumption that sin leads to suffering. They reason, then, that people who sin will suffer, and they go on to state that it follows that if people suffer, then they must be sinners. Thus, to them, the conclusion is obvious. Job suffers; therefore, he is a sinner (Job 4:7-11; 5:5-7; 8:3-4; 11:6; 15:3-5; 18:5-21; 20:4-29; 22:6-11). The solution follows on the diagnosis. If sin is the problem, then repentance is the answer (Job 5:17-27; 8:5-7; 11:13-20; 22:21-30). Thus, they pound away on Job, asserting that he is a sinner in need of repentance.

On the other side of the debate stands Job. He responds angrily to the three friends. He has not sinned so as to deserve his present fate (Job 6:24-30; 10:1-7). He decisively rejects their argument and offers a different perspective. God is unfair (Job 9:21-24); indeed, he reverses proper *retribution (Job 12:4-6; 21:4-16). Interestingly, Job shares the three friends' retribution theology (God punishes the wicked and rewards the righteous) but believes that God has made a mistake (or worse, is unjust) in his case. Job too positions himself as a wise man over against their claim. He believes that he knows the answer to his problem: he must confront God (Job 13:3, 22-27; 22:2-12; 31:35-37), even though at times he says that even this tactic will be futile (Job 9:15-31). Occasionally, he will express the wish for an arbiter—someone who can intercede on his behalf with God—but none ever comes (Job 9:33-35).

The debate has four participants but really only two viewpoints. If there are differences between the arguments of the three friends, they are subtle at best. The three really represent one position, thus raising the question of why the book creates three rather than one debating partner for Job (see 5.2 below). Of course, having three attackers gives the impression of "piling on." It may also register the fact that the friends' viewpoint is the dominant viewpoint of the culture of the day. Further, since Job outlasts the three friends—he keeps talking even after they stop (Job 28—31)—it also is a literary strategy showing the inadequacy of their side of the debate.

Thus, the debate centers on Job's suffering. Deeper down, however, the real issue is the question of the source of wisdom. Where can wisdom be found?

1.1.2. Who Is Wise? At the heart of the debate between Job and his three friends is this question: Who is wise? Who has the correct insight into Job's suffering? Both Job and the friends set themselves up as sources of wisdom and ridicule the wisdom of the other.

Many of the speeches begin with sarcastic dismissals of the perspective of the other disputant: "How long will you say such things? Your words are a blustering wind" (Bildad [Job 8:2]); "Will your idle talk reduce men to silence?" (Zophar [Job 11:2a]); "I have heard many things like these; miserable comforters are you all! Will your long-winded speeches never end?" (Job [Job 16:2]). Often the barbs are directed specifically to the wisdom of the opponent: "But a witless man can no more become wise than a wild donkey's colt can be born a man" (Zophar, directed to Job [Job 11:12]); "Doubtless you are the people, and wisdom will die with you!" (Job to Zophar [Job 12:2]).

Many other examples could be given (Job 12:12; 13:1-2, 12; 18:1-4; 26:2-4), but the most interesting and involved of these insults appears at Job 15:1-13. After stating that Job's mind is filled with "empty notions" and his words are "the hot east wind" (Job 15:2), Eliphaz levels a number of questions at him: "Are you the first man ever born? Were you brought forth before the hills? Do you listen in on God's council? Do you limit wisdom to yourself? What do you know that we do not know? What insights do you have that we do not have?" (Job 15:7-9). These questions imply that Job is claiming great wisdom for himself. The charge that Job thinks that he was the first one ever born not only is associated with the ancient idea that wisdom is connected to old age but also more pointedly suggests that Job is identifying with none other than *Woman Wisdom herself, who was born before the hills (Prov 8:22-31).

Thus, the center of the dispute has to do with who is wise. As they seek to diagnose and remedy Job's problem, they all—Job and his friends—claim wisdom for themselves and deny it to their opponent(s).

1.1.3. The End of the Debate between Job and His Three Friends. The debate ends, unresolved, in Job 27. Neither Job nor the three friends give in to their opponents. The three friends simply go silent. Indeed, the third cycle of the debate (Job 22—27) already indicates that the friends are running out of arguments. In the first two cycles all three friends offered robust speeches that were filled with sometimes angry and always urgent language. The third cycle begins with a strong speech by Eliphaz that questions Job's piety and wisdom, but it is noticeably shorter than the first two (first speech [Job 4–5]: 48 verses; second speech [Job 15]: 35 verses; third speech [Job 22]: 30 verses). Bildad's third speech is a shadow of his earlier self (6 verses [Job 25]: 22 verses [Job 8]; 21 verses [Job 18]. Zophar's speeches in the first two rounds were fiery and substantial (20 verses [Job 11]; 29 verses [Job 20]). In the third cycle he may be completely absent (there is a debate over whether Job 27:13-23 belongs to Zophar rather than Job [see Newson; Zerafa]). With no further arguments from the friends, Job surprisingly turns to a beautiful meditation on the divine origin of wisdom (Job 28), but then he reverts to a negative view of life in a lamenting protestation of innocence and call for God to hear his case (Job 29–31).

2. The Scope of Disputation in Job.

When one thinks of disputation in Job, the debate between Job and his three friends springs immediately to mind. However, other parts of the book also have qualities of a debate, though they are not as fully developed.

2.1. God versus the Satan (Job 1–2). The prologue introduces the reader to a character who is given not a name but rather a title, “the *Satan.” Many English versions give the impression that this figure is the devil (NIV, NLT, NRSV), but there are significant reasons to doubt that this is the proper name for the devil, most notably the fact that the term in question is prefixed with the definite article (haśśāṭān, “the satan”), thus precluding it from being a proper name. It is much more likely that this figure is one of God's angelic associates who takes the position of “devil's advocate,” so to speak, but is not Satan himself (see Divine Council). The title means “the Accuser,” which is the role that he takes in reference to Job.

The Accuser has just returned to the heavenly court to give God a report on activities on earth. God asks specifically concerning Job and remarks about his piety. The Accuser gainsays not God's evaluation of Job but rather the motivation for Job's piety. This triggers a debate of sorts between God and the Accuser that results in a test to see who is right. The debate is civil and marked by God's quick willingness to agree to terms proposed by the Accuser.

The relationship between God and the Accuser is one of a dispute, but it is only important to initiate the plot and lead to the more substantial disputation between Job and the friends and ultimately to the divine responses. After all, somewhat surprisingly, God does not address the Accuser at the end of the book, though what God says in the epilogue (Job 42:6-17) gives the impression that the Accuser lost the debate.

2.2. Elihu (Job 32–37). After the debate between Job and his three friends Elihu steps into the silence (Job 32–37). He is irritated at the inability of the three to convince Job of his error. He is young and therefore had deferred to the older men, but now he appeals not to experience and observation but rather to “the spirit in a man” and “the breath of the Almighty” (Job 32:8) in his argument with Job, thus becoming yet another claimant to wisdom.

Elihu's attempt to enter the disputation, however, ultimately fails. He gives arguments similar to those of the three friends, rehashing the same ideas concerning retribution (Job 33:8-21; 34:5-20). Accordingly, no one, including Job, responds to him. Elihu too has claimed wisdom (Job 32:6-9; 36:4), but his insight does not lead to resolution. At best, this section of the book can be considered an abortive disputation.

2.3. God versus Job (Job 38:1–42:6). During the debate with the three friends Job expressed his wish to enter a disputation with God (see 1.1.1 above). Occasionally, he despaired that it would do any good, but it is interesting that his last words before God speaks to him expressed his desire for an audience with God. However, when God does appear, the audience does not go as he had hoped or thought. The divine speech is essentially a rebuke of Job's pretensions toward wisdom and an assertion of God's power and wisdom. Job does not debate; he repents (Job 40:4-5; 42:1-6).

3. Resolution.

The divine speech (Job 38:1–42:6) and the epilogue (Job 42:7-17) bring the disputation between Job and the three friends to a close. On the surface, the issue had been the cause and solution to Job's suffering, but the deeper question had to do with the source of wisdom. In the final analysis, the human participants in the drama never learn the reason for Job's suffering. Suffering remains a mystery. The question of wisdom, though, has been clearly resolved. None of human characters are wise; they all failed in their analysis of the situation. Only God is wise. Although this was a solution anticipated earlier by Job himself (Job 28), it did not bring him to personal resolution (Job 29–31). God had to intervene and appear to Job in order to set him straight.

4. The Rhetorical Function of Disputation.

The disputation form is one that allows the interaction of more than one perspective on a problem and allows the reader to enter the discussion and consider the strengths and weaknesses of the different perspectives. Some modern interpreters are attracted to the disputation form because it keeps positions in flux (Newsom; Zuckermann). When treated in isolation, the disputes in Job do not mandate a resolution. It is interesting that these recent major treatments of Job often interpret the debate apart from its wider context. However, the canonical book does adjudicate between the characters and judges all human participants as wrong-minded. The book points to God as the one who has the answers and the power.

5. Ancient Near Eastern Disputation.

Perhaps it is not surprising that a vexing issue such as suffering, particularly undeserved suffering, finds treatment in disputation form, allowing for the airing of different perspectives. In the disputation section of Job no resolution emerges, but the book in which it finds its context does resolve at least one aspect of the issue (“Who is wise?”) while allowing the question of suffering to remain unanswered.

Ancient Israel is not the only culture that struggled with these questions. Other ancient Near Eastern cultures did so as well, and it is notable that two texts, one Egyptian and one Babylonian, that have been compared to Job are also disputations.

5.1. Egyptian: The Dispute of a Man with His Ba. In Egyptian we have The Dispute of a Man with His Ba (for translation, see Lichtheim, 163–69). According to Egyptian anthropology, the ba was a component of the soul, specifically that part which survived into the afterlife. This text is known by one main papyrus (P. Berlin 3024), which comes from the early Middle Kingdom period (Twelfth Dynasty). This is one of a group of pessimistic/speculative texts that were popular at the time that Egyptian culture emerges from the quagmire of the First Intermediate period (twenty-second century BC). In this case, though, the topic is not so much about political and social confusion as about individual confusion. This text is one of the most difficult to translate and then to understand. It takes the form of a disputation between a man and his ba. As noted above, ba has been roughly understood as the equivalent of soul and is even translated that way by J. Wilson (ANET, 405–7). However, although there is a general similarity between the two concepts, the concept of the ba seems more complex than that association allows. Indeed, H. Goedicke discusses the evolution of the idea of the ba through Egyptian history and the distinction between an immanent and transcendental ba. In any case, what is clear in the text is that both the man and the ba express disappointment in life. Life brings trouble. The man spurs the discussion on (as far as we know, since the beginning of this text is broken) by complaining about life and longing for death. It is disputed whether he really contemplates suicide or not, but his ba advocates acceptance rather than despondency. At the end, the man continues to praise death in a poem that includes

Death is before me today
(Like) a sick man’s recovery,
Like going outdoors after confinement.

He also looks forward to the “other side” of death:

Truly, he who is yonder will be a living god,
Punishing the evildoer’s crime.

The ba and he come to an agreement that the ba will stay with him both in this life and the next. According to Goedicke (58), the text is “the promulgation of an idealistic philosophy within which the goal is to master the shortcomings of the mundane world by knowledge of the fleetingness of corporeal existence and of a true eternal home in transcendence.”

5.2. Akkadian: The Babylonian Theodicy. In Akkadian literary tradition two texts in particular are often discussed alongside Job: Ludlul Bel Nemeqi and the Babylonian Theodicy (both are most likely composed in the second half of the second millennium BC). The former is a monologue, while the latter is a dialogue that has the form of a disputation. The Babylonian Theodicy is a dialogue between two men who are friends and keep the conversation civil, but they disagree about the relationship between suffering and the gods. The first speaker describes his suffering and his opinion that life, and the gods, are not just. At one point he raises the classic example of injustice:

Let me [put] but one matter before you:
Those who seek not after a god can go the road of favor,
Those who pray to a goddess have grown poor and destitute.
Indeed, in my youth I tried to find out the will of (my) god,
With prayer and supplication I besought my goddess.
I bore a yoke of profitless servitude:
(My) god decreed (for me) poverty instead of wealth.
A cripple rises above me, a fool is ahead of me,
Rogues are in the ascendant, I am demoted.
(COS 1.154:492-95)

The friend tries to lead him back to the road of orthodoxy by suggesting that his “logic is perverse” and that he “has cast off justice” and “scorned divine design.” The text ends, rather unexpectedly, with the friend coming around and at least partially agreeing with the sufferer’s assessment. Also, unlike Ludlul, the sufferer ends the text unrestored and requesting such from the gods.

6. Summary.

Disputation is a primary feature of the book of Job. The most heated debate takes place between Job and the three friends, but disputations of sorts, some calm, some abortive, are also seen in the prologue (God versus the Accuser) and in the Elihu monologue. The appearance of God at the end of the book brings the debate to a resolution. The debate centered on the question of the reason for Job’s suffering and how he might alleviate his pain, but the deeper issue is the claim to wisdom. All the human parties (Job, the three friends, Elihu) have asserted their wisdom and criticized the others. At the end, however, God comes and definitely states that he is all-wise (and all-powerful), a conclusion anticipated by Job (Job 28) in a temporary moment of clarity. Examination of the literature of the surrounding cultures shows at least two compositions (The Dispute of a Man with His Ba; the Babylonian Theodicy) that share the disputation form with Job. Interestingly, all three examine the struggles of human existence.

See also JOB 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; SATAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. L. Alden, Job (NAC; Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 1993); H. Goedicke, The Report about the Dispute of a Man with His ba: Papyrus Berlin 3024 (JHNES; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1970); A. Graffy, A Prophet Confronts His People: The Disputation Speech in the Prophets (AnBib 104; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1984); J. E. Hartley, The Book of Job (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); M. Lichtheim, Ancient Egyptian Literature, vol. 1 (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973); R. E. Murphy, Wisdom Literature: Job, Proverbs, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, and Esther (FOTL; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); C. Newsom, The Book of Job: A Contest of Moral Imaginations (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003); S. H. Scholnick, “Poetry in the Courtroom: Job 38-41,” in Directions in Hebrew Poetry, ed. E. R. Follis (JSOTSup 40; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987) 185-204; K. van der Toorn, “The Ancient Near Eastern Literary Dialogue as a Vehicle of Critical Reflection,” in Dispute Poems and Dialogues in the Ancient and Medieval Near East: Forms and Types of Literary Debates in Semitic and Related Literatures, ed. G. J. Reinink and H. L. J. Vanstiphout (OLA 42; Leuven: Departement Oriëntalistiek, 1991) 59-70; P. P. Zerafa, The Wisdom of God in the Book of Job (SUSTU 8; Rome: Herder, 1978); B. Zuckermann, Job the Silent: A Study in Historical Counterpoint (New York: Oxford University Press, 1991).

T. Longman III

DIVINE COUNCIL

The term divine council is used by Hebrew and Semitics scholars to refer to the heavenly host, the pantheon of divine beings who administer the affairs of the cosmos. All ancient Mediterranean cultures had some conception of a divine council. The divine council of Israelite religion, known primarily through the psalms, was distinct in important ways.

1. Textual Evidence
2. Monotheism in the Hebrew Bible and the Divine Council

3. The Divine Council, Jewish Binitarianism and New Testament Christology

1. Textual Evidence.

1.1. The Council of the Gods/God. Comparison of the Hebrew Bible with other ancient religious texts reveals overlaps between the divine councils of the surrounding nations and Israel's version of the heavenly bureaucracy. The parade example is the literature from Ras Shamra (Ugarit). Translated shortly after their discovery in the 1930s, these tablets contain several phrases describing a council of gods that are conceptually and linguistically parallel to the Hebrew Bible. The Ugaritic council was led by "El," the same proper name used in the Hebrew Bible for the God of Israel (e.g., Is 40:18; 43:12). References to the "council of El" include phr 'ilm ("the assembly of El/ the gods" [KTU 1.47:29; 1.118:28; 1.148:9]); phr bn 'ilm ("the assembly of the sons of El/the gods" [KTU 1.4.III:14]); mphrt bn 'il ("the assembly of the sons of El" [KTU 1.65:3; cf. 1.40:25, 42]); dr bn 'il ("assembly [circle, group] of the sons of El" [KTU 1.40:25, 33-34]); 'dt 'ilm ("assembly of El/the gods" [KTU 1.15.II:7, 11]). Phoenician texts, such as the Karatepe inscription, also describe a Semitic pantheon: wkl dr bn 'lm ("and all the circle/group of the sons of the gods" [KAI 26.III.19; 27.12]).

The 'dt 'ilm ("assembly of El/the gods") of Ugaritic texts represents the most precise parallel to the data of the Hebrew Bible. Psalm 82:1 uses the same expression for the council ('dt 'ilm), along with an indisputably plural use of the word 'ēlōhīm ("God, gods"): "God ['ēlōhīm] stands in the council of El/the divine council [ba'adat 'ēl]; among the gods ['ēlōhīm] he passes judgment." The second occurrence of 'ēlōhīm must be plural due to the preposition "in the midst of." The Trinity cannot be the explanation for this divine plurality, since the psalm goes on to detail how Israel's God charges the other 'ēlōhīm with corruption and sentences them to die "like humankind." Psalm 89:5-7 (89:6-8 MT) places the God of Israel "in the assembly of the holy ones" (biqhal qēdōšīm) and then asks, "For who in the clouds can be compared to Yahweh? Who is like Yahweh among the sons of God [bēnē 'ēlīm], a god greatly feared in the council of the holy ones [bēsōd qēdōšīm]?" Psalm 29:1 commands the same sons of God (bēnē 'ēlīm) to praise Yahweh and give him due obeisance. These heavenly "sons of God" (bēnē 'ēlōhīm or bēnē hā'ēlōhīm) appear in other biblical texts (Gen 6:2, 4; Deut 32:8-9, 43 [LXX, Qumran]; Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7) (Heiser 2001).

Another biblical Hebrew term matching Ugaritic terminology is dōr, which often means "generation" but, as with Ugaritic and Phoenician dr, may also refer to the "circle" (group) of gods—that is, the divine council (Amos 8:14 [emendation]; Ps 49:19 [49:20 MT]; 84:10 [84:11 MT]).

1.2. The Abode and Meeting Place of the Divine Council. At Ugarit the divine council and its gods met on a cosmic mountain, the place where heaven and earth intersected and where divine decrees were issued. This place was at the "source of the two rivers" (mbk nhrm) in the "midst of the fountains of the double-deep" (qrb 'apq thmtm). This well-watered mountain was the place of the "assembled congregation" (phr m'd). El dwelt on this mountain and, with his council, issued divine decrees from the "tents of El" (dd 'il) and his "tent shrine" (qrš [KTU 1.1.III:23; 1.2.III:5; 1.3.V:20-21; 1.4.IV:22-23; 1.6.I:34-35; 1.17.VI:48]). In the Kirta Epic, El and the gods live in "tents" ('ahlm) and "tabernacles" (mšknt [KTU 1.15.3.18-19]). The Ugaritic god Baal, the deity who oversaw the council for El (see 1.3 below), held meetings in the "heights" (mrym) of the mountain Šapānu, apparently located in a range of mountains that included El's own abode. In Baal's palace in Šapānu there were "paved bricks" (lbnt) that made Baal's house "a house of the clearness of lapis lazuli" (bht thrm 'iqn'um).

These descriptions are present in the Hebrew Bible with respect to Israel's God and his council. Yahweh dwells on mountains (Sinai or Zion [e.g., Ex 34:26; 1 Kings 8:10; Ps 48:1-2]). The Jerusalem temple is said to be located in the "heights of [yarkētē] the north [šāpôn]" (Ps 48:1-2). Zion is the "mount of assembly" (har mō'ed), again located in yarkētē šāpôn (Is 14:13). Additionally, Mount Zion is described as a watery habitation (Is 33:20-22; Ezek 47:1-12; Joel 3:18; Zech 14:8). A tradition preserved in Ezekiel 28:13-16 equates the "holy mountain of God" with Eden, the "garden of God." Eden appears in Ezekiel 28:2 as the "seat of the gods" (mōšab 'ēlōhīm). The description of Eden in Genesis 2:6-15 refers to the "ground flow" that "watered the entire face of the earth." At Sinai, Moses and others saw Yahweh and feasted with him (Ex 24). The description of this banquet includes the observation that under God's feet was a paved construction of "sapphire stone" (libnat hassappîr [Ex 24:10]), just as with Baal's dwelling. Other striking parallels include Yahweh's frequent presence in the tabernacle (mîskan [Ps 26:8; 74:7]) and Zion as Yahweh's tent ('ôhel [Is 33:20; cf. 1 Chron 9:23]).

1.3. The Structure and Bureaucracy of the Divine Council. The council at Ugarit apparently had four tiers (Smith 2001, 41-53). The top tier consisted of El and his wife Athirat (Asherah). The second tier was the domain of their royal family ("sons of El"; "princes"). One member of this second tier served as the vicegerent of El and was, despite being under El's authority, given the title "most high" (Wyatt, 419). A third tier was for "craftsman deities," while the lowest tier was reserved for the messengers (ml'km), essentially servants or staff. In Ugaritic council scenes lower deities are established or granted spheres of authority and at times are depicted as challenging or confronting El (KTU 1.3.V.19-36; 1.6.I.36-55; 1.4.VII.21-25; 1.16.V.26-27) (see Handy 1993).

Evidence for exactly the same structures in the Israelite council is tenuous. Despite the fact that popular Israelite religion may have understood Yahweh as having a wife, Asherah (see Hess), it cannot be sustained that the religion of the prophets and biblical writers contained this element or that the idea was permissible. There is also no real evidence for the craftsman tier. However, the role of the śātān (see Satan), the accuser who openly challenges God on the matter of Job's spiritual resilience, is readily apparent (Job 1:6-12; 2:1-6). In the divine council in Israelite religion Yahweh was the supreme authority over a divine bureaucracy that included a second tier of lesser 'ēlōhîm (bēnē 'ēlîm; bēnē 'ēlōhîm or bēnē hā'ēlōhîm) and a third tier of mal'ākîm ("angels"). In the book of *Job some members of the council apparently have a mediatory role with respect to human beings (Job 5:1; 15:8; 16:19-21; cf. Heb 1:14).

The vicegerent slot in the Israelite council represents the most significant difference between Israel's council and all others. In Israelite religion this position of authority was filled not by another god but by Yahweh himself in another form. This "hypostasis" of Yahweh was the same essence as Yahweh but a distinct, second person. This is most plainly seen via the Name theology of the Hebrew Bible and the so-called angel of Yahweh (for the angel's connection to the Name, the essence of Yahweh, see Ex 23:20-33; see Heiser 2004, 34-67).

2. Monotheism in the Hebrew Bible and the Divine Council.

2.1. Biblical Polytheism? Many scholars have concluded that the presence of a divine council in the Hebrew Bible means that Israel's religion was at one time polytheistic (there are many gods) or henotheistic (there are many gods, but one is preferred) and only later evolved to monotheism. Polytheism and monolatrous henotheism both presume "species sameness" among the gods. Henotheism in particular assumes the possibility of a power struggle for supremacy in the council, where the supreme authority could be displaced if another god defeats or outwits him. This does not reflect orthodox Israelite religious belief. The biblical data indicate that orthodox Israelite religion never considered Yahweh as one among equals or near equals. The biblical writers refer exclusively to Yahweh as "the God" (hā'ēlōhîm [1 Kings 18:39]) when that term occurs with respect to a singular entity. Yahweh is the "true God" ('ēlōhîm 'ēmet [Jer 10:10]). The assertion points to the belief that although Yahweh was an 'ēlōhîm, he was qualitatively unique among the 'ēlōhîm. The primary distinguishing characteristic of Yahweh from any other 'ēlōhîm was his preexistence and creation of all things (Is 45:18), including the "host of heaven" (Ps 33:6; 148:1-5; cf. Neh 9:6), language that at times clearly refers to the other divine beings (cf. 1 Kings 22; Job 38:7-8; Is 14:13; cf. Deut 4:19-20; 32:8-9, 43 [LXX, Qumran] with Deut 17:3; 29:25; 32:17). Yahweh's utter uniqueness against all other 'ēlōhîm is monotheism on ancient Semitic terms, and orthodox Israelite religion reflects this at all stages.

2.2. Plural 'ēlōhîm as Human Beings? Many scholars understand the plural 'ēlōhîm of Psalms 82; 89 as human rulers, the elders of Israel, no doubt due to the specter of polytheism. This position is highly problematic. If these 'ēlōhîm are humans, why are they sentenced to die "like humans"? A clear contrast is intended by both the grammar and structure of the Hebrew text (Prinsloo; Handy 1990). At no time in the Hebrew Bible did Israel's elders ever have jurisdiction over all the nations. There is no scriptural basis for the idea that God presides over a council of humans that governs the nations of the earth. In fact, the situation is exactly the opposite: Israel was separated from the nations to be God's own possession, while the other nations were abandoned by Yahweh to the rule of other 'ēlōhīm in the wake of the incident at Babel (Deut 4:19-20; 32:8-9 [LXX, Qumran]; cf. Dan 10:13, 20; see Heiser 2001). It is also difficult to see how the corrupt decisions of a group of humans would shake the foundations of the earth (Ps 82:5). Furthermore, it is clear from Psalm 89:6-7 (89:7-8 MT) that the "sons of God" (bēnē 'ēlīm) in "the council of the holy ones" (bēšōd qēdōšīm) meet "in the clouds" (baššahaq).

The lesser 'ēlōhīm are not merely idols. Deuteronomy 32:17, when understood against a broad view of Deuteronomy's statements about gods and idols, nullifies this explanation: "They sacrificed to demons [sēdīm] who are not God [ēloah, a singular noun], to gods ['ēlōhīm] they did not know, to new gods that had come along recently, whom your fathers had not revered." If the lesser 'ēlōhīm are demons, their existence cannot be denied. One psalmist (Ps 97:7), while mocking the lifeless idols, demands that the lesser 'ēlōhīm *worship Yahweh—a puzzling command if there were no such entities.

2.3. "No Other Gods Beside Me"? How is one to reconcile Israel's divine council with statements in the Hebrew Bible that "there is none beside" Yahweh? Such statements are taken by critical scholars as evidence that Israel had shed its polytheism, and by others as necessitating the strained interpretations noted above. Neither view can be sustained in light of the references to plural 'ēlōhīm and 'ēlīm in Second Temple period Jewish texts (roughly 185 in the Qumran material alone [see Heiser 2004, 189-210]) and the Jewish belief in "two powers" in heaven during that same period (Segal). Analysis of the Hebrew text demonstrates that several of the most common phrases in the Hebrew Bible allegedly used for denying the existence of other gods (e.g., Deut 4:35, 39; 32:12, 39) appear in passages that affirm the existence of other gods (Deut 4; 32). The result is that these phrases express the incomparability of Yahweh among the other 'ēlōhīm, not that the biblical writer contradicts himself or is in the process of discovering monotheism. The situation is the same in Isaiah 40–66. Isaiah 40:1-8 is familiar to scholars (via the plural imperatives in Is 40:1-2) as a divine council text (Cross; Seitz). Isaiah 40:22-26 affirms the ancient Israelite worldview that described heavenly beings with "heavenly host" terminology (Heiser 2004, 114-18). That Isaiah's "denial statements" should be understood as statements of incomparability, not as rejections of the existence of other gods, is made clear in Isaiah 47:8, 10, where Babylon boldly claims, "I am, and there is none else beside me." The claim is not that Babylon is the only city in the world, but rather that it has no rival.

Some would argue that the descriptions of a divine council are merely metaphoric. Metaphoric language, however, is not based on what a writer's view of reality excludes. Rather, the metaphor is a means of framing and categorizing something that is part of a writer's worldview. When in Exodus 15:11 the biblical writer asserts, "Who is like you, O LORD, among the gods ['ēlīm]?" or in Deuteronomy 10:17, "For the LORD your God is God of gods ['ēlōhīm]," this reflects a sincere belief and is neither dishonest nor hollow. Comparing Yahweh to the ancient equivalent of an imaginary or fictional character cheapens the praise. The psalms contain many exclamations of the incomparability of Yahweh to the other gods (Ps 86:8; 95:3; 96:4; 135:5; 136:2). David (Ps 138:1) proclaims that he will sing the praise of the God of Israel "before the gods" (neged 'ēlōhīm)—a declaration that makes little sense if lesser 'ēlōhīm did not exist.

3. The Divine Council, Jewish Binitarianism and New Testament Christology.

Numerous descriptions and epithets of Ugaritic El and Baal are attributed to Yahweh in the Hebrew Bible (Day, 13-127; Smith 2002, 32-107). This was done for polemic reasons to challenge the authority of El and Baal. For the Israelite, high sovereignty and chief administration of the cosmos was conducted only by Yahweh. Nevertheless, Israel's own divine council had a bureaucratic hierarchy, and that order is consistently described in terms of Yahweh being both the high sovereign and the vicegerent. Orthodox Israelite religion instead had Yahweh as sovereign and a second person who was Yahweh's mediating essence as the vicegerent of the council. This structure reflected Israel's belief in Yahweh's ontological uniqueness as creator of all things, including the other 'ēlōhīm of the council. The notion of two distinct deities at the top of the hierarchy was unthinkable to Israel.

This religious structure is the backdrop to the ancient Jewish acceptance of two powers in heaven (Segal). Since both powers were believed to be good, the belief does not reflect Zoroastrian influence. The belief in two powers in heaven was a contributing factor in the advent of what scholars have termed "binitarian monotheism" in Second Temple period Judaism (Hurtado 1999), which in turn contributes to our understanding of the advent of NT Christology. This contextualizes the description of Jesus as the monogenēs ("unique" [see Grudem, 1233-34]) son of God in the NT. Since the Hebrew Bible is clear that there are other sons of God (bēnē [hā] ʾēlōhim), NT writers clarify that Jesus, as the same essence as the Father, is unique among all heavenly sons of God.

See also CREATION THEOLOGY; DIVINE PRESENCE; GOD; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; ROYAL COURT; THEOPHANY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Clifford, The Cosmic Mountain in Canaan and the Old Testament (HSM 4; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1972); F. M. Cross, "The Council of Yahweh in Second Isaiah," JNES 12 (1953) 274-77; J. Day, Yahweh and the Gods and Goddesses of Canaan (JSOTSup 265; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994); W. Grudem, Systematic Theology (Leicester: Inter-Varsity Press; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994); L. K. Handy, "Sounds, Words, and Meanings in Psalm 82," JSOT 47 (1990) 60-73; idem, "The Authorization of Divine Power and the Guilt of God in the Book of Job: Useful Ugaritic Parallels," JSOT 60 (1993) 107-18; idem, Among the Host of Heaven: The Syro-Palestinian Pantheon as Bureaucracy (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1994); M. S. Heiser, "Deuteronomy 32:8 and the Sons of God," BSac 158 (2001) 52-74; idem, "The Divine Council in Second Temple Literature" (Ph.D. diss., University of Wisconsin, 2004); idem, "Monotheism, Polytheism, Monolatry, or Henotheism? Toward an Assessment of Divine Plurality in the Hebrew Bible," BBR (forthcoming); R. S. Hess, "Yahweh and His Asherah? Epigraphic Evidence for Religious Pluralism in Old Testament Times," in One God, One Lord in a World of Religious Pluralism, ed. A. D. Clarke and B. W. Winter (Cambridge: Tyndale House, 1991) 5-33; L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); idem, "The Binitarian Shape of Early Christian Worship," in The Jewish Roots of Christological Monotheism: Papers from the St. Andrews Conference on the Historical Origins of the Worship of

Jesus, ed. C. C. Newman, J. R. Davila and G. S. Lewis (JSJSup 63; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999) 187-213; Min Suc Kee, "The Heavenly Council and its Type-Scene," JSOT 31:3 (2007): 259-273; E. T. Mullen Jr., The Divine Council in Canaanite and Early Hebrew Literature (HSM 24; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1980); idem, "Divine Assembly," ABD 2.214-17; S. B. Parker, "Sons of (the) God(s)," DDD 794-98; W. S. Prinsloo, "Psalm 82: Once Again, Gods or Men?" Bib 76 (1995) 219-28; A. F. Segal, Two Powers in Heaven: Early Rabbinic Reports about Christianity and Gnosticism (SJLA 25; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977); C. R. Seitz, "The Divine Council: Temporal Transition and New Prophecy in the Book of Isaiah," JBL 109 (1990) 229-47; M. S. Smith, The Origins of Biblical Monotheism: Israel's Polytheistic Background and the Ugaritic Texts (New York: Oxford University Press, 2001); idem, The Early History of God: Yahweh and Other Deities in Ancient Israel (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); N. Wyatt, "The Titles of the Ugaritic Storm God," UF 24 (1992) 403-24. M. S. Heiser

DIVINE PRESENCE

The dominant image of divine presence in these OT texts is that of Yahweh dwelling in the temple. The dwelling of *God in the temple is multivalent in that the holy of holies is described as the place where earth and heaven meet. Thus, Yahweh is simultaneously in heaven and in the temple (Ps 11:4), with the ark of the covenant serving as his footstool (Ps 132:7-8). From this vantage point Yahweh observes the whole creation. In tension with Yahweh's covenant presence among his people is the reality that his presence is inescapable because he is everywhere (Ps 139:7-12).

1. Descriptions of Divine Presence
2. Spirit and Angel of Yahweh
3. Blessings of Divine Presence
4. Divine Presence in Biblical Theology

1. Descriptions of Divine Presence.

1.1. Yahweh the Enthroned King. Yahweh is no mere tribal deity with sovereignty over a particular territory, "for to Yahweh is the Kingship, and he rules among the nations" (Ps 22:28). Nevertheless, he has chosen the temple in Jerusalem as the place of his special dwelling among his covenant people Israel (1 Kings 11:13; Ps 79:1). As a corollary to this, other lands are the places of other gods, as reflected in the words of

*Naomi to *Ruth regarding Orpah: “Behold, your sister in law has returned to her people and to her gods” (Ruth 1:15; cf. Deut 4:19). The relationship between land, people and deity can be seen in Ruth’s reply as well: “For where you go I will go, and where you lodge I will lodge, your people will be my people, and your God my God” (Ruth 1:16). Orpah goes to her land and her gods; Ruth goes to Israel with Naomi, and there she will serve Yahweh.

The temple in Jerusalem is the place where earth and heaven meet, and God’s presence among his people means that he is enthroned in heaven with the ark in the holy of holies as his footstool (see Beale; Wilson). This understanding is seen in the many allusions to Yahweh possessing human characteristics. From these it seems that Yahweh is conceptualized as possessing the human form of a great king on his throne, with the temple as his earthly court and the land of Israel as his domain.

1.1.1. Anthropomorphic Depictions of King Yahweh. Yahweh is characterized as possessing a face, as seeing and hearing, as having a nose and breath, as having a strong arm and hands. All of these physical characteristics communicate the reality of his noncorporeal presence. Where English translations refer to the “presence” of God, the direct expression is almost always some variation on the Hebrew root pnh (“face”). To be in the presence of God is to be before his face. It is therefore difficult to find a reference to divine presence that is not anthropomorphic, though there are allusions to non-human features, such as when Yahweh is described as having wings under which refuge may be found.

In the “presence of Yahweh” (pēnēy yhwē) (Job 1:12) Satan promises that Job will curse God “to his face” (‘al-pāneykā*) (Job 1:11; cf. Job 2:5). Job does not curse, but he does wish to plead his case before the face of God (Job 13:15) and plaintively asks why God has hidden his face (Job 13:24). When God hides his face, he is inaccessible (Job 34:29).

The blessing in Numbers 6:25, “May Yahweh cause his face to shine upon you,” is refracted through a number of psalms. For example, “Lift up the light of your face upon us” (Ps 4:6; cf. Ps 11:7; 24:6; 25:16; 27:8-9; 31:16; 36:9; 44:3; 67:1; 80:3, 7, 19; 86:16; 89:15; 118:27; 119:135). Related statements include the question of why Yahweh hides his face, the plea that he not turn his face away, and the statement that his face is against the wicked (Ps 13:1; 27:9; 34:16; 44:24; 69:19; 88:14; 102:2; 132:10; 143:7). The presence of Yahweh is likewise communicated through the expressions that he sees (e.g., Ps 10:14; 18:24; 19:14; 31:7, 22; 33:13-18; 34:15; 35:17, 22; 37:13; 51:4; Prov 3:4; 5:21) and hears (e.g., Ps 40:1; 69:33; 102:2). Yahweh’s word of promise that he will save the righteous and judge the wicked also communicates his nearness to his people (see esp. Ps 73:17-18, 23-28; cf. Deut 32:35).

Yahweh delivered Israel by means of his right hand, his outstretched arm and the light of his presence (Ps 44:3). And having planted them in the land (Ps 44:2), he is now enthroned upon their praises (Ps 22:3). The many references to him sitting on his throne (Ps 45:6; 47:8; 55:19; 97:2; 99:1) and to him being a king (e.g., Ps 10:16; 24:8, 10; 29:10; 47:2; 84:3) substantiate the impression that this stock of images comes from the fund of the conception of Yahweh as the great king in human form. His throne is in heaven, above the cherubim (Ps 80:1; 99:1), and his footstool is the ark in the holy of holies (Ps 99:5; 132:7-8; Lam 2:1).

1.1.2. The Throne Room and Surrounds of Yahweh. The fact that Yahweh is present in the temple, the place where earth and heaven meet, gives rise to a number of figures of speech that bear witness to the presence of God in Israel. By metonymy and synecdoche God’s presence is described when allusion is made (moving concentrically inward) to the land of Israel (Ps 78:54; 85:9; Prov 10:30), the land of Judah (Ps 68:16; 76:1-2), the city of Jerusalem (Ps 79:1, 3), the city of God (Ps 48:1), *Zion (Ps 147:12), the holy hill (Ps 149:2) and the holy mountain (Ps 48:1). These references reflect the perspective that this place is important because this is the land and city in which Yahweh dwells. Within the all-important city are the gates and courts of the temple (Ps 92:13; 100:4), the house (Ps 52:8), the dwelling (Ps 43:3; 46:4, 5, 7, 11), and within the temple precincts the altar and its horns (Ps 43:3; 118:27), the cherubim over the ark (Ps 80:1), the throne of Yahweh (Ps 45:6) and his footstool the ark (Ps 99:5). Mention is also made of Yahweh’s former dwelling in Shiloh, “where he dwelt among men” (Ps 78:60). These details all reflect the perspective that Yahweh is enthroned among his people with the divine council around him (Ps 82:1; 89:7). By going to the temple in Jerusalem, Israel has unique access to Yahweh. This reality creates a strong desire to go to (Ps 84:2; 122:1) and remain in Jerusalem (Ps 84:10). These many references also reflect the salvation history of the OT, where Yahweh first inhabited the tabernacle, which after the conquest of the land apparently was pitched at Shiloh, prior to the building of the temple in Jerusalem.

1.2. Other Metaphors and Prepositions.

1.2.1. Metaphors. In addition to describing Yahweh as the enthroned king reigning from Jerusalem, a number of metaphors are employed that describe what Yahweh is for his people. A representative survey of these metaphors will find that God is likened to, for instance, a rock (Ps 62:2), a hiding place (Ps 119:114), a shield (Ps 140:7; Prov 2:7-8), sheltering wings (Ps 57:1; 63:7; 91:4), a strong tower (Ps 61:3; Prov 18:10) and a dwelling place (Ps 90:1; 91:1). Each figure of speech reflects the presence of Yahweh with his people (see 3.1 below).

1.2.2. Prepositions (“With, Near, Around, Upon”). Several statements in Psalms directly say that Yahweh is with (‘et*, ‘im) (Ps 14:5; 23:4; 36:9; 91:15; 139:18), before (lipnēy) (Ps 16:8, 11; 37:7) and near (qārôb) (Ps 34:18; 73:23, 28; 75:1; 119:151) his people. These statements can be understood as anthropomorphic as well, with Yahweh depicted as a companion, such as a shepherd (Ps 23:4). Psalm 33:22 calls for Yahweh’s steadfast love to be upon (‘al) his people, and Psalm 90:17 appeals for his favor to be upon (‘al) them.

2. Spirit and Angel of Yahweh.

2.1. Spirit. In Psalm 51:11 David voices a prayer that Yahweh not take his Holy Spirit from him. When read in conjunction with the rest of the OT canon (see esp. 1 Sam 16:13-14; 28:17), this must be interpreted as a prayer from the king who is specially anointed with the Spirit for kingship in Israel. In other words, this statement does not reflect the theology of the NT, where believers are indwelt by the Holy Spirit (e.g., John 7:39; 14:17; Rom 8:9; 1 Cor 3:16; 6:19) (see 4 below). Every OT reference to the Spirit being “upon” or “in” someone in the OT marks that person as distinct. Each time someone is described in this way the Spirit enables that person to do something that no one else in Israel can. An explicit statement that the Spirit of God continually indwells the faithful of Israel on an individual basis is not found in the OT (Hamilton 2003; 2005). The other references to the Spirit in the Psalms are to his activity in creation (Ps 104:30; cf. Job 33:4), his inescapable presence (Ps 139:7; cf. Job 4:15) and, recalling the imagery of the pillar of cloud leading the people at the exodus, the Spirit leading the supplicant (Ps 143:10). In the OT, as we noted above, Yahweh indwells the temple. This can be contrasted with the NT, where there is no physical temple and God’s Spirit indwells the believing remnant.

2.2. Angel of Yahweh. Two texts in Psalms refer to the “angel of Yahweh” (mala’k yhw). In Psalm 34:7 we are told that “the angel of Yahweh encamps around those who fear him, and delivers them.” The one feared is Yahweh, thus the wording of the text draws a close connection between Yahweh and this angel who represents him. Then in Psalm 35:5-6 the angel of Yahweh drives out the wicked.

3. Blessings of Divine Presence.

The people of Israel enjoy the benefits of Yahweh’s presence among them because they are in covenant with him. The corollary is that if the covenant is broken, Yahweh’s presence is withdrawn. Since the texts testify to the wicked actually experiencing the angry presence of Yahweh (Ps 68:1-2; 78:66; 83:15; 135:8, 10; 139:19), we must conclude that this withdrawal is relational rather than physical. That is, wicked covenant-breakers do not escape God’s presence; rather, instead of his face shining on them, they experience him pursuing them in justice. The righteous psalmists often call on Yahweh to arise against their enemies (see Theophany). The blessings of Yahweh’s covenant presence with his people are both spiritual and physical, but at points physical blessings cannot be distinguished from spiritual ones.

3.1. Protection. A common statement in this portion of the OT is that Yahweh is a refuge for his people (e.g., Ruth 2:12; Ps 2:12; 4:8; 5:11; 7:1; 11:1; 12:7; 14:6; 16:1, 8; 17:7; 18:2; 25:20; 28:8; 31:1-4, 20). At one level, taking refuge in Yahweh means trusting in him for protection from one’s enemies (Ps 57:1-3; 61:3). At other levels, the refuge that Yahweh provides shields those who seek him from possible shame (Ps 71:1) or keeps the righteous from envying the wicked (Ps 73:3, 17, 28). Entering into the presence of Yahweh and taking refuge in him cause a person to desire righteousness because the reality of Yahweh exposes the sham of sin's deceitfulness.

There are many terms used to communicate the idea that Yahweh is a refuge. Several of these terms (italicized in the following quotation) are brought together in Psalm 91:1-4:

The one who dwells in the hiding place of the Most High, in the shadow of Shaddai he lodges. I will say to Yahweh, 'My refuge and my fortress; my God, I will trust in him.' For he will deliver you from the snare of the trapper, from the pestilence of destruction. With his pinions he will cover you, and under his wings you will seek refuge; his faithfulness is a shield and buckler.

Here the presence of Yahweh is likened to a fortress, which effectively removes one from the fray of combat, and also to a shield and buckler, which are protective in the midst of battle. Further, Yahweh's presence not only protects but also delivers from snares. Yahweh is often referred to as a shield (e.g., Ps 3:3; 5:12; 7:10; 18:2, 30-31; 28:7; 33:20; Prov 2:7; 30:5) and a help(er) (e.g., Ps 46:1; 54:4; 56:9; 115:9-11).

The presence of Yahweh, who sees all and has promised to judge wickedness, is what informs the fear of Yahweh (see Fear of the Lord). This healthy fear is protective in that it keeps the righteous from self-destructive behavior. This is clearly expressed in Job 31: "I made a covenant for my eyes, so how could I gaze on a virgin? And what [would be my] portion from God above, or heritage from Shaddai on high? Are not distress for the unrighteous and calamity for those who do iniquity? Does he not see my ways and number all my steps? . . . Because of the dread of the distress from God, and because of his majesty, I was unable [to sin]" (Job 31:1-4, 23).

3.2. Satisfaction. The satisfaction brought by the presence of Yahweh is at times the basic provision of human needs. For instance, in Ruth 1:6 we are told that "Yahweh visited his people to give them food." The sense in which Yahweh satisfies his people, however, is not limited to their physical needs; it also reaches into the arena of satisfaction that pertains to the joy and contentment and pleasure that result from desire realized, purpose fulfilled, emotion made full. Thus we read, "You make known to me the path of life; fullness of joy is your presence. Unending pleasures are in your right hand" (Ps 16:11).

4. Divine Presence in Biblical Theology.

The Israel of the old covenant is a localized people. In other words, the land of promise is central to their religion, and the dwelling of God in the temple constitutes Jerusalem as the focal point of the nation's religious life (for the strong land theme in the OT, see Dempster). In the OT, statements regarding the presence of God reflect the perspective that Yahweh is the king enthroned in heaven and his heavenly throne room is accessed from his earthly dwelling, the temple in Jerusalem (cf. Mt 23:21-22).

This OT perspective is radically altered through the coming of Jesus, the Messiah. Jesus declares that the time for *worship at the temple is over (Jn 4:21-24). The new-covenant people of God have no particular land, and the temple in which God dwells is no longer a physical building but the physical bodies of believers (1 Cor 3:16; 6:19). This reality is reflected in the references to the church's leaders and members being "pillars" (Gal 2:9; Rev 3:12) and "stones" being built into a dwelling of God (1 Pet 2:5; cf. Eph 2:19-22). In the old covenant, God dwells in the temple in Jerusalem, and his people worship him at the temple where he dwells. In the new covenant, God dwells in his people, and they are dispersed throughout the world, worshipping in spirit and in truth (Hamilton 2004). S. Terrien (1978) finds the theme of divine presence to be central for biblical theology.

In addition to the corporate aspect of divine presence there is the reality that God is "with" certain individuals in unique ways (see, e.g., Josh 1:5, 9; 2 Sam 5:10; Ps 23:4; 110:5; Is 7:14; 61:1). God's special presence with Jesus is cited as strong indication that he was indeed the Messiah (e.g., John 3:2; Acts 10:38) (see Alexander).

See also AFTERLIFE; DIVINE COUNCIL; PERSONIFICATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. T. D. Alexander, The Servant King: The Bible's Portrait of the Messiah (Leicester: InterVarsity Press, 1998); A. A. Anderson, "The Use of 'RUAH' in 1QS, 1QH and 1QM," JSS 7 (1962) 293-303; G. K. Beale, The Temple and the Church's Mission: A Biblical Theology of the Dwelling Place of God (NSBT 17; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004); R. E. Clements, God and Temple (Oxford: Blackwell, 1965); S. G. Dempster, Dominion and Dynasty: A Theology of the Hebrew Bible (NSBT 15; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2003); J. M. Hamilton, "God with Men in the Torah," WTJ 65 (2003) 113-33; idem, "Were Old Covenant Believers Indwelt by the Holy Spirit?" Them 30 (2004) 12-22; idem, "God with Men in the Prophets and the Writings: An Examination of the Nature of God's Presence," SBET 23.3 (2005) 166-93; idem, God's Indwelling Presence: The Holy Spirit in the Old and New Testaments (NACSBT; Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 2006); W. Hildebrandt, An Old Testament Theology of the Spirit of God (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995); W. E. March, "God with Us: A Survey of Jewish Pneumatology," ASR 83 (1967) 3-16; R. J. McKelvey, The New Temple: The Church in the New Testament (OTM; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1969); H. D. Preuss, "Ich will mit dir sein!" ZAW 80 (1968) 139-73; S. Terrien, The Elusive Presence: Toward a New Biblical Theology (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978); idem, The Psalms: Strophic Structure and Theological Commentary (ECC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); I. Wilson, Out of the Midst of the Fire: Divine Presence in Deuteronomy (SBLDS 151; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995).

J. M. Hamilton

E

ECCLESIASTES 1: BOOK OF

Ecclesiastes poses one of the more interesting hermeneutical challenges in the OT, for two reasons. First, the message of the book seems to be at odds with theological trajectories evident elsewhere in the Hebrew Scriptures. Second, at least on the surface, Ecclesiastes is dotted with noticeable internal inconsistencies.

Discussions reaching back at least to rabbinic times (Beckwith, 274-304; Hirshman) still continue, not only as to the meaning of verses here and there but also in regard to the basic message of the book as a whole. An overview of standard commentaries and introductions will quickly demonstrate that Ecclesiastes is amenable to conflicting interpretations. Is the author incoherent, insightful or confused? Is he a stark realist or merely faithless? Is he orthodox or heterodox? Is he an optimist or a pessimist? Is the final message of the book “Be like Qohelet, the wise man” or “Qohelet is wrong, so do not fall into his trap”?

Discovering the meaning and purpose of Ecclesiastes will likely continue as a back-and-forth journey between overarching concepts and smaller exegetical details, balancing the forest and the trees. But attempting to achieve such a balance seems to involve us in a vicious hermeneutical circle. How one sees the overall purpose of Ecclesiastes will affect how one handles the perplexing details of the book itself, yet that overall purpose cannot be determined apart from those same details. Of course, on one level, this is the case with any biblical book, but the problems are augmented in the case of Ecclesiastes, for it is precisely the details of the book that continue to challenge virtually any statement about its basic purpose. As one reads the book, one begins to draw conclusions about the author’s train of thought, only to find a verse or two later that the author says something that reduces one’s conclusions to ashes. This scenario is played out so often in Ecclesiastes that M. V. Fox (1999, 1-26) has argued that rather than trying to impose an internal consistency on the book, we should see that the contradictions in Ecclesiastes are actually the key to discerning its meaning (for a concise review of the issue, see Krüger, 14-19).

1. Authorship and Date
2. Frame Narration and the Message of Ecclesiastes
3. Theological Themes
4. Conclusion

1. Authorship and Date.

The very beginning of the book ascribes the words to follow as those of *Qohelet, which raises three questions: who is Qohelet, when did he live, and who is this other person introducing his words? The first two questions will be addressed here, and the third in §2 below.

1.1. Identifying Qohelet. The meaning and identity of Qohelet has eluded biblical interpreters for centuries and will continue to do so for the foreseeable future. The word is from the Hebrew root qhl. The verb means “assemble” or “summon,” and the noun qāhāl denotes an assembly or convocation. Hence, it is sometimes thought that Qohelet (Qal feminine participle) may denote a speaker in an assembly. The LXX title (Ekklesiastēs) reflects this understanding, and the titles in the Vulgate (Liber Ecclesiastes) and in English follow suit. The common English translations of Qohelet as “preacher” or “teacher” further reflect such a secondary understanding. But to attribute this meaning to Qohelet is a matter of tradition and may amount to only a best guess. The word is found nowhere outside of Ecclesiastes, nor is it defined in Ecclesiastes.

Therefore, any attempt to render the word in an English equivalent will remain inconclusive.

One thing can, however, be said with relative certainty: “Qohelet” is not someone’s name. The person in question is referred to as “king over Israel in Jerusalem” (Eccles 1:12 [cf. Eccles 1:16; 2:7, 9]). No king is known by that name, so we can safely assume that the name is a pseudonym. This hardly means, however—and it is important to bear this in mind—that the author wishes to deceive the readers. It simply means that the main character of the book is referred to as Qohelet for reasons that still elude interpreters to this day (Provan, 26-31). The more pressing question is whether this person referred to as Qohelet was indeed an actual king of Israel or whether the references to his kingship are likewise, for whatever reason, part of the author’s literary output. For many, this is the crux of the matter. To disguise the identity of an actual king by naming him “Qohelet” is one thing, but to refer to him as “son of David, king in Jerusalem” (Eccles 1:1) when he was not is problematic for some interpreters, although it need not be, since there is no reason to assume that adopting a literary persona is an act of deception.

As with any other issue in Ecclesiastes, we must look for an answer by keeping before us the forest as well as the trees. Qohelet is likely a character created by the author to make his point (Fox 1999, 372-73)—that is, a nickname adopted by the writer to maintain a Solomonic connection but distancing himself from the actual person (Longman, 4). The name “Qohelet” is not intended to be a veiled reference to an actual Israelite king, designed either to keep his identity secret or to communicate some cryptic quality. Moreover, the traditional reference to *Solomon specifically would be quite odd, given what we see in Ecclesiastes 1:16: “Look, I have grown and increased in wisdom more than anyone who has ruled over Jerusalem before me.” Only *David was before Solomon ruling in Jerusalem. It could be argued that this reference to many kings ruling in Jerusalem should not be restricted to Israelite kings but also include other occupants (e.g., Melchizedek [Gen 14:18], Adoni-zedek [Josh 10:1]). Nevertheless, this argument seems to have an air of desperation about it.

One could adduce, however, 1 Chronicles 29:25 in support of Ecclesiastes 1:16 being compatible with Solomonic authorship: “The LORD highly exalted Solomon in the sight of all Israel and bestowed on him royal splendor such as no king over Israel ever had before.” This phrase is similar to what we see in Ecclesiastes 1:16. Since the reference here in Chronicles is clearly to Solomon, it lends a certain weight to reading Ecclesiastes 1:16 as likewise referring to Solomon. But the relevance of 1 Chronicles 29:25 for supporting the Solomonic identity of Ecclesiastes 1:16 is more superficial than substantive. One would first need to explore the theological themes in Chronicles in order to determine how such a designation would have functioned in Chronicles (see Japhet 1989; 2000, 43-49). It is not a question, therefore, of refusing to take the Chronicler’s words at “face value.” It is a question of how this verse functions in the Chronicler’s overall purpose, which is to take 1 Chronicles 29:25 at face value.

As with Ecclesiastes, a reference to ancient Jerusalemite kings seems wholly out of place for the Chronicler’s ideology. One of the clear and central theological foci of Chronicles is all Israel. An isolated (and somewhat cryptic) reference to non-Israelite kings seems a bit of a stretch. The author’s purpose for designating Solomon in this way is an exercise not so much in reviewing objectively the history of Solomon as in reviewing Solomon’s reign for the benefit of the author’s postexilic community. The reference to Solomon in 1 Chronicles 29:25 is meant to evoke in the postexilic community a sense of Israel’s strong and ancient royal tradition, which they now are summoned to recapture. In other words, the past is recast in terms of present concerns.

The Chronicler is using the ancient image of Solomon to get across his contemporary theological point that their reconstructed monarchy, their return to Solomonic glory (however inchoate it might be at the time), will likewise be exalted “in the sight of all Israel” like none before. 1 Chronicles 29:25 is part of the Chronicler’s theology of Israel’s recapture of its glorious past. In fact, in view of 1 Chronicles 29:25, one could just as well, and perhaps more easily, argue precisely the opposite of what a more “plain” reading of Ecclesiastes 1:16 suggests. This verse is not a proof-text for Solomonic authorship but rather an indication that Ecclesiastes likewise participates in a postexilic theological program (on the question of dating, see 1.2 below) similar to what we see in Chronicles. Ecclesiastes too is a book that appeals to Israel's ancient past in order to address contemporary concerns. In other words, reading Ecclesiastes 1:16 in light of 1 Chronicles 29:25 supports the point to be made later (see 2.2 below) concerning Ecclesiastes 12:13: Israel's past provides the context within which to deal with the challenges of Israel's postexilic present.

In Qohelet Rabbah (composed sometime after the fifth century AD), appeal is made to 1 Kings 8:1, 22 in support of Solomonic authorship, where the verbal and nominal forms (respectively) of qhl are used in reference to Solomon's "assembling" of the leaders of Jerusalem. Hence, it was thought that Qohelet is a cryptic allusion to this episode in Solomon's life, thus identifying Qohelet with Solomon. Such a mid-rashic solution attests to the mystery surrounding the name, but there is no reason to assume that this oblique allusion is intended to identify Solomon as the author of Ecclesiastes any more than it could be intended simply to anchor the Solomonic persona. In other words, it may simply be that the intention of this allusion (assuming that it is an allusion) is to get the perceptive reader to "think Solomon when you read this."

Or, it is perfectly conceivable that the allusion is not the result of the author's own literary creativity intended only for the most perceptive readers; it may have already become an accepted designation for Solomon by the time Ecclesiastes was written—although we should readily admit that this is highly conjectural and ultimately has no exegetical payoff. Similarly, one could argue that the words of the book are Solomon's, and that the words have been recast in the postexilic period, by which time "Qohelet" had already, for whatever reason, become an accepted nickname for ancient Solomon, and so the author has Solomon referring to himself as such. But at some point an unbiased reader has to appeal to Occam's Razor. Such layered explanations have the ring of desperation, and sooner or later they weaken the point of the argument itself: Solomon authorship.

Ecclesiastes does not claim to be authored by Solomon, and the non-Solomonic authorship of Ecclesiastes is the least problematic position in view of the points made above. This is in harmony with the observation concerning the book's attitude toward kingship. It is often pointed out that the royal persona seems to recede into the background quite quickly (Longman, 4-8). We read of kingly activities from Ecclesiastes 1:12—2:16, but by the time we get to Ecclesiastes 3, the theme of Qohelet's royal explorations is forgotten (Fox 2004, x; for a contrary view, see the full discussion in Christianson, 128-47). In Ecclesiastes 4:13-16 the author seems aloof toward kingship. By the time we get to Ecclesiastes 5:9, he is critical. In Ecclesiastes 8:2-4 and Ecclesiastes 10:20 we see not-so-veiled references to the king being a threat.

1.2. The Hebrew of Ecclesiastes and the Dating of the Book. The language and style of Ecclesiastes have instigated considerable debate among linguists, although it is fair to say that a preexilic date, based on linguistic factors, is the most common position. F. Delitzsch, writing in 1877, is often cited in this regard: "If the Book of Koheleth were of old Solomonic origin, then there is no history of the Hebrew language" (Delitzsch, 190). The point here is that the language of Ecclesiastes is, by all standards of our knowledge of the historical development of *Hebrew, unambiguously of later origin. Likewise, the nineteenth-century Princeton OT scholar W. H. Green, of no mean conservative pedigree, although ambivalent about the matter for some time, conceded later in his career that the language of Ecclesiastes "stands alone in the Bible," and then (a bit reluctantly) he concurred with Delitzsch: "After all that has been said, however, we do not see how the argument from the language can be met. We conclude, therefore, that it is decisive. . . . It is alleged, and the fact seems to be, that the Hebrew of this book is so Aramean [i.e., Aramaic] that it must belong to a period later than Solomon" (Green, 56).

In fact, the similarities between the Hebrew of Ecclesiastes and Aramaic, which did not begin to exert an international influence until the seventh century BC, had led scholars at one time to propose an Aramaic original of Ecclesiastes that was then translated into Hebrew (e.g., Burkitt; Zimmermann; Torrey; for argument against an Aramaic original, see Gordis). Although this theory has not gained scholarly assent, it illustrates the depth of the problem.

Several linguistic indicators in Ecclesiastes suggest a postexilic date (on the following, see more fully Seow, 11-21). (1) The increased use of vowel letters in Ecclesiastes is more consistent with exilic and postexilic developments as seen in their dramatic increase by the time of the *Dead Sea Scrolls. (2) The Persian words pardēs (“garden” [Eccles 2:5]) and pitgām (“sentence” [Eccles 8:11]) suggest a time when Persian influenced Hebrew. Although this does not absolutely and necessarily indicate a postexilic setting, it should be pointed out that Persian loanwords occur in the Bible only in books of demonstrably postexilic date (e.g., Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, *Esther). (3) As mentioned above, there is significant Aramaic influence on Ecclesiastes. As with the Persian words, Aramaic influence in isolation does not necessarily prove a late date, but the sheer frequency of these terms suggests more than just a general international “influence”; it suggests an historical setting for the book. (4) Certain grammatical elements are more consistent with an exilic or postexilic date—for example, frequency of the relative pronoun šē-; exclusive use of the first-person pronoun ʾāni instead of ʾānōkī; expanded use of ʾēt/et- beyond that of direct-object marker; the feminine demonstrative zōh rather than zōʾt; use of third-person masculine pronominal suffix for feminine plural antecedents; negation formed by ʾen plus the infinitive in Ecclesiastes 3:14 instead of lōʾ plus the imperfect. (5) Seow (21-36) also notes that the abundance of economic terms (e.g., “money,” “riches,” “profit,” “account,” “salary,” “success”) bespeaks a Persian-period monetary and commercial economy, since the minting of coins (daric) only began under Darius I in 515 BC (but see Rudman, 15-16, who argues for a Hellenistic date).

Although a postexilic date for Ecclesiastes is the consensus position, arguments to the contrary have been adduced (for a judicious appreciation for these arguments, see Longman, 11-15). One of the more respected, and often cited (by both supporters and detractors), works is the 1988 monograph by D. C. Fredericks. His main observation is that linguistic data place Ecclesiastes no later than the exilic period and possibly preexilic. A general preexilic date, however, still leaves us very far from a demonstration of Solomonic authorship. Fredericks’s arguments have not achieved a consensus (see, e.g., Schoors 1992, 221-24). Regardless, his arguments provide a helpful balance to those who would date Ecclesiastes to as late as the second century BC—that is, bearing the marks of the influence of Mishnaic Hebrew (e.g., Whitley; but see the contrary argument by Isaksson). Debate certainly will continue concerning a more precise dating of Ecclesiastes, but it is unlikely that arguments for authorship in Solomon’s time will gain academic support. Any arguments for an early date would gain acceptance only if the linguistic arguments were first met. Until such time, the aforementioned positions of Delitzsch and Green can be employed as a base for subsequent discussion.

2. Frame Narration and the Message of Ecclesiastes.

2.1. The Frame. Understanding the macrostructure of Ecclesiastes is vital for discerning the message of the book as a whole. What strikes the reader is the book begins (Eccles 1:1-11) with the voice of a narrator. Beginning at Ecclesiastes 1:12 and extending to Ecclesiastes 12:7, the narrator gives way to Qohelet’s own voice (with the interesting exception of Eccles 7:27). The narrator’s voice resumes in the conclusion, Ecclesiastes 12:8-14 (or epilogue, although some commentators refer to Eccles 12:13-14 as the epilogue).

How does this narrator’s voice function in the book? After the general introduction of Ecclesiastes 1:1 (“The words of Qohelet, son of David, king in Jerusalem”), we read the narrator’s evaluation of Qohelet’s words in Ecclesiastes 1:2 (indeed, his summation of Qohelet’s teaching). This is repeated virtually verbatim in Ecclesiastes 12:8 (see Inclusion).

hābēl hābālīm ʾāmar qōhelet hābēl hābālīm
hakkōl hābēl (Eccles 1:2)
hābēl hābālīm ʾāmar haqqōhelet hakkōl hābēl
 (Eccles 12:8)

“Meaningless! Meaningless!” says the Teacher. “Utterly meaningless!
 Everything is meaningless.” (Eccles 1:2)
 “Meaningless! Meaningless!” says the Teacher. “Everything is meaningless!”
 (Eccles 12:8)

Since Ecclesiastes 1:2 and Ecclesiastes 12:8 “frame” the book in this way, the author of the entire book is sometimes referred to as the *frame narrator. Appreciating this structure will help bring a greater understanding of how the book as a whole fits together. Toward that end, any argument that seeks an “original” skeptical book of Qohelet (Eccles 1:12—12:7) to which is clumsily added a later “orthodox” framework is purely conjectural and based on faulty assumptions of what is and is not appropriate for a biblical book to contain. In this regard, the frame narrator's introduction should be taken at face value. There should be no doubt as to what Ecclesiastes is about. We are told explicitly in Ecclesiastes 1:1-2: "The words of Qohelet, son of David, king in Jerusalem. 'Meaningless! Meaningless!' says Qohelet. 'Utterly meaningless! Everything is meaningless.'"

There is no mystery here. The frame narrator is telling the readers what they are about to hear. The problems begin to arise, however, when we presume that the frame narrator's words, even here, represent a negative evaluation rather than simply an attempt to express succinctly the point of Qohelet's words. Yet the remainder of the introduction simply continues in this vein. There is no attempt here to "correct" or sanitize the tone of what will occupy the middle section of the book.

The presence of a third-person frame and a first-person middle raises the question of whether there is one author or two—that is, whether one person is responsible for the first-person discourse and another person for adding on the frame. Some of the motivation for such thinking can be traced to early critical studies, where the search for sources dominated the scholarly landscape. I see no reason not to view the frame narrator as the author of the book, regardless of whatever independent prehistory there might have been for the middle section, although this too is a conjecture (see also Longman, 21). The more active issue, as indicated above, is whether Qohelet is (1) a fictional character created by the frame narrator or (2) the frame narrator's own alter ego, but here too this issue cannot be settled definitively, nor is it vital to do so. Either way, Qohelet represents a point of view about which the frame narrator feels strongly enough to lay out patiently for his readers over 203 of the 221 total verses in the book. There is clearly something here, some lesson that readers are expected to discern. The frame narrator has already given us a fairly explicit map.

2.2. The Epilogue. The epilogue (Eccles 12:8-14) provides a summary and evaluation of Qohelet's words. The basic question is this: Does the narrator give a fundamentally negative or positive evaluation of the content of the book? Or put differently: Is the purpose of the epilogue to correct the errant theology of Qohelet or to confirm Qohelet's observations? Of course, in reality the matter is more complex than either-or, and the final solution likely contains elements of both. The view taken here is that the epilogue is in fundamental support of Qohelet's observations while at the same time offering a mild corrective (on this, see also Bartholomew, 95-96; Fox 1999, 371, 373; Seow, 38; Provan, 36).

To demonstrate this point, we focus on the last two verses of the epilogue, Ecclesiastes 12:13-14 (for a fuller treatment, see Enns). The book of Ecclesiastes ends thus: "Now all has been heard; here is the conclusion of the matter: Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man [kol-hā'ādām]. For God will bring every deed into judgment, including every hidden thing, whether it is good or evil" (Eccles 12:13-14). Our focus here is the last two words of Ecclesiastes 12:13, kol-hā'ādām (lit., "all the man"), translated in the NIV as "the whole duty of man."

It is a widely recognized notion that the epilogue intentionally picks up on the language and themes of Qohelet's discourse (see Shead). The phrase kol-hā'ādām, which concludes Ecclesiastes 12:13, is found three other times in the book: Ecclesiastes 3:13; 5:19 (5:18 MT); 7:2 (fourteen times elsewhere in the OT, but these instances are of no consequence for understanding Ecclesiastes). It may be suspected that the author's use of this phrase in Ecclesiastes 12:13 is not meant to be an isolated comment but rather is to be read in light of these previous occurrences. Briefly put, in Ecclesiastes 3:13 and Ecclesiastes 5:19 (5:18 MT), the so-called carpe diem passages, Qohelet affirms that kol-hā'ādām ("everyone") is to enjoy pleasure in daily existence. In Ecclesiastes 7:2 Qohelet observes that death is the end (sōp) of kol-hā'ādām. Pleasure and death are two important, indeed, dialectical and pivotal, theological themes in Qohelet's discourse, and the emphatic phrase kī-zeh kol-hā'ādām ("Indeed, this is the whole duty of man" [see 2.2.3 below]) in Ecclesiastes 12:13 should be understood as Qohelet's final reflection on these themes.

2.2.1. kol-hā'ādām and Pleasure in Ecclesiastes 3:13; 5:19 (5:18 MT). The first instance of kol-hā'ādām is found in Ecclesiastes 3:13, where Qohelet considers the value of pleasure and enjoyment: "I know that there is nothing better for men than to be happy and do good while they live. That everyone [kol-hā'ādām] may eat and drink, and find satisfaction in all his toil—this is the gift of God” (Eccles 3:12-13).

The NIV blunts the force of the Hebrew phrase somewhat. Perhaps a better way of translating it here, at least for the purpose of drawing out its theological connections with other passages in Ecclesiastes, is “Moreover, the whole [duty] of man is that he should eat.” When we handle this phrase here the way in which it is typically understood in Ecclesiastes 12:13, the contrast between them becomes apparent—which exactly is kol-hā'ādām? Is it to enjoy the simple pleasures of life, as Ecclesiastes 3:13 has it, or is it to fear God and keep his commandments, as we see in Ecclesiastes 12:13?

The contrast between the two becomes more apparent when we consider the tone of resignation that surrounds Ecclesiastes 3:12-13. Ecclesiastes 3:12 states, “There is nothing better than . . .” (see also Eccles 2:24; 3:22; 8:15). This section follows Ecclesiastes 3:1-9, which likewise (despite Pete Seeger’s optimistic interpretation in the song “Turn, Turn, Turn”), reflects Qohelet’s resignation to the inevitability of the cycles of life (note the “pessimistic” evaluation of Eccles 3:1-9 given in Eccles 3:9: “What does the worker gain from his toil?” [see Rudman, 89-91]). In fact, Qohelet is revisiting here the theme already introduced by the frame narrator in Ecclesiastes 1:1-11. The recurring cycles of life demonstrate that there is no yitrôn, no surplus or profit (“gain” in Eccles 1:3 NIV), and it is this fact that renders all of life hebel (NIV: “meaningless”); that is, all human activity is ultimately hebel because no human activity produces yitrôn. This is the lesson so clearly illustrated in Ecclesiastes 1:5-7. The sun, wind and streams labor, but in the end they are no better off than when they started. No profit or surplus results from their struggles. This drama of nature will be played out on the human stage repeatedly in Ecclesiastes: since death levels the playing field for all, and since “you can’t take it with you,” it is the inevitability of death that insures that no human activity will provide anyone with a profit or surplus (see, e.g., Eccles 3:19-22). It is this fact that renders life under the sun hebel.

It is within this larger context of resignation that kol-hā'ādām in Ecclesiastes 3:13 must be understood. Qohelet resigns himself to the fact that eating, drinking and “experiencing what is good” (rā'ā tōb) are what God gives everyone to do; this is God’s “gift” (mattat), not in the sense of a festive present but rather as that which God has assigned for us to do. It is the procurement of mundane benefits, such as eating, drinking and getting some simple pleasures out of life, that, even though there is no “profit” in them, are the very things that everyone can and should do during the days of one’s existence. These are the activities that counter, albeit ultimately unsuccessfully, the absurdity of life “under the sun” (understood, I take it, to mean “the land of the living” [i.e., expansively], and not in contrast to a “heavenly” perspective [i.e., restrictively]; for the latter, see Seow, 104-5; Lohfink, 37; for the former, see Longman, 66). And life is absurd in the face of death’s inexorable final blow. Finally, Ecclesiastes 3:14-15 continues Qohelet’s rather pessimistic appraisal of the human situation. What God has done, the recurring cycle of times and humanity’s meager lot in life, are God’s doing and cannot be changed. Things will always (lě'ōlām) be this way. They cannot be added to (ysp) or taken away from (gr). The purpose for which God has done it so is “so that they [humanity] will fear [yr] him.” Precisely what Qohelet means by “fear” can be debated, but certainly it seems to be bound up in the frustrating incomprehensibility of the inevitability that there is nothing new under the sun, a point aptly made in Ecclesiastes 3:15a: “That which is already was, and what will be already was.”

The rhythm of life “under the sun” (another recurring theme in Ecclesiastes) does not change, which is the summation of Qohelet’s thoughts in Ecclesiastes 1:1-11. In the timing of the circumstances of life, scrutable only to God, the summation of humanity’s existence is to accept as God’s gift the simple pleasures that come from one’s labor. This is what, according to Ecclesiastes 3:13, is for “everyone”; this is what is kol-hā'ādām.

As with Ecclesiastes 3:13, so also Ecclesiastes 5:19 (5:18 MT) is a carpe diem passage set within a larger context: “Moreover, everyone [kol-hā'ādām] to whom God gives wealth and possessions, he gives him the ability to partake of them, to accept his lot and rejoice in his labors. This is a gift from God.”

The sentiment expressed here is very similar to that of Ecclesiastes 3:10-15, a point borne out by a number of similarities in wording. Ecclesiastes 5:18 repeats the triad “eat, drink, experience good” of Ecclesiastes 3:13. Moreover, this activity is what Qohelet calls “fitting” (yāpeh), thus echoing the notion of God’s fitting activity of ordering the rhythms of life (Eccles 3:11). This passage also speaks of what God has given (mattat) to humanity (Eccles 5:19), although here it is summed up a bit differently. Whereas Ecclesiastes 3:13 speaks simply of eating, drinking, and experiencing good as humanity’s kol-hā’ādām, in Ecclesiastes 5:19 the thought is added that God gives humanity wealth (’ōšer), possessions (nēkāsīm), and the ability to partake of these things, to accept one’s lot (hēleq), and to rejoice in one’s labor (’āmāl).

Qohelet’s admonition to his readers to content themselves with the pleasures of this life as their portion (hēleq) is his attempt to construct meaning in a world where meaning, at least for him, has collapsed. But his calls to seize the day, however sincere, are repeatedly relativized by the universal inevitability of death. It is the fact of death that renders all human activity without yitrôn, without profit. There is no payoff ultimately to anything we do, since we, like the animals, will die (Eccles 3:19).

2.2.2. kol-hā’ādām and Death in Ecclesiastes 7:2. The juxtaposition of death and carpe diem in Ecclesiastes creates a tension that is not resolved until the end of the book. In the meantime, Ecclesiastes 7:2 explicitly ties the theme of death to kol-hā’ādām: “It is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting, because that is the end of everyone [sōp kol-hā’ādām]; the living should take this to heart.”

Death is a dominant theme in Ecclesiastes (see Burkes). The specter of death routinely nullifies whatever positive conclusions Qohelet might draw. There are a number of explicit references to death in the book (Eccles 2:14-16; 3:2, 19-21; 4:2-3; 5:15-16; 6:3-6; 7:1-2, 4, 17, 26; 8:8; 9:2-12; 11:8; 12:5-6). Although Ecclesiastes 7:2 is the place where Qohelet laments that death is specifically kol-hā’ādām, the notion is implied throughout the book. Qohelet’s focus on death is disproportionate to what is found elsewhere in the Hebrew Scriptures. As S. Burkes (75) puts it, “With Qohelet . . . death makes its entrance into the Hebrew traditions as a phenomenon to be reckoned with.”

Burkes attempts to locate Qohelet’s preoccupation with death in the context of larger paradigm shifts in the postexilic world. Specifically, she focuses on Egyptian biographies that share certain themes with Ecclesiastes. Both Ecclesiastes and these Egyptian biographies are part of a larger paradigm shift (Burkes is very careful not to argue for any direct dependence) fueled by “permutations” in the “power structures of the ancient world . . . that were felt far and wide” (Burkes, 6). For the author of Ecclesiastes, who passed his days in such a time of upheaval, death “represents the chief flaw that embraces and subsumes all other problems in the world” (Burkes, 2).

In exile the Israelites began to struggle to come to grips with their lost glory. The status of the group was uncertain, and so the question of the individual’s fate began to present itself; the heretofore subdued emphasis on the individual (such as one finds in *Proverbs) comes to the foreground. To put it another way: whatever national hope there might have been for Israel is transferred to the individual (Burkes, 111). God’s perpetual covenant fidelity to a nation had been demonstrated (indeed, promised [see 2 Sam 7:5-16]) in the form of possession of land, performance of cult, and an unbroken line of kings. Such things ceased for Israel in the early sixth century BC. But to transfer these promises to the individual is no easy task, for how can an individual experience the perpetual covenant? The reality and finality of death call into question the applicability of God’s ancient promises to the individual. Moreover, “The symbolic immortalities offered elsewhere in the Bible, the memory and endurance of a good name, survival through one’s children and people, even the qualitative good life that negates the ‘death’ of folly and unrighteousness, fail utterly in Qohelet’s opinion” (Burkes, 111).

Death is that which, for Qohelet, ultimately renders futile humanity’s “quest for meaning.” All, human and animal alike, come to the same end. Thus, what punctuates Qohelet’s theology is that which is the activity of “everyone”: to enjoy the pleasures that God has given (Eccles 3:13; 5:19) and then to die (Eccles 7:2).

2.2.3. kol-hā’ādām and Ecclesiastes 12:13. The book as a whole, however, does not let the matter rest there. A solution to the dilemma is provided in Ecclesiastes 12:13. In view of the foregoing discussion, it seems highly unlikely to me that kol-hā’ādām in Ecclesiastes 12:13 can be treated in isolation from the theology espoused in the previous uses of the phrase. It seems, rather, that kol-hā’ādām contributes to our understanding of the epilogue as a mild corrective to the teachings of Qohelet, by accepting Qohelet's observations as wise (see Eccles 12:9-11) but then going one further.

It seems most unlikely that the epilogist is simply contradicting Qohelet; that is, it is improbable that the teachings of Qohelet, which are expressed very intentionally over the span of roughly twelve chapters, are there merely to be dismissed in the closing verses of the book. Moreover, the epilogue has a decidedly positive tone. Despite legitimate ambiguities in the closing section of the book, it seems clear that the epilogue presents Qohelet as a wise teacher (Eccles 12:9). There is no indication that the epilogue should be seen in fundamental contrast to Qohelet's words. I do suggest, however, that Ecclesiastes 12:13-14 puts Qohelet's observations in a broader perspective. We find a positive evaluation of Qohelet as wise, but with a gentle critique, as can be seen in the use of kol-hā'ādām in Ecclesiastes 12:13.

Two things are worth noting concerning the use of kol-hā'ādām in Ecclesiastes 12:13. First, this phrase is emphatic: (kī-zeh kol-hā'ādām). Throughout Ecclesiastes the demonstrative pronoun (zeh/zōh) is used in a number of climactic statements. In fourteen instances it is used to introduce Qohelet's conclusion zeh hebel, "this is meaningless" (Eccles 2:15, 19, 21, 23, 26; 4:4, 8, 16; 5:9; 6:2, 9; 7:6; 8:10, 14). Similarly, it is used as a concluding statement of some sort in twelve other instances (Eccles 1:10, 17; 2:10, 24; 5:15, 18; 7:23, 27, 29; 8:9; 9:3, 13).

When we keep in mind the rather obvious fact that Ecclesiastes 12:13-14 is itself the conclusion of the concluding section of Ecclesiastes, the "concluding" force of zeh in Ecclesiastes 12:13 seems self-evident. Further, in light of these observations, it is likely that we should assign likewise an emphatic meaning to kī. It is not too much to expect the writer to want to drive home his point emphatically in the closing thought of the book. "Fear God. Keep the commandments. Indeed [kī], this [zeh] is kol-hā'ādām."

The NIV, as we noted, translates the phrase as "this is the whole duty of man" (NRSV: "that is the whole duty of everyone"). Fox's translation, however, comes closest to reading Ecclesiastes 12:13 as an intentional echo of Ecclesiastes 3:13; 5:19; 7:2: fearing God and keeping the commandments are "the substance, the 'material' of every person. There should be no alloy" (Fox 1999, 362). If I may put it differently, fearing God and keeping the commandments—this is what truly "summarizes the human experience" or, as the JPS translation puts it, "applies to all mankind." Qohelet is correct in taking to heart the pleasures and rewards of life (Eccles 3:13; 5:19) and facing the stern reality of death (Eccles 7:2). These are central components of the human drama for each Israelite, for "everyone." But more foundational and central is each Israelite's fear of God (see Fear of the Lord) and obedience to God's *law.

The conclusion to the book, therefore, does not pit the frame narrator against Qohelet but rather places Qohelet's flesh-and-blood struggles into their larger and theologically ultimate context and perspective. Qohelet was indeed wise in his observations (Eccles 12:9-11), but the frame narrator encourages his readers to view those observations in view of a broader perspective. The epilogist does not encourage his readers to engage further in Qohelet's internal debate. In fact, Ecclesiastes 12:12-13 cuts off debate entirely. And here we may find an indication of why the author adopts a royal persona. The king is the paragon of *wisdom and has at his disposal the necessary resources and time to investigate the meaning of life under the sun. His readers do not. Qohelet's investigation takes him to dark places where his readers cannot, and need not, tread. It is up to the reader, therefore, to heed the epilogist's words, that (1) Qohelet is wise (Eccles 12:9-11); (2) nothing can be added to his words (Eccles 12:12-13a); (3) the proper response is not to dismiss Qohelet's words but rather to move beyond them by acknowledging one's duty to fear God and keep the commandments (Eccles 12:13b), and trust that God is still about the business of setting all things right (Eccles 12:14). The epilogue acknowledges the true wisdom of Qohelet's observations while at the same time reiterating Israel's central tradition of the fear of God and obedience to Torah. Times have changed, and new challenges may be afoot, but Israel's responsibility remains the same.

In other words, despite the reality of the struggles so eloquently outlined by Qohelet, the answer is still as it always was. Qohelet was indeed wise in his observations of the inconsistencies, even contradictions, of life, as the epilogue points out. But there is something more, and the

“more” is not a new twist but rather the tried and true formula of “fear and obedience.” Such a solution to the newer problems that beset post-exilic Israelites also serves as an appeal to Israel to see their historical vicissitudes from the point of view of traditional categories, thus encouraging a sense of continuity between Israel’s past and present, despite the circumstances. The emphatic phrase in Ecclesiastes 12:13 is intended to direct the reader’s attention toward a higher goal that sums up Israel’s quest for meaning. To paraphrase Ecclesiastes 12:13: “Qohelet is wise, to be sure. As he says, pleasure and death are real and are the portion of everyone [kol-hā’ādām]. But there is a deeper, more fundamental obligation upon this earth, which is to fear God and keep his commandments. This is truly for everyone [kī-zeh kol-hā’ādām].”

Despite our own theological instincts that might drive us to distance ourselves from Qohelet’s blunt observations, the frame narrator spins us around and brings us right up against the words of wisdom that he has so delicately framed. The frame narrator will not allow us to dismiss Qohelet’s words as the skeptical ramblings of a fool or unbeliever. We are forced to allow his words to jab us like goads and firmly embedded nails (Eccles 12:11). The frame narrator blocks our escape into the comfort of familiar theological territory, just as he did for his original readers.

3. Theological Themes.

3.1. Dominant Theological Themes in Ecclesiastes. Ecclesiastes is a difficult book in which to isolate individual themes, as there is a significant amount of interweaving and revisiting of themes and vocabulary. At times it appears that new ideas come almost out of nowhere, and the reader is left to ponder how the pieces of the book connect as a whole. Despite this situation, however, a number of important theological themes present themselves and serve to provide important hooks upon which to hang the various data of the book. These dominant themes are addressed here, although, due to their interconnectedness, they are not presented in isolation from each other.

Perhaps the most recognizable theme is that of “meaninglessness” (NIV), or “vanity” (KJV). These words are attempts to translate the Hebrew hebel. Its literal sense is “vapor,” which leads to metaphorical uses such as “ephemeral”

(Ps 144:4), “vain,” “worthless,” “inconsequential” and the like. In Ecclesiastes, however, these meanings rarely fit. Qohelet’s main contention is not that life is ephemeral or worthless; rather, his cause of such distress is that there is no payoff in what one does. None of our activities result in any sort of ultimate benefit. Hence, a more apt translation of hebel may be, as Fox argues, “absurd.” Life as we experience it is “an affront to reason” (Fox 1999, 31; see also Christianson, 83-88). And what sorts of things are absurd? Things such as pleasure, wealth, labor, justice, wisdom—or, to use the summative word of the frame narrator, “everything” (kōl).

Why does Qohelet draw such a conclusion? Because there is no profit (yitrôn) in any of our labor (‘āmāl). The point of the frame narrator’s introduction is to illustrate this very point (Eccles 1:3-11). The recurring question “What profit is there?” is rhetorical. The answer is “None at all.” No matter how much effort one expends, at the end of the day there is no net surplus. Why is there no net surplus? Because at the end of the day, all die, and so Qohelet laments in Ecclesiastes 3:18-21, “I also thought, ‘As for men, God tests them so that they may see that they are like the animals. Man’s fate is like that of the animals; the same fate awaits them both: As one dies, so dies the other. All have the same breath; man has no advantage over the animal. Everything is meaningless. All go to the same place; all come from dust, and to dust all return. Who knows if the spirit of man rises upward and if the spirit of the animal goes down into the earth?’”

This is the situation into which all are born. We are all destined to die, and no notion of an *afterlife will change that fact, since we cannot be sure. Since death comes to us all as the final leveler, nothing that we do has any ultimate value, because nothing lasts. So, anything that we might perceive as being meaningful, Qohelet goes to great lengths to point out, is really absurd. Any meaning to be found in these activities or accomplishments is only relative. The best that we can do is to accept our portion (hēleq), that which God allows us to do in this life: living day to day—eating, drinking and enjoying the tasks that God has given us.

One may sum up the dominant theological themes in Qohelet thus: Everything is absurd because there is no payoff for anything we do. The main reason why this is so is that death cancels out any such potential profit. What we do have, however, is our lot in life, the day-to-day activities that occupy our time and that, if God pleases, will occupy us to the extent that we do not consider the absurdity of it all.

A plain reading of Ecclesiastes will allow these themes to develop of their own accord, resisting the impulse to align Qohelet's thought with more conventional biblical teaching. As discussed above, the epilogue is somewhat startling in its general support of Qohelet's observations while at the same time taking his thoughts to another level of understanding. The radical nature of the proposed "solution" to Qohelet's struggles can be fully appreciated only when we allow the dominant themes of the book to exert their full force.

3.2. Some Recurring and Important Lexemes for the Theology of Ecclesiastes. In addition to important theological themes, it is helpful to observe dominant lexemes in Ecclesiastes. Providing a list of recurring vocabulary, however, should not be misunderstood as perpetuating a false distinction between words and concepts; rather, it is precisely through the recurring use of vocabulary that the reader is alerted to the author's main concerns. In other words, the importance of these words is in how they are used in Ecclesiastes: they point to concepts. The list of words is simply an indication of specific Hebrew lexemes that recur in Ecclesiastes, thus alerting the reader to conceptual interconnections. The words listed below are not necessarily the most frequent, although some of them certainly are. Some have already been mentioned (see 3.1 above). Only the root is listed if verbal and nominal forms occur.

ʾēlōhīm ("God") (Eccles 1:13; 2:24, 26; 3:10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 17, 18; 4:17; 5:1, 3, 5, 6, 17, 18, 19; 6:2; 7:13, 14, 18, 26, 29; 8:2, 12, 13, 15, 17; 9:1, 7; 11:5, 9; 12:7, 13, 14) bqš ("seek") (Eccles 3:6, 15; 7:25, 28, 29; 8:17; 12:10)
hokmā ("wisdom") (Eccles 1:13, 16, 17, 18; 2:3, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 19, 21, 26; 4:13; 6:8; 7:4, 5, 7, 10, 11, 12, 16, 19, 23, 25; 8:1, 5, 16, 17; 9:1, 10, 11, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18; 10:1, 2, 10, 12; 12:9, 11)
hālak ("walk, go," sometimes a metaphor for death) (Eccles 1:4, 6, 7; 2:1, 14; 3:20; 4:15, 17; 5:14, 15; 6:4, 6, 8, 9; 7:2; 8:3, 10; 9:7, 10; 10:3, 7, 15, 20; 11:9; 12:5) hebel ("meaningless, absurd") (Eccles 1:14; 2:1, 11, 15, 17, 19, 21, 23, 26; 3:19; 4:4, 7, 8, 16; 5:6, 9; 6:2, 4, 9; 7:6; 8:10, 14; 9:9; 11:8, 10; 12:8)

hēpeš ("pleasure/delight, matter") (Eccles 3:1, 17; 5:3, 7; 8:3, 6; 12:1, 10)
hēleq ("portion") (Eccles 2:10, 21; 3:22; 5:17, 18; 9:6, 9; 11:2) ṭōb ("good") (Eccles 2:1, 3, 24, 26; 3:12, 13, 22; 4:3, 6, 8, 9, 13; 5:4, 10, 17; 6:3, 6, 9, 12; 7:1, 2, 3, 5, 8, 10, 11, 14, 18, 20, 26; 8:12, 13, 15; 9:2, 4, 7, 16, 18; 11:6, 7; 12:14)
yāḏ ("know, knowledge") (Eccles 1:17; 2:14, 19; 3:12, 14, 21; 4:13, 17; 6:5, 8, 10, 12; 7:22, 25; 8:1, 5, 7, 12, 16, 17; 9:1, 5, 11, 12; 10:14, 15; 11:2, 5, 6, 9) yitrōnyōtēr ("profit, excess") (Eccles 1:3; 2:11, 13, 15; 3:9; 5:8, 15; 6:8, 11; 7:11, 12, 16; 10:10, 11; 12:9, 12) kōl ("all") (Eccles 1:2, 3, 7, 8, 9, 13, 14, 16; 2:5, 7, 9, 10, 11, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 23; 3:1, 11, 13, 14, 17, 19, 20; 4:1, 4, 8, 15, 16; 5:8, 15, 16, 17, 18; 6:2, 6, 7; 7:2, 15, 18, 21, 23, 28; 8:3, 6, 9, 17; 9:1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11; 10:3, 19; 11:5, 8, 9; 1:4, 8, 13, 14)
kēsil ("fool") (Eccles 2:14, 15, 16; 4:5, 13, 17; 5:2, 3; 6:8; 7:4, 5, 6, 9; 9:17; 10:2, 12) lēb ("heart," intensive referent to one's "inner" self) (Eccles 1:13, 16, 17; 2:1, 2, 10, 15, 20, 22, 23; 3:11, 17, 18; 5:1, 19; 7:2, 3, 4, 7, 21, 22, 25, 26; 8:5, 9, 11, 16; 9:1, 3, 7; 10:2, 3; 11:9, 10) mīšpat ("judgment") (Eccles 3:16; 5:7; 8:5, 6; 11:9; 12:14)
siklūt ("fool") (Eccles 1:17 [śiklūt]; 2:3, 12, 13; 7:25; 10:1, 13)
ʾōlam ("great expanse of time") (Eccles 1:4, 10; 2:16; 3:11, 14; 9:6; 12:5)
ʿml ("labor") (Eccles 1:3; 2:10, 11, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24; 3:9, 13; 4:4, 6, 8, 9; 5:14, 15, 17, 18; 6:7; 8:15, 17; 9:9; 10:15)
ʿēt ("time") (Eccles 3:1-8 [29x]; 3:11, 17; 7:17; 8:5, 6, 9; 9:8, 11, 12; 10:17)
šdq ("righteous") (Eccles 3:17; 7:15, 16, 20; 8:14; 9:1, 2)
qrh ("fate") (Eccles 2:14, 15; 3:19; 9, 3, 11; 10:18)
r³h ("see, observe, experience") (Eccles 1:8, 10, 14, 16; 2:1, 3, 12, 13, 24; 3:10, 13, 16, 18, 22; 4:1, 3, 4, 7, 15; 5:7, 12, 17; 6:1, 5, 6; 7:11, 13, 14, 15, 27, 29; 8:9, 10, 16, 17; 9:9, 11, 13; 10:5, 7; 11:4, 7; 12:3)
r^c/r³h ("evil, unjust" [see rš^c]) (Eccles 1:13; 2:17; 4:8, 17; 5:12, 13, 15; 6:1, 2; 7:14; 8:3, 5, 11, 12; 9:3, 12; 10:5, 13; 11:2, 10; 12:14)
rš^c ("evil, unjust" [see r^c/r³h]) (Eccles 3:16, 17; 7:15, 17, 25; 8:8, 10, 13, 14; 9:2)

śmḥ (“joy”) (Eccles 2:1, 2, 10, 26; 3:12, 22; 4:16, 5:18, 19; 7:14; 8:15; 9:7; 10:19; 11:8, 9)
taḥat hāsšāmeš (“under the sun”) (Eccles 1:9, 14; 2:11, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22; 3:16; 4:1, 3, 7, 15; 5:12; 6:1, 12; 8:9, 15, 17; 9:3, 6, 9, 11, 13; 10:5)

Bearing these words in mind—even looking for them—will alert the reader to the interconnectedness of Qohelet’s major themes and concepts. And observing such interconnections will force the reader to allow Qohelet himself to set the agenda for how he wishes to be understood. It will also bring to the fore what Fox has so well observed: Qohelet’s self-contradictory reflections are not an oddity to be adjusted here and there; rather, they reflect the author’s intention for how he wishes to communicate his theological message. Fox sees Qohelet’s contradictions as the starting point for interpretation.

My primary thesis is a simple one: The contradictions in the book of Qohelet are real and intended. We must interpret them, not eliminate them. . . . Qohelet’s persistent observation of contradictions is a powerful cohesive force, and an awareness of it brings into focus the book’s central concern: the problem of meaning in life. The book of Qohelet is about meaning: its loss and its (partial) recovery. . . . Qohelet’s contradictions are the starting point but not the message of the book. He marshals them to tear down meaning, but he does not stop there. He is not a nihilist. He also builds up meaning, discovering ways of creating clarity and gratification in a confusing world. (Fox 1999, 3)

Attention to Qohelet’s use of words, which provides a “structure” of sorts to the book, alerts us to the very message that he intends to communicate.

4. Conclusion.

The disjunction with other portions of the OT as well as internal tensions assure that Ecclesiastes will remain one of the more enigmatic and challenging books of the OT. The book’s macro-structure—the narrator’s words framing the extended dialogues of Qohelet himself—advances its theology, and so it is important to come to resolution of the interplay between them. In the closing verses of the epilogue the author brings the tensions of the book to a resolution, not by dismissing Qohelet’s observations but by acknowledging the wisdom that they contain and then bringing them under the broader (more traditional) umbrella of fearing God and keeping his commandments. The force of this resolution, however, will not be fully appreciated apart from the necessary and challenging work of reading Ecclesiastes patiently and allowing the author to present the case in his time and in his way.

See also AUTOBIOGRAPHY; FOLLY; FRAME NARRATIVE; QOHELET; SOLOMON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: J. Crenshaw, Ecclesiastes (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); F. Delitzsch, Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes (repr., Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982 [1877]); T. Krüger, Qoheleth: A Commentary (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2004); N. Lohfink, Qoheleth (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); R. E. Murphy, Ecclesiastes (WBC 23A; Dallas: Word, 1992); I. Provan, Ecclesiastes/Song of Songs (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2001); C. L. Seow, Ecclesiastes (AB 18C; New York: Doubleday, 1997); R. N. Whybray, Ecclesiastes (NCBC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989). Studies: C. Bartholomew, Reading Ecclesiastes: Old Testament Exegesis and Hermeneutical Theory (AnBib 139; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1998); R. Beckwith, The Old Testament Canon of the New Testament Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); S. Burkes, Death in Qoheleth and Egyptian Biographies of the Late Period (SBLDS 170; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 1999); F. C. Burkitt, “Is Ecclesiastes a Translation?” JTS 23 (1921-1922) 22-26; E. Christianson, A Time to Tell: Narrative Strategies in Ecclesiastes (JSOTSup 280; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); P. Enns, “כל־האדם and the Evaluation of Qohelet’s Wisdom in Eccles 12:13, or The ‘A Is So, and What’s More, B’ Theology of Ecclesiastes,” in The Idea of Biblical Interpretation: Essays in Honor of James L. Kugel, ed. H. Najman and J. Newman (JSJSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003) 125-37; M. V. Fox, Qohelet and His Contradictions (JSOTSup 71; Sheffield: Almond, 1989); idem, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Rereading of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); idem, Ecclesiastes (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2004); D. C. Fredericks, Qoheleth’s Language: Re-evaluating Its Nature and Date (ANETS 3; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1988); R. Gordis, “The Original Language of Qohelet," JQR 37 (1946-1947) 67-84; W. H. Green, Old Testament Literature: Lectures on the Poetical Books of the Old Testament (Princeton, NJ: Princeton College, 1884); M. Hirshman, "Qohelet's Reception and Interpretation in Early Rabbinic Literature," in Studies in Ancient Midrash, ed. J. L. Kugel (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001) 87-99; B. Isaksson, Studies in the Language of Qoheleth: With Special Emphasis on the Verbal System (SSU 10; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1987); S. Japhet, The Ideology of the Book of Chronicles and Its Place in Biblical Thought (BEATAJ 9; Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1989); idem, I and II Chronicles (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2000); D. Rudman, Determinism in the Book of Ecclesiastes (JSOTSup 316; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); A. Schoors, The Preacher Sought to Find Pleasing Words: A Study of the Language of Qohelet (OLA 41; Leuven: Peeters, 1992); idem, ed., Qohelet in the Context of Wisdom (BETL 86; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1998); A. G. Shead, "Reading Ecclesiastes 'Epilogically,'" TynBul 48 (1997) 67-91; C. C. Torrey, "The Question of the Original Language of Qoheleth," JQR 39 (1948-1949) 151-60; C. F. Whitley, Koheleth: His Language and Thought (BZAW 148; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1979); F. Zimmermann, "The Aramaic Provenance of Qohelet," JQR 36 (1945-1946) 17-45.

P. Enns

ECCLESIASTES 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND

No literary text, biblical or extrabiblical, exists in a vacuum. Texts, as well as their authors, are subject to influences from the culture that surrounds them. Many elements, such as language, education, religious persuasion, economic factors and political forces, influence the genesis of any written text and impact the worldview of its author (G. Klingbeil 2007, 5-14). One important element influencing texts is other literary productions, especially from surrounding cultures. This cross-pollination of influence between distinct cultures can easily be appreciated when one considers the present interaction between East and West in the global economy and culture. To be sure, modern cultural interaction cannot be the paradigm for ancient cultural, religious and literary contact. Our communication capabilities are far more advanced than in Iron Age II (or later), the period during which scholars would place the writing of the book of Ecclesiastes. Our educational system is geared toward much broader interaction. Our technical capabilities of cultural and literary exchange (even by means of a translation) are vastly superior to those in existence during the writing of the OT. However, despite technological, geographical and even political limitations, people living in the ancient Near East were aware of their neighbors and surrounding cultures, as can be easily documented from their writings and material cultures (Yannai and Braun; Gestoso; Gural-nick; Hoffner; Hallo 2004).

In the present article a careful look at possible literary and conceptual links between cultures surrounding Palestine at all the four cardinal points will be undertaken. However, prior to discussing the specifics of the ancient Near Eastern background of Ecclesiastes, it will be helpful to examine what comparative studies can and cannot do. This will be followed by a look at the specifics of the comparative data, beginning with Mesopotamia to the east, Syria and Phoenicia to the north, Greece, Anatolia and the Aegean to the west, and Egypt to the south. As will be shown in the section dealing with the nature of comparative data, this article will not primarily strive to establish concrete historical links but rather will look at the intellectual climate of the surrounding cultures. This is not meant to ignore the clearly established historical, political, religious, economical and cultural links between Palestine and these neighboring cultures but will avoid the often contentious issue of who borrowed from whom, which cannot always be resolved satisfactorily. A final important note should be included at the outset here: although the biblical literary creations did not originate in a vacuum, they are definitely not merely the result of literary cross-pollination. According to the self-testimony of Scripture, it was the God of Israel who spoke through them to the ancient Israelites and continues to speak to those looking for divine and practical wisdom.

1. What Comparative Studies Can and Cannot Do
2. Looking to the East: Mesopotamia
3. Looking to the North: Syria
4. Looking to the West: Greece and the Aegean
5. Looking to the South: Egypt
6. Conclusions

1. What Comparative Studies Can and Cannot Do.

Comparative methods in scientific research have a long history. More than a century ago archaeologists of the ancient Near East looked at comparative data of the material culture of surrounding cultures in order to establish dating sequences and understand the typological development of certain pottery forms or architecture. In biblical studies the pendulum has swung from parallelomania (criticized by Sandmel) to parallelophobia (warned against by Ratner and Zuckerman, 51-52) over the past decades. The focus of the comparative method employed to a certain degree has also influenced the outcome and interpretation of the discovered data.

Historical comparison seeks to evaluate the influence of one culture on another and thus to provide a better Sitz im Leben for certain cultural, sociological, political or religious phenomena (G. Klingbeil 2007, 63; for further references, see G. Klingbeil 1998, 325-40; M. Klingbeil, 268-82; Malul; Talmon). Generally, historical comparison focuses on data sets that belong to the same historical and geographical context and has been used to demonstrate specific historical links between two cultures. Others use historical comparison to illuminate specific phenomena (literary, historical, religious or cultural) of one culture with phenomena in another culture.

Typological comparison compares societies and cultures that are chronologically and geographically far removed, with little or no possibility of contact. This school of thought presupposes some type of a common religious conscience in humanity and is often employed in anthropological or sociological research. An interesting example of this type of comparison is found in a study by M. Fox (1999, 8-11), who compares Qohelet's sensitivity to the absurd with the thought of Albert Camus. Fox (1999, 9) recognizes that no direct link between Qohelet and existentialism per se is intended, but rather he suggests similar social changes in Judea of the Hellenistic period (which he identifies as the time of origin for the book of Ecclesiastes) and in Europe of the middle of the twentieth century. Other examples of this typological approach are found in works by N. Klaes and by E. Dammann. Obviously, the typological approach lends itself to the proverbial "apples and oranges" comparison and seems to rely heavily on external models (Talmon, 324; Malul, 52-53).

On the other hand, historical comparison does not always provide sufficient data to establish clear lines of development or dependence and can be quite subjective when it comes to evaluating cultural, religious or historical interaction.

A helpful alternative to historical and typological comparisons, and one that shares common ground with both approaches, is the compare-and-contrast approach suggested and practiced by Assyriologist W. W. Hallo (1977; 1990). This method highlights similarities without neglecting possible differences. Furthermore, the focus on cultures belonging to the same historical and cultural stream (such as the Mediterranean basin or the Levant) avoids highly speculative relations available to the modern researcher, who has access to a huge spectrum of data, but unavailable to ancient authors and cultures. In this sense, when looking at the ancient Near Eastern background of Ecclesiastes, one will be able to discover common or dissimilar patterns of ancient wisdom, which, however, should not automatically be construed as indications of historical development with one culture borrowing from another but rather may point to common wisdom traditions or shared sources. In other words, this discussion of ancient Near Eastern background primarily intends to provide data not for a historical exploration of the particular Sitz im Leben of the book or its date but rather that bears on the conceptual and literary world of the ancient Near East.

2. Looking to the East: Mesopotamia.

Mesopotamian conceptual similarities to Ecclesiastes have long been recognized. Statements in the Epic of Gilgamesh easily find counterparts in verses from Ecclesiastes. On Tablet III of the Old Babylonian version, Gilgamesh speaks to Enkidu: "Who, my friend, can scale he[aven]? Only the gods [live] forever under the sun. As for mankind, numbered are their days; whatever they achieve is but the wind" (ANET, 79). This "wind" metaphor is used frequently in Ecclesiastes (e.g., Eccles 1:14, 17; 2:11; 4:4) to mark the futility of human work and achievement. Another conceptual link can be found in the speech of the alewife Siduri on Tablet X: "When the gods created mankind, death for mankind they set aside, life in their own hands retaining. Thou, Gilgamesh, let full be thy belly, make thou merry by day and by night. Of each day make thou a feast of rejoicing, day and night dance thou and play! Let thy garments be sparkling fresh, thy head be washed; bathe thou in water. Pay heed to the little one that holds on to thy hand, let they spouse delight in thy bosom! For this is the task of [mankind]!” (ANET, 90). Similar thoughts to those of Siduri are reflected in Ecclesiastes 9:7-9, pointing to the transient nature of humanity and showing a carpe diem motif (see Barton, 162; Longman, 120). J. Y.-S. Pakk (1996) has demonstrated that these conceptual links between Ecclesiastes and Gilgamesh go even beyond the generally cited examples and include Ecclesiastes 8:16—9:10. However, it has been argued that these links are too general and, furthermore, that no specific historical connections can be established (Uehlinger, 196-98).

In terms of structure, T. Longman (120-23) has observed close similarities on the genre level, involving the Akkadian genre of royal (fictional) *autobiography with a didactic ending. Longman makes particular reference to the Cuthaeen Legend of Naram-Sin, whose fullest text is a Neo-Assyrian version (English translation in Longman, 228-31). In both cases the text begins with an autobiographical reference “I am” (Eccles 1:12; similar in Adad-guppi Autobiography [COS 1.147:477]) and continues to describe the journey of its purported author to discover meaning and happiness (as in the case of Ecclesiastes) or for power and religious guidance (Cuthaeen Legend of Naram-Sin). From lines 147-175 the Akkadian text includes instructions given in the first person, which is also similar to the instructions given in the final section of Ecclesiastes (6:10-14). It must be noted that Ecclesiastes also includes instructions in the earlier section dealing with the search for meaning and happiness and cannot be neatly divided as with the Akkadian document. However, the formal and structural similarities, involving royal fiction and self-discourse, suggest conceptual links between the biblical text and the Akkadian counterpart. Particularly the element of self-discourse or internal dialogue is characteristic of Ecclesiastes (Eccles 1:16; 2:1, 15; 3:17, 18; 7:23) and can also be found in Naram-Sin’s autobiography: “Speaking to myself, thus I said” (lines 79, 89, 124).

Another possible link to Mesopotamia and its literature is the pessimistic outlook that Ecclesiastes seems to portray. Life is meaningless. Everything is nothingness. Babylonian texts such as Counsels of a Pessimist (Lambert, 107-9) and The Dialogue of Pessimism (Lambert, 139-49) express a pessimistic outlook on life and its futility and express helplessness and bitterness in the face of life’s contradictions and realities (Anderson, 63-65; Bottéro; Loretz, 108-10). However, as suggested in current research on Ecclesiastes (Kottsieper, 237; Whybray 1982), the book is not a clear-cut case of a completely pessimistic outlook on life, happiness and human nature (see Zimmer; Schwienhorst-Schönberger 1994). It rather seems to function as a corrective or further development to other biblical Wisdom literature, particularly in its understanding of hokmâ (“wisdom”). It is highly self-conscious (Fox 1993, 115) and recognizes the limitations of human wisdom, which in turn extends its scope. This recognition of the failure of human hokmâ (Eccles 7:14) is borne out of personal experience (as indicated by the use of autobiographical information, referring to “I” [Eccles 8:16-17]) and leads finally to the important acknowledgment that as everyone must die, so too wisdom is overwhelmed by death (Fox 1993, 125-26; similarly Crenshaw 1982, 129-37).

The question of the origins of Israelite wisdom represents another possible link to Mesopotamian wisdom. As can be easily perceived in the reading of biblical wisdom texts, there are at least two different loci for the origin of wisdom texts in Israel: scribal schools (see Scribes), most probably sponsored by the royal leadership and associated with the court (Whybray 1990), and folk wisdom—that is, wise sayings that were transmitted orally in the context of small villages and the setting of a clan or family (Crenshaw 1995, 2449-50; Garrett, 23-26). Although in Mesopotamian wisdom the scribal tradition is most clearly emphasized, there is evidence of folk wisdom that was orally transmitted (Denning-Bolle, 2-3). Obviously, it is somewhat misleading to speak about Mesopotamian wisdom as a monolithic block, since, even more than in the biblical wisdom tradition, texts originated and were transmitted over several millennia, involving diverse political, cultural and religious contexts. A particular link between the scribal school activity and the nature of folk wisdom can be seen in the Sumerian collections of proverbs, which were widely used as models for scribal exercises in the schools, even though the dominant imagery of the Sumerian proverbs reflects agriculture and animal husbandry and echo the occupations and concerns of shepherds, gardeners, foremen, hired workmen, fowlers, merchants and so on (Alster, 1.xvi-xxiv).

3. Looking to the North: Syria.

Over the past decades the view from the north has become more and more important. While Syria had mostly been ignored during the early days of the rediscovery of the ancient Near East during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries (Chavalas 1992, 2), due to the important discoveries of ancient Ugarit, Ebla, Alalakh, Emar, Qatna, Kamid el-Loz, Qadesh, Tel Brak, together with the important Phoenician towns of Sidon and Tyre, the perspective from the north (G. Klingbeil, forthcoming) has become increasingly important. Syrian history and religious practice appear to have reflected more closely Israelite power structures (particularly the important view from the countryside balancing the Mesopotamian focus on major urban centers [Fortin]), and a number of common religious practices (including the importance of prescriptive and descriptive ritual texts, festival calendars, seven-day periods, high priestly anointing rites, etc.) have been described (Fleming 1992; 1996; 1999; Hess; G. Klingbeil 2000; forthcoming).

What possible literary or intellectual influence of background can be posited as having come from the north (see Uehlinger, 160-61)? In the heyday of comparative Semitics, following the discoveries of Ras Shamra in the first half of the twentieth century, M. Dahood (1952; 1966) suggested significant Canaanite-Phoenician influence in the orthography, morphology and syntax of Ecclesiastes—a theory that was challenged later by A. Schoors (1992). Others have suggested that the Phoenician influence on Ecclesiastes could be discovered in later Persian period texts (Azize, 128), including a funerary description from Eshmunazor II of Sidon (c. 465-451 BC): “The words of Eshmunazor, king of the Sidonians: I was snatched away not at my time, a child of a few days” (Azize, 128; cf. Gibson 1982, 106-7). The use of ‘ty (“my time”) as a reference to death presupposes the important assumption of “appropriate time,” a concept found also in Ecclesiastes 3:2. Furthermore, the frequent use of the phrase “under the sun” (e.g., Eccles 1:3, 9, 14; 2:11, 17, 18) has been understood as a hint to Phoenician solar religion (Azize), which may have been used in a polemical sense against known (non-Israelite) theological concepts—a tendency found in other biblical material as well (see G. Klingbeil 1997 on the references to “sun” and “moon” in Ps 121:6).

Also known from texts of the Persian period (namely, in an Aramaic version found at Elephantine), Ahiqar is another possible candidate for extrabiblical influence on biblical wisdom texts (e.g., for Proverbs [Cazalles]). C. Uehlinger (200-203 [earlier Loretz, 325-27; Küchler, 319-414]) has provided a helpful list of eleven possible parallels. For example, Ahiqar (lines 127-129) emphasizes, similar to Ecclesiastes 2:24, the carpe diem motif: “[If] thou [be hungry], my son, take every trouble and do every labor, then wilt thou eat and be satisfied and give to thy children. . . . [If] thou [be needy], my son, borrow corn and wheat that thou mayest eat and be sated and give to thy children with thee” (ANET, 429).

While the similarities between Ahiqar and Ecclesiastes require further research (Uehlinger, 201-3), the more recent publication of texts from Late Bronze Age Emar provide further possible links between biblical and Syrian literature (Gianto; Dietrich). Remarkably, Emar VI.4:767 seems to echo a similar text that had been discovered among the texts from Ugarit decades earlier (Dietrich, 9-11). As can be expected, most of the Emarite statements occur in the framework of their polytheistic religious outlook. However, conceptual links can easily be observed: “Destinies have been designed by Ea. Portions have been distributed according to the decree of the god. It has been that way since the days of old. It has been declared from the beginning” (Emar VI.4:767 [Arnaud, 359-65; translation in Gianto, 473]). Ecclesiastes 1:9 seems to reflect a similar observation: “That which has been is what will be, that which is done is what will be done, and there is nothing new under the sun” (NKJV). Similarly, Ecclesiastes 3:14-15 also underlines the important concept that human destinies are controlled by God. It is also interesting to note the “audacious, even iconoclastic” (Gianto, 475) nature of the Emar wisdom text, challenging the traditional belief system and theology manifested in canonical Mesopotamian tradition. *Qoheleth (indicating the sage who refers to himself in the first person singular throughout the volume) also appears to challenge traditional belief systems and is involved in existential (and theological) experiments (Eccles 1:12-14, 17-18; 2:1-23). This search to understand human destiny is further documented in lines 21-24 of the same text from Emar: "Cast off all griefs, ignore troubles. Instead of joy in the heart of a single day, a period of 36,000 [years of silence will come]. May Zirash [the goddess of beer] rejoice in a son like you! This is human destiny" (Emar VI.4:767 [Arnaud, 359-65; translation in Gianto, 476]). Similar ideas are expressed in Ecclesiastes 5:17-19.

As can easily be seen from these brief descriptions of possible Syrian parallels to important concepts contained in the book of Ecclesiastes, the possibility of comparative material from the north should not be overlooked and needs further clarification. The wide chronological frame of reference (beginning in fourteenth/thirteenth-century texts from Ugarit and Emar and extending via Phoenician texts to the Persian period Aramaic Ahiqar) underlines two important elements: (1) the look to the north for comparative material is increasingly important and should not be neglected; (2) many of the important (and often unconventional) wisdom concepts found in Ecclesiastes find their echo throughout an extended period of time, suggesting a development of ancient Near Eastern wisdom that provided corrections or alternatives to more typical ancient Near Eastern wisdom concepts.

4. Looking to the West: Greece and the Aegean.

Due to wide-ranging developments in the dating of biblical texts, which generally emphasize an exilic or predominantly postexilic locus for the writing and editing of many (if not most) biblical texts (Finkelstein and Silberman), the view from the west, including Greece and the larger Aegean realm, has become increasingly important in studies dealing with the intellectual background of Ecclesiastes (Braun; Bohlen; Schwienhorst-Schönberger 1994; 2004, 103). To be sure, Greece did not just appear in the Levant after the arrival of Alexander the Great. There is plenty of evidence for an interaction between east and west prior to the Hellenistic period in the material culture (Wenning; Gestoso; Guralnick). Some of the evidence for the Hellenistic influence on Ecclesiastes (and thus a date during the third century BC) includes the reflection of Greek philosophy in the way the book argues its case and has been linked to the Hellenistic diatribe (Schwienhorst-Schönberger 1994). The structural and argumentative links to Greek philosophy are not necessarily understood as a wholesale adoption of Greek philosophy per se. Clearly, humankind is not an independent entity that can find happiness and fulfillment apart from God or even against God, which in the anthropology and theology of the OT would be unthinkable (Schwienhorst-Schönberger 1994, 296-98). Other studies, however, have particularly marked the difference between Stoic and Epicurean philosophical concepts and Ecclesiastes (Zimmer, 66; Harrison; also Towner, who questions direct Greek influence).

Questioning the existence of direct philosophical and literary links to Greek literature (see Wisdom, Greek), some have argued rather for the general reflection of Hellenistic thought in Ecclesiastes (Hengel 1973). N. Lohfink perceives a reflection of governing terminology that seems to evidence the distinction between a central power outside of Jerusalem (Alexandria, considering the fact that the book is dated during the third century BC) and the local power (Jerusalem). Similarly, R. Bohlen (257-59) sees echoes of the consequences of Hellenistic state ideology, administrative structures and the tax system of the Ptolemaic province of Syria and Phoenicia in texts such as Ecclesiastes 4:1 (with particular emphasis on the motif of oppression); 5:8-9 (oppression and perverted justice). However, it seems as if the general motif of oppression is not necessarily a compelling reason to posit a Hellenistic date, as can be easily seen in similar references found in earlier texts of the Hebrew Bible (e.g., Amos 2:6-7; 4:1; Jer 6:6; 7:6; 22:17; Neh 5:1-5). Concerning specific Greek parallel expressions or motifs, O. Kaiser, critically sorting them, still maintains forty-eight parallel motifs, including references to Homer, Theognis, Euripides and Menander. It seems as if even more than two centuries after the first suggestion of Greek influence for Ecclesiastes, no scholarly consensus has emerged, and much of the discussion actually centers on the dating of the book and not necessarily on the intellectual or theological/philosophical background.

5. Looking to the South: Egypt.

Egyptian influence in the conceptual and textual world of Ecclesiastes has been argued repeatedly (Shupak; Uehlinger, 207-28; Anderson, 62-63), albeit not unanimously (see Loretz, 89). Examples of Egyptian literature with a strong pessimistic slant include the Middle Kingdom text The Dispute between a Man and His Ba (COS 3.146:321-25; ANET, 405-7), which relates the conversation of a man with his soul, discussing the futility of life. It has a dialogic style similar to Ecclesiastes (Eccles 1:16; 2:1, 15; 3:17-18). The carpe diem motif seems to be reflected in the phrase “follow the happy day and forget worry” (COS 3.146:323) and can be compared to similar motifs in Ecclesiastes 2:24; 3:12, 22; 5:17; 8:15; 9:7-9; 11:7-8. However, as has been pointed out before, the time gap between the Middle Kingdom text and biblical Ecclesiastes is considerable and should be noted when positing a particular intellectual or theological Egyptian background. A similar argument could be used for another proposed parallel, The Eloquent Peasant (COS 1.43:98-104), likewise composed during the Middle Kingdom period. Similar to Ecclesiastes, this composition contains a *frame narrative, and the body of the work consists of nine complaints that the peasant addresses to the high steward Rensi son of Meru. Part of the second petition is a list of opposites (e.g., the magistrate who shows partiality, a judge who steals what has been stolen, the breath-giver who languishes on the ground). Ecclesiastes contains similar motifs—for example, “Fools are placed in many positions of authority, while wealthy men sit in lowly positions. I have seen slaves on horseback, while princes go on foot like slaves” (Eccles 10:6-7 NIV). Similar ironic inversions (or reversals) are found also in Ecclesiastes 3:16; 7:15; 8:10.

The Song from the Tomb of King Intef (1.30:48-49) belongs to the genre of harper’s songs, a small group of lyrics advocating carpe diem attitudes (Foster, 317), and should be understood as a genuine Middle Kingdom text, even though the text is preserved only in two New Kingdom copies.

A generation passes, another stays, since the time of the ancestors. The gods who were before rest in their tombs, blessed nobles too are buried in their tombs. . . . Their walls have crumbled, their places are gone, as though they had never been! None comes from there, to tell of their state, to tell of their needs, to calm our hearts, until we go where they have gone. Hence rejoice in your heart! . . . Follow your heart as long as you live! Put myrrh on your head, dress in fine linen, anoint yourself with oils fit for a god. Heap up your joys, let your heart not sink! (COS 1.30:49)

The focus on the present life over against the future life, the latter being an important fundamental belief of Egyptian civilization, is intriguing and seems to reflect similar thoughts in Ecclesiastes (e.g., Eccles 1:11; 3:22; 11:9-10) as well as similar iconoclastic tendencies in the biblical text, which seems to challenge some traditional concepts such as the principle of *retribution, which is well represented in other biblical Wisdom literature.

Another possible parallel in Egyptian literature is found in The Complaints of Khakheperre-sonb (COS 1.44:104-6), another Middle Kingdom text. Similar to verses in Ecclesiastes (Eccles 1:13, 17; 8:16; 9:1), the text emphasizes a searching heart as well as the nothingness of memory, also reflected in Ecclesiastes 1:11: “There is no remembrance of former things, Nor will there be any remembrance of things that are to come by those who will come after” (Eccles 1:11 NKJV). The Egyptian text underlines the importance of the past: “I said this in accord with what I have seen: from the first generation, down to those who come after, they imitate that which is past” (lines 6-7 [COS 1.44:105]). Learning from the past, including personal experience, is also characteristic of Ecclesiastes (Eccles 1:12—2:26; 7:23-39; 8:16-17).

Another possible link to Egyptian texts, studied by S. Burkes, involves the topic of death in late Egyptian biographies (see Chaos and Death). Burkes (235) concludes that in both texts “death is a problem such that each culture’s established ways for confronting death’s disruptions are, for these authors, no longer effective.” Theologically, it appears as if Ecclesiastes is functioning as a counterweight to the concept of divine retribution, which is so clearly promulgated in *Proverbs and *Job. Burkes (236-43) notes that the late Egyptian biographies also seem to present a markedly distinct position on the issue of death as opposed to earlier Egyptian texts; he explains this on the basis of a general shift in religious patterns during the second half of the first millennium.

As we have seen, numerous parallels between Ecclesiastes and Egyptian texts have been suggested. A meaningful comparison should involve comparative data from the same geographic and chronological historic stream, which for Egyptian wisdom literature does not always apply, since many of the aforementioned parallels date to the Middle Kingdom, hundreds of years before the time of Solomon or other loci of the possible origin of the work. In this sense, the emphasis by Uehlinger (207-24) on late Egyptian texts is laudable and helpful and will compel additional future research.

6. Conclusions.

The search for the ancient Near Eastern background of the enigmatic book of Ecclesiastes has provided many surprising links to texts from Mesopotamia, Syria and Egypt. Many of these links referred to texts that originated long before Ecclesiastes was composed. They would not be helpful for a historical comparative approach, but they are relevant for a typological comparative approach, looking at literary and theological motifs that have impacted human beings throughout history. Regarding the possible influence and background from the west, it seems as if the scholarly lines are sharply drawn between those who posit a clear Hellenistic background for the book (including literary structures and rhetorical strategies) and those who reject this thesis. As we noted above, the decision about the Hellenistic influence relies heavily on one's conclusion concerning the dating of the Ecclesiastes.

One important element of a possible ancient Near Eastern background concerns the inner-biblical (or *intertextual) links of Ecclesiastes to other biblical literature. Did Ecclesiastes draw consciously from these texts or even question them or complement them, considering the important theological concept of progressive revelation (Bartholomew, 254-61)?

As already seen in the many references to parallel ideas, terms and structures of Ecclesiastes within the larger framework of the ancient Near East, the notion of the "internationality" of wisdom should be considered (Uehlinger, 157). It is this internationality that may explain some of the links that have been noted throughout this article. This internationality of ancient Near Eastern wisdom may be rooted in humanity's search for answers to questions and situations that go beyond comprehension and are not resolved by pat rational or theological answers, and may even require outrageous or radical answers. It is precisely this radicalness that still surprises the modern reader of Ecclesiastes.

See also AUTOBIOGRAPHY; WISDOM, GREEK; WISDOM SOURCES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Alster, Proverbs of Ancient Sumer (2 vols.; Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1997); W. H. U. Anderson, Qoheleth and Its Pessimistic Theology: Hermeneutical Struggles in Wisdom Literature (MBPS 54; Lewiston, NY: Mellen Biblical Press, 1997); D. Arnaud, Emar VI.4: Textes de la bibliothèque, transcriptions et traductions (Paris: Editions Recherche sur les Civilisations, 1987); J. Azize, "The Genre of Qohelet," DavarLogos 2 (2003) 123-38; C. G. Bartholomew, Reading Ecclesiastes: Old Testament Exegesis and Hermeneutical Theory (AnBib 139; Rome: Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1998); G. A. Barton, The Book of Ecclesiastes (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1912); R. Bohlen, "Kohélet im Kontext hellenistischer Kultur," in Das Buch Kohélet: Studien zur Struktur, Geschichte, Rezeption und Theologie, ed. L. Schwienhorst-Schönberger (BZAW 254; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1997) 249-73; J. Bottéro, "Le 'Dialogue Pessimiste' et la transcendance," RTP 16 (1966) 4-24; R. Braun, Kohélet und die frühhellenistische Popularphilosophie (BZAW 130; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1973); S. Burkes, Death in Qoheleth and Egyptian Biographies of the Late Period (SBLDS 170; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 1999); H. Cazalles, "Aḥiqar, Ummân and Amun, and Biblical Wisdom Texts," in Solving Riddles and Untying Knots: Biblical, Epigraphical, and Semitic Studies in Honor of Jonas C. Greenfield, ed. Z. Zevit, S. Gitin and M. Sokoloff (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1995) 45-55; M. W. Chavalas, "Ancient Syria: A Historical Sketch," in New Horizons in the Study of Ancient Syria, ed. M. W. Chavalas and J. L. Hayes (BMes 25; Malibu, CA: Undena Publications, 1992) 1-21; J. L. Crenshaw, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (London: SCM, 1982); idem, "The Contemplative Life in the Ancient Near East," in Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, ed. J. M. Sasson (4 vols.; New York: Scribner, 1995) 4.2445-57; M. Dahood, "Canaanite-Phoenician Influence in Qoheleth," Bib 33 (1952) 30-52; idem, "The Phoenician Background of Qoheleth," Bib 47 (1966) 264-82; E. Dammann, "Gott und Geister in Sprichwörtern aus Schwarzafrika," in Biblische und außerbiblische Spruchweisheit: Ergebnisse einer Tagung der Sektion Religionswissenschaft/Missionswis-

- senschaft der Wissenschaftlichen Gesellschaft für Theologie vom 26. bis 29. September 1988 in Basel, ed. H.-J. Klimkeit (StOR 20; Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1991) 105-16; S. Denning-Bolle, Wisdom in Akkadian Literature: Expression, Instruction, Dialogue (Leiden: Ex Oriente Lux, 1992); M. Dietrich, "Ein Leben ohne Freude . . .": Studie über eine Weisheitskomposition aus den Gelehrtenbibliotheken von Emar und Ugarit," UF 24 (1992) 9-29; I. Finkelstein and N. A. Silberman, The Bible Unearthed: Archaeology's New Vision of Ancient Israel and the Origin of Its Sacred Texts (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2002); D. E. Fleming, "The Rituals from Emar: Evolution of an Indigenous Tradition in Second-Millennium Syria," in New Horizons in the Study of Ancient Syria, ed. M. W. Chavalas and J. L. Hayes (BMes 25; Malibu, CA: Undena Publications, 1992) 51-61; idem, "The Emar Festivals: City Unity and Syrian Identity under Hittite Hegemony," in Emar: The History, Religion, and Culture of a Syrian Town in the Late Bronze Age, ed. M. W. Chavalas (Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1996) 81-114; idem, "The Israelite Festival Calendar and Emar's Ritual Archive," RB 106 (1999) 8-34; M. Fortin, "New Horizon in Ancient Syria: The View from 'Atij," NEA 61 (1998) 15-24; J. L. Foster, "Lyric," OEA 2.312-17; M. V. Fox, "Wisdom in Qoheleth," in In Search of Wisdom: Essays in Memory of John G. Gammie, ed. L. G. Perdue, B. B. Scott and W. J. Wiseman (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1993) 115-31; idem, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Rereading of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); D. Garrett, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs (NAC 14; Nashville: Broadman, 1993); G. N. Gestoso, "Las relaciones de intercambio entre Egipto y el mundo Egeo durante la época de El Amarna," in Relaciones de intercambio entre Egipto y el Mediterráneo Oriental (IV-I milenio A.C.), ed. A. D. Rodrigo (Buenos Aires: Editorial Biblos, 2001) 79-101; A. Gianto, "Human Destiny in Emar and Qohelet," in Qohelet in the Context of Wisdom, ed. A. Schoors (BETL 86; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1998) 473-79; J. C. L. Gibson, Textbook of Syrian Semitic Inscriptions, 3: Phoenician Inscriptions (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1982); E. Guralnick, "Greece and the Near East: Art and Archaeology," in Daidalikon: Studies in Memory of Raymond V. Schoder, S.J., ed. R. F. Sutton (Wauconda, IL: Bolchazy-Carducci Publishers, 1989) 151-76; W. W. Hallo, "New Moons and Sabbaths: A Case-Study in the Contrastive Approach," HUCA 48 (1977) 1-18; idem, "Compare and Contrast: The Contextual Approach to Biblical Literature," in The Bible in the Light of Cuneiform Literature, ed. W. W. Hallo, B. W. Jones and G. L. Mattingly (ANETS 8; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1990) 1-30; idem, "Sumer and the Bible: A Matter of Proportion," in The Future of Biblical Archaeology: Reassessing Methodologies and Assumptions; The Proceedings of a Symposium August 12-14, 2001, at Trinity International University, ed. J. K. Hoffmeier and A. Millard (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004) 163-75; C. R. Harrison, "Qoheleth in Social-Historical Perspective" (Ph.D. diss., Duke University, 1991); M. Hengel, Judentum und Hellenismus: Studien zu ihrer Begegnung unter besonderer Berücksichtigung Palästinas bis zur Mitte des 2. Jh.s v. Chr. (2nd ed.; WUNT 10; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1973); R. S. Hess, "Multiple-Month Ritual Calendars in the West Semitic World: Emar 446 and Leviticus 23," in The Future of Biblical Archaeology: Reassessing Methodologies and Assumptions; The Proceedings of a Symposium August 12-14, 2001, at Trinity International University, ed. J. K. Hoffmeier and A. Millard (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004) 233-53; H. A. Hoffner Jr., "Ancient Israel's Literary Heritage Compared with Hittite Textual Data," in The Future of Biblical Archaeology: Reassessing Methodologies and Assumptions; The Proceedings of a Symposium August 12-14, 2001, at Trinity International University, ed. J. K. Hoffmeier and A. Millard (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004) 176-92; O. Kaiser, "Judentum und Hellenismus," VF 27 (1982) 68-88; N. Klaes, "Indische Spruchweisheit und das Verständnis von dharma," in Biblische und außerbiblische Spruchweisheit: Ergebnisse einer Tagung der Sektion Religionswissenschaft/Missionswissenschaft der Wissenschaftlichen Gesellschaft für Theologie vom 26. bis 29. September 1988 in Basel, ed. H.-J. Klimkeit (StOR 20; Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1991) 85-101; G. A. Klingbeil, "Sun and Moon in Psalm 121:6: Some Notes on Their Context and Meaning," in To Understand Scriptures: Essays in Honor of William H. Shea, ed. D. Merling (Berrien Springs, MI: Andrews University Institute of Archaeology, 1997) 33-43; idem, A Comparative Study of the Ritual of Ordination as Found in Leviticus 8 and Emar 369 (Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1998); idem, "The Anointing of Aaron: A Study of Lev 8:12 in its OT and ANE Contexts," AUSS 38 (2000) 231-43; idem, Bridging the Gap: Ritual and Ritual Texts in the Bible (BBRSup 1; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2007); idem, "Between

North and South': The Archaeology of Religion in LBA Palestine and the Period of the Settlement," in Critical Issues in Early Israelite History, ed. R. S. Hess, G. A. Klingbeil and P. Ray (BBR-Sup 3; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, forthcoming); M. G. Klingbeil, Yahweh Fighting from Heaven: God as Warrior and as God of Heaven in the Hebrew Psalter and Ancient Near Eastern Iconography (OBO 169; Fribourg: University Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1999); I. Kottsieper, "Alttestamentliche Weisheit: Proverbia und Kohelet (II)," TRu 67 (2002) 201-37; M. Küchler, Frühjüdische Weisheitstraditionen: Zum Fortgang weisheitlichen Denkens im Bereich des frühjüdischen Jahweglaubens (OBO 26; Fribourg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979); W. G. Lambert, ed., Babylonian Wisdom Literature (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1960); N. Lohfink, "melek, šallit, and mōšēl bei Kohelet und die Abfassungszeit des Buches," Bib 62 (1981) 535-43; T. Longman III, Fictional Akkadian Autobiography: A Generic and Comparative Study (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1991); O. Loretz, Qohelet und der alte Orient: Untersuchungen zu Stil und theologischer Thematik des Buches Qohelet (Freiburg: Herder, 1964); M. Malul, The Comparative Method in Ancient Near Eastern and Biblical Legal Studies (AOAT 227; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1990); J. Y.-S. Pahlk, Il canto della gioia in Dio: L'itinerario sapienziale espresso dall'unità letteraria in Qohelet 8,16-9,10 e il parallelo di Gilgameš Me. iii (Series Minor 52; Naples: Istituto Universitario Orientale, Dipartimento di Studi Asiatici, 1996); idem, "Qohelet e le tradizioni sapienziali del Vicino Oriente Antico," in Il Libro del Qohelet: Tradizione, redazione, teologia, ed. G. Bellia and A. Passaro (Milan: Paoline, 2001) 117-43; R. Ratner and B. Zuckermann, "A Kid in Milk? New Photographs of KTU 1.23, Line 14," HUCA 57 (1986) 15-60; S. Sandmel, "Parallelomania," JBL 81 (1962) 1-13; A. Schoors, The Teacher Sought to Find Pleasant Words: A Study of the Language of Qohelet (OLA 41; Leuven: Peeters, 1992); L. Schwienhorst-Schönberger, Nicht im Menschen gründet das Glück (Koh 2,24): Kohelet im Spannungsfeld jüdischer Weisheit und hellenistischer Philosophie (HBS 2; Freiburg: Herder, 1994); idem, Kohelet (HT-KAT; Freiburg: Herder, 2004); N. Shupak, Where Can Wisdom Be Found? The Sage's Language in the Bible and in Ancient Egyptian Literature (OBO 130; Fribourg: University Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1993); S. Talmon,

"The Comparative Method in Biblical Interpretation: Principles and Problems," in Congress Volume: Göttingen 1977, ed. W. Zimmerli et al. (VTSup 29; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1978) 320-56; W. S. Towner, "The Book of Ecclesiastes," NIB 5.265-375; C. Uehlinger, "Qohelet im Horizont mesopotamischer, levantinischer und ägyptischer Weisheitsliteratur der persischen und hellenistischen Zeit," in Das Buch Kohelet: Studien zur Struktur, Geschichte, Rezeption und Theologie, ed. L. Schwienhorst-Schönberger (BZAW 254; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1997) 155-247; R. Wenning, "Griechischer Einfluss auf Palästina in vorhellenistischer Zeit," in Die Griechen und das antike Israel: Interdisziplinäre Studien zur Religions- und Kulturgeschichte des Heiligen Landes, ed. S. Alkier and M. Witte (OBO 201; Fribourg: Academic Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2004) 29-69; R. N. Whybray, "Qoheleth, Preacher of Joy," JSOT 23 (1982) 87-98; idem, "The Sage in the Israelite Royal Court," in The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. J. G. Gammie and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990) 133-39; E. Yannai and E. Braun, "Anatolian and Egyptian Imports from Late EB I at Ain Assawir, Israel," BASOR 321 (2001) 41-56; T. Zimmer, Zwischen Tod und Lebensglück: Eine Untersuchung zur Anthropologie Kohelets (BZAW 286; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1999).

G. A. Klingbeil

ECCLESIASTES 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

Ecclesiastes is a deeply enigmatic but tremendously compelling book. Its interpretation has intrigued generations of readers. Whereas pre-Reformation readings by both Jewish and Christian interpreters shared many assumptions about the book, little consensus exists among readers in the twenty-first century. A survey of the history of interpretation aids interpreters today to situate their own reading and understand more deeply the issues involved in reading the book.

One of the leading problems of interpretation concerns what appear to be tensions or even contradictions within the book. For instance, *Qohelet on numerous occasions concludes that life is "meaningless," but then at crucial points he advocates a lifestyle of joy (Eccl 2:24-26; 3:12-14, 22; 5:18-20; 8:15; 9:7-10). A second example is seen in the apparently conflicted statements about laughter—negative in, for example, Ecclesiastes 2:2; 7:3, but positive in Ecclesiastes 8:15. Are these tensions to be reconciled, and if so, how? Should the tensions be allowed to stand? Are they indications of multiple authors, or at least of more than one voice? Perhaps they are quotations. On the other hand, maybe one theme is subservient to another. All these options have been argued at one point or another in the history of interpretation.

Internal tensions have provoked much discussion and debate, and the same may be said about how the teaching of Ecclesiastes conflicts with the rest of the *canon. For instance, as early as rabbinic times, Ecclesiastes 11:9 (“Be happy, young man, while you are young, and let your heart give you joy in the days of your youth. Follow the ways of your heart and whatever your eyes see”) was seen to be in conflict with Numbers 15:39 (where young men were told to “not prostitute yourselves by going after the lusts of your own hearts and eyes”).

These features make Ecclesiastes a difficult book to interpret, thus leading to debate among interpreters. The biggest difficulty is to provide the book with a coherent reading that accounts for all the varied emphases and apparent tensions. In this regard, an observation made by C. Newsom (191) is apropos: “It is always interesting to see where the ‘interpretive sweat’ breaks out in dealing with such an iconoclastic book; moreover, the history of interpretation of Ecclesiastes sheds an important light on contemporary exegesis.” C. Bartholomew (forthcoming) suggests that problems arise when these tensions are tamed into what he calls the “heresy of paraphrase,” summarizing the book’s message to one of its two poles, meaninglessness (Bartholomew prefers “enigmatic”) or joy. Of course, many interpreters conclude that a proper reading of the book does see one theme as subservient to the others. All these viewpoints are represented in the history of interpretation.

1. From the Beginning to the New Testament
2. Early and Medieval Interpretation
3. The Modern Period
4. Postmodern Readings
5. Late Twentieth and Early Twenty-First Centuries
6. Conclusion

1. From the Beginning to the New Testament.

Significant consensus exists that Ecclesiastes is postexilic. Debate continues though over whether the book is from the Persian (Seow) or the Hellenistic period (Bartholomew, forthcoming). Some scholars (Fredericks 1988; Kaiser) still argue for a preexilic date for the book, but they are few.

No matter when the book was written, it does not appear to be quoted or even alluded to in other OT texts. Its lack of mention does not necessarily mean that Ecclesiastes was not written during the OT period, but if it were mentioned in later OT books, it would likely inform us how the book was being interpreted in that early period. Ecclesiastes very likely was composed before (though perhaps near) the time of *Sirach (c. 180 BC) and *Wisdom of Solomon (c. first century AD), but, again, has not left an explicit imprint on these generically related books.

The earliest manuscript of the book of Ecclesiastes is from Qumran (4QQoh^a), published by J. Muilenburg in 1954 and dated to 175-150 BC, while the only other witness to the book at Qumran (4QQoh^b) is dated sometime between the middle of the first century BC to sometime in the first century AD (Ulrich). 4QQoh^a thus provides a latest point for the composition of the book, but these texts do not inform us about the book’s interpretation.

The NT perhaps quotes Ecclesiastes 7:20 at Romans 3:10 (“There is no one righteous, not even one”) along with a collage of other texts predominantly from *Psalms in support of Paul’s point that all human beings are sinners. Even more provocatively, Romans 8:20 alludes to the book of Ecclesiastes when Paul pronounces the world as subjected to mataiotēs, the Greek equivalent to Hebrew hebel, a thematic word in Ecclesiastes variously translated “meaningless, vanity, enigmatic” or even “transient.” In this section (Rom 8:18-25) Paul reflects on the effects of the introduction of sin and thus most pointedly on Genesis 3. Here we may see that Paul interprets Qohelet as describing a world of sin (“under the sun”) and suffering the effects of God’s punishment (“meaningless, meaningless”). If so, then Paul provides the earliest hint at the interpretation of Ecclesiastes on record.

2. Early and Medieval Interpretation.

2.1. Jewish Interpretation. The earliest Jewish traditions about Ecclesiastes and its interpretation are found in the Mishnah, various midrashim and the Talmuds. These sources reveal differences not only in interpretive strategies but also on the important question of whether the book “makes the hands unclean” or should be “stored away.” A book that “makes the hands unclean” is an authoritative book, a holy book, whose use is surrounded by rituals of washing hands and care. To “store away” a book, on the other hand, is to get rid of it, consign it to oblivion.

We noted above that through the ages questions arose concerning the book’s fit with the rest of the canon as well as its own internal consistency. We can see this debate in early Jewish sources. In the third chapter of the first tractate of the Mishnah (Šabbat), Rabbi Tanhum of Nave is quoted as saying, “O Solomon, where is your wisdom, where is your intelligence? Not only do your words contradict the words of your father, David, they even contradict themselves” (translated from the citation given in Podchard). The Talmud cites the contradiction between Ecclesiastes 2:2; 7:3 and Ecclesiastes 8:15. In the Tosefta (t. Yad. 2:14 [fifth century A.D., but quoting earlier sources]), Rabbi Simeon ben Menasia says, “The Song of Songs makes the hands unclean because it was spoken by the Holy Spirit. Ecclesiastes does not make the hands unclean because it is [merely] Solomon’s wisdom” (Beckwith, 284). The Pesiqta of Rab Kahana (Pesiq. Rab Kah. 68b [see also Lev. Rab. 28:1]) states, “The sages sought to store away the Book of Ecclesiastes because they found words in it which tended toward heresy” (Beckwith, 287). Jerome picked up and affirmed this sentiment when he noted in the introduction to his commentary, “The Jews say that . . . this book seemed fit to be consigned to oblivion, because it asserted the creatures of God to be vain, and preferred eating, drinking, and transitory pleasures to all things; on account of this one section [i.e., Eccl. 12:13-14] [it seemed] to have deserved its authority, that it was included among the divine books” (Beckwith, 287).

Jerome was correct that the majority of Jewish scholars accepted the book in spite of its apparent conflicts with other Scripture. According to b. Sabb. 30b, “The sages sought to store away the Book of Ecclesiastes. . . . And why did they not store it away? Because its beginning is words of the Law and its end is words of the Law” (Beckwith, 287). The beginning and end show its orthodoxy, likely referring especially to the last two verses of the book, which encourage the fear of God and obedience to the commandments as well as warn of the coming judgment (Eccles 12:13-14).

Thus, it appears that although Ecclesiastes was questioned, its canonicity was never rejected by the mainstream Jewish community. The question, in other words, was not “Is Ecclesiastes canonical?” but rather, since the book was considered authoritative, “Why is this book canonical?”

The rabbinic sources describe a meeting of important Jewish leaders at the city of Jamnia in AD 90. These leaders discussed a variety of topics, including those books about which there was some debate as to their authority (particularly *Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes). This influential group of scholars concluded that the book did “render the hands unclean,” and this has remained the dominant Jewish view on the matter.

In terms of interpretation, the *Targum of Ecclesiastes (c. AD 600) provides an excellent insight into a major early Jewish interpretive approach. First, the Targum makes a strong identification of Qohelet with *Solomon. As we will see, this identification is assumed in both Jewish and Christian interpretation until the Reformation period. Note the importation of an extrabiblical legend about Solomon into the Targum’s expansionistic rendering of Ecclesiastes 1:12:

When King Solomon was sitting upon the throne of his kingdom, his heart became very proud of his riches, and he violated the word of God, by gathering many horses, chariots and riders, and amassing much gold and silver. And he married from foreign nations, whereupon the anger of the Lord was kindled against him, and he sent to him Ashmodai, king of the demons, who drove him from his kingdom’s throne, and took away the ring from his hand, in order that he should roam and wander about in the world to reprove it. And he roamed about in the outlying towns and the cities of the land of Israel, weeping and lamenting, and saying, “I am Qohelet, whose name was formerly called Solomon, who was king over Israel in Jerusalem.” (Levine, 28)

This identification of Qohelet and Solomon may have smoothed the way for many religious communities (Jewish and Christian) to accept the authority of this perplexing book that at times seems out of kilter with the rest of the canon. The Targum goes further and turns the book and Qohelet himself into a statement of the deepest piety. Illustrative is the Targum's transformation of Ecclesiastes 12:12 ("Furthermore, of these, my son, be warned! There is no end to the making of many books, and much study wears the body") into an exaltation of Torah study: "And more than these, my son, take care, to make many books of wisdom without end; to study much the words of the Law, and to consider the weariness of the body" (Levine, 47). In this way and throughout the Targum interprets the book as a repository of orthodox teaching in perfect harmony with the rest of the canon, particularly the Torah.

Some medieval Jewish manuscripts (e.g., Codex Leningradensis [early eleventh century AD]) list Ecclesiastes among the so-called *Megillot (after *Ruth and Song of Songs and before *Lamentations and *Esther). Jewish tradition associates these five books with five major Jewish festivals. In what is perhaps the most difficult connection to fathom, Ecclesiastes is associated with the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkot). E. Christianson points out that the Talmud (b. Hag. 17a) connects Ecclesiastes 3:1, which asserts that there is a time for every activity in heaven, with the "appropriate keeping of the season." Of course, this is a rather superficial connection, and Christianson (31) goes on to speculate "that Ecclesiastes reflects the transient, fragile and joyful mood of Sukkot, which remembers the time in the wilderness of rootless wandering, unstable habitation and the hope of a promised land."

Among later medieval Jewish interpreters, Rashbam (grandson of the illustrious Rashi [c. 1080-1160]) stands out as the first to note that the book has a frame and therefore is a type of edited work (see Frame Narrative). His view that Ecclesiastes 1:1-2 is an editorial introduction to the words of Qohelet and that Ecclesiastes 12:8 introduces an editorial epilogue, though not immediately embraced, is widely held today. Another medieval work, the thirteenth-century Zohar (the most important work of Kabbalah mysticism), asserts another view that is more commonly found in modern commentaries. In order to explain contradictions and tensions within the speech of Qohelet, it posits the idea that Qohelet is quoting his unbelieving opponents in order to refute them.

2.2. Christian Interpretation. In one sense, Christian interpretation begins as early as the NT (see 1 above). However, we do not have much writing on Ecclesiastes before Origen (third century AD). Still, there seems to be little doubt about the canonical status of the book, at least according to the witness of early canonical lists from the second century AD onwards, including the Bryennios List (2nd century AD), the list of Melito of Sardis (2nd century AD), the three lists of Epiphanius of Salamis (4th century AD) and others (Beckwith, 182-85; Bartholomew, forthcoming). Furthermore, Clement of Alexandria (d. AD 215) cited it in his Stromata and introduced it by a formula that indicates its status as Scripture: "It is written." In summary, no evidence exists that Ecclesiastes was ever doubted by the early church, and even Theodore of Mopsuestia, cited by many as an exception to this widespread belief, recognized the book as holy Scripture (Murphy 1992, xxiii).

We do not have a full-fledged commentary from Origen, but besides some comments in his works about the book, we can see his influence in his students, particularly Gregory Thaumaturgos (c. AD 213-270), who wrote an early paraphrase of the book (see Jarick). Similar to the Targum, he explicitly identified Qohelet as King Solomon, as shown by his rendering of Ecclesiastes 1:1: "Solomon (the son of the king and prophet David), a king more honored and a prophet wiser than anyone else, speaks to the whole assembly of God." Also, like the Targum, Gregory turns Qohelet into a spokesperson for theological orthodoxy, in his case Christian orthodoxy.

Although Gregory Thaumaturgos is one of the earliest known interpreters of Ecclesiastes, Jerome (c. AD 347-420 [his commentary was written AD 398-399]) holds pride of place in terms of his massive influence on generations of commentators on the book. Jerome was influenced by rabbinic interpretation but takes it in a decidedly Christian direction. Like all early interpreters, Jewish and Christian, he believes that the book was written by King Solomon. His major influence comes in his view that the book teaches its readers to despise this world and its attractions (the so-called contemptus mundi view). In his hands, the book becomes a pamphlet advocating an ascetic perspective and promotes the monastic lifestyle. Indeed, his commentary was written for Blesilla, a daughter of his disciple Paula, to encourage her to maintain an ascetic lifestyle.

The book of Ecclesiastes fit Jerome's purposes well. After all, Qohelet looked extensively under the sun for meaning and concluded that life is meaningless. Specifically, Qohelet examined pleasure, work, wealth, relationships, wisdom and *folly and concluded that such things were not worthy of life. This view can be seen in a letter that he wrote to his disciple Paula, the mother of Blesilla, mentioned above, concerning the course of biblical study that he recommends for her other daughter, Paula. After telling her to begin with Psalms and *Proverbs (for which she can "gather rules of life"), he tells her to proceed to Ecclesiastes third, and this for the reasons that we have been noting. He says, "From the Preacher let her gain the habit of despising the world and its vanities" (for translation, see Pope, 119). Jerome's influence extended beyond his commentary, however, to include his translation of the book into the Latin Vulgate. His translation of hebel as vanitas led to the traditional English rendering "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity" (see KJV).

J. Wright provides an accessible and helpful survey of quotations from the patristic and early medieval period that demonstrates consistency of interpretation during this period along the lines set down by Jerome. In the eyes of scholars of this period, the book compelled an aesthetic life. These commentators had a tendency to resort to allegory to find deeper meanings of passages. In this regard, one can think of Ambrose's interpretation of the "three strand cord" of Ecclesiastes 4:12 in reference to the Trinity (Jarick, 316).

As we reach the end of the period under discussion in this section, we see some nuance of Jerome's approach in a scholar such as Bonaventura, who wrote his commentary in AD 1253-1257. Bonaventura did not reject the contemptus mundi approach, but he did answer the objection that such a view cast aspersions on God, who made the world. He responded that the world is not inherently contemptible, but compared with God, it is nothing. E. S. Christianson (103) cites his "wedding ring" analogy. If a woman loves her ring more than her husband, that is wrong, even adulterous. She should instead regard the ring as worthless compared to her husband. Bonaventura also expanded the scope of Ecclesiastes' teaching to make it relevant to the development of the new sciences related to the study of the natural world that were emerging in the thirteenth century AD. (though roots for this approach to the book may be found in Origen, who believed that the teachings of Ecclesiastes related to "natural science" like Proverbs related to "moral science" [Bartholomew 1998, 36]). For this reason, he emphasized a literal approach to the book more than did his predecessors. Recognizing these shifts of emphasis allows us to place Martin Luther, who will begin our next section, in a better context.

3. The Modern Period.

3.1. Luther and the Reformers. Martin Luther (his Notes on Ecclesiastes were lectures delivered in 1526) provides a watershed in the interpretation of Ecclesiastes. As noted above, the contemptus mundi interpretation of Jerome dominated the scholarly and ecclesiastical approach to the book. Luther vehemently objected to such a view on the basis that it denigrates God, who created the world. Of course, Luther (and other Reformers, such as Melancthon, who wrote commentaries on Ecclesiastes) had no use for the monastic lifestyle, having rejected it in his revolt against the Catholic Church. Luther did not believe that vanity (Eitel) related to the world as much as it did to humanity, or in his (translated) words, "The vanity of the human heart, that is never content with the gifts of God that are present but rather thinks of them as negligible" (Christianson, 107). Bartholomew (forthcoming) well summarizes Luther's constructive approach to Ecclesiastes as "fundamentally positive about civic life even as it wrestles with the difficulties of poor leadership, a problem with which the Reformers were only too familiar. Luther reads Ecclesiastes as a book about politics and the family, about human existence in the context of creation order. Solomon is envisaged not as a solitary but as a political figure deeply concerned about social life." In addition, Luther, like Bonaventura, and others before him also used Ecclesiastes to interact with the new empirical sciences and attendant philosophy. He also found the book to be helpful in his debate with Erasmus over free will.

Of course, Luther did not eradicate the contemptus mundi approach to the book. He did, however, provide a robust alternative to it, thus breaking the consensus among interpreters that had persisted for over a thousand years following Jerome. Luther may have been instrumental in breaking yet another matter of agreement in the understanding of Ecclesiastes, that of Solomonic authorship. Indeed, it is commonly taught that Luther, in Table Talk, was the first one to question Solomonic authorship. He is cited as saying, "Solomon himself did not write Ecclesiastes, but it was produced by Sirach at the time of the Maccabees. . . . It is a sort of Talmud, compiled from many books, probably from the library of King Ptolemy Euergetes of Egypt." This may have been so, since it is cited in many sources, but there is a problem with the transmission of Table Talk, and Christianson (95), in his recent study of the history of interpretation (from which this citation comes), could not find it. If Luther is disqualified, then the view that Solomon was not responsible for the book goes to Grotius (d. 1645), who came to this conclusion based on the appearance of late Hebrew words in the text. From this point on, the consensus on authorship was ended, although Solomonic authorship still has its occasional defenders even today.

3.2. Historical Criticism. The modern period from the late eighteenth century on is marked by the development of historical-critical approaches (see Historical Criticism). The tendency in premodern interpretation, which took place mainly in an ecclesiastical setting, was to question neither the scriptural text nor the interpretation of one's tradition. Of course, this is a generalization, but it does explain why certain exegetical ideas could be passed on for hundreds of years. The historical-critical method developed in the modern period questions the text and the tradition to determine the truth of a matter. In this period, we observe intense concerns and questions about issues such as authorship, historical setting, composition history, genre, ancient Near Eastern background, social setting and much more. Descriptions and evaluations and practices of historical criticism vary greatly and cannot be recounted in this article. (For a particularly incisive analysis of historical criticism and a detailed rendition of historical-critical method in regard to Ecclesiastes, see Bartholomew 1998.)

It is often and rightly noted that modern historical criticism first developed in connection with the Pentateuch. J. Wellhausen was not by any stretch of the imagination the originator of historical criticism, but his Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1885) is seen as the point where the historical-critical method began its domination of scholarly study of the OT to the present. Wellhausen's focus concentrated on two main objects. The first was the history of the development of the Pentateuch itself (source criticism). Once this was accomplished, the conclusions could be the basis for the history of the development of Israelite religion. In the light of historical criticism, this latter history was different from that presented by the Bible itself (most notably by flipping the order of the Law and the Prophets). The second concern was the reconstruction of the history of Israel and its religion. Such a focus soon had an impact on the Historical Books and the Prophets, but the Wisdom literature, while not completely ignored, was on the periphery of scholarly concern for a while.

Even so, by the end of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, historical criticism was used to solve exegetical issues in Ecclesiastes as well as reconstruct its compositional history. One of the more difficult exegetical issues for the book was, as noted earlier, tensions or contradictions within the book. Under the influence of Wellhausian source criticism, commentators "discovered" various sources within the book, partly at least on the basis of these different perspectives. C. Siegfried argued that there were nine hands that contributed to the composition of Ecclesiastes. A decade later, Barton suggested that there were three people behind the book, while Podechard said there were four. Today, few scholars continue in this vein, believing that an appeal to multiple sources is too easy a solution to the issue of the tensions of the book and so are hesitant to appeal to sources or additions to the text. Some would argue that the epilogue is a later addendum. Both M. Fox and T. Longman, among others, argue that someone other than Qohelet is the voice of the epilogue (Eccles 12:8-14). However, neither is certain about nor interested in the question of whether they represent two specific historical individuals or whether Qohelet's speech ever existed as an independent entity. In other words, one can argue for two voices in the book of Ecclesiastes without positing separate sources.

Source criticism developed throughout the nineteenth century, finally influencing the study of Ecclesiastes (for better or worse) at the turn of the century. The next major development in historical-critical method was beginning about that time with the focus on form criticism*. Form criticism is a type of genre analysis with a diachronic dimension. In other words, biblical books and parts thereof are identified in terms of their genre and then are studied to see what their original (usually oral) shape was. In terms of the OT, such study originated in the work of H. Gunkel, who applied it to Genesis and Psalms. Form criticism in the traditional diachronic form, however, has had little impact on the interpretation of Ecclesiastes. Even so, the analysis of the genre as a whole, as well as parts of the book, has become increasingly important (Murphy 1981; Longman 2003; for a description of the present assessment of the genre of the book, see 5.3 below).

Gunkel and his followers also advocated studying the OT in the light of the relatively new ancient Near Eastern sources that were rediscovered beginning in the mid-nineteenth century. Today this type of study is known as the comparative or contextual method. In the early twentieth century, however, most of the comparisons were made to Greek thought (Ranston). This makes sense, since most twentieth- and twenty-first-century interpreters believe that the book was written during the Hellenistic period of the ancient Near East. Today, however, most interest in this area is focused on the generic similarity between Qohelet's speech in Ecclesiastes and ancient Near Eastern autobiographies (Longman; Perdue; Seow). It appears to these scholars that Qohelet's speech within the book (Eccles 1:12–12:7) has the form of an ancient Near Eastern autobiography.

Redaction criticism was introduced to the study of the OT in the middle of the twentieth century. It analyzes the theological impulses at work in the transmission and editing of earlier traditions. Redaction criticism depends on a complex compositional history. For instance, those who divide the Pentateuch into discrete sources that were brought together over the centuries utilize redaction criticism to uncover the theological interests of the collectors of the sources. In the study of Samuel-Kings and Chronicles, redaction criticism examines the theological tendencies of those who drew on the earlier traditions of Israel's past ultimately, it appears, in the exile and the postexilic period respectively. As we have noted, however, source criticism has had limited or no success in Ecclesiastes, with the possible exception of the epilogue.

The closest that the interpretation of Ecclesiastes has come to a redaction-critical study is the reading by B. Childs and his followers (Shepard; Longman 2006 [with differences]), though it is probably better to envision these studies as literary analyses of Ecclesiastes in its final form. In these studies, however, the epilogue is seen as a way to conform the book to the rest of the canon.

4. Postmodern Readings.

If premodern approaches to the exegesis of Ecclesiastes were guided by tradition and a respect for authority of the text, and modern approaches guided by a neutral search for the proper interpretation through the use of historical-critical methods, postmodernism casts doubt on determinant meaning of the text. Unlike modern and premodern hermeneutics, postmodernism does not believe that there is a meaning "out there" to be discovered. Such a skeptical approach was anticipated by the existentialist philosophy of the 1960s. Indeed, Ecclesiastes was a favorite of existentialist theologians such as P. Tillich because the ancient book itself often sounded skeptical ("Meaningless, meaningless"). Christianson (257) quotes Tillich as saying, "The spirit of the Preacher is strong today in our minds. His mood fills our philosophy and poetry. The vanity of human existence is described powerfully by those who call themselves philosophers or poets of existence. They are all children of the Preacher, this great existentialist of his period."

Both Tillich's existentialism and J. Derrida's deconstructionism throw a doubtful light on finding meaning in life or in literature. The difference, however, is that existentialism leads to angst, whereas deconstructionism leads to joy. After all, if there is no determinate meaning in the world, then there is no one to tell us what rules to live by. And in terms of literature, there is no one (not even an author) who can tell us what it means. Therefore, we do not interpret the text according to its original meaning but rather we "play" with it or, to use a term current among postmodern biblical interpreters, we "read against the grain." (For a recent example of a postmodern reading of Ecclesiastes, see Koosed.)

5. Late Twentieth and Early Twenty-First Centuries.

It is illuminating to consider the current discussions of the interpretation of Ecclesiastes against the background of the history of interpretation. In this section we will consider different areas of interpretation. The goal here is not to be exhaustive (mostly commentaries from the leading commentary series will be in view), nor is it to give every nuance of interpretation, but instead only broad outlines. The purpose is to describe the “state of the art” rather than resolve the disagreements of interpretation. In the process, we will also be able to give summary of the high points of interpretation over the past two millennia.

5.1. Authorship and Date. With very few exceptions, interpreters up to the time of the Reformation (either Luther or Grotius) accepted the identification of Qohelet with Solomon and dated the book to his time (tenth century BC). Indeed, again with few exceptions (Rashbam in the twelfth century AD), the book was seen to be the product of a single author.

Today, few commentators on Ecclesiastes would identify Qohelet with the historical Solomon. Even conservative commentators (Young; Kidner; Longman 1997 [Kaiser is an exception]) reject the tradition of Solomonic authorship. The connection between Qohelet and Solomon is instead recognized as a literary fiction on the part of the writer of the book. Again, with few exceptions (Fredericks [1988], who argues that the language is preexilic [but see Schoors]), commentators believe that the language and thought date the book to the Persian (Seow) or Greek period (Crenshaw; Lauha; Bartholomew). Even those who remain agnostic believe that the book almost certainly is late (Longman 1997). Accordingly, in the opinion of the majority of scholars, Ecclesiastes is an anonymous book.

5.2. Unity. In terms of unity, after the passing of a period where scholars posited multiple sources (see, on the work of Siegfried, 3.2 above), few scholars today would describe the book as having a complicated redactional history. The debate centers on the relationship between the body of the book (Qohelet’s *autobiography) and the frame (Eccles 1:1-3 [or 1:1-11]; 12:8-14). Fox (1977) was the first in the modern period to explore the presence of two voices in the book, one that spoke in the first person as Qohelet and another that spoke about Qohelet (frame narrator).

5.3. Genre and Ancient Near Eastern Backgrounds. Discussions of genres of biblical books and their component parts occupy an important part of contemporary interpretation. Such interest is due in part to the program of form criticism initiated by Gunkel a century ago and more recently to the rise of synchronic literary studies. In any case, a contrast between ancient and modern interpretation may be drawn in the extent and explicitness with which the issue of genre of biblical books is discussed. In the case of Ecclesiastes, it is hard to miss the autobiographical nature of much of the book, particularly Ecclesiastes 1:12–12:7. This is not autobiography of the res gestae type, documenting and promoting the great achievements of an individual. Res gestae is the type of autobiography normally produced by or for a king. In Ecclesiastes, however, we have a king who searches for the meaning of life and ponders the consequences of his failure to discover any. It is not surprising then that the dominant type of literature within the book is the reflection, although we also find proverbs, anecdotes and more.

A second contrast between ancient and modern exegesis of the book of Ecclesiastes is the use of ancient Near Eastern background. Of course, this is largely due to the fact that the great ancient Near Eastern cultures and literature were only rediscovered in the nineteenth century. Scholars were quick to exploit these new discoveries to enrich their understanding of biblical texts. Until relatively recently, however, scholars have only pointed to similarities in thought between statements by Qohelet and in ancient Near Eastern texts. A case in point is the frequent comparison made between the speech by Siduri, the “barmaid” in the Epic of Gilgamesh, to Qohelet’s exhortation to carpe diem (see Crenshaw, 51). In the past fifteen years, however, scholars have debated the relevance and significance of a generic similarity between Qohelet’s *autobiography and autobiographies from Mesopotamia and Egypt (Longman; Seow; Perdue; Bartholomew).

5.4. Message. The book of Ecclesiastes is a complex book. This article began by citing examples of what appear to be conflicting statements both within the book and also between the book and the broader canon. In contemporary scholarship there is even the added issue of the relationship between the body of the book and the *refrain, especially if one follows Fox's idea that these represent two voices within the book.

As we have seen above, early Jewish and Christian interpretation handled these tensions by simply smoothing them out and ignoring them. The Targum turned Qohelet and the book into a model of rabbinic Judaism, while early Christian interpreters such as Gregory Thaumaturgos and Jerome transformed Qohelet into an orthodox theologian who advocated contempt for this world and a desire for an ascetic lifestyle.

One can still find semblances of such exegetical maneuvers. W. Kaiser, for instance, expends great energy in explaining how all of Qohelet's statements, though on the surface seemingly out of step with the rest of OT tradition, in reality fit in to its overall message. D. Fredericks (1993) is even more ambitious when he argues against the interpretive consensus that hebel should be translated consistently as "transient" rather than "meaningless" (Longman), "absurd" (Fox) or "enigmatic" (Bartholomew). Although there are significant differences between the latter three positions, they are all within the same semantic range in contrast to Fredericks's suggestion. To have Qohelet proclaim that everything is "transient" is another attempt to turn him into a consistently orthodox thinker and blunt the radical edge of his message.

Another aspect of discussion concerning the message of the book has to do with the relationship between Qohelet's frequent claim that "everything is meaningless/enigmatic/absurd" with the less frequent but still persistent carpe diem statements. Here he urges his hearers to seek whatever joy they can out of life. J. Crenshaw and T. Longman represent one side of the debate, concluding that meaninglessness is Qohelet's final verdict on the world, and that his encouragements to joy come with a tone of resignation. R. Whybray argues the opposite side. He believes that Qohelet's optimism grows with each successive carpe diem passage. Bartholomew represents a third view, which cautions against subsuming one of these themes to the other. Bartholomew (forthcoming) believes that both should be held together: "Qohelet's autonomous epistemology, depending on observation, experience and reason alone, leads him continually to the hebel conclusion, which is juxtaposed again and again with his carpe diem confessions of the goodness of life. The book is about the struggle to live with and resolve the agonized tension between these two poles."

6. Conclusion.

Coming to the end of this survey of major interpretive paradigms of the book of Ecclesiastes, we are not surprised to see that complete consensus has not yet been reached in its interpretation. Such a complex and profound book will continue to occupy the attention of generations of scholars yet to come. In spite of (or maybe due to) the book's complexity, the presence of Ecclesiastes in the canon serves as a reminder that life itself is complex and not amenable to simple answers.

See also ECCLESIASTES 1: BOOK OF; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; HERMENEUTICS; MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS; TARGUMIM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. G. Bartholomew, Reading Ecclesiastes: Old Testament Exegesis and Hermeneutical Theory (AnBib 139; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1998); idem, Ecclesiastes (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, forthcoming); G. A. Barton, The Book of Ecclesiastes (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1908); R. Beckwith, The Old Testament Canon of the New Testament Church (London: SPCK, 1985); B. S. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); E. S. Christianson, Ecclesiastes through the Centuries (BBC; Oxford: Blackwell, 2007); J. L. Crenshaw, Ecclesiastes (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster John Knox, 1987); K. J. Dell, "Ecclesiastes as Wisdom: Consulting Early Interpreters," VT 44 (1994) 301-29; M. V. Fox, "Frame-Narrative and Composition in the Book of Qohelet," HUCA 48 (1977) 83-106; idem, "Qohelet," in Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, ed. J. H. Hayes, vol. 2 (Nashville: Abingdon, 1999) 346-54; idem, Ecclesiastes (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2004); D. C. Fredericks, Qoheleth's Language: Re-evaluating Its Nature and Date (ANETS 3; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1988); idem, Coping with Transience: Ecclesiastes on the Brevity of Life (BibSem 18; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993); C. D. Ginsburg, Cohleth: Commonly Called the Book of Ecclesiastes (London: Longman, 1861); J. Jarick, Gregory Thaumaturgos' Paraphrase of Ecclesiastes (SBLSCS 29; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990); W. Kaiser, Ecclesiastes: To- tal Life (Chicago: Moody, 1979); D. Kidner, A Time to Mourn and a Time to Dance: Ecclesiastes and the Way of the World (BST; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1976); J. L. Koosed, (Per)mutations of Qoheleth: Reading the Body in the Book (LHBOTS; London: T & T Clark, 2006); A. Lauha, Kohelet (BKAT 19; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1978); É. Levine, The Aramaic Version of Qohelet (New York: Sepher-Hermon Press, 1978); T. Longman III, Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Eerdmans, 1997); idem, "Israelite Genres in Their Ancient Near Eastern Setting," in The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century, ed. by M. A. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 177-95; idem, "Reading Wisdom Canonically," in Canon and Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. (SHS 7; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2006) 352-73; J. Muilenburg, "A Qohelet Scroll from Qumran," BASOR 135 (1954) 20-28; R. E. Murphy, Wisdom Literature: Job, Proverbs, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, and Esther (FOTL 13; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); idem, "Qohelet Interpreted: The Bearing of the Past on the Present," VT 32 (1982) 331-37; idem, Ecclesiastes (WBC 23A; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1992); C. A. Newsom, "Job and Ecclesiastes," in Old Testament Interpretation: Past, Present, and Future; Essays in Honor of Gene M. Tucker, ed. J. Mays, D. Petersen and K. Richards (Nashville: Abingdon, 1995) 177-94; L. G. Perdue, Wisdom and Creation: The Theology of Wisdom Literature (Nashville: Abingdon, 1994); E. Podechard, L'Ecclesiaste (EBib; Paris: Librairie Victor Lecoffre, 1912); M. H. Pope, Song of Songs (AB 7C; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977); H. Rastson, Ecclesiastes and Early Greek Wisdom Literature (London: Epworth, 1925); A. Schoors, The Preacher Sought to Find Pleasing Words: A Study in the Language of Qoheleth (Leuven: Peeters, 1992); C. L. Seow, Ecclesiastes (AB 18C; New York: Doubleday, 1997); G. T. Sheppard, "The Epilogue of Qoheleth as Theological Commentary," CBQ 39 (1977) 182-89; C. Siegfried, Prediger und Hoheslied (HKAT; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1898); E. Ulrich, "Ezra and Qoheleth Manuscripts from Qumran (4QEzra, 4QQohA,B)," in Priests, Prophets and Scribes: Essays on the Formation and Heritage of Second Temple Judaism in Honour of Joseph Blenkinsopp, ed. E. Ulrich et al. (JSOTSup 149; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1992) 139-57; R. N. Whybray, "Qohelet, Preacher of Joy," JSOT 23 (1982) 87-92; idem, Ecclesiastes (NCBC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989); J. R. Wright, ed., Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon (ACCS 9; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2005); E. J. Young, An Introduction to the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1949).

T. Longman III

ECCLESIASTICUS. See SIRACH, BOK OF.

EDITORIAL CRITICISM

Our understanding of the book of *Psalms probably has suffered as a result of its frequent characterization as the "hymnbook of the Old Testament." The Psalter is often considered to be a collection of songs (see Music, Song) for *worship, and undoubtedly there is an element of truth in this idea; it is likely that many psalms were sung in public or private worship in their original setting, just as they have been throughout the ages (see Cult, Worship: Psalms). However, one thing is certain: the Psalter at some point became a canonical book of the OT. It became a book to be read and meditated upon and applied, just like any other book of the OT—not a hymnbook, but a book. The "hymnbook" idea has had a marginalizing effect upon our understanding of the psalms: "The Psalms are poems, and poems intended to be sung; not doctrinal treatises, nor even sermons" (Lewis, 10). This is partly due to contemporary misconceptions concerning the value of the aesthetic. Modernity has tended to assume that anything of real importance and significance should be explained "factually," using propositional ideas. The poetic—with its use of metaphor, imagery and emotive description—is often considered to be insubstantial by comparison. However, nothing could be further from the truth, for the aesthetic and the didactic combine seamlessly in the psalms, and regardless of what the Psalter may have been at various stages of its development, it has become a book of the Christian *canon and as such teaches us theology.

As a book like any other book, Psalms (and the other anthological books of the Writings) has been subject to the same editorial processes that can be observed in the remainder of the canon. Since B. S. Childs's Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (1979), the general principle that an editorial hand was at work in the formation of the final version of the canon has been broadly accepted with regard to the historical and prophetic books of the OT. However, discussion of the poetic books continued to focus on questions of genre and function within the cult, and scholars generally were skeptical with regard to any notion of editorial shaping of the poetic books. It was widely assumed that nothing other than the random compilation of disparate materials could be observed in Psalms and *Proverbs particularly. So, is it legitimate to speak of editorial criticism with regard to such poetic works?

1. Editorial Shaping of Psalms
2. The Significance of Editorial Shaping in Psalms
3. Editorial Shaping in Proverbs
4. Method in Discerning Editorial Context
5. Conclusion

1. Editorial Shaping in Psalms.

Since the key works of H. Gunkel and S. Mowinckel (see Form Criticism), study of Psalms has been dominated by questions of literary genre and usage within Israel's public worship. Consideration of type and cult-function was so pre-eminent in the secondary literature that questions of editing in the psalms were almost entirely neglected. C. Westermann (251) suggests that "in laying the foundation for his interpretation of the Psalms, Gunkel above all had no interest in how the collection was handed down to us," and this lack of interest in the formation of the Psalter continued through several generations until the 1980s. However, in writing the chapter on the canonical shape of Psalms in Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture, Childs asked a very pertinent question that ultimately led to a sea change in the study of Psalms: "Why is Psalm 1 the first psalm in the Psalter?" (see Childs, 512-14). It is not representative of the major genres of psalms, being neither a *lament nor a *hymn of praise. Equally, it seems unlikely that the first psalm was ever sung by the massed ranks of the covenant community at one of the great festivals, since it is a Torah/Wisdom poem. Psalm 1, therefore, is not significant either with regard to its genre or its function in Israel's cult, so why should it be chosen as the first in the book?

This initial question led naturally to a second: "Why are there so many lexical and structural links between Psalms 1 and 2?" Neither of these two poems is headed by a superscription (which is unusual in Book I of the Psalter), the two psalms are bounded by an *inclusio grounded in the idea of "blessing" (ʿāšrê is used in Ps 1:1; 2:12), the verb hāgâ is key to both psalms (used of meditation on the Torah in Ps 1:2 and of the mutterings of rebellion in Ps 2:1), and, among other links, the righteous, the wicked, the law, ideas of judgment and a way that is perishing appear in both poems (see Auffret; Grant, 60-65). Once these observations are made, the reader logically begins to question whether these connections are accidental or are they in fact indications of purposeful editorial activity in the Psalter?

This was the very issue that G. H. Wilson, a student of Childs, sought to address in his Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (1985). Having examined editing techniques that were apparent in collections of Sumerian hymns, Wilson went on to ask if such indicators of editorial influence are apparent also in the biblical psalms. The Sumerian hymnic collections contained several explicit indications of editing (e.g., the name of the scribe who gathered a collection), but Wilson also pointed out the presence of "tacit" signs of editing (e.g., grouping hymns according to theme, or the similarity of their first line, called an "incipit"). Although there are no explicit signs of editing in the Psalter, Wilson (1985, 9-10, 182-85) went on to show that there are many tacit indications of the grouping or ordering of psalms in the book.

One of the first and most significant of these signs is seen in the aforementioned placement of Psalms 1—2 at the head of the Psalter. These poems are deliberately linked and seem to have been purposefully placed at the start of the Psalter as an introduction to the wide diversity of material that the reader will encounter within the collection as a whole (McCann, 48-50). It was a common practice in the ancient Near East for the editors of anthologies of hymnic or poetic material to place an introduction at the head of the collection in order to provide the reader with a paradigm for the interpretation of the diverse materials that follow (Van Leeuwen, NIB 5.24). The placement of Psalms 1—2 as an introduction to the canonical book as a whole indicates that the biblical Psalter follows this pattern and thus points toward the subtle presence of editorial organization within the psalms.

Once this introduction is observed, it soon becomes clear that there are other obvious indications of deliberate editorial activity throughout the book of Psalms. The division of Psalms into five books separated by doxologies is, arguably, the clearest indication that the order of the psalms is not entirely random (Wilson 2005, 230-31). It is possible that this was a deliberate attempt to echo the Pentateuch within the Writings, and the rabbis compared the “five books of David” with the five books of Moses (Sarna, 18). Whether this was the intent or not, the organization of the psalms into books clearly is not accidental but rather points toward deliberate editorial activity.

Another obvious sign of editing is the incorporation of smaller groupings of psalms into the broader Psalter as collections (e.g., the Songs of Ascent [Pss 120—134]). These psalms, unlike the laments, have not been dispersed throughout the book, but their association with one another is retained by their inclusion as a subcollection within the broader book. Furthermore, we can observe deliberate editorial structuring of these collections retained within Psalms. Perhaps the best example of this is the *chiastic structure of Psalms 15—24. Miller points out that Psalm 15 and Psalm 24 are entrance psalms that focus on questions of access into the temple; Psalm 16 and Psalm 23 are psalms of comfort; Psalm 17 and Psalm 22 are powerful laments; Psalm 18 and the linked Psalms 20—21 are royal psalms; thus leaving Psalm 19, a Torah psalm, as the central pivot of this collection. Other indications of editing include the deliberate juxtaposition of psalms that are apparently “in conversation” with one another. For example, Psalm 90 (and the succeeding psalms in Book IV of the Psalter) seems to provide a response to the depths of despair found in the lament section of Psalm 89 (e.g., cf. Ps 89:39 with Ps 90:14). The lament of Psalm 89 focuses on the demise of the Davidic monarchy and questions whether Yahweh is still in control of the destiny of his people. Psalm 90 responds with the voice of Moses, pointing out that Yahweh was the refuge and dwelling place of the people before king and temple existed, and that he is still their rock even though these institutions have been removed. The ensuing psalms emphasize the continuing reign of Yahweh and also encourage the people with the prospect of the future return of the Davidic king (Mays 1994a, 124-25).

So, although it is impossible to completely remove an element of “randomness” from the Psalter (claims for a logical ordering throughout the whole book go too far), there are many indications of extensive editorial activity within Psalms. Wilson (1985, 199) summarizes the tell-tale signs of editorial activity in the Psalter:

I have been able to show (1) that the “book” divisions of the Psalter are real, editorially induced divisions and not accidentally introduced; (2) the “separating” and “binding” functions of author and genre groupings; (3) the lack of a s/s [superscription] as an indication of a tradition of combination; (4) the use of hllwyh pss to indicate the conclusion of segments; (5) the use of hwddw pss to introduce segments; (6) the existence of thematic correspondences between the beginning and ending pss in some books. All of these findings demonstrate the presence of editorial activity at work in the arrangement of the pss.

2. The Significance of Editorial Shaping in Psalms.

Reading Psalms as a book has important implications for interpretation, primarily in terms of context. Traditionally, each psalm has been treated as an individual unit for interpretation purposes—these were contextless, hermetically sealed units as far as their interpretation was concerned. However, reading Psalms as a book means that, as with every book, passages fall within a context. Why are Psalms 1—2 the only psalms without a superscription in Books I-III of the Psalter? Well, it seems that Psalms 1—2 were meant to be read and understood together as a joint introduction to the book of Psalms, an introduction that focuses on choosing a way of Torah-based devotion to Yahweh and absolute submission to his lordship. However, this double message is clearly heard only when we read these psalms in their canonical context.

Increasingly, scholars are becoming aware of the importance of context even within gathered anthological books such as Psalms and Proverbs. Not that psalms cease to function as individual units for interpretative purposes; it is rather that their context—where the psalm is found in the Psalter—impinges upon the interpretation of that individual unit. It can therefore be argued that individual compositions within the Psalter have limited interpretative autonomy: each psalm is a literary unit in its own right (akin to any pericope within a narrative text), but the meaning found in each unit is often nuanced or influenced by its near neighbors or the collection within which it resides. To read and understand a psalm properly, we must be aware of its setting within any subcollection of which it may be a part, within its book and, indeed, within the whole Psalter. We should pay particular attention to psalms that open or close books or that are central to a book. Psalms are associated—resulting in an interpretative context—by way of their superscriptions (e.g., the Songs of Ascent) or their opening/closing lines (e.g., the “hallelujah” commands found in Pss 111–117; 146–150) or by theme (e.g., the “Yahweh reigns” psalms [Pss 93–99]). So, the position of a psalm within the Psalter impacts how we read that poem (Mays 1993).

For example, Psalm 1 is a literary unit. Despite claims that Psalms 1–2 were once a single composition, Psalm 1 is a composition in its own right. Therefore, it speaks a message to today’s reader: the avoidance of evil, the practice of the means of grace, the blessings of being in right relationship with the living God, and the fact that life boils down to a choice between one of two ways. This is Psalm 1’s message; however, as we noted, the first two psalms are linked both structurally (through the lack of superscription and the ’āsrê [“blessed”] inclusio in Ps 1:1 and Ps 2:12) and semantically (through the repetition of key terms—e.g., hāgā [“meditate/plot”] in Ps 1:2 and Ps 2:1; derek [“way”] in Ps 1:6 and Ps 2:12). The editorial association of these two psalms provides each with a context for interpretation. So we should read and understand Psalm 1 in the light of Psalm 2 and vice versa. As J. L. Mays (1994a, 122–23) observes, “The two psalms together call for a piety composed of obedience and trust that is fostered by the entire book. Delight in the torah and taking refuge in the Lord constitute the faith nurtured by the psalms. The psalms offer a ‘way’ and a ‘refuge’ in the midst of the wickedness and power of the world.”

3. Editorial Shaping in Proverbs.

In many ways, the issues discussed above regarding Psalms apply equally when the Wisdom literature comes under consideration. Although written in poetic form, the book of *Job follows a fairly cohesive narrative structure. Equally, it has been argued that a “narrative” or even “narratives” can be traced through the book of *Ecclesiastes (Christianson). It has generally been thought that the book of Proverbs is also made up of gathered material where questions of context, broadly speaking, were thought not to apply. However, in recent years several works have drawn attention to signs of editorial organization in Proverbs akin to those observable in the Psalter.

The problem of interpreting Proverbs, especially Proverbs 10–29, is well stated by R. C. Van Leeuwen (1988, 2): “In these chapters we find discrete, entirely self-sufficient literary units . . . which are extremely terse in formulation and brief in compass. . . . One is acutely aware that the briefer the literary unit the more difficult the interpretation. The problem is further complicated because the juxtaposed proverbs, to the modern, western mind at least, often appear to have very little to do with one another either formally or materially.” Obviously, the individual proverbs of Proverbs 10–29 are even briefer literary units than those found in Psalms. Proverbs 1–9 and Proverbs 30–31 contain longer groupings of proverbial statements, called “instructions,” and these provide a much clearer context for the interpretation of the individual proverb. However, Proverbs 10–29 consists of verse after verse of individual proverbial statements without obvious flow, progression of thought or context. The collections appear at first glance to be random, and for many years scholars assumed that there was no purposeful ordering in this section.

The works of Van Leeuwen, K. M. Heim and others go a long way toward dispelling the myth of the random collection of proverbs in the book of Proverbs. Van Leeuwen highlights the editorial organization of proverbs on structural, poetic and semantic levels. In terms of structure, Van Leeuwen points out that although individual sayings and admonitions have a “relative self-sufficiency” in their own right, each proverb is in fact a “paradigmatic building block” used by the author or editor to create larger poetic units. From the perspective of *poetics, it is clear that individual proverbial sayings can be juxtaposed in such a way as to create poems that in turn impact our interpretation of the individual sayings. So contiguous units within a broader poem provide “commentary” on one another; that is, they supply the reader with a context. At the word level, Van Leeuwen points out the frequent repetition of similar words or concepts within juxtaposed proverbial statements, once again indicating continuity and therefore context (see Van Leeuwen 1988, 40-55). Heim develops these observations in more detail, providing thorough criteria for the delimitation of editorial groupings within the book of Proverbs. He suggests that “clusters” of proverbs are to be discerned by observing not primarily the continuation of themes but rather the formal links that associate proverbial sayings. Thus, the reader should look for the repetition of synonyms, word roots, sounds, consonants and so forth in these clusters of proverbs. Heim argues that the movement between clusters is not marked by verses that clearly conclude a particular chain of proverbs; rather, we should watch for a change in the linking device that bonds proverbs into groups (e.g., the movement from a speech-dominated cluster in Prov 11:9-14 to a commerce-focused cluster in Prov 11:15-21) (see Heim, 105-8).

4. Method in Discerning Editorial Context.

Once it is established that editorial hands have in some sense shaped the poetic books, a secondary question must follow: How can we discern the editorial shaping that is apparent in Psalms and Wisdom literature? The basic thesis argued above is that editors have provided us, as readers, with a context for the interpretation of individual poems, proverbs, sayings and instructions. This context inevitably influences our understanding of these individual literary units, so how can we discern these frameworks for interpretation in the poetic books?

With Psalms as our primary example, the basic thesis of a canonical approach to the Psalter is that the ordering and placement of the psalms is not entirely random, but rather the book of Psalms has been shaped by the work of editors in order to impact our understanding of individual poems. In order to legitimately discern editorial activity in the Psalter, some fairly rigorous ground rules must be applied to prevent the misuse of this canonical approach and its decline into rampant subjectivity. G. H. Wilson, as well as being one of the originators of this method, championed correct and clearly defined method. Having highlighted the pitfalls of approaching the Psalter with a preconceived notion of the editorial themes to be found in the book and then “finding” psalms that fit this theory, Wilson (1993, 48) states, “My own preference is to work without a hypothesis . . . and to allow any sense of the structure that develops to derive from an intensive and thorough analysis of the psalms in question in terms of their linguistic, thematic, literary and theological links and relationships.” Wilson suggests that editorial themes can be discerned from “linguistic, thematic, literary and theological links and relationships” observed between psalms. Psalms are linked in order to paint a fuller picture than is seen in their individual parts. Content in context takes on a slightly different meaning. The idea is that the theological concerns of the editors of the Psalter’s final form are seen in the way in which they link psalms together and also in their placement of these linked psalms at key junctures throughout the Psalter.

D. M. Howard also provides helpful comment on canonical methodology as it is applied to the book of Psalms. His approach focuses on four areas of linking that show concatenation between individual psalms or groups of psalms: lexical, thematic, structural and genre connections (see Howard, 99-100). He further refines these categories. Regarding lexical links, we should look in particular for “keyword” (Leitwörter) links where the same word or phrase is repeated, and for thematic word links where the same concept is expressed using different words. Incidental links, which could be described as nonessential to both psalms, may also appear, so we should be careful not to read too much into the repetition of the commonest of words or phrases. Thematic links are seen via lexical repetition and more generally linked concepts, or even in echoes and responses between psalms. For example, a question asked in one psalm may be answered in the following psalm (e.g., could “The LORD is my shepherd, I shall not want” in Ps 23:1 be a response to “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” in Ps 22:1?), or a theme may be expanded upon throughout a chain of psalms (e.g., the “LORD reigns” psalms [Pss 93–99]). Howard sees structural links as particularly helpful when we are dealing with a group of psalms within the larger structure of the Psalter (see 4.1 below). Both Wilson and Howard see genre having only limited importance as a tool for deriving thematic association between psalms; it can highlight interesting indicators (e.g., the possible transition between groups of psalms), but it seems unlikely that the redactors of the Psalter extensively used genre classification as an organizational tool—content, including the superscriptions, rather than type seems to have directed the editorial placement of the psalms.

Obviously, there may be a certain degree of overlap in these categories. For example, thematic links often become apparent through the observation of lexical concatenation. Or, the use of the same word in consecutive psalms may indicate a structural connection as well as simple lexical linkage (e.g., the repetition of the ʾāsrê ["blessed"] in Pss 1—2 forms a structural link, an inclusio, that goes beyond the simple repetition of words in successive psalms). However, these ground rules provide a reasonable framework within which the canonical approach can function. Seeking out such indicators of concatenation can help us to define more clearly a context for the interpretation of individual psalms.

4.1. Collections, Superscriptions and Editorial Context. Along with the indications of deliberate editorial association mentioned above, collections and superscriptions are particularly significant for discerning context. Obviously, lexical and thematic repetition is an essential feature indicating the deliberate association of juxtaposed psalms: where there is no repetition of words, ideas and motifs, the reader makes no connection between neighboring psalms. However, an element of subjectivity in charting keyword links remains. Where does concatenation come to an end? Where did it begin? Sometimes linked groups of psalms have a very clear beginning and ending, but often this linking is more difficult to define—for example, Book I is so dominated by Davidic laments that it is difficult to define groupings within that broader collection.

It seems that if a proper definition of psalm groupings is key to the canonical approach to the study of the Psalter, then the method of delimiting groups of psalms needs to be clearly expressed. Concatenation via linking techniques is not always sufficient to define a psalm grouping in and of itself, so the reader should also look for indicators of editorial division. The whole idea of a psalm grouping implies both a conjunctive and a disjunctive literary function. Thus, a group of psalms (or a cluster of proverbs, for that matter) implies a degree of association between the psalms within that grouping, and this in turn implies a degree of separation from neighboring psalms that are not part of this psalm grouping.

Take the Songs of Ascent, for example. How does this grouping impact Book V of the Psalter? Psalms 120—134 clearly comprises a grouping. This is indicated, as is often the case, primarily by their superscription. Each of these fifteen psalms begins with the words šir hamm'ālōt ("a song of ascents"), and there is evidence from both the psalms themselves and extrabiblical material that these psalms were used in the temple during one of the great pilgrimage festivals. So there is good reason to see these psalms as a grouping, and, therefore, the editorial context for the interpretation of any one of these psalms is found within the collection—the emphases of the grouping shapes our understanding of each individual composition. What are the implications for the rest of Book V?

The conjunctive aspect of this collection provides a clear context for the interpretation of these psalms, but the disjunctive aspect of this grouping also gives us indicators as to how we should read the psalms contextually. Psalm 119 and Psalm 135 clearly are not part of the Songs of Ascent, and therefore they fall within a different context. This leads us to question the contextual setting for these compositions. Looking for indicators of other groupings within Book V, we see that Psalms 111—117 form a canonical collection because each of them either begins or ends with the "hallelujah" command (except Ps 114, but it is possible that the "hallelujah" postscript to Ps 113 was originally the superscript for Ps 114). This clearly defined collection leaves Psalms 118—119 as a pairing designed to be read together, as is evidenced by the lexical and thematic overlap that can be observed in these psalms (Grant, 175-80). On the other side of the Songs of Ascent collection we see a group of Davidic psalms from Psalm 138 to Psalm 145, leaving the context for Psalm 135 to be found in relationship with Psalms 136—137 (Mays 1994b, 422).

So we can see that collections are often marked by a common superscription or first line, and that these collections help us to define the context for the interpretation of individual poems. The psalms within the collection are linked, and at the same time they delimit the extent of the association and help us to see connections that may not otherwise have been immediately obvious.

4.2. The Question of Significant Placement. Having examined some principles for establishing context by way of lexical and thematic association, and having looked at the impact of collections on our reading of the text, we will find it helpful to explore some of the principles regarding significant placement within the Psalter. What makes the placement of a psalm or a group of psalms particularly telling from an editorial perspective? At its most basic level, the answer to that question is quite simple: we should pay particular attention to psalms or groups of psalms that are placed at the beginning, middle or end of one of the books of the Psalter.

One of the observations by Wilson (1985, 207-8) on the editorial shaping of the Psalter was the importance of the so-called seam psalms that come at the beginning and the end of the books of the Psalter. These positions within the five books have an obvious significance for understanding the thematic emphases that the editors seek to highlight for the readers of the psalms. The opening thoughts of a book, in a very natural manner, set the tone for what follows, and it has been observed that the psalms that close the book divisions of the Psalter often appear to deliberately echo the initial compositions (deClaissé-Walford, 55-56). Therefore, we should pay particular attention to the beginning and the end of books as we seek to discern editorial emphases. Furthermore, centrality within a book of the Psalter is also considered to be of some significance. E. Zenger (102), referring to the placement of Psalm 119 in Book V, states, "According to the theological perspective of the fifth book of psalms which has the Torah Psalm 119 intentionally placed in the middle of the composition, the psalms are a means of opening oneself to the living Torah of YHWH—in accordance with the programme at the beginning of the Psalter, Psalms 1–2, and in accordance with the closing Hallel, Psalms 146–150, which interprets the recitation/singing of psalms as the actualization of the way of life (Torah) instilled in the cosmos" (emphasis added).

Centrality within the respective books of the Psalter also seems to be of importance in defining the emphases that the editors desired to stress. It may be that there is a single, central psalm that clearly lies at the very heart of one of the books (e.g., Ps 119 in Book V), and in other examples it appears to be a collection that is central (e.g., the Pss 15–24 collection in Book I). However, the beginning, middle and end of the five books of Psalms should draw our interest because these in particular seem to be the focus of editorial attention.

Although not all of the aforementioned methodological details apply equally to all of the poetic books of the OT, many of the general principles—especially Wilson's and Howard's suggestions for determining concatenation—may be adopted in our analysis of editorial activity in Proverbs.

5. Conclusion.

All the poetic books of the OT show signs that their final form has somehow been shaped by editors. The task of editorial criticism is to access the themes, concerns and emphases that were key for those who assembled these books as we know them today. Through careful study of the text we see that the poetic texts are not isolated units that stand entirely on their own but rather do in fact have a context that is drawn from the ordering of these collections. These contexts shape our understanding and interpretation of the individual texts found in both Psalms and Proverbs.

See also ASAPH AND SONS OF KORAH; FORM CRITICISM; FRAME NARRATIVE; LEMUEL AND AGUR; PSALMS 1: BOOK OF; RHETORICAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Auffret, The Literary Structure of Psalm 2, trans. D. J. A. Clines (JSOTSup 3; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1977); B. S. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (London: SCM, 1979); E. S. Christianson, A Time to Tell: Narrative Strategies in Ecclesiastes (JSOTSup 280; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); N. L. deClaissé-Walford, Reading from the Beginning: The Shaping of the Hebrew Psalter (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1997); J. A. Grant, The King as Exemplar: The Function of Deuteronomy's Kingship Law in the Shaping of the Book of Psalms (SBLAB 17; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2004); K. M. Heim, Like Grapes of Gold Set in Silver: An Interpretation of Proverbial Clusters in Proverbs 10:1-22:16 (BZAW 273; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001); D. M. Howard, The Structure of Psalms 93-100 (BJSUCSD 5; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997); C. S. Lewis, Reflections on the Psalms (Glasgow: Collins, 1961); J. L. Mays, "The Question of Context in Psalm Interpretation," in The Shape and Shaping of the Psalter, ed. J. C. McCann (JSOTSup 159; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993) 14-20; idem, The Lord Reigns: A Theological Handbook to the Psalms (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1994a); Psalms (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 1994b); J. C. McCann, A Theological Introduction to the Books of Psalms: The Psalms as Torah (Nashville: Abingdon, 1993); P. D. Miller, "Kingship, Torah Obedience and Prayer," in Neue Wege der Psalmenforschung, ed. K. Seybold and E. Zenger (HBS 1; Freiburg: Herder, 1994) 127-42; N. M. Sarna, On the Book of Psalms: Exploring the Prayer of Ancient Israel (New York: Schocken, 1993); R. C. Van Leeuwen, "The Book of Proverbs: Introduction, Commentary and Reflections," NIB 5.19-264; idem, Context and Meaning in Proverbs 25-27 (SBLDS 96; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); C. Westermann, Praise and Lament in the Psalms (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); G. H. Wilson, The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (SBLDS 76; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985); idem, "Understanding the Purposeful Arrangement of the Psalms: Pitfalls and Promise," in The Shape and Shaping of the Psalter, ed. J. C. McCann (JSOTSup 159; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993) 42-51; idem, "The Structure of the Psalter," in Interpreting the Psalms: Issues and Approaches, ed. P. S. Johnston and D. G. Firth (Leicester: Apollos, 2005) 229-46; E. Zenger, "The Composition and Theology of the Fifth Book of the Psalter," JSOT 80 (1998) 77-102.

J. A. Grant

EDUCATION. See SAGES, SCHOOLS, EDUCATION.

ELIHU. See JOB 1: BOOK OF.

ELLIPSIS

Ellipsis involves constructions in which a grammatically required element is omitted, thus creating a structural hole or gap.

1. Introduction
2. Cross-linguistic Features of Verbal Ellipsis
3. Distinctive Features of Verbal Ellipsis in Biblical Poetry
4. Ellipsis in Poetry as Opposed to Prose

1. Introduction.

Ellipsis is the most elusive feature of biblical poetry in that it involves words that are not present but whose existence is understood by speakers and hearers, as well as writers and readers. From a linguistic point of view, ellipsis produces utterances that are grammatically incomplete in their surface structure. For example, in Isaiah 1:27 the verb has been elided (or deleted) in the second line: "Zion by justice shall be redeemed, / and her repentant ones by righteousness []." (In the biblical examples of ellipsis in this article, the following conventions are used: the elided material is represented by the blank space within square brackets, the antecedent is in italics, and the two halves of the example are divided by a slash.) The second clause, "and her repentant ones by righteousness," is structurally incomplete without the verb ("shall be redeemed") from the first clause. Some biblical scholars have referred to the verb in examples such as Isaiah 1:27 as a "double-duty" element (e.g., Dahood, §13.44a), thus focusing on the item that is retained in an elliptical construction rather than the item that is deleted.

Less technically, the term "elliptical" is sometimes used to describe utterances that are contextually incomplete and require the hearer to supply contextual information (on the distinction, see Lyons, 174-75; Halliday and Hasan, 142-43); this second use of the term will not be considered here.

Verses with elliptical constructions pose two special problems: the necessity of recognizing that ellipsis has occurred, and the need to restore the missing word(s) so that the verse can be read correctly. For native speakers of a language, these challenges are ordinarily met without difficulty and, in fact, unconsciously. We can illustrate these problems using spoken English. Upon hearing the sentence John ate apples and Sue oranges, the hearer knows that Sue oranges is a sentence fragment that must be resolved as Sue [ate] oranges. Native speakers are able to process sentence fragments effortlessly because they have two kinds of innate syntactic knowledge: knowledge of the underlying syntactic structures of their language, and knowledge of the ways in which ellipsis operates upon those structures. Nonetheless, syntax alone is insufficient for interpreting elliptical structures; native speakers also must rely on their knowledge of semantics (the meanings of words), pragmatics (the uses of words within the speech context) and prosody (the sound phrases). Contrast the sentence John ate the apples slowly and the monkey quickly with the sentence John ate the apples slowly and the candy quickly. The two sentences are identical in surface structure and have the same kind of sentence fragment (a noun phrase [respectively, the monkey and the candy] and an adverb [quickly]), and each allows syntactically for two different interpretations depending upon whether the noun phrase is the subject or the object of the elided verb. On the basis of semantics and pragmatics, however, most English-speakers will interpret the monkey as the subject of its fragmented sentence (the monkey [ate the apples] quickly) and the candy as the object of its fragmented sentence ([John ate] the candy quickly). When the two sentences are spoken aloud, the presence or absence of a slight pause provides the hearer with an additional clue to the intended meaning of the speaker (Hartmann), signaling the absence of the implied words from the sentence (John ate the apples slowly and the monkey [pause] quickly). Each of these features of language (syntax, semantics, pragmatics, prosody) plays a role in the interpretation of elliptical constructions.

The patterns of ellipsis in biblical *Hebrew must be ascertained through an understanding of the features of ellipsis that are shared among the world's languages (see, e.g., McShane, 136-42) as well as an examination of the features distinctive to biblical Hebrew on the basis of exegetically unremarkable examples. The remainder of this article considers ellipsis of the verb in biblical poetry, since this aspect of ellipsis is most easily illustrated in translation. (For a description of the other kinds of ellipsis in biblical Hebrew, see Geller, 299-312; O'Connor, 124-29, 401-407; Watson, 303-6; Miller 2003; 2005 [on ellipsis of negative words]; forthcoming b [on comparative constructions]; forthcoming a [on prepositions]).

2. Cross-linguistic Features of Verbal Ellipsis.

2.1. Ellipsis Requires Coordinate Clauses. The first feature common to languages concerning verbal ellipsis is that ellipsis is possible only out of coordinate (not subordinate) structures. In English, for example, ellipsis of the verb is possible when two clauses are coordinate (i.e., joined with "and" or "but"), but not when they are subordinate (e.g., joined with "because"). Thus, it is possible to say Chris cleaned the garage and Lee [] the car, but not Chris cleaned the garage because Lee [] the car (see Wilder).

Biblical Hebrew is similar in that verbal ellipsis requires two coordinate clauses, joined with "and" (as in Is 1:27 [see 1 above]), an adversative conjunction (e.g., "but rather" in 1 Sam 30:22), or simply juxtaposed, as in Isaiah 41:7: "The artisan encourages the goldsmith, / the one who smoothes with the hammer [] the one who strikes the anvil."

In most of the examples in this article the boundaries of the poetic line and the boundaries of the syntactic clause are coterminous, but this is not always the case. Verbal ellipsis occurs out of coordinate structures; the poetic line may or may not provide a suitable environment for ellipsis to take place.

2.2. Ellipsis Requires Correspondence. A second feature of ellipsis is that the two clauses must correspond in some way. In other words, hearers (and readers) are able to determine what belongs in the gap by aligning the two clauses and determining what is missing in one of them.

In biblical Hebrew, verbal ellipsis generally involves a syntactic correspondence of the constituents in the two clauses. This means that the basic building blocks of the clause (e.g., subject, object, prepositional phrases) are identical in both clauses or at least function identically in both clauses. For example, in Isaiah 1:27 the constituents of the two clauses are identical (the Hebrew word order is represented here): "Zion (subject) by justice (prepositional phrase) will be redeemed (verb), / and her repentant ones (subject) by righteousness (prepositional phrase) [] (deleted verb)." The constituents in both lines have this order: subject, prepositional phrase, verb. The hearer (or reader) knows to restore the verb in the second line because of the syntactic correspondence of the two lines.

It is also possible for corresponding constituents to be slightly different in the two lines if they play the same syntactic role in their respective sentences. Psalm 121:6 illustrates this phenomenon: "Daily the sun will not strike you, / and the moon [] in the night." The constituents in the two lines match except that the first line has an adverb ("daily") that corresponds to a prepositional phrase ("in the night") in the second line. However, both the adverb and the prepositional phrase function as adverbial modifiers; therefore, ellipsis of the verb and its object is possible from the second line. (The issue of the ways in which the two lines correspond is more complex than is presented here; for additional details, see Miller 2007.)

2.3. Ellipsis Requires Lexical Identity. A third feature of ellipsis involves the identity of the item that is deleted with respect to the corresponding item that is not deleted (i.e., its antecedent). Ellipsis universally requires lexical identity; that is, the item that is deleted must be the same lexical item as the antecedent. In the case of Isaiah 1:27, the only verb that can be understood to have been deleted is a form of pdh (“redeem”) and not any other verb, not even a synonym. Furthermore, the form of the verb must be understood as passive and as future (technically, the form is imperfective) in both lines (“will be redeemed”). However, ellipsis does not require that the deleted item be identical to its antecedent in every respect.

In biblical Hebrew, the deleted verb need not agree with its antecedent in gender or number (in Is 1:27 “Zion” is fem. sg., whereas “her repentant ones” is masc. pl.). Nor does the deleted verb need to agree with its antecedent in person, as illustrated in Psalm 20:7[8] (the order of deletion is backwards [see 3.1 below]): “Some on chariotry [], / and some on horses [], / but as for us, on the name of the LORD our God we will call.” In the first two clauses the deleted verb must be third-person plural (“they will call”); the antecedent verb in the third line is first-person plural (“we will call”).

3. Distinctive Features of Verbal Ellipsis in Biblical Poetry.

In addition to the universal features of verbal ellipsis, biblical Hebrew has several other features.

3.1 Direction of Ellipsis. The first feature relates to the direction of ellipsis, since languages differ in this respect. Biblical Hebrew usually exhibits forwards ellipsis; that is, the verb is present in the first line and is deleted from the second line. However, it is possible for ellipsis to occur in the first line—a situation known as backwards ellipsis. Psalm 20:7[8] (see 2.3 above) provides an example.

Backwards ellipsis is highly constrained in biblical poetry. It occurs only when the antecedent is in final position in the line. The biblical Hebrew patterns are like other languages with respect to backwards ellipsis—languages that allow backwards ellipsis do so only when the constituent to be deleted is in final position (van Oirsouw, 132, 124).

3.2 Position of Verb. The second feature of ellipsis in biblical Hebrew involves the position of the verb in the clause. Ellipsis may occur when the verb is in initial, medial or final position with respect to the other clausal constituents. The most common position is initial position, as illustrated in Isaiah 17:13: “They will be chased like chaff on the mountains before the wind, / and [] like whirling dust before the storm.”

Medial position is illustrated in Isaiah 60:2: “For behold, darkness will cover the earth, / and thick darkness [] the peoples.”

Ellipsis from final position was illustrated in Isaiah 1:27 (see 1 above) and Psalm 121:6 (see 2.2 above).

3.3. Linear Order. A third unique feature of ellipsis in Hebrew involves the order of constituents. Unlike English, Hebrew allows ellipsis to take place when the order of constituents is in *chiastic (mirror) order, although chiastic order is less common. Psalm 103:7 provides an illustration: “He made known (verb) his ways (object) to Moses (prepositional phrase) / to the sons of Israel (prepositional phrase) his deeds (object) [] (verb)” (cf. Ps 121:6 [see 2.2 above]) The order of constituents is verb, object, prepositional phrase in the first line, mirrored by prepositional phrase, object, deleted verb in the second line.

3.4 Semantics of Paired Constituents. As we have noted, verbal ellipsis involves a correspondence between the constituents of the two lines. In English, verbal ellipsis results in specific semantic relationships between the pairs of nonverbal constituents. Consider this English sentence: John writes novels, my brother [] biographies.

The paired constituents in the two halves of the elliptical structure are “John”/“my brother” and “novels”/“biographies.” The paired words cannot be understood as referring to the same entities; that is, John cannot be the same individual as the speaker’s brother, nor can the literary productions be combined to mean “biographical novels.” Instead, both sets of paired words are contrastive. As a whole, the construction compares the differing literary outputs (novels as opposed to biographies) of two individuals (John and the brother) (see Prince).

In biblical poetry, however, the semantic relationship between word pairs involving verbal ellipsis is rarely that of contrast (as it is in English). Instead, most commonly the word pairs refer to the same person or entity, as illustrated in Numbers 23:7: “From Aram brought me Balaq, / the king of Moab [] from the eastern mountains.” The constituents in the two lines are in chiastic order: prepositional phrase, verb with object, subject (first line), followed by subject, deleted verb and object, prepositional phrase (second line). The prepositional phrase “from Aram” is paired with “from the eastern mountains,” and the subject “Balaq” is paired with “the king of Moab.” What is important to note is that in Hebrew the two lines refer to the same action by the same individual rather than to two contrastive actions by two individuals (as English speakers would expect).

Rarely in biblical poetry verbal ellipsis results in truly contrastive word pairs, as in Isaiah 1:21: “Righteousness was dwelling in her, / but now murderers [].” The verse contrasts “righteousness” as a personified quality with “murderers.” By placing these two nouns in an elliptical structure, the poet contrasts the righteous, ethical inhabitants of the past with the wicked, murderous inhabitants of the present.

More commonly, if the word pairs do not refer to precisely the same individual or item, they are nonetheless semantically related in some way, as illustrated in Isaiah 49:23: “Kings shall be your foster fathers, / and their queens [] your nursing mothers.” In this verse the word pairs (“kings”/“queens” and “your foster fathers”/“your nursing mothers”) are not contrastive but complementary. Nonetheless, the two lines describe a single situation, not contrastive actions.

In reading biblical poetry, even in English translation, it is important to remember that word pairs in parallel lines with an elided verb are probably not to be understood as contrastive. This feature of biblical poetry is diametrically opposed to English usage in which verbal ellipsis always produces contrastive word pairs.

Ellipsis of the verb may also result in a longer term in the second half of a word pair. The deleted verb opens up space, so to speak, in the second line, as illustrated in Deuteronomy 32:13: “He suckled him with honey from a rock, / and [] with oil from a flinty stone” (Alter, 614). The deletion of object plus verb in the first line means that “from a rock” can be paired with the longer descriptive phrase “from a flinty stone” in the second line.

4. Ellipsis in Poetry as Opposed to Prose.

Ellipsis is a prevalent feature of biblical poetry (O'Connor, 128), and undoubtedly it contributes to the perceived *terseness of poetry (Berlin). By contrast, ellipsis of the verb is quite rare, though not completely absent, in biblical prose (Kugel, 321-23). It is not surprising that ellipsis in biblical Hebrew poetry differs from ellipsis in ordinary language; the same is true of English poetry. In ordinary English a verb can only be elided from the second of two syntactically identical clauses: Leaves adorn the trees, and flowers [] the ground. That is, English routinely elides the verb forwards. But in poetry, backwards ellipsis of the verb may occur, as in the following snippet from Alexander Pope: Now leaves [] the trees, and flowers adorn the ground (Fabb, 147).

Ellipsis of the verb is rare in biblical prose. It occurs primarily in representations of direct speech rather than in narrative (e.g., Gen 27:12; 28:20, 43:32; Exod 32:27; Lev 26:19; Deut 17:7; but see 1 Kings 20:32 with similar examples in direct speech and narrative). Ordinarily, the verb is in initial position (e.g., 1 Sam 30:22). Rarely, the constituents are in chiasmic order (Gen 31:40; Judg 6:37).

Ellipsis of the verb is more highly constrained in prose than it is in poetry. Most importantly, backwards ellipsis of the verb never occurs.

Prose does, however, allow for verbal ellipsis across paired speeches by different characters. For example, in the initial encounter between Joseph and his brothers in Egypt, we have the following exchange in Genesis 42:7: “He spoke with them harshly and he said to them, ‘From where have you come?’ They said, ‘[] from the land of Canaan to buy food.’” The brothers’ reply involves verbal ellipsis (“We have come”). Thus, biblical narrative preserves a common feature of conversational style: verbal ellipsis across question/answer pairs.

Biblical prose also allows the word pairs in constructions with elided verbs to be contrastive, as illustrated in Genesis 7:2: “From all the clean animals take for yourself seven pairs, a male and its mate, / and from all the animals which are not clean [] a pair, the male and its mate.” The instructions to Noah involve contrastive word pairs: clean animals as opposed to unclean animals, and seven pairs as opposed to a single pair.

Verbal ellipsis in poetry is far more prevalent than it is in prose. And poetry relaxes several of the syntactic constraints on ellipsis that are found in ordinary language. However, in both poetry and prose, verbal ellipsis in biblical Hebrew can be described as falling within normal cross-linguistic patterns.

See also AMBIGUITY; HEBREW LANGUAGE; MERISM; PARALLELISM; POETICS; TERMINOLOGY OF;

RHYME; TERSENESS; WORDPLAY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Alter, "Characteristics of Ancient Hebrew Poetry," in Literary Guide to the Bible, ed. R. Alter and F. Kermode (Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press, 1987) 611-24; A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985); M. Dahood, Ugaritic-Hebrew Philology (BibOr 17; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1967); N. Fabb, Linguistics and Literature: Language in the Verbal Arts of the World (Blackwell Textbooks in Linguistics; Oxford: Blackwell, 1997); S. A. Geller, Parallelism in Early Biblical Poetry (HSM 20; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); M. A. K. Halliday and R. Hasan, Cohesion in English (English Language Series 9; London: Longman, 1976); K. Hartmann, Right Node Raising and Gapping: Interface Conditions on Prosodic Deletion (Amsterdam: Benjamins, 2000); J. L. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); J. Lyons, Introduction to Theoretical Linguistics (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1971); M. J. McShane, A Theory of Ellipsis (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005); C. L. Miller, "A Linguistic Approach to Ellipsis in Biblical Poetry: Or, What to Do When Exegesis of What Is There Depends on What Isn't," BBR 13 (2003) 251-70; idem, "Ellipsis Involving Negation in Biblical Poetry," in Seeking Out the Wisdom of the Ancients: Essays Offered to Honor Michael V. Fox on the Occasion of His Sixty-fifth Birthday, ed. R. L. Troxel, K. G. Friebel and D. R. Magary (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005) 37-52; idem, "Constraints on Ellipsis in Biblical Hebrew," in Studies in Semitic and Afroasiatic Linguistics Presented to Gene B. Gragg (SAOC 60; Chicago: Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, 2007) 165-80; idem, "A Reconsideration of 'Double-duty' Prepositions in Biblical Poetry," JANESCU (forthcoming a); idem, "The Syntax of Elliptical Comparative Constructions," ZAH (forthcoming b); M. O'Connor, Hebrew Verse Structure (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1980); E. F. Prince, "Discourse Analysis: A Part of the Study of Linguistic Competence," in Linguistics: The Cambridge Survey, 2: Linguistic Theory: Extensions and Implications, ed. F. J. Newmeyer (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 164-82; R. R. van Oirsouw, The Syntax of Coordination (Croom Helm Linguistics Series; London: Croom Helm, 1987); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (JSOTSup 26; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984); C. Wilder, "Some Properties of Ellipsis in Coordination," in Studies on Universal Grammar and Typological Variation, ed. A. Alexiadou and T. A. Hall (Linguistik Aktuell 13; Amsterdam: Benjamins, 1997) 59-107. C. L. Miller

ENEMIES. See PSALMS 1: BOOK OF; SUFFERING; WARFARE IMAGERY.

ENTRANCE LITURGIES. See PSALMS 1: BOOK OF.

ENVELOPE STRUCTURE/FIGURE. See INCLUSION.

ESTHER 1: BOOK OF

Interpreters throughout history have found the book of Esther to be a troubling presence within the *canon of the OT. It does not read like a religious text, and its only link to the rest of the OT is that the story that it tells involves the Jewish people. It is well known that the book of Esther contains neither the divine name "Yahweh" nor the word God. Nevertheless, the Babylonian Talmud finds in the Torah a prophetic allusion to the events chronicled by the book of Esther by observing that the unpointed first-person imperfect verb 'str ("I will hide") in Deuteronomy 31:18 is identical to the unpointed name 'str ("Esther") and noting that there God predicts, "I will surely hide ['str] my face from them" in response to the rebellion of his people (b. Hul. 139b). In rabbinic fashion, this allows Esther to be linked directly to the Torah and to be read as a story of God hiding from his people, even though he is not referred to explicitly (Beal, 116-17).

Although the story takes place after Cyrus's decree allows the Jews to return to Jerusalem from exile, there is no mention of Jerusalem, the temple, the law or the covenant as is found in other postexilic books. Unlike the book of Daniel, which also is set in the court of a pagan king, there are no prayers, apocalyptic visions or miracles. Moreover, Esther and *Mordecai do not seem to reflect the character of other great biblical heroes and heroines. Esther shows no concern for the dietary laws when taken into the court of a pagan king, she conceals her Jewish identity, and she pleases the king in one night more than all the other virgins. When she risks her life for her people, she does so only after Mordecai points out that she herself will not escape harm even if she refuses to act. Her request to extend the massacre displays what many interpreters consider to be a surprising attitude of brutality. Similarly, it is Mordecai, Esther's parent figure, who insists that she conceal her Jewish identity. And it is Mordecai's refusal to give Haman the due respect of his office that allows the incident to escalate into a threat to the entire Jewish people. The astute reader sees in Esther and Mordecai a disquieting moral ambiguity at best.

The absence of piety and the presence of sensuality and brutality have posed a perennial problem for interpreters of Esther. John Calvin never preached from the book, nor did he include it among his commentaries. Martin Luther denounced the book of Esther along with the apocryphal 2 Maccabees.

In stark contrast, some Jewish interpreters have held the book in highest esteem. Maimonides (twelfth century AD), for example, ranked it equal to the Pentateuch in his statement that when the Messiah comes, only the Torah and Esther will remain. Its popularity and esteemed value are attested by being the only book outside the Pentateuch to have two Targumim* devoted to it (Targum Rishon and Targum Sheni). Moreover, it is the only biblical book for which the Babylonian Talmud includes a midrashic exposition of the entire book that regulates the liturgical reading of the story and presents haggadic expositions of its text (Megillah Esther).

1. Historical Issues
2. Literary Issues
3. Theology
4. Canon

1. Historical Issues.

1.1. Historical Setting. The events of the story are set during the Persian (Achaemenid) period in the court of the Persian king, who is called Ahasuerus* in the Esther story. The story unfolds while the court is in residence in the winter palace in Susa*, which was located near the modern border of Iran and Iraq. The Achaemenid period begins in 539 BC, when the Persians, under Cyrus the Great, conquered the Babylonians and ends in 330 BC, when the conquest by Alexander the Great inaugurated the Hellenistic Empire. The king of the Esther story, Ahasuerus, is usually identified with Xerxes, who ruled from 486 to 465 BC. The name "Ahasuerus" may be an attempt to transliterate either the Persian (Khšayāršan) or Akkadian (Aḫšī'aršu) pronunciation of the king's name into Hebrew*, or it may be a literary appellation given for other reasons, perhaps to mock the Persian monarchy as an institution (Yamauchi, 187). If Ahasuerus is to be identified with Xerxes, then the banquet held in the third year of his reign (Esther 1:3) would correspond with the great war council held in 483 BC to plan for the invasion of Greece. After his queen, Vashti*, was deposed, there is a four-year gap before Esther was chosen to replace her. This would correspond with the time Xerxes was away fighting a disastrous war in Greece (481-479 BC), a war that he lost and that depleted the treasuries of the Persian Empire.

1.2. Author and Date. The author of the book of Esther is unknown. According to the Talmud (b. Bat. 15a), the "Men of the Great Assembly" produced the book of Esther, as well as those of Ezekiel, Daniel and the Minor Prophets. Claims that Mordecai himself wrote it are likely a misreading of Esther 9:20. It was, however, likely written by a Jew who lived under Persian rule and who was familiar with Susa and the Persian court, though it need not have been written in Susa (Perrot and Ladiray, 254). Moreover, the story may have been preserved orally for many years before being written down.

The opening of the book of Esther ("This is what happened during the time of Xerxes . . .") implies that the story is being told well after the fact. An earlier generation of scholars dated Esther to the late Greek era (e.g., Paton, 60-62), but currently most scholars date the writing of the book sometime between 400 BC and 200 BC—that is, late in the Persian period or early in the Greek period. Although there are no fragments of Esther among the Qumran materials, a study of the Hebrew of that period has tended to push the date of Esther back well before 200 BC. Those who date the writing of the book of Esther to this earlier period (Baldwin, 48-49; Bechtel, 3; Berlin, xli; Bush, 297; Clines, 291; Levenson, 26; Moore [1995], LVII-LX) do so for a variety of reasons, including these: (1) the author's knowledge of Susa and the palace is consistent with findings by archaeological excavations conducted by the French since 1850 (Perrot and Ladiray, 254); (2) there are many Persian loanwords in the text and few if any Greek loans (Yamauchi, 227); (3) the Hebrew of the text is late biblical Hebrew, similar to that of the books of Ezra, Nehemiah and Chronicles, which are also dated to the two centuries after the exile but before Alexander (539–323 BC). Of special note are approximately thirty proper names in the book that are of Persian or Elamite origin accurately preserved by the MT (Yamauchi, 237). The identification of the names of Haman's sons as daiva names found in early Iranian and Hindu texts suggests an early origin for the Esther story, possibly during the reign of Xerxes himself, since a vocalic shift observed in one personal name occurred between the reigns of Xerxes and his son Artaxerxes (Yamauchi, 237–38). (The word daiva meant “god” in early Iranian and Hindu texts and was used to designate deity as opposed to human beings or to refer to evil spirits who incited people to violence [Yamauchi, 427]. The latter is particularly fitting in the context of the Esther story.) The Elamite Persepolis tablets have provided many other parallels to the Persian names in Esther (see Esther 2: Extrabiblical Background). This suggests that the book was written during the approximately 150 years between the reign of Xerxes and the conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great, and probably earlier in that period rather than later. However, not all scholars agree on this early date, and arguments have been made (e.g., Fox, 139–40) that the language and tenor of the book better fit the social and political world of the Hellenistic period (c. 125 BC).

Although the Greek historian Herodotus confirms much of the historical setting as described by the book of Esther, his history also raises issues about the accuracy of the book of Esther (see Esther 2: Extrabiblical Background). Herodotus (Hist. 7.114; 9.109) refers to Xerxes' wife by the name “Amestris” and mentions no other wives. Furthermore, he says that Amestris was with Xerxes during his campaign in Greece. Moreover, Amestris was the queen mother during the reign of her son who succeeded Xerxes. Some have suggested that “Amestris” was the Greek name for “Vashti,” which was the transliteration of her Persian name into Hebrew. There is no mention of a second wife named “Esther,” although this name may have been a literary appellation that played on the name of the Babylonian goddess Ishtar, goddess of love and war. Esther pleases the king more than all the other virgins (Esther 2:17), and she took on warrior-like qualities in the defense of her people (Esther 9:13), possibly making the nickname apt in the view of the author. Moreover, since

Persian kings often took more than one wife and had large harems as well, it may be that Herodotus mentions only Amestris, whether or not she was Vashti, because it was she who gave birth to Xerxes' successor, Artaxerxes. All other royal wives and concubines may have been irrelevant to Herodotus if he was concerned with the succession of the Persian dynas

A second problem, concerning Mordecai's age, also calls into question the historicity of the book. Esther 2:5–6 apparently indicates that Mordecai was taken into exile with King Jeconiah in 597 BC. If so, Mordecai would have been 122 years older at the time he served Xerxes. One way to resolve this problem is to read the relative clause in the Hebrew text (ʿăšer hoglâ mîrûšālayim) as referring not to Mordecai personally but rather to his grandfather Kish, who is also mentioned in the verse. Hence it would have been Mordecai's grandfather Kish who was taken into exile with Jeconiah, and he is mentioned in order to draw a literary affinity with King Saul (see 3.1 below).

Although the names “Vashti” and “Esther” are not mentioned outside of this book, there is extrabiblical evidence that the name “Mordecai” was contemporary. A tablet discovered in 1904 at Persepolis, another of the Persian royal cities, refers to a Persian official during the early years of Xerxes' reign with the name “Marduka” (Yamauchi, 235). Although the name was very common, this occurrence corresponds well in time with the setting of the Esther story.

Despite the literary flourishes, the author of the book apparently intends the Esther story to be read as historically authentic.

2. Literary Issues.

2.1. Genre. Most scholars today consider the story of Esther to be an ancient historical novel (see Novella, Story, Narrative), with its historical authenticity a highly debated point. Esther has been labeled variously as a Diaspora novel (Meinhold), a wisdom tale (Talmon), a festal lection (Fox), a festival etiology (Gerleman), a Persian chronicle (Gordis), a historical novel (Levenson), a burlesque comedy (Berlin) and even as carnivalesque (since Esther is read liturgically at the carnival-like festival of *Purim) (Craig). Many scholars affirm the significance and value of the story even though denying that it has any historical authenticity. However, recognizing the story's distinctive literary features does not require discarding its historical value, for the festival of Purim surely arose from some memorable event in the distant past to have become such a universal practice of Judaism for more than two millennia. The story of that event is artfully and memorably told in the book of Esther with irony, satire and even a humor that interprets rather than distorts its message. The mention of 127 satrapies, when Herodotus mentions only twenty, may be an expression of the Persian powers' inflated sense of self-regard as perceived by others (Herodotus Hist. 3.89) rather than an egregious historical error that indicates a late date (Fox, 139). The improbable height (seventy-five feet) of the gallows that Haman unwittingly constructs for his own death (Esther 5:14; 7:9) may be taken ironically as the measure of the stature of Haman's own pride and evil. Such "unhistorical" features of the book do not threaten its historical value but rather provide interpretive depth to the story.

Even an understanding of the story as burlesque or carnivalesque recognizes the value of a form of entertainment that vulgarizes a serious topic by treating it with mock dignity, in this case the excesses of the Persian monarchy that led to deliverance from a lethal threat (Berlin, xix). By poking fun at such a serious threat years afterward, the book allows both its pressing power and its ultimate impotence to be recognized and remembered by ordinary people. The carnival-like celebration of Purim teaches each new generation this powerful spiritual lesson.

The story of Esther is not only history artfully told, but also, because it is in the canon of Scripture, it is theology artfully told. There are no statements about God in the book, but because it is in the canon of Scripture of both synagogue and church, in some sense it is a story being told to us by God that offers an opportunity for reflection on his sovereignty with respect to history and with respect to human motives and responsibility.

2.2. The Plot. Esther 1—2 sets the opulent stage in the Persian palace where Vashti defies her husband and king, where all the beautiful virgins of the empire are gathered into the harem, where Esther alone pleases the king with her sensuous beauty, and where Mordecai foils an assassination plot against the king's life. Esther 3—8 recounts how the personal conflict between Mordecai and Haman escalated into the threat of genocide for the Jews, how Esther dares to seek an uninvited audience with the king at the risk of her life, and how she entertains the king and Haman at two banquets. In a reversal, Mordecai is honored after the king's sleepless night, and Haman's plot is turned against him when the Jews are not only delivered from annihilation but also become an empowered people in the empire. Esther 9—10 explains how from this great deliverance arose the celebration that bears the name "Purim," one of the two Jewish feasts not mandated by the Pentateuch (the other being Hanukkah).

These historical events are artfully woven into a tale of romance and intrigue, with irony, satire and humor. The account is full of irony that parodies the relationship between men and women, beginning with Vashti's disobedience to her husband and king. Furthermore, Ahasuerus, whose word is said to be irrevocable law, never makes one decision of his own in this story. Throughout the story he mindlessly does the bidding of others who skillfully manipulate him for their own ends. The author also parodies the sexual appetite for which the Persian kings were stereotypically known. When the king's advisors propose gathering every beautiful young virgin in the empire for the king to sample, the narrator wryly comments, "This advice appealed to the king" (Esther 2:4). Even the horses used to carry the king's memos were no ordinary horses, but were sired by the royal stud (Esther 8:10). Such topics and comments indicate the author's effort to amuse and entertain as well as inform.

2.3. Characterization. The characterization in the story is masterful. The Persian king, when viewed from the perspective of his Jewish subjects, is a bumbling, inept figure who becomes an object of mocking. Vashti's sensibilities heighten the king's status as a playboy and a dunce. Haman is a demonic villain, characterized by uncontrolled pride and vengeance. Mordecai is the insightful court attendant, conventional in stories of intrigue, who moves the plot by his actions. Esther is a young woman trying to live in two worlds: the Jewish world in which she was raised and the opulent world of the Persian court into which she was thrust. Hers is the only character that develops throughout the book that is aptly named for her. Only she has two names in the story: "Hadassah," a Hebrew name, and "Esther," a Persian name that is perhaps intended as a literary appellation (Esther 2:7). As the story unfolds, Esther develops from a passive young woman who relies on her beauty to get ahead into a powerful leader of the Jewish people on whose authority the customs of Purim still stand (Esther 9:32). Her transformation hinges on that defining moment in her story when she decides to identify with God's covenant people even at the risk of her life. In this specific way Esther serves as an exemplary model for those who would seek after God.

2.4. The Prominent Motif. A prominent literary motif of the book of Esther is the mīsteh ("feast"), a term most often used to refer to eating and drinking on special occasions (Berg, 31). The word mīsteh occurs twenty times in the book of Esther and only twenty-six times in the rest of the OT. There are, by some counts, ten feasts that take place in the story. This dominant motif of feasting is apt because the Esther story explains the origin of Purim, a feast still celebrated now by Jews. On the Jewish calendar today, the fourteenth of Adar is called Purim and the fifteenth of Adar is called Shushan Purim (i.e., Susa's Purim). The story of Esther explains not only the reason for the Feast of Purim but also why it is celebrated on two different, consecutive days.

The story of Esther both begins and concludes with pairs of feasts that mirror each other (Esther 1:3, 5 [the king gives two feasts]; Esther 9:18-19 [the Jews celebrate two feast days]). Esther also gives not one banquet but two for the king and Haman (Esther 5:4-8, 7:1). Haman's downfall begins between the first and second of Esther's banquets when the king has a sleepless night. Thus there are three pairs of feasts that mark the beginning, climax and conclusion of the story.

2.5. The Structure of Peripety. The literary structure of the book is defined by repetition of the primary motif of feasting (Jobes, 154-58). The three pairs of feasts mark the rise and fall of a plot that is characterized by peripety. The word peripety (from Gk peripeteia) is a literary term first used by Aristotle (Rhet. 1.11.24) to refer to a sudden turn of events in a story that reverses the intended and expected action. The Esther story is structured on reversals that pivot on the king's sleepless night, the one event occurring between the pair of feasts at the book's literary center. By making the pivot point of the peripety an insignificant event rather than the height of dramatic tension, the author is taking the focus away from human action and implies that an unseen force is controlling the reversal of destiny (see 4.3.1 below). The story provides an example of how form and content mutually interact in a text, for in Esther 9:1 the author explicitly states the theme of reversal that he has subtly built into the very structure of his narrative.

The Esther story is about an event intended to harm the Jews, which, against all expectation, actually results in the opposite. Instead of being destroyed, the Jews are not only delivered but also become empowered through the high rank of Esther and Mordecai. The once powerful destroyer, Haman, not only loses his power but also is himself destroyed. Before Esther's banquets the king promotes Haman, the Agagite, and gives him the signet ring of royal authority (Esther 3:1, 10). After Esther's banquets, the same language is used when we are told that the king promotes Mordecai, the Jew, and gives him the signet ring previously worn by Haman (Esther 10:3; cf. 8:2). On the very day Haman goes to the king seeking permission to kill Mordecai (Esther 6:4), Haman ends up not only failing to kill Mordecai but also publicly honoring him in the king's name (Esther 6:11). Vashti risks her life by defying the king's word and refusing to appear before him when summoned (Esther 1:12); Esther risks her life by defying the king's word and appearing before him unsummoned (Esther 4:11). The story is full of ironic reversals that conspire together to turn Haman's plan to destroy the Jews against him. The Feast of Purim celebrates this grand reversal in the month of Adar because it was a month "when their sorrow was turned into joy and their mourning into a day of celebration" (Esther 9:22 TNIV).

3. Theology.

3.1. Esther in Biblical Theology. This structure of peripety is not simply a literary device that produces an aesthetically pleasing story. The structure of peripety deeply reflects the worldview of the author, and it provides the framework within which to understand the theological implications of the Esther story. The author is suggesting that beneath the surface of human decisions and events there is an unseen and uncontrollable power at work that can be neither explained nor thwarted. Because this story is in the canon of the Jews, and subsequently the Christians, it is proper to construe that unseen power as God. What is the divinely inspired author of Esther trying to say to the original audience about God?

For the Jews who returned to Jerusalem, the postexilic books of Chronicles, Nehemiah, Ezra, Haggai and Zechariah answer in the affirmative these nagging questions: Are we still in covenant relationship with God? Are we still God's chosen people? The author of Esther answers in the affirmative through the reversal of fortune for the Jews living in the Diaspora, where they had no temple or prophet or city. The reversal so prominent in the literary structure of Esther is driven by the conflict between Haman the Agagite and Mordecai the Jew. The identity of Haman as an Agagite is the clue that links the Jews of the Diaspora to the ancient covenant made at Sinai.

Agag was the king of the Amalekites at the time Saul was the first king of Israel (1 Sam 15). The Amalekites were a nomadic people of the southern desert region who frequently raided Israel from the very beginning of its history. They had the dubious distinction of being the first people to attack God's newly formed covenant nation right after the exodus. Because they were the first to attempt to destroy Israel, God promises Moses that he will completely erase the memory of the Amalekites from under heaven and would be at war with them from generation to generation (Ex 17:8-16). In Deuteronomy 25:17-19 God commands Israel, after they settle in the land, to wage war against the Amalekites so as to blot out the memory of Amalek.

In the many years between Moses and King Saul, God gave Israel the land as promised. When Saul came to power, God instructed him through the prophet Samuel to "attack the Amalekites and totally destroy all that belongs to them. Do not spare them; put to death men and women, children and infants, cattle and sheep, camels and donkeys" (1 Sam 15:1-3 TNIV). Saul did attack the Amalekites as he had been commanded, but in direct and willful disobedience to God's command, he took their king, Agag, alive and spared his life along with the best of the sheep and cattle. Because of this disobedience, God rejected Saul's kingship, and eventually Saul was dethroned.

Saul was a Benjaminite whose father was Kish (1 Sam 9:21; 14:51). Mordecai is also identified as a Benjaminite who is also a "son" of a man named Kish (Esther 2:5), depicting Mordecai as a new Saul. This probably explains what has been noted as an historical problem, with Mordecai being 122 years older than the time of the exile of Jeconiah. But the relative clause in the Hebrew text can be read as referring not to Mordecai personally but rather to his grandfather Kish, who is also mentioned in the verse. Hence it would have been Mordecai's grandfather Kish who was taken into exile with Jeconiah, and Mordecai would be his "son" in the sense of a descendant. The mention of Mordecai's relationship to a man named Kish strengthens the literary parallel between Saul and Agag with Mordecai and Haman the Agagite. Over the centuries after Saul spared Agag's life, other perennial enemies of Israel were called Agagites or Amalekites even though they had no ethnic relationship to that ancient people.

The Esther story is another episode of the ancient war between Israel and the Amalekites, and by every indication it looks like Israel will be destroyed. They have no king, no army, no prophet, no land, no temple, no priesthood and no sacrifices. They are but a small minority living at the mercy of a ruthless and powerful pagan monarchy. The reversal that dethrones Haman and empowers Mordecai shows that despite their sin and despite their location away from Jerusalem, God's promise to Israel made at the beginning of their nation still stood. He would still destroy those who would destroy his people, no matter where they were living. In contrast to Saul's covenantal disobedience when he spared the Amalekites and plundered the best of their property, the Jews of Persia struck down all their enemies, but the text is careful to say that they did not lay their hands on the plunder (Esther 9:5-10). In other words, under the leadership of Esther and Mordecai, the Jews of Persia obeyed where Saul had disobeyed. The book of Esther shows that the Jews of the Persian Diaspora were still under God's covenantal care.

The understanding that the conflict documented in the Esther story is another biblical episode of holy war informs modern sensibilities that may be offended, especially by Queen Esther's request that a second day of retaliation be allowed the Jews and that Haman's ten sons be executed and displayed. Throughout its interpretive history this incident has been viewed as morally questionable by many interpreters, both Christian and Jewish (Anderson, 136-37; Baldwin, 106; Bickerman, 215-18; Fox, 220-26; Gordis, 415; Levenson, 121-22; Moore, xxx, 87, 88). When the Lord commanded the conquest of Canaan, Joshua and the Israelites devoted whole cities to the Lord in destruction, killing every living thing within and burning the buildings to the ground. In this act of holy war the destroyers were acting not on their own behalf but as agents of God's wrath, and thus they were not permitted to profit from the act in any way. In the book of Esther, Haman is portrayed as the leader of destruction against the Jews, but his plan is turned against him by Queen Esther, who not only reveals the plot that leads to Haman's death but also eliminates any of his offspring who might avenge their father in the future. Although this is loathsome to modern sensibilities, clearly Queen Esther came to see herself not only as a monarch of the Persians but also as a leader raised up to protect God's people according to his ancient covenant, and she acted accordingly (Esther 4:14). Ancient Israel's history shows the perennial failure of their greatest leaders to war against moral and spiritual darkness without engaging in it themselves. Scripture shows that no human being is worthy to wage true holy war in God's name. God's strategy against sin and evil awaited the perfect warrior, Jesus Christ, who could execute divine justice with clean hands and a pure heart, thus putting an end to the practice of holy war waged between nations.

Haman the Agagite had cast dice (pûrîm) to determine the day on which the Jews of Persia would be destroyed. In this instance, casting dice was not a game of chance but rather a method of pagan divination to determine when Haman's gods would give him victory over the Jews. Haman rolled the dice in the first month of the Jewish year, the month of Nisan (Esther 3:7). The edict of death went out on the thirteenth of Nisan (Esther 3:12), ironically, the very eve of Passover (the fourteenth of Nisan). Passover commemorates the Israelites deliverance from death in Egypt, when the angel of death killed the firstborn of the Egyptians but passed over the homes of the Israelites where the blood of the lamb was smeared on the door. Centuries later in Susa an edict of death went out, but this time the Jewish people are the target. But because of Yahweh's promise to Moses, the rolling of dice would not determine the destiny of God's people. Without a temple or a prophet or a high priest or a burnt offering, without a prayer or a miracle, God providentially worked in a completely pagan world through morally ambiguous people to fulfill his covenant promise. One clear message of the story is that no enemy can thwart God's electing purpose.

The story of Esther has points of contact with the exodus story beyond the theme of threat and deliverance. Both Esther (Esther 4:10-14) and Moses (Ex 3:11; 4:10, 13; 6:12, 30) are hesitant in their response to step into leadership; both benefit from the wealth of the Gentiles (Esther 8:1-2; Ex 12:36); the success that the Lord grants to both stirs up fear in their enemies (Esther 9:2-3; Ex 15:14-15); and the events centered on Esther and on Moses both result in the institution of a festival, Purim and Passover respectively, that continues to be observed even today. The Esther story also has much in common with the stories of Joseph in Egypt and Daniel in Babylon (Berg, 124, 143), as all three characters are examples of Jews who not only are living in exile but also have been strategically placed in foreign courts of worldly power. The story of Esther, an orphaned female exiled in a foreign culture who rises to a pivotal position of power in a great worldly empire, provides hope to God's people wherever they find themselves to be a marginalized minority, especially in those times and places when God seems frighteningly absent.

Both the name of the feast and the custom practiced on Purim celebrate God's covenantal *protection of his people. The word pûr ("die") was a Persian word that occurs in the Bible only in the book of Esther (Halla, 19, 20, 22). But its Hebrew equivalent, according to Esther 3:7 and 9:24, was gôral. The Hebrew word gôral occurs frequently in the Hebrew Scriptures to refer not only to the dice-like object but also to the fate or destiny that comes not from the roll of dice but from the Lord—for example, "Lord, you have assigned me my portion and my cup; you have made my lot [gôral] secure" (Ps 16:5). Therefore, the name of the feast, "Purim," is a double-entendre that commemorates that the lot, or destiny, of God's people will never be determined by the decision of any foreign power, which at that time was made by the casting of lots.

The custom of sending portions of food to friends and neighbors on Purim also symbolizes the portion that God has destined for his people. In Psalm 16:5 "portion" translates the Hebrew mēnāt. This Hebrew word, found in the synonymous parallelism of Psalm 16:5, is used to refer to one's destiny, just as gôral is used. However, it has a second meaning, referring to choice morsels of food (e.g., 2 Chron 31:4). In Esther 9:19 the Jews send portions (pl., mānôt) to one another to celebrate Purim. Because the word has both senses, these portions of food sent as gifts on Purim symbolize the portion, or destiny, allotted by God to his people.

3.2. Esther in Jewish Thought.

3.2.1. The Origin of the Festival. Megillah Esther (the Esther scroll read liturgically at Purim) provides an historical explanation of the origin of Purim, the first Jewish festival not mandated by Torah. Today Purim is still celebrated joyously to commemorate Jewish identity and inviolability. For Jews it is the strongest possible statement against the anti-Semitism that they have repeatedly experienced throughout the ages. The holiday is celebrated by sending gifts of food to friends and loved ones and by extending charity to the poor. The entire book of Esther is read in the synagogue on Purim with a boisterous audience booing Haman and cheering Mordecai with noisemakers. The Talmud prescribes drinking and celebrating on Purim until one cannot tell the difference between “Mordecai be blessed!” and “Haman be cursed!” (b. Meg. 7b).

3.2.2. Living as a Religious Minority. The story of Esther is also a tale of how to live as a religious minority in a dominant society where exile has become Diaspora and where issues of *honor and shame and of oppression and affliction are a pressing reality (Beal; Laniak). Unlike other post-exilic books, Esther shows no interest in the land of Israel, which has made it for all subsequent generations a story of and for the Jewish people who live outside the land. Esther as a literary character personifies the life of the entire Jewish nation in Diaspora, with its concerns for status, power, security and identity in what has often been a hostile dominant society. Esther exemplifies the virtue of the individual who is willing to self-identify with the Jewish nation in courageous acts of vigilance and wisdom through which God may choose to act (Esther 4:13-14). Thus the story of Esther, repeated annually, helps Jewish communities living in Diaspora to identify with ancient Israel of the Bible.

The traditional prayer recited before the reading of the scroll at the Purim service speaks of the blessings exemplified by the Esther story (Braun, 272):

Blessed are You, God, our Lord, King of the universe,

Who has sanctified us with His commandments and has commanded us regarding the reading of the Megillah.

Blessed are You, God, our Lord, King of the universe,

Who has wrought miracles for our fathers in those days at this season.

Blessed are You, God, our Lord, King of the universe,

Who has kept us alive, sustained us, and brought us to this season.

3.2.3. Assurance of Deliverance. The book of Esther is still treasured by Jews today and read annually in the synagogues on Purim because they find in it the reassurance that the Jewish race will survive as a people against those who from time to time throughout history have wished to destroy them (Fox, 11-12). The Esther story is a strong statement against anti-Semitism, for in it the unseen God protects his people and destroys those who came against the Jews of Persia. The inmates of Auschwitz, Dachau, Treblinka and Bergen-Belsen wrote out the book of Esther from memory and read it secretly on Purim (Gordis, 13-14). Resistance to annihilation by Jews and their Gentile neighbors was viewed as service to God and devotion to him.

3.3. Esther in Christian Thought.

3.3.1. Divine Providence. Although not an exclusively Christian idea, Christians should see in the book of Esther a demonstration that God's providence works to fulfill God's covenant promise (Jobes, 233-42). God's providence means that in some invisible and inscrutable way he governs all creatures, actions and circumstances through the normal and ordinary course of human life without the intervention of the miraculous. Even in the most pagan corner of the world, God is ruling all things to the benefit of his people and to the glory of his name. And even when his own people, like Esther and Mordecai, make life decisions that come from ambiguous motives at best and outright disobedience at worst, God is still providentially working through those very things for his perfect purposes. The book of Esther is the most true-to-life biblical example of God's providence precisely because God is absent from the story. The story articulates the assumption of the invisible God in human events. The author of Esther had ample opportunity to refer to God, prayer and the covenant. The complete absence of God is the genius of the book from which hope and encouragement flow.

3.3.2. Divine Sovereignty and Human Responsibility. The deliverance of the Jews from destruction in Persia is now a part of redemptive history, but Esther did not know how the story would end when she decided to risk her life and identify herself with God's people. The great reversal that they experienced, which fulfilled God's covenant promise by delivering his people from destruction (Esther 9:1), came about because in her defining moment Esther chose to identify herself with God's covenant people even though at great personal risk. This is perhaps the most striking biblical example of the interplay between God's sovereignty and human responsibility. The defining moment in Esther's own life was at the same time the crucial moment in which God would sovereignly fulfill his promise to his people.

3.3.3. The Necessity of Biblical Revelation. The author of Esther does not interpret the events in the story, and this silence probably is intentional. For instance, in comparison to the book of Daniel, the reader is told neither what Esther was thinking when she was taken into the court of a pagan king nor of her motives in pleasing the king in one night more than all the virgins. The resulting moral and theological ambiguities in the Esther story illustrate the hermeneutical principle that without divine revelation human experience is inherently ambiguous and cannot be rightly understood. The book of Esther is an example where the divinely inspired author refrains from evaluating the motives and behaviors of the characters, leaving a story that bears no marks of a sacred text. Historical narratives without interpretive commentary are inherently ambiguous; events do not carry within them their own interpretation. The construal of the significance of events will depend on the presuppositions of the interpreter. However, when reading in canonical context, interpreters can see in the events of the Esther story the presence of God's hand behind the scenes and can compare the virtues and flaws of Esther and Mordecai to other heroes of the faith only because such matters are made explicit in the interpretive commentary of other biblical historical narratives. Therefore, the explicit, and probably deliberate, absence of God in Esther makes it a canonical illustration that where there is no interpretive revelation, history is inherently morally and theologically ambiguous.

3.3.4. Peripety as the Structure of Redemptive History. The literary structure of peripety found in the book of Esther and its pivot point in an ordinary and insignificant event (the king's sleepless night in Esther 6:1) is an example of the structure of all of redemptive history, where God works through all things to fulfill his covenant promises. Because of sin, we are not living in the Garden of Eden; rather, we live in the Diaspora of history in a world where God is unseen. In such a world only death is expected, but God has worked the ultimate peripety, the ultimate reversal of expected ends, in another seemingly ordinary human event: the birth of a baby in Bethlehem and years later the execution of that man on a Roman cross. The ordinary and the miraculous intersect in Jesus Christ. The cross of Jesus Christ is the pivot point of the great reversal of history, where sorrow has been turned to joy. Through the seemingly insignificant events of the birth of a baby in Bethlehem and the execution of a man on a Roman cross, God has guaranteed us life even though we face certain death. He has reversed our lot. God is working providentially in the completely secular and ungodly course of human events to save those who are his and, against all expectation, to bring all of history to culmination in Christ. There is no plot, no plan that can thwart God's purposes, which stretch from Genesis to Revelation. And Esther lies between the two. The great paradox illustrated so well by the story of Esther is that God is omnipotently present even where God is most conspicuously absent.

3.3.5. The Eschatological Hope of the Esther Story. The resurrection of Jesus Christ has transformed the spiritual heritage of Christians, of which the book of Esther is a part. Christians can face death with the assurance that the grave will not be the victor but that God's people will have victory over the grave against all human expectation. The deliverance of the Jewish nation in Persia foreshadows the redemption of those from all nations who enter into God's covenant promises through Jesus the Messiah.

The story of Esther has been read throughout history as symbolizing the final salvation of God's people in the end. The book of Esther forms a link between the covenant made at Sinai and the eschatological destiny of all whom God will redeem and deliver. The first occurrence of Purim was a spontaneous celebration of the joy of finding oneself still standing on the day after an irrevocable death decree had been executed. The day of death had come and gone, and God's people were still alive! In this sense Purim is a Sabbath, a joyous rest after the battle with death has passed. It symbolizes the eschatological joy of God's people in its most ultimate sense. The final reality of this eschatological hope was realized at the resurrection of Jesus Christ (Rev 1:17-18). Therefore, in Christian thought Purim foreshadows the joyful celebration of one's lot in eternal life secured by God's providence working through the life of Jesus Christ (Acts 4:27-28).

4. Canon.

The canonization of the book of Esther is, of course, closely related to the canonization of the Ketubim (Writings), the third section of the Hebrew Bible, in which it is found. This may have occurred as early as the second century BC, though the date of the closing of the Hebrew canon is debated. However, the celebration of Purim presumably originated independently of the canonization of the text that documented its origin, so the acceptance of Purim as a legitimate festival by mainstream Judaism and the canonization of the book of Esther were no doubt mutually influential. Nevertheless, the canonical status of Esther has been questioned at times. Perhaps one reason is that God and significant elements of Judaism are not mentioned in it. The book of Esther was among a small number of OT books that incited later debate in rabbinic literature over its status (the other books were Ezekiel, *Proverbs, *Song of Songs and *Ecclesiastes). Apparently, both Shammai and Hillel agreed that Esther "makes the hands unclean" (b. Meg. 7a), but the precise meaning of that expression with respect to modern concepts of canonicity is not well understood.

One reason that the canonicity of Esther may have been questioned during the Graeco-Roman period, perhaps at the meeting of rabbis at Jamnia about AD 90, is that the Jewish people had not experienced at that time a deliverance from the Romans as their ancestors had from the Persians. After AD 70 Jerusalem once again lay in ruins, which may have challenged a Jewish understanding of the significance of the Esther story. Modern Judaism has similar questions reading Esther on this side of the twentieth-century Holocaust.

The Judean desert materials from Qumran (*Dead Sea Scrolls) offer no relevant evidence since, as is well known, Esther is the only book of the Hebrew Bible not found at Qumran. Fragments from Qumran (4QProto-Esther) that allegedly are fragments of Esther bear no direct textual correspondence to the extant book of Esther but rather appear to be fragments of another story also set in the court of a Persian king (de Troyer). None of the sectarian books produced at Qumran quote the book of Esther, nor is the holiday of Purim mentioned in the Qumran documents. This is probably not a happenstance of manuscript fragility, since fragments of smaller books, such as Song of Songs and *Lamentations, have survived. Moreover, fragments of Esther in the Cairo Genizah outnumber the fragments of any other book outside the Pentateuch. It is more likely that the Qumran community did not celebrate Purim as a legitimate holiday because the Torah did not prescribe it. The argument that the Qumran community did not know of the book of Esther because it had not yet been written is unlikely because one of the two Greek versions ends with a colophon that can be dated to either 114 BC or 77 BC, implying that both a Hebrew version and its Greek translation predated the Qumran community (see Esther 5: Greek Versions).

Although the NT does not quote the book of Esther, in the early centuries of the Christian church Esther was almost always accepted in the Western canon, although it did not attain universal canonical status until the Councils of Hippo (393 AD) and Carthage (397 AD). As late as the Reformation period, Martin Luther denounced the book and wished that it were not part of the Bible, although it had by that time been canonical for centuries. Like Luther, the rabbis who debated the status of Esther at Jamnia in AD 90 may have been contemplating not whether to add it to the canon but whether it deserved the canonical status that it already enjoyed and perhaps had enjoyed for centuries.

See also AHASUERUS; ESTHER 2: EXTRABIBLICAL BACKGROUND; ESTHER 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; ESTHER 6: PERSON; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; MORDECAI; SUSA; VASHTI; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: L. C. Allen and T. S. Laniak, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther (NIBC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); J. G. Baldwin, Esther (TOTC: Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1984); C. M. Bechtel, Esther (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 2002); A. Berlin, Esther (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2001); M. Breneman, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther (NAC; Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 1993); F. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Dallas: Word, 1996); D. J. Clines, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther (NCBC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); G. Gerleman, Esther (BKAT 21; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1982); K. H. Jobes, Esther (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1999); J. D. Levenson, Esther (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); C. A. Moore, Esther (AB 7B; New York: Doubleday, 1995); L. B. Paton, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Esther (ICC; repr., New York: Scribner, 1976 [1908]). Studies: B. W. Anderson, "The Place of the Book of Esther in the Christian Bible," in Studies in the Book of Esther, ed. C. A. Moore (New York: KTAV, 1982) 130-41; T. K. Beal, The Book of Hiding: Gender, Ethnicity, Annihilation, and Esther (London: Routledge, 1997); S. B. Berg, The Book of Esther: Motifs, Themes and Structure (SBLDS 44; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); E. Bickerman, Four Strange Books of the Bible (New York: Schocken, 1967); M. Braun, The Jewish Holy Days: Their Spiritual Significance (Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson, 1996); A. Brenner, ed., A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susanna (FCB 7; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995); K. M. Craig, Reading Esther: A Case for the Literary Carnivalesque (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1995); S. W. Crawford and L. J. Greenspoon, eds., The Book of Esther in Modern Research (New York: T & T Clark, 2003); L. Day, Three Faces of a Queen: Characterization in the Books of Esther (JSOTSup 186; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995); K. de Troyer, "Once More, the So-Called Esther Fragments of Cave 4," RevQ 75 (2000) 401-22; C. V. Dorothy, The Books of Esther: Structure, Genre, and Textual Integrity (JSOTSup 187; Sheffield Academic Press, 1997); M. V. Fox, Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); R. Gordis, "Studies in the Esther Narrative," in Studies in the Book of Esther, ed. C. A. Moore (New York: KTAV, 1982) 408-23; W. W. Hallo, "The First Purim," BA 46.1 (1983) 19-29; T. S. Laniak, Shame and Honor in the Book of Esther (SBLDS 165; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1998); A. Meinhold, "Die Gattung der Josephgeschichte und des Estherbuches: Diasporanovelle, I," ZAW 87 (1975) 306-24; idem, "Die Gattung der Josephgeschichte

und des Estherbuches: Diasporanovelle, II," ZAW 88 (1976) 72-93; C. A. Moore, Studies in the Book of Esther (New York: KTAV, 1982); J. Perrot and D. Ladiray, "The Palace of Susa," in Royal Cities of the Biblical World, ed. J. G. Westenholz (Jerusalem: Biblelands Museum, 1996) 236-54; R. W. Pierce, "The Politics of Esther and Mordecai: Courage or Compromise?" BBR 2 (1992) 75-89; S. Talmon, "'Wisdom' in the Book of Esther," VT 13 (1963) 419-55; M. F. Whitters, "Some New Observations about Jewish Festal Letters," JSJ 32 (2001) 272-88; H. G. M. Williamson, Studies in Persian Period History and Historiography (FAT 38; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004); E. M. Yamauchi, Persia and the Bible (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990).

K. H. Jobes

ESTHER 2: EXTRABIBLICAL BACKGROUND

The events of the book of Esther occur in the Achaemenid period (539-330 BC) during the reign of the Persian king Xerxes I (486-465 BC), son of Darius I. The Persian Empire was a superpower in its day that engaged in more than a century of war with the Greeks. Because Alexander the Great finally defeated Persia, that great defeated enemy became the subject of many Greek writings preserved by the victors. Xenophon and Aeschylus wrote about the Persian kings, but the most relevant source with respect to the book of Esther comes from Herodotus, who was reported by Diodorus Siculus (fl. first century BC) to have been a contemporary of Xerxes I (Diodorus 2.32.2). Modern scholarship has identified Xerxes to be the Persian king to whom Esther was married. Persika, written by Ctesias, who served as the physician to the king's wife, mother and children in the court of Artaxerxes II (409-355 BC), survives only in references by other Greek writers (e.g., Plutarch, Art. 1.2; Diodorus 2.5.4-5), possibly because he was thought to exaggerate to the point of inaccuracy.

Even well into the first century of the Christian era the defeat of the Persians remained a significant event in Greek public memory, and Greek writers continued to produce works about the Persian Empire. Plutarch's Life of Artaxerxes, Quintus Curtius Rufus's History of Alexander, and Diodorus's history provide general historical and cultural background about the Persians as remembered by their conquerors centuries later, but none are specifically relevant for illuminating the book of Esther.

In addition to Greek sources, archaeologists have excavated from Persia a number of reliefs, friezes and inscriptions written in cuneiform that date from the Persian period.

1. Old Persian, Elamite and Akkadian Inscriptions
2. The Earlier Greek Sources
3. The Later Greek and Latin Sources

1. Old Persian, Elamite and Akkadian

Inscriptions.

Although there are twenty-one Old Persian inscriptions that date from Xerxes' reign, they are primarily copies of inscriptions from his predecessor's reign that have merely substituted his name for that of his father, Darius—a practice that was continued by later successors. Of particular note is the Behistun inscription of Darius's rise to power, carved in three languages (Old Persian, Elamite, Babylonian) on a cliff and covering an area fifty-nine feet wide.

The Persepolis Tablets are Elamite inscriptions dating from the reigns of Darius, Xerxes I and Artaxerxes I, found in the ruins of treasury of Persepolis, a major Persian capital destroyed by Alexander the Great. They document payments involved in the construction of Persepolis and the distribution of commodities such as olive oil, grain and food. Although they provide some historical insight into the period, they do not specifically inform the Esther story. However, the Elamite Persepolis tablets do provide ample parallels to the Persian names found in the MT of Esther, suggesting that the story dates from the Persian period. A number of tablets attest the name "Marduka" or "Marduku," from which the name of *Mordecai derives, in reference to possibly as many as four different individuals. A vocalic shift relevant to the spelling of one of the names of Haman's sons in the Esther story is believed to have occurred between the reigns of Xerxes and his son Artaxerxes, providing some evidence that the story originated in the actual period of Xerxes reign.

The Daiva inscriptions of Xerxes found at Persepolis in 1935 are cuneiform tablets written in Old Persian, Akkadian and Elamite, dating from 486-480 BC, during the earlier days of Xerxes' reign. Although they contain much formulaic language common to royal inscriptions, they do confirm that both Xerxes' and his father, Darius, practiced Zoroastrianism, providing some religious background to the world into which the Jewish Esther was thrust. Moreover, the inscription provides historical information about the accession of Xerxes to the throne that confirms material found in the writings of Herodotus, a Greek historian who is perhaps the most important ancient source of greatest relevance to the book of Esther (see 2 below).

2. The Earlier Greek Sources.

Xenophon (c. 430–post 355 BC), an Athenian and a younger associate of Socrates, wrote during the period of war between Athens and Sparta. He was among ten thousand Greek mercenaries whom Cyrus II, the Persian satrap of Lydia, had enlisted in his attempt to usurp the Persian throne from his brother, Artaxerxes II. Both were great-grandsons of Xerxes. Xenophon's Cyropaedia (The Education of Cyrus) is a narrative written about Cyrus the Great (see 2 Chron 36:23; Ezra 1:1-2; Is 44:28), after whom Xenophon's contemporary Cyrus II had been named. Xenophon presents Cyrus the Great as an idealized leader with the purpose of discussing Greek education, ethics and politics. Thus, Cyropaedia offers more insight into Greek thought than into Persian culture.

Aeschylus (525-456 BC) was a Greek playwright of Athens who fought against the invasion of the Persians at Salamis. In 472 BC he wrote the prize-winning play The Persians, one of ninety plays that document the triumph of the Greek nationalistic spirit. The play is about Xerxes I, son of Darius, who warred against Athens to avenge his father's defeat by the Greeks at Marathon, and who himself returns to Persia defeated. Xerxes' campaign against Greece took place between the deposition of *Vashti in the third year of his reign (Esther 1:2) and his marriage to Esther four years later (Esther 2:16). Aeschylus writes from the perspective of the Persian council selected by Xerxes to administer the empire while he is away at war, which receives increasingly bad news from messengers reporting back from the front. The play concludes with an appearance of Xerxes lamenting his defeat. In this morality play Aeschylus offers the disastrous defeat of Xerxes as an example of the inevitable fate of a human being whose prideful ambition had exceeded that allowed by the gods to mortals. The Greek playwright's critique of the megalomaniacal ego of the Persian kings resonates with a similar evaluation of the Persian monarchy found in the book of Esther.

The most extensive and relevant primary source for the Persian period is Herodotus, the “father of history.” Herodotus (c. 480-420 BC) was born in Halicarnassus in Asia Minor at the front line of the Greek-Persian Wars at about the time when Xerxes was attacking Greece. He later took up residence in Athens, where he found the Persian attack on the city still recent enough in living memory to provide him an opportunity to discuss a wide range of current interests. The accuracy of the history that he recounts is debated, as Herodotus certainly was not writing history as it is written today. Nor was he writing a treatise on Persia and its culture. The very first line of his writing states his intent: “What Herodotus the Halicarnassian has learnt by inquiry is here set forth: in order that so the memory of the past may not be blotted out from among men by time, and that great and marvelous deeds done by Greeks and foreigners and especially the reason why they warred against each other may not lack renown” (Herodotus, Hist. 1.1 [italics added]). Like other Greek writers of his time, Herodotus was interested in exploring the relationship and causes of events so that they would not be forgotten by future generations. His reflection on the causes of events led him into areas such as philosophy and moral ethics, which causes modern historians to question his objectivity and accuracy. Furthermore, his worldview assumed an order in which the continents of Asia and Europe were in balance and must remain so for peace and harmony to be sustained. The hubris displayed by the Persians in crossing the Hellespont violated this natural order and caused the gods to intervene, bringing disaster on the Persian kings, whose pride had exceeded that permissible to mere mortals. Herodotus’s interest in documenting the reasons for the Greek and Persian wars motivated the arrangement of his material and the association of events in such a way that violates modern principles of historiography. Although the accuracy of what he reports continues to be debated, his work must be recognized as the primary surviving source of information about how the Persians were viewed by their enemy and conqueror.

There is nothing in the writings of Herodotus that could be understood as either a direct reference or an allusion to the events presented by the book of Esther. And because Herodotus was not writing about the Persian culture per se but rather about Persia’s attack on the Greek cities in Asia Minor and later on Athens itself, his history provides only background information of a general and incidental nature that informs the book of Esther. Even though Herodotus has often been evaluated by modern historiographers as lacking historical accuracy, differences between Herodotus and the Esther story are often used to argue against the historical accuracy of Esther. It is quite likely that the intents of both Herodotus and the book of Esther have been misunderstood by modern sensibilities; therefore caution is needed in attempts to harmonize them.

Several passages of the Esther story can be compared to the description of the reigns of Xerxes and his father, Darius, as told by Herodotus. Esther 1:1 informs its readers that the Persian king Xerxes ruled over 127 satrapies (provinces), which can be compared to the description by Herodotus (Hist. 3.89) of the empire’s organization into only twenty satrapies under Darius. If the author of Esther intends his statement to be historical, an expansion or reorganization of the empire under Darius’s son Xerxes would have to have occurred. It is also possible that the opening statement in Esther is rhetoric intended to parody the expanse and bureaucracy of the Persian Empire, which would be consistent with the tenor of the story.

Esther 1:1-3 sets the story during the reign of the Persian king referred to in the original Hebrew text as *Ahasuerus but identified by modern scholarship almost certainly as Xerxes. Herodotus (Hist. 6.98; 7.34-35; 7.187) describes Xerxes as a tall, handsome and ruthless warrior worthy of the throne. When the incomplete bridge being built to span the Hellespont for his army’s assault on Europe was washed away by a great storm, its builders were executed to vent Xerxes’ frustration and anger. Esther’s plight in approaching this formidable man unbidden is heightened by such knowledge of his character.

The book of Esther knows only two wives of Xerxes: Vashti and Esther. Herodotus (Hist. 7.114; 9.109) refers only to one wife of Xerxes by the name “Amestris,” who is the mother of Xerxes’ successor. Persian kings often took more than wife, but the mother of the heir to the throne held pride of place. Whether Amestris is yet another wife in the harem of the king or represents a different rendering of a Persian name is not known. If, however, the lavish banquets held by Xerxes in *Susa (Esther 1) were part of the great war council where, according to Herodotus (Hist. 7.8), Xerxes announced his plan to bridge the Hellespont and lead his army through Europe, then Esther would not yet have been his wife during the campaign that concerned Herodotus. Furthermore, the name “Vashti” may be a literary appellation created by the author, and, since “Vashti” sounds much like the Old Persian for “beautiful woman,” it has been argued that Vashti and Amestris are one and the same woman.

Esther 1:14 names seven close advisors to Xerxes, and Esther 4:11 reports that there was limited access to the king, which was violated on pain of death. Herodotus (Hist. 3.84) describes a seven-man counsel associated with Xerxes’ predecessor, Darius, who could enter the king’s presence at will and unannounced unless the king was with a woman. According to Herodotus (Hist. 1.99; 3.77), the practice of the Persian king to be reclusive and to receive no one except through messenger eunuchs began in the reign of Deioces and continued into the reign of Darius. The use of messenger eunuchs in Esther 4 and Esther’s worry that the king had not summoned her for thirty days, presumably through a messenger, are true to the custom of the Persian court as described by Herodotus.

In Esther 3:7-14 the plot against the Jews develops as Haman casts lots (pūr) to determine an auspicious day for his genocide (see Purim). Herodotus (Hist. 3.128) also describes the casting of lots to choose a political assassin, which decision was sealed with the king’s ring (cf. Esther 3:12).

Herodotus (Hist. 3.92-97) describes the specific tribute paid to Darius by the far-flung lands that he had subjugated and explains that the Persians proper paid no tax. The tribute included not only large amounts of silver, gold dust, coins, ore, ebony and elephant tusks but also young boys and girls to serve the court, documenting that the gathering of virgins for the king was not without precedent. From Asia and Libya alone Herodotus calculated a total tribute of 14,560 talents of silver. This figure can be compared to the ten thousand talents of silver that Haman promises to the king’s treasury, presumably the silver he would have plundered from the Jews (Esther 3:8-9).

One of the distinctive traits of the Persian Empire was its highly efficient and fast “pony express” system of messengers. Through this system the decrees of Esther 3:13 and Esther 8:10 were sent to all the provinces of the empire. Herodotus explains that a fresh horse and rider would be stationed along the route, one for each day’s journey, and they could cover about 250 miles a day. A letter would travel over the Royal Road from Susa (in modern Iran) to Sardis (on the western coast of what is now Turkey) in a week via 111 relay posts. Herodotus (Hist. 8.98) praised the efficiency of the riders, saying that “these are stayed neither by snow nor rain nor death nor darkness from accomplishing their appointed course with all speed.”

Significant to the Esther story is Esther’s invitation to the king and Haman to a banquet at which she invites them to a second banquet. According to Herodotus (Hist. 1.133), the Persians delighted in lavish celebrations of birthdays with a festive meal consisting of an ox, horse or camel roasted whole followed by several courses of desserts and abundant wine. The Greek versions of Esther reflect this understanding of the banquet as celebrating Esther’s special day of honor, which by Persian custom would be her birthday (though this may have been a ruse that Esther employed to make Xerxes and Haman more inclined to attend).

Herodotus (Hist. 1.133) also notes that Persians had the habit of deliberating grave matters while inebriated and confirming their decisions later when sober. This probably reflects the ancient belief that the mental state of drunkenness provides access to the spiritual world and the will of the gods. This custom perhaps informs the statement in Esther 1:7-8 that Xerxes provided such abundant wine that each guest was allowed to drink without restriction. The custom may also be reflected in the statement that after reaching a decision to annihilate the Jews, Xerxes and Haman sat down to drink (Esther 3:15).

The practice of recording the names of benefactors of the king is also confirmed by the report by Herodotus (Hist. 8.85) of a Phoenician ship’s captain who was recorded among the king’s benefactors and given much land for service on the king’s behalf. The incident in the Esther story when the king realizes that Mordecai has been recorded as a benefactor in his records but has not received his reward is consistent with Persian practice (Esther 6:1-11).

3. The Later Greek and Latin Sources.

The conquest of Persia by the Greeks remained prominent in national memory such that in the first century of this era four writers continued to include the Persian kings in their writings. The Jewish historian Josephus, of course, includes the Esther story as part of his history of the Jewish nation (Jewish Antiquities), but he seems completely dependent on the Greek translation of Esther story, following the LXX text, which identifies the king as “Artaxerxes,” the name of Xerxes’ son. However, Josephus uses Macedonian month names as found in the Greek Alpha text of Esther but not in the LXX version (see Esther 5: Greek Versions). Josephus (Ant. 11.277) further makes explicit the connection between the Esther story and the Sinai covenant by identifying Haman as an Amalekite, the appellation for the perennial enemy of the Jews. Josephus (Ant. 11.191) attempts to provide an explanation for Vashti’s disobedience, explaining that the Persians forbade their wives to be seen by strangers.

Plutarch (c. AD 50–post 119) chose to include Artaxerxes II (404–362 BC), the great-grandson of Xerxes, in his series of Lives. The work is primarily concerned with court intrigue during the reign of Artaxerxes II and draws on Xenophon’s Anabasis. Plutarch (Art. 27.2) mentions that Artaxerxes had 360 concubines in addition to a wife whom he loved passionately. Although Artaxerxes lived three generations after Xerxes and Esther, and Plutarch’s number may or may not be accurate, this nonetheless suggests that Persian kings were believed to retain large harems, as the Esther story also indicates.

Quintus Curtius Rufus (first century AD) wrote in Latin his History of Alexander, in which the history of the Persian kings that led to Alexander’s final victory is chronicled. Xerxes is noted for having made “godless war upon Europe” (History of Alexander 5.6.1). The luxurious wealth of the Persian royal cities and the deleterious effect of Persian influence on Alexander are noted (History of Alexander 5.2.11–12).

Diodorus Siculus (fl. first century BC) was a Greek writer who attempted to write a universal history of events occurring in the same time period throughout the world as he knew it. The prominence of Xerxes in the history of Persia is suggested in that Diodorus defines other people in reference to him. For instance, Diodorus (1.58.4) writes that Egypt fell to the Persians under Darius, “the father of Xerxes.” Diodorus

(2.32.2) defines the time period of Herodotus, one of his sources, as “at the time of Xerxes,” apparently expecting his readers to know when that was. Perhaps the reason the Greeks thought of Xerxes as the paradigmatic king of Persia is that Xerxes led one of the largest armies ever assembled against the Greeks, and yet he failed to defeat them. This event became a defining moment celebrated by Greek writers for half a millennium.

The defeat of Xerxes marked a turning point in the Persian Empire when it began its decline that would lead to Alexander’s conquest about 150 years later. Following his disastrous defeat, Xerxes returned to Persia and involved himself in domestic matters, especially the completion of the royal city of Persepolis. It was at this time that the events documented in the book of Esther occur. The opening of the book of Esther 1:1 (“This is what happened during the time of Xerxes” [TNIV]) would have been read by its original readers in light of their knowledge of Xerxes’ disastrous defeat. The description in Esther 1:4–12 of his lavish extravagance during his prolonged war council would have ironically highlighted the hubris of the Persian king before he marched off to his magnificent defeat and returned to Persia having depleted the royal treasury. It is a defeated Xerxes who finds Esther’s appeal irresistible and who sees in Haman’s plan a huge sum to replenish the royal coffers (Esther 3:9). And so although the ancient sources do not mention Esther or Mordecai or the events they lived out in the court of the Persian king, an understanding of the role of Xerxes in Persian history certainly adds a depth of insight that the author could assume on the part of his original readers.

After returning from his campaign against the Greeks, the remainder of Xerxes’ reign was consumed by harem intrigues and the overbearing influence of courtiers and eunuchs—a characterization confirmed and parodied by the author of Esther. Twenty years after ascending the Persian throne, in August 465 BC, Xerxes was assassinated in his bedroom by Artabanus, captain of his bodyguard, about thirteen years after his marriage to Esther (Diodorus 11.69.1).

See also AHASUERUS; HISTORICAL CRITICISM; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; SUSA; VASHTI.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Aeschylus, The Persians (2 vols.; LCL; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1930 [1922]); A. Berlin, Esther (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2001); M. Boyce, "Persian Religion in the Achaemenid Age," in Cambridge History of Judaism, ed. W. Davies and L. Finkelstein (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984) 279-307; P. Briant, Histoire de l'Empire perse: De Cyrus à Alexandre (Paris: Fayard, 1996); Diodorus Siculus (12 vols.; LCL; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1933-1967); Flavius Josephus, The Jewish Antiquities, Books 1-19 (9 vols.; LCL; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1930-1965); J. G. Gammie, "Herodotus on Kings and Tyrants: Objective Historiography or Conventional Portraiture?" JNES 45 (1986) 171-95; Herodotus (4 vols.; LCL; New York: G. P. Putnam, 1920-1938); A. J. Hoerth, Archaeology and the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1998); R. G. Kent, "The Daiva-Inscription of Xerxes," Language 13 (1937) 292-305; A. T. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948); Plutarch, Life of Artaxerxes (11 vols.; LCL; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1916-1928); Quintus Curtius Rufus, History of Alexander (2 vols.; LCL; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1946); Xenophon, Cyropaedia (2 vols.; LCL; repr., New York: Macmillan, 1925 [1914]); E. M. Yamauchi, Persia and the Bible (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990). K. H. Jobes

ESTHER 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

The book of Esther has played a considerably larger role in the history of Judaism than in Christianity, largely due to the significance acquired by the festival of *Purim. Understandably, then, the body of Jewish interpretation devoted to Esther is considerably larger and therefore will receive greater attention in what follows here. The history of Esther's interpretation will be treated under the following headings, moving roughly chronologically:

1. Early Jewish Interpretation
2. Patristic Interpretation
3. Rabbinic Interpretation
4. Aramaic Versions of Esther (Targumim)
5. Medieval Jewish Interpretation
6. Protestant Reformation
7. Modern Interpretation

1. Early Jewish Interpretation.

1.1. Versions of Esther. In addition to a number of smaller changes, the major difference between the Greek and Hebrew versions of Esther is the insertion of six lengthy additions to the Greek text (typically designated Additions A-F), which probably date to the second or third century BC (see Esther 4: Additions; Esther 5: Greek Versions). These modifications add important theological and ethical dimensions that are entirely absent from the MT. For example, they add Jewish piety to Esther and *Mordecai (not mentioned in the MT), innocence/righteousness to the Jews (again, not mentioned), and God's intimate involvement behind the scenes in rescuing his people (God appears nowhere in the MT Esther).

The presence of the additions implies that the absence of their themes was perceived as a deficiency—but why? It is probably the case that many early Jewish interpreters assumed that Esther, Mordecai and their compatriots were observant Jews, that the prayer and the fasting mentioned in Esther were directed toward the Jewish God, and that God is ultimately responsible for delivering his people from calamity. If so, it makes perfect sense why Esther would be read as a story about God's deliverance of his holy and righteous people from unwarranted persecution at the hands of a foreign power, even though Esther mentions nothing about God or religion. The editors of the additions probably believed that the dimensions that they added were essentially already present in the text and lay embedded beneath the surface, and they were making them explicit. That is, the perceived deficiency was not as much the text itself as the fact that it left much implicit.

On occasion, the Greek additions also interpret Esther directly through interpretive glosses. Thus, for instance, the MT of Esther 3:4 explains that the reason Mordecai refuses to bow (yīstahāweh) before Haman is the fact that he is Jewish (yēhūdī). A priori this should not have prevented him from paying respects to his superiors, especially since there are plenty of OT examples of this practice; therefore it begs for explanation. Addition C, a prayer of Mordecai inserted after Esther 4, puts further elaboration on the lips of Mordecai himself: bowing is an act of worship and an activity reserved for God alone; doing so to Haman would be idolatrous, and therefore Mordecai dutifully refrained.

1.2. Josephus on Esther. The first-century AD Jewish historian Josephus is the only other major extant source to engage Esther. His narrative retelling the story of Esther in Jewish Antiquities

(Ant. 11.184-296) follows roughly that of the Greek versions of Esther, though it omits the first and final additions (A and F). Thus Josephus recounts the story emphasizing the innocence of the Jews, the Jewishness of the protagonists, the involvement of God, and so on, often augmenting them with additional commentary. This is also not surprising, since it naturally fits into one of Jewish Antiquities' larger themes: exaggerating Jewish piety, innocence and utility to foreign governments, which in part seems aimed at combating the contemporaneous treatment of Jews under Roman rule and anti-Semitic stereotypes.

One additional characteristic of Josephus's version of the story is his occasional inclusion of interesting details to explain peculiarities in the text. For example, neither the MT nor the Greek versions of Esther answer the question of why *Vashti refused to come to *Ahasuerus when beckoned. Josephus fills in that detail by explaining that Vashti, "in observance of the Persian customs [nomoi], which forbid wives to be seen by other men [allotrioioi], did not go to the king, even though he repeatedly sent eunuchs to [retrieve] her" (Ant. 11.191 [cf. Esther 1:12-15]). This interpretation also explains why Vashti was holding a separate banquet for "the women of the palace" (Esther 1:9): she and the women celebrated independently because they were not supposed to be seen by the men.

2. Patristic Interpretation.

The book of Esther does not feature prominently in patristic literature, though this should be taken as a direct reflection of its role in the grassroots life of the early church—for example, in devotion, liturgy or homiletics, of which we know little. Nevertheless, where it does appear, it does so with a surprising range of themes. Here we will survey but three.

2.1. The Greek Additions to Esther. One subject of interpretation concerned the canonical status of the additions to Esther (see Canon). The early church fathers were aware of the differences between the Greek and Hebrew Bibles, including the absence of Esther's additions from the Hebrew version of Esther. For example, Origen (c. AD 185-254) was intimately aware of the differences because of his work on *textual criticism and dialog with contemporary Jews (Origen Ep. Afr. 3). Nevertheless, he was convinced of the authenticity of the additions and regarded them as inspired and authoritative. His precise rationale for this conclusion is unstated, though perhaps he explained their absence, just as he explained the absence of the Danielic additions (which he also regarded as inspired), as intentional deletions by Jewish scribes. By contrast, Jerome (c. AD 347-420), in his Prologue to Esther, regarded the Greek versions of Esther as corrupt and doubted the value of the additions, and therefore he collected them in an appendix to his translation of Esther for the Vulgate. In any case, a majority of the early church eventually came to regard the additions as being rightfully part of God's word.

2.2. Esther as Moral Example. One of the recurring themes in early Christian interpretation of the book of Esther is the use of the character of Esther as an example of piety and Christian virtue. This theme has a relatively consistent purpose and point of departure: God responds to and delights in the faithful, therefore Christians should follow the example of Esther, because of whose piety God delivered her people from the decree of Ahasuerus. Thus, for example, the church father Clement of Rome (late first century) links the deliverance of the Jews to Esther's great faith, humility and fasting in the face of danger to herself and implicitly exhorts his readers to follow her example (1 Clem. 50:18-20). Similarly, Athanasius' fourth festal letter (c. AD 332) exhorts his readers to live "silencing their fleshly desires," just as Esther, who through fasting and prayer averted the destruction about to come upon her people (Festal Letters IV §2). The church father John Chrysostom (AD 347-407) also exhorts, "Does man frighten you? Hasten to the Lord [in prayer] and you will suffer no evil!" just as Esther, who through prayer delivered her people (Homilies on the Statues III §6).

2.3. Esther and Persecution. One of the more unique interpretations belongs to the fourth-century Syrian father Aphrahat, who used Esther as a source of encouragement for the persecuted. In chapter 20 of his Demonstrations Aphrahat comforts his followers under duress for their faith and encourages them to persevere. To do so, Aphrahat shows how God's faithful people (in the OT, NT, Apocrypha), like Jesus himself, suffered unjustly at the hands of the wicked so that the readers might follow their examples and press on (resembling Heb 11) even if it requires martyrdom, as it did for Jesus, who for Aphrahat is the archetype of unjust suffering. Among the saints whom Aphrahat uses is Mordecai, of whom he writes, “Mordecai was persecuted by the wicked Haman and Jesus was persecuted by a rebellious people; Mordecai delivered his people from the hands of Haman by his prayer and Jesus delivered His people from the hands of Satan by his prayer . . . [and] because Mordecai sat and clothed himself with sackcloth he saved Esther and his people from the sword, and because Jesus clothed Himself with a body and was illuminated he saved the Church and her children from death . . . [therefore] Mordecai received the honor of Haman, his persecutor, and Jesus received great glory from his Father instead of his persecutors who were of the foolish people,” so as to impel his readers to be like Mordecai, who, like Jesus, endured unjust suffering for God’s namesake (Demonstrations 20:21 [italics added]).

3. Rabbinic Interpretation.

The rabbinic works that discuss the book of Esther span several centuries. Thus as one might expect, some interpretations, or versions of them, are reproduced in various rabbinic works, although there are numerous differences among them. Nevertheless, the rabbis’ general interpretive posture toward Esther is one that they held in common with their Jewish (and to an extent, Christian) predecessors since at least as far back as the composition of the Greek versions: Esther is a religious text about God’s deliverance of his holy and righteous people from unjust persecution. In general, what also marks rabbinic interpretation of Esther is its immense exegetical ingenuity.

3.1. Mishnah and Tosefta. The earliest “rabbinic” interpretation of Esther is found in the legal anthologies known as the Mishnah and the Tosefta, compiled in the third century AD. Both devote an entire tractate to Esther, called Megillah, short for Megillat Esther (= “scroll of Esther”). However, both tractates are devoted mostly to considerations surrounding the proper observance of the holiday of Purim, which Esther both commands and authorizes. A significant portion is devoted to the proper practice of qerî’at megillâ, reading the book of Esther on Purim, which is not explicitly commanded in the book but is nevertheless understood as an implied obligation for fulfilling the holiday in Esther 9:28 (t. Meg. 1:4, y. Meg. 1:5a, b. Meg. 2b; cf. b. Mak. 23b [see Tabory, 323-

54]). For example, since Esther 9:19-31 authorizes two days for celebrating Purim, the 14th and 15th Adar, tractate Megillah opens by discussing their significance for when and where the book of Esther should be read. Both the Mishnah and the Tosefta conclude from the passage that fortified cities that are surrounded by walls that date from the days of Joshua (or Ahasuerus, according to a dissenting rabbi in the t. Meg. 1:1) should read the Megillah on the 15th of Adar, whereas large villages and cities should read it on the 14th of Adar. From there, both collections explicate various reasons behind this distinction and implications for how it plays out in the lives of Jewish communities.

3.2. Babylonian Talmud. The Babylonian Talmud, assembled probably in the mid-sixth century AD, is a compilation of rabbinic traditions organized according to the Mishnah, similar to a modern commentary to a biblical text. Thus following the Mishnah, the Talmud’s tractate Megillah is also interested in issues related to Purim observance, though it furthers the discussion by rehearsing numerous debates and vignettes of various rabbis—for example, concerning Esther’s place in the canon (b. Meg. 7a).

In addition, b. Megillah contains a rabbinic commentary on the whole book of Esther, which is the only midrashic commentary on a biblical book to be incorporated into the Talmud (b. Meg. 10b-17a). Here the rabbinic dialogs and vignettes serve a variety of purposes—for example, to embellish the villainy of the Ahasuerus, Vashti and Haman (and sometimes Nebuchadnezzar); to aggrandize the Jewish piety of Esther, Mordecai and their kin; to supply additional contextual information. This is done by appropriating exegetical techniques common to other midrashim. Among the more interesting tendencies of the commentary is that of tying lexical and grammatical peculiarities in the text to a deeper significance rather than a grammatical-historical sense, which is a generic characteristic of midrashic commentary. Thus, for instance, the book’s first words, “And it happened in the days of [wayêhî bimê],” spark a rabbinic discussion about how when these words occur in biblical narrative, they often introduce a period of distress (Heb šārâ) (b. Meg. 10b; cf. Tg. Esth. II 1:1). The commentary also has a penchant for etymologizing names; so, for example, in b. Megillah 11a the Talmud discusses various possible derivations of the name “Ahasuerus,” such as from the words aḥiḡw šel roʿš (“brother of the head”), on the (incorrect) assumption that he was the brother of Nebuchadnezzar, whom Daniel calls “the head of gold” (Dan 2:38).

3.3. Other Midrashim. There are a number of midrashim that discuss Esther, as well as sections of other midrashim devoted to Esther that have been preserved, the largest being Megillat Esther Rabbah (for a list see, Berlin, liii). One of their common themes, following the Talmud and earlier Jewish tradition, is the embellishment of both the villainy of the antagonists and the Jewish piety of the protagonists. Thus, Esther’s Jewish devotion is often emphasized by noting that she would not partake of the court’s food (cf. Dan 1:8) and did not sleep with Ahasuerus—or if she did, it was after he converted to Judaism. By contrast, the rabbis also denigrate Ahasuerus by identifying him as the king responsible for ceasing the rebuilding of the temple in Ezra-Nehemiah and for using its vessels for his banquets (cf. Dan 1:2), Vashti by identifying her as Nebuchadnezzar’s granddaughter, and Haman by portraying him as a bigger fool and miscreant.

4. Aramaic Versions of Esther (Targumim).

The Aramaic versions, or Targumim*, are rabbinic reworkings of Esther that weave their interpretations directly into the text using various strategies such as rewordings and additions of extra narrative sequences, dialogues and exegetical digressions. As such, they probably are better understood as midrashim than as translations. There are two versions of Esther Targumim, designated by the names Targum Rishon (“first Targum”) and Targum Sheni (“second Targum”). The interpretive traditions found in the Targumim reflect those found in other rabbinic literature, which has raised the question of how the two corpora relate: was one the source for the other, or were they both dependent upon a third source, or something else? To date, this is a disputed matter. Attempts to date the composition of the Targumim are based on related considerations in addition to linguistic ones, and therefore they too are disputed. According to B. Grossfeld (1991, 21, 23-25), one of the latest scholars to investigate these issues, both Targum Rishon and Targum Sheni derive from a lost rabbinic work known as Esther Rabbati and were composed in roughly the same period, and no later than the early seventh century AD in Palestine. However, it must be emphasized that these conclusions are still very uncertain.

Like other rabbinic literature and the Greek versions, the Targumim approach the text of Esther from the standpoint that Esther is a story about God’s deliverance of his faithful people from an undeserved fate. However, unlike the Greek versions, while some of the added material serves the purpose of supplying this perspective, most of it simply assumes it and serves other purposes, such as aggrandizing the Jews, disparaging the Persians/Babylonians, or deriving creative interpretations. The traditions in Targum Rishon in general tend to add midrashic material rather than interpret the text directly. So, for instance, when in Esther 1:11 Ahasuerus ordered Vashti to be brought into the banquet, Targum Rishon adds that the king ordered her to be brought in “naked, since she used to make Israelite girls work naked and make them beat wool and flax naked, therefore it was decreed that she be brought out naked” (Tg. Esth. I 1:11). Targum Sheni is similar to Targum Rishon in many respects, though it is significantly more expansive and integrates many more fanciful stories and details into its narrative. For example, the first two verses of Esther (Esther 1:1-2) are the catalyst for a long series of midrashic digressions that take up nearly two-thirds of Targum Sheni’s first chapter (Tg. Esth. II 1:1-3). The majority of this digression seems to stem from a single rabbinic tradition that regards Ahasuerus as one of the ten kings in history who ruled the world (or “will rule” in the case of the tenth—the Messiah in the eschaton), which in turn is the point of departure for a lengthy midrashic recounting of various traditions related to Judaism under Babylonian and Persian rule. It is interesting to note that an appreciable body of these traditions found in the Babylonian Talmud beginning in b. Meg. 10b.

5. Medieval Jewish Interpretation.

Medieval Jewish interpreters retain a number of the same assumptions about Esther held by earlier Jewish tradition; however, the questions that they ask of the text and the methods that they appropriate are of a very different character.

5.1. Peshat Interpretation. The Middle Ages generally saw intense interest in classical literatures of various languages and witnessed important developments in lexicography, grammar, philology and comparative linguistics—including ing *Hebrew and other Semitic languages. The wake of these developments consequently ushered in a new era in Jewish interpretation of the Bible—not only Esther—whose interests focused largely on understanding the text by explaining difficult words and grammatical forms and interpreting the text in context (not unlike modern commentaries). This new approach, known as pēšat (“simple, literal” interpretation), therefore marked an important departure from the traditional midrashic techniques of earlier rabbinic literature. Moreover, having begun in Spain and Northern Africa, it eventually became the dominant method in western Europe throughout the Middle Ages. Famous commentators include Avraham Ibn Ezra (or just Ibn Ezra), Rabbi Shimon ben Yitzhak (= Rashi), and Rabbi Shimon ben Meir (= Rashbam).

5.2. Use of Philosophy. In addition to historical-grammatical concerns, medieval Jewish commentaries were characterized by their creative use of philosophy in exegesis. For example, after the translation of Aristotle’s highly influential Nicomachean Ethics into Hebrew in the fourteenth century, Jewish exegetes regularly employed its insights in their commentaries. Concerning Esther specifically, Avraham Hadidah, for example, occasionally quoted Aristotle at length to explain and critique Ahasuerus’s lavish display of wealth as a sign of personal insecurity. Some commentators also utilized medieval science as an interpretive tool, and the use of astrology was particularly prominent. For instance, many medieval scholars believed that the movement of celestial bodies affected human events. Thus, commentators such as Yitzhak ben Yosef (“the Priest”) argued that Haman calculated his plans according to constellation patterns in order to ensure their success, thereby making Israel’s deliverance seem all the more miraculous.

5.3. Theological Concerns. Medieval commentators also continued in the footsteps of their forebears by addressing Esther’s theological problems, though they charted their own way through them as well. As in the earlier translations and rabbinic exegesis, the absence of God’s name from Esther needed explaining. Some commentators (e.g., Ibn Ezra, Sa’adia Ga’on) offered reasons why God’s name was omitted—for example, intentionally for fear that if the book fell into pagan hands, pagan scribes would replace God’s name with a pagan god in order to attribute the miracles to the latter. Others simply explained the absence of God’s name as incidental, since obviously he was orchestrating the events of Israel’s deliverance. Medieval commentators also had trouble with the book of Esther’s lack of Jewish distinctiveness—for example, concerning kašrūt (kosher law), Sabbath observance and sexual purity. Thus the Zohar, a medieval kabbalistic text, realizing that the terms of Ahasuerus’s beauty pageant implied that the contestants must sleep with him, explained that God sent down a female spirit disguised as Esther to sleep with the king in order to protect her from sexual sin (Ki Tēšē 3:276a).

5.4. Esther and the Diaspora. Perhaps one of the most historically interesting features of the medieval interpretation of Esther is that it became a paradigm for Jewish communities living in the Diaspora under foreign rule. Jews were treated variously in the medieval period. Under both Christian and Muslim rule Jews enjoyed a recognized, though second-class, status. However, after Christians drove the Muslims from Europe in the thirteenth century, this status slowly degraded. Hatred and persecution of Jews gradually mounted, culminating in the fifteenth century with the Spanish Inquisition and the expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492 and from Portugal in 1496. The situation of the Persian Jews following Ahasuerus’s edict at the hands of Haman therefore had very real, palpable parallels to medieval European Jews. Consequently, medieval commentators frequently interpreted the actions of Ahasuerus and Haman in terms of the contemporary persecutions, as though medieval Jews were recapitulating the events of Esther in their own time. To give one example, Avraham Shalom (fifteenth-century in Spain) explained that the reason Haman encouraged Ahasuerus to exterminate the Jews from his kingdom in Esther 3:8 was that the king believed that it was his duty to unite his kingdom under one religion and to do away with those who disagree, for such could threaten the whole kingdom (Naveh Shalom 69b).

6. Protestant Reformation.

A significant number of Esther commentaries were written in the Reformation period, though oddly enough, none by Luther and Calvin, though presumably Calvin intended to write one. However, according to Table Talk, a compilation of Luther’s statements on various topics collected by his students, Luther did famously remark, "I am so great an enemy to the second book of the Maccabees, and to Esther, that I wish they had not come to us at all, for they have too many heathen unnaturalities. The Jews much more esteemed the book of Esther than any of the prophets; though they were forbidden to read it before they had attained the age of thirty, by reason of the mystic matters it contains" (Table Talk §24). Table Talk is a notoriously difficult source to interpret, particularly because it is difficult to know to what extent the contents actually reflect Luther's opinions, and because different statements were collected for a range of purposes—for example, didactic and humorous. This challenge no less applies here. Luther apparently did accept Esther as canonical and authoritative, although his unique criteria of justification by faith and whether it urged Christ probably placed it lower in value than other books in his canon. The force of this statement, therefore, probably should not be taken too literally as an indictment against Esther but more so as a cheap shot against contemporaneous Jews.

All Protestant commentators appear to have regarded Esther's genre as literally historical. Protestants used the Hebrew text as the basis for commentary and exhibited a strong interest in the historical, grammatical and lexical aspects of the book of Esther. However, the more prevalent concerns of Protestant commentators appear to have been ethical and religious ones. Thus, for instance, commentators discussed whether Ahasuerus could divorce Vashti, whether Esther had grounds for marrying a pagan, whether Esther was lying by concealing her identity, and numerous other such topics (see Paton, 108).

Roman Catholics also produced a number of commentaries, and although they used the Vulgate text as the basis for commentary and regarded the additions as inspired, they also showed an awareness of issues in the Hebrew text. Many of their interests were similar to those of the Protestants—for instance, historical and linguistic concerns. One interesting feature of Roman Catholic interpretation is its use of typology—in particular, interpreting Esther as a type for which the Virgin Mary is the antitype (see Paton, 108).

7. Modern Interpretation.

Recent interpretation of Esther has swirled around numerous topics ranging from textual history to the *Dead Sea Scrolls. Here we will survey a couple of recent developments concerning Esther's historicity and genre.

7.1. Historical Value. One area that has received much attention is how to situate Esther in relation to ancient Persia. Scholars have increasingly noted that Esther's narrative contains details that are either historically inaccurate or too fanciful to be true (e.g., Fox 2001, 131-39; Berlin, xvii; for literary/thematic problems see Clines, 26-63).

Esther is the only source that records Persia having 127 provinces, which is far too high. The counts from all other extant sources, including Darius's own monuments, indicate there were only twenty to thirty, which is much more realistic (Fox 2001, 132).

Persian society, like others in the ancient Near East, functioned aristocratically, and as a rule kings needed to marry from noble families (Herodotus Hist. 3.84). Therefore it would be inconceivable that a Persian king would choose a wife of unknown ancestry and do so by a beauty contest.

Moreover, Esther's portrayal of a Persian dynast, Ahasuerus, as an incompetent ruler dependent on his advisors for recommendations on insignificant matters (e.g., how to honor Mordecai) and unable to discern absurd requests (e.g., to slaughter the Jews) is also hard to believe.

It is also difficult to understand how Persia, which had warmly treated nations previously conquered by Babylonia, including Judah, as Ezra-Nehemiah testifies, would then at a moment's notice and without good reason issue an outlandish edict to exterminate all Jews from everywhere in the empire.

However, scholars have also noted that Esther's portrayal of Persian culture in certain respects seems fairly consonant with the Persian stereotypes found elsewhere in the Mediterranean, particularly in the works of the Greek writers Herodotus, Xenophon and Aristophanes. For instance, these writers describe, often pejoratively, the opulence of the Persian court exhibited in its lavish banquets, its ornate decor, and the king's display of his wealth, all of which are features assumed by Esther's narrative.

The upshot of these observations has led to the affirmation that Esther's assumptions about Persian culture are roughly accurate, if not simply widely held throughout the Mediterranean, but also to the recognition that Esther's overall narrative is not strictly historical.

7.2. Genre Identification. In recent decades a rough consensus seems to have emerged regarding Esther's genre. On the one hand, Esther should be understood as a Diaspora story. Esther was written in a Diaspora context, written for Jews under a foreign power, and reflects a perspective on Jewish life and values in the Diaspora. Moreover, Esther also shares features with other Diaspora stories such as Judith, Tobit, Daniel 1—6 and the additions to Daniel. On the other hand, Esther should be understood in carnivalesque terms. This identification results largely from the recognition of several humorous or ironic episodes, such as Mordecai being honored instead of Haman, and at Haman's unwitting advice; the annals being read to Ahasuerus to cure insomnia; Haman getting the stake instead of Mordecai (Berlin, xv-xxviii; Fox 2001, 141-52).

These observations, in tandem with Esther's historical problems, have raised the question of whether the author of the MT Esther intended the work to be read as fiction or nonfiction—that is, whether he believed it was story or history. The answer largely depends on how one interprets the relationship between the events of Esther to various features of Esther 9—10, though the Purim etiology in particular. For instance, the fancifulness of the narrative coupled with the viability of its background assumptions suggests that the book is something like historical fiction or historical novel (Berlin, xvi-xvii). However, Esther 9—10, which establishes the composition's etiological purpose, gives the impression that the author believed that the events actually happened. This disconnect, in addition to other data, has led scholars to conclude that the practice of Purim and the story of Esther probably were originally independent and became associated at some later point before the writing of the Masoretic Text of Esther (and correlatively that the actual etiology of Purim is lost to us [see Berlin, xlv-xlix; Clines, 31-138]).

See also ESTHER 1: BOOK OF; ESTHER 4: ADDITIONS; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS; PURIM; TARGUMIM; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Berlin, Esther (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2001); D. Börner-Klein and E. Hollender, Rabbinische Kommentare zum Buch Ester (2 vols.; Leiden: E. J.

Brill, 2000); D. J. A. Clines, The Esther Scroll: The Story of the Story (JSOTSup 30; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984); L. Feldman, Studies in Josephus' Rewritten Bible (JSJSup 58; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998) 500-538; M. V. Fox, The Redaction of the Books of Esther: On Reading Composite Texts (SBLMS 40; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1991); idem, Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); L. Ginzberg, The Legends of the Jews, vols. 4, 6 (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998); B. Grossfeld, The First Targum to Esther: According to the MS Paris Hebrew 110 of the Bibliothèque Nationale (New York: Sepher-Hermon Press, 1983); idem, The Two Targums of Esther, Translated, with Apparatus and Notes (ArBib 18; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991); idem, Targum Sheni to the Book of Esther: A Critical Edition Based on MS Sassoon 282 with Critical Apparatus (New York: Sepher-Hermon Press, 1994); S. Lieberman, Tosefta Ki-Feshutah: A Comprehensive Commentary on the Tosefta, 5: Order Mo'ed (New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1962); M. Luther, The Table Talk of Martin Luther (Philadelphia: Lutheran Publication Society, 1997); C. F. Moore, Daniel, Esther, and Jeremiah: The Additions (AB 44; Garden City, NY: Double Day, 1977); G. W. E. Nickelsburg, "Additions to the Book of Esther," in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, ed. M. E. Stone (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) 135-38; L. B. Paton, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Esther (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1908); E. Segal, The Babylonian Esther Midrash: A Critical Commentary (3 vols.; BJS 291-293; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1994); Y. Tabor, Mô'ade Yisra'el bi-Têqûpat ha-Misnâ wê-ha-Talmûd (= Festivals of Israel in the Period of the Mishnah and the Talmud) (Jerusalem: Magnes, 2000) 321-67; B. D. Walfish, Esther In Medieval Garb: Jewish Interpretation of the Book of Esther in the Middle Ages (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993).

J. Dombrowski

ESTHER 4: ADDITIONS

There are extant six chapter-length additions to the Esther story, designated A-F, which survive only in the two Greek versions (the LXX text and the Alpha text) (see Esther 5: Greek Versions). The additions either add explicitly religious language (additions A, C, D, F) or comprise official memos from the Persian king (additions B, E). All but addition D are inserted cleanly into the narrative; addition D is woven into Esther 5 in such a way as to suggest that it may have had a different origin than did the other additions.

1. Origins and Christian Reception
2. Content of the Additions

1. Origins and Christian Reception.

The consensus of scholarship is that additions B and E originated in Greek, but both Semitic and Greek origins have been argued for the other additions. It is apparent that the additions were added subsequent to the original production of both Greek versions. It is uncertain whether the additions were originally introduced to one of the Greek versions all at one time or by different hands at different times. The degree of similarity of the additions in the LXX text (δ -text) compared to the Alpha text (AT) indicates a literary dependence between them. It is not clear if the additions were copied from the δ -text to the AT or vice versa, or if they came from some third source. Although it is unknown when the additions came into the Greek versions, they were present by the late first century AD, as Josephus clearly uses material from additions B, C, D, E in his Jewish Antiquities. His omission of apocalyptic material from A and F that reveals Jewish dominance of the Gentile nations may have been due to his sensitivity about war against Gentiles, since Josephus was closely aligned with the Romans.

The additions to the Greek versions as they appear in the LXX (δ -text) are canonical for the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches. Protestants place the additions to Esther among the apocryphal writings. When Jerome produced the Latin Vulgate, he knew that these additions were not original even though they were well known to the church because the Old Latin version that had been translated from the Greek included them. He acknowledged their traditional inclusion by excising them from the story and dislocating them into an appendix at the end of the story. Today the English translations produced by the Roman Catholic Church traditionally also include these dislocated chapters, but it is more common to insert them into the narrative where they are found in the Greek versions.

2. Content of the Additions.

When the two Greek versions are compared, the six additions are similar enough to indicate literary dependence between them but they are not identical in wording. This has given rise to complex discussions about to which Greek version they were first added and about the Tendenz of the final redactors of each version. Nevertheless, the overall contribution of each addition to the narrative is clear.

2.1. Additions A and F. Additions A and F frame the Esther narrative with an apocalyptic dream and its interpretation that provide a political perspective on the Esther story that would be at home in the Hellenistic era. Addition A introduces the Greek Esther story with Mordecai's dream of two dragons, thunders, earthquake and a tiny fountain that produces a great river of water. *Mordecai understands the dream as revelation from God and ponders it to understand its every detail. The dream is a prelude to Mordecai's discovery of an assassination plot against the king by two eunuchs, which the AT links closely to the interpretation of the dream. Addition A documents that the king then wrote a memo in his book about how Mordecai had foiled this attempt on his life, a detail that later is of great significance to the canonical story (Esther 6:2). Haman's animosity toward Mordecai is explicitly linked to the execution of the two eunuchs upon Mordecai's discovery of their plot, implicating Haman as part of the assassination conspiracy. Haman is identified as an "Agagite" in the Hebrew Masoretic Text (MT) but is introduced in addition A as a "Bugaion" in the δ -text and as a "Macedonian" in the AT.

Addition F ends the Greek Esther story by explaining that the events of the story are a fulfillment of Mordecai's dream that are from God. In the δ -text Esther is identified as the little spring that produces a great river; in the AT she is the little spring, but the river is the nations gathered together against the Jewish people. The two dragons are identified as Mordecai and Haman in both Greek versions. The lots of *Purim are identified as two destinies, one for the people of God and one for the nations, and the events of the Esther story are understood as the moment of decision when these two lots fell. Additions A and F view the Esther story not as an isolated happenstance of history but rather as events divinely orchestrated and prophetically foretold.

Because additions A and F clearly answer to each other, they most likely were introduced into the Greek Esther story at the same time. Because they are apocalyptic, they probably were introduced during the Hellenistic (or Greco-Roman) era when Hellenistic kings (or later Roman governors) began to oppress the Jews. It seems unlikely that they ever circulated independently of the Esther story as either Greek or Semitic texts. These additions were more carefully redacted into the AT than the δ -text, as evidenced by the omission in Esther 2 of elements that would be redundant following Addition A, whereas the δ -text lets Esther 2 stand unedited in this regard.

The positioning of Mordecai's dream and its interpretation as a frame around the Esther story achieves two literary effects. First, it makes Mordecai the undisputed hero of the story. In the Hebrew MT Mordecai and Esther are introduced at the same point in the story, and their roles in the deliverance of the Jews are so mutually interdependent that it is difficult to judge which should be considered the main character (though it is of note that the book has come down to us with title "Esther" and not "Mordecai"). In the Greek versions addition A introduces both Mordecai and Haman but not Esther, clearly subjugating her role to Mordecai's. This is consistent with the practice of referring to Purim as "Mordecai's Day" and minimizing Esther's role in the Hellenistic period.

Second, additions A and F bring Mordecai into Israel's tradition of great prophetic dreamers such as Joseph and Daniel. The parallels between Mordecai in the court of Persia, Joseph in Egypt, and Daniel in Babylon have long been recognized. In the Hebrew MT Mordecai's spiritual character is left undefined; however, in the Greek versions he becomes an exemplar of faithfulness and the recipient of divine revelation.

2.2. Additions B and E. Esther 3 and Esther 8 of the Hebrew canonical text only state that decrees were written in the king's name, first by Haman and then by Mordecai. In the Greek versions the text of the royal decrees has been cleanly inserted. A very high degree of agreement exists between the δ -text and AT in these additions. Differences amount to only the updating of vocabulary with synonyms, stylistic changes in syntax, and the addition of an occasional pronoun or relative clause for clarity. Although putatively written during the Persian period, additions B and E bear characteristics of documents contemporary in the Ptolemaic period. They are wordy, with a convoluted sentence structure and syntax that achieves flowery rhetoric.

The traits of additions B and E indicate that the same hand composed both. Because both additions include distinctive words that are found elsewhere in the AT but not in the δ -text, it appears that they were first introduced into the AT in a more careful manner and were then simply copied into the δ -text without revision to the rest of the story. This is comparable to what is observed with the introduction of addition A more carefully achieved in the AT than in the δ -text.

2.3. Addition C. Addition C is comprised of the prayers of Esther and Mordecai, thereby introducing the strongest religious element found in the Greek additions. It is often assumed that the fast of Mordecai and Esther in Esther 4:15-17 was accompanied by prayers of supplication; the prayers in addition C document their prayers for deliverance. The overtly religious language of addition C expresses interest in the covenant by alluding to God's previous acts of deliverance, and it specifically mentions the temple, the Jews as God's inheritance, the exodus and circumcision. Such references make explicit what the Hebrew story of Esther only hints: the Jews of the Diaspora are still God's covenant people even though they have chosen not to return to Judah.

The prayers in addition C echo the Greek version of the prayer of Moses in Deuteronomy 9:26-27, where Moses asks God to be merciful because of his covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Mordecai bases his plea to God similarly. The deliberate use of the exodus motif by the author of addition C is also seen in the description of the Jewish people as being "in bitter slavery," which draws a close identity of the Jews of Persia with their ancestors in Pharaoh's Egypt, even though historically the Persians did not enslave the Jewish nation.

Addition C exonerates Mordecai and Esther by revealing more of their thoughts and motives. Esther divulges her thoughts about being taken into the harem of the king when she admits that she loathes "the bed of the uncircumcised," casting her relationship with Xerxes (see Ahasuerus) in a more virtuous light as measured by Torah. Mordecai explains that it was not from hubris or self-seeking that he refused to bow to "the uncircumcised" Haman but rather out of obedience to the first commandment. Because the Hebrew version of Esther extant in the MT lacks reference to God or the symbols of Judaism, it leaves the events of the Esther story at the periphery of biblical history and theology. The overall effect of addition C is to bring the Esther story into the mainstream of pentateuchal tradition.

The Semitic flavor of addition C has sometimes been used to argue for a Semitic Vorlage; however, its style may simply be imitation of the Greek translation of the pentateuchal passages to strengthen its allusion to them.

2.4. Addition D. Addition D stands apart from the other additions with respect to the manner in which it has been introduced into the text. Whereas each of the other additions has been cleanly inserted without integration into the surrounding text, addition D has been woven into the immediately surrounding text, suggesting a different origin for it than for the other five additions. It is also the addition that shows the highest degree of agreement between the δ -text and the AT, suggesting that it was already present in the Hebrew Vorlage of the Greek translations.

The outcome of Esther's uninvited approach to the king is summarized succinctly in the Hebrew MT with one verse, Esther 5:2. The first half of this verse is supplemented in the Greek versions by an extensive description that notes the fearsome appearance of the king, the swooning of Esther, and the comment that the king sprang from his throne to take Esther in his arms and comfort her. The second half of Esther 5:2 is included in the Greek versions followed by the several concluding verses of addition D. Because addition D is spliced exactly the same way with the canonical text in exactly the same places in both the AT and the δ -text, it was likely already embedded within the Vorlage from which the Greek versions were translated.

Although there is the highest degree of agreement between the δ -text and the AT in addition D, the AT does include the distinctive phrase that the king looked upon Esther when she first approached him uninvited "as a bull in fierce anger." Neither the Hebrew MT nor the LXX of Esther include this phrase, but it is found in the Old Latin version of the Esther story, perhaps suggesting some literary relationship between the AT and the Old Latin.

A second distinctive phrase in addition D as found in the AT is that on Esther's face was "a measure of sweat" as she went uninvited to the king. This Greek phrase may have resulted from misreading the letter dalet for a resh in a Semitic Vorlage, which, if in Aramaic, would change the sense of the word from "good will" to "sweat." This has been proposed as evidence that an Aramaic version of the Esther story that included addition D may once have existed. The collocation of "sweat" and the preparation of a banquet, which was Esther's request when she appeared before the king, is found also in 2 Maccabees 2:26-27, which appears to be an allusion to the Esther story in the form extant in the AT. The book of 2 Maccabees is believed to have been written in Jerusalem to the Hellenized Diaspora Jews in Ptolemaic Egypt during the Hasmonean period, which would imply that addition D, with its distinctive readings as found in the AT, were in circulation before that time.

See also CANON; ESTHER 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; ESTHER 5: GREEK VERSIONS; TEXT, TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Berlin, Esther (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2001); D. J. A. Clines, The Esther Scroll: The Story of the Story (JSOTSup 30; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984); K. de Troyer, The End of the Alpha-Text of Esther: Translation and Narrative Techniques in MT 8.1-7, LXX 8.1-17 and AT 7.14-41, trans. B. Doyle (SBLSCS 48; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000); idem, "The End of the Alpha-Text of Esther: An Analysis of MT and LXX 8.9-13 and AT 7.33-38," Text 21 (2002) 175-207; M. V. Fox, The Redaction of the Books of Esther: On Reading Composite Texts (SBLMS 40; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1991); idem, Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); K. H. Jobes, The Alpha-Text of Esther: Its Character and Relationship to the Masoretic Text (SBLDS 153; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996); C. A. Moore, Daniel, Esther and Jeremiah: The Additions (AB 44; New York: Doubleday, 1977); C. C. Torrey, "The Older Book of Esther," HTR 37 (1944) 1-40; E. Tov, "The 'Lucianic' Text of the Canonical and the Apocryphal Sections of Esther: A Rewritten Biblical Book," Text 10 (1982) 1-25; H. G. M. Williamson, Studies in Persian Period History and Historiography (FAT 38; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004). K. H. Jobes

ESTHER 5: GREEK VERSIONS

Modern English translations made within the Protestant and Jewish traditions are translated from the Hebrew Masoretic Text, but all canonical books of the Hebrew Bible survive also in at least one ancient Greek translation. However, the book of Esther is among a few books that survive in two different Greek versions, as do the books of Judges, Daniel, Tobit and 1-2 Esdras. Extant for the book of Esther are manuscripts of the LXX text (ó-text) and the much shorter Alpha text (AT, sometimes referred to as the Lucianic version or L-text). Both Greek versions tell the same basic story as found in the Hebrew MT. The ó-text is almost certainly a translation of a Hebrew text that was virtually identical to the MT. The consensus is that the AT also originated as a translation of a Hebrew text, though the relationship of that Hebrew text to the MT is disputed. A significant minority of scholars consider the AT to be not a translation but rather a midrashic retelling of the Esther story that has no direct literary relationship to a Vorlage.

1. Characteristics of the Greek Versions
2. Differences between the Greek Texts
3. Relationship of the Three Texts
4. The Manuscripts

1. Characteristics of the Greek Versions.

The most prominent characteristic of the Greek versions is that both contain six additional chapters (A-F) that are not found in any surviving Hebrew version but are so similar in both Greek versions that a common origin is certain (see Esther 4: Additions). These six additional chapters contextualize the story for the times in which their Hellenistic readers lived. The Greek versions tone down the mockery of the Persian king, perhaps in respect of the Greek writers' high view of their most powerful enemy. The additions also supply the religious language referring to God, prayer and the covenant that the Hebrew story so notoriously lacks. The first and last additions, A and F, frame the Esther story with an apocalyptic vision of Israel's struggle against, and eventual triumph over, the nations. The effect of this apocalyptic frame reduces the focus on the roles of Esther and Mordecai and makes the story an episode in the age-old struggle of which Hellenistic oppression was yet another incident.

If the colophon found in the manuscripts of the ó-text is accurate, that Greek translation was made in the fourth year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, which could be dated, depending on which Ptolemy and Cleopatra are intended, to c. 48 BC or c. 77 BC or c. 114 BC. The AT manuscripts includes no such colophon, and the dates of its original production and final redaction remain an open question.

The Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches consider the ó-text, including its six major additions, to be canonical. In the Latin Vulgate the additions were dislocated to an appendix at the end of the story because although they are not found in the Hebrew text, which was the textual base used by Jerome, they did appear in the Old Latin version familiar to the Latin church. Modern English translations of Esther that include the additions tend to place them in their proper sequence within the story.

No current community of faith, either Jewish or Christian, considers the AT of Esther to be canonical. However, the fact that manuscripts of this text were being copied into the thirteenth century suggests that it was valued by some community.

Although both Greek versions tell the same basic story as the Hebrew MT, they do so with different emphases and apparently different purposes. Produced in the Hellenistic era, the Greek versions reflect a Hellenistic political ethos that finds the Jewish people living in a Diaspora ruled by the Hellenistic kings who succeeded Alexander the Great. The role of *Mordecai as a Jew who was loyal to the pagan king is amplified in the Greek versions, perhaps as a message that the Jews were not a political threat and, moreover, that it is good for the king to have Jews in influential positions at court. The mockery of the ruling empire found in the Hebrew text is downplayed or omitted in the translations produced during the Hellenistic period. Two of the six major additions, B and E, are presented as copies of letters from the Persian king, who in the ó-text is named "Artaxerxes," where the AT simply transliterates the Hebrew name, "Ahasuerus."* Although putatively the documents of a Persian king, additions B and E replicate the complicated syntax and vocabulary of court documents known from the Ptolemaic era. Addition E presents the Persian king promoting the Jewish people among his subjects, referring to them as children of the only and true God, who has benevolently directed even the affairs of the Persian Empire. The Persian king describes Jewish practices, though odd by Hellenistic standards, as righteous laws.

Both Greek versions also supply the explicitly religious language needed to make the Esther story more comparable to Ezra, Nehemiah and Daniel, which share the common theme about a Jewish leader's relationship to a pagan king. Where the Hebrew text mentions that many people became Jews out of fear (Esther 8:17), both Greek versions specify that conversion to Judaism involved circumcision, which had become the notoriously distinctive mark of Jewish identity in the Hellenistic world. The Greek versions make Esther more virtuous by Jewish standards by showing her praying fervently and interceding for the sins of her people, abhorring her marriage to a Gentile, and refusing to eat at the king's table. However, they also downplay her role in the deliverance and describe Esther as fearful. She swoons during her appearance before her husband and king, a stereotypical element found in Hellenistic romance stories of that time.

2. Differences Between the Greek Versions.

Although both Greek versions expand the Hebrew story of Esther in similar ways, there are some notable differences between them. The LXX, or ó-text, more closely follows the Hebrew text extant in the MT when the six major additions are excluded from consideration. The AT is considerably shorter than the ó-text text by frequently lacking the personal names, numbers, dates and repeated elements found in the LXX version. Of the two Greek versions, the AT is less explicitly religious than the ó-text. Because the six additions are secondary to both Greek versions, a comparison of the original emphases of the two texts should exclude them. In the Hebrew text and the ó-text, Mordecai pleads with Esther to intercede for the plight of her people before the king but notes that if she does not, deliverance will be accomplished from elsewhere. The AT states that if Esther does not intercede, their help will come specifically from God, implying a view that God steps in if human beings fail to act. Personal responsibility to act for the well-being of the Jewish nation is implicit in all versions of the story, for punishment is threatened should Esther fail to act on behalf of her people. The AT, however, does not state that Esther's ethnic and religious identity had been hidden, in contrast to the Hebrew story and the ó-text, which underscores the danger of identifying oneself with God's covenant people. The ó-text implies the importance of being an observant Jew if one is to have influence, noting that Esther kept her Jewish way of life even after entering the harem (Esther 2:20). The AT lacks this emphasis, implying that Esther's influence was not directly related to her observance of the *law.

In comparison to the ó-text, the AT magnifies Mordecai's role and minimizes Esther's. This may reflect an emphasis on Mordecai's role as a political hero in the Greek period, as *Purim was referred to at that time as "Mordecai's Day" (2 Macc 15:36). Although the AT states that Purim commemorates this episode of deliverance from the Persian threat (Esther 9:49//Eng. Esther 9:26), it abbreviates the Purim etiology and amplifies the political dynamics of the Jews in relation to a powerful pagan empire. More than the other versions, the AT emphasizes that Jews in positions of political power benefit not only the Jewish nation but also the king and the empire.

In addition to different emphases, there are many differences of detail between the ó-text and the AT. The ó-text explains that Mordecai was raising Esther to be his wife (Esther 2:7), making her marriage to the king more dramatic and poignant, but the AT is silent on that point. All references to cosmetics and the elaborate beauty treatment in Esther 1 are omitted in the AT. The AT also omits reference to the inalterability of Persian law (Esther 8:8), the second day of fighting and then of celebration (Esther 9:13, 19), and the extended Purim etiology (Esther 9:26-32). Esther 1:1 in the AT gives the Macedonian month names "Dystros-Xandikos," which correspond to the Jewish lunar months Adar-Nisan, suggesting that the AT in its present form was read by peoples who used the Macedonian calendar, while the ó-text was read by those familiar with the Jewish lunar calendar. Because of a known intercalating correction to the Macedonian calendar that occurred sometime between AD 15 and AD 46, this particular correspondence existed only from the time of the adjustment through AD 176. This might corroborate the theory of those who would date the production of the AT to the reign of the Roman emperor Claudius, but the month names could easily have been revised at some point in the AT's transmission history.

3. The Relationship of the Three Texts.

Discussion of the relationship of the two Greek texts of Esther to each other and the relationship of each to the Hebrew text has focused on the differences in the endings of the story in each of the three extant texts. The question is whether the Hebrew text(s) from which the Greek versions were translated ended at a different place than does the MT or whether the endings of the Greek versions represent an intentional redaction by the Greek translators. Some believe that the AT, which is considerably shorter than the ó-text, is a translation of a shorter, earlier Hebrew version that ended at Esther 8:17 and that later received the ending that turns the Hebrew narrative into a Purim etiology. However, even though the three texts begin to diverge even as early as Esther 8:3, there is a substantial core and sequence of material common in the ending of all three versions. To further complicate the issue, the endings of both Greek versions appear to have been redacted extensively but independently when addition E was introduced.

Although the original relationship of each Greek version to the other is debated, the six major additions are almost identical in both (see Esther 4: Additions). Examination of the texts shows that their relationship in the additions is quite different than in their canonical sections, indicating that the additions were not original in either version. There is evidence that additions A, B, C, E, F (but not D) were introduced first into the AT and subsequently copied from that version into the ó-text. However, some scholars insist that the additions were originally introduced into the ó-text, if not by the original translator, then in a subsequent redaction, and were later copied into the AT. Addition D has a different relationship to its immediate context than do the other additions, leading some to conclude that it was already in the Hebrew Vorlage from which the Greek versions were translated.

The consensus of scholarship holds that the Vorlage of the ó-text was an ancestor as it existed in the first century BC of what became the MT several centuries later. Whether that Hebrew Vorlage included the ending of the story as found in the extant MT is highly debated. Until the 1960s, the AT was believed to be the Lucianic recension of Esther made by revising the LXX text in the late third century AD and therefore a younger and derivative Greek version. The siglum L in the Göttingen critical edition preserves this understanding of the origin of the AT. Other current theories contend that the AT is a midrashic rewrite of the Esther story, possibly precipitated by the political situation faced especially by the Jews of Alexandria under the reign of Claudius. There is also a weight of scholarship that argues that both Greek versions, exclusive of the six major additions, were translations independently made from respective Hebrew Vorlagen. If the AT is the older of the two Greek translations, its Hebrew Vorlage may have been an earlier ancestor of the Hebrew text that became the Vorlage from which the LXX was later translated and that further developed into the MT. Or it may have been a collateral relative of the MT's ancestor text that was to some extent different from it.

4. The Manuscripts.

The Greek text known as the LXX text (the ó-text, sometimes referred to as the B-text) is widely attested in the four great uncial codices and more than thirty minuscule manuscripts. Apart from the six major additions, it is the Greek version that stands most closely to the extant MT.

The AT is extant in only four manuscripts from the tenth through thirteenth centuries: MS 19 (Chigi R.vi.38), MS 93 (Royal I.D.2), MS 108 (Vat.Gr. 330) and MS 319 (Vatop. 600). MS 392 preserves a text that is a mix of the two Greek versions. The Greek versions formed the textual basis from which the Old Latin, the Sahidic (or Coptic) and the Ethiopic versions were translated.

See also CANON; ESTHER 4: ADDITIONS; TEXT, TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Berlin, Esther (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2001); F. W. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Dallas: Word, 1996); D. J. A. Clines, The Esther Scroll: The Story of the Story (JSOTSup 30; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984); K. de Troyer, "An Oriental Beauty Parlor: An Analysis of Est. 2.8-18 in the Hebrew, the Septuagint and the Second Greek Text," in A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susanna, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 7; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 47-70; idem, The End of the Alpha-Text of Esther: Translation and Narrative Techniques in MT 8.1-7, LXX 8.1-17 and AT 7.14-41 (SBLSCS 48; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000); idem, "The End of the Alpha-Text of Esther: An Analysis of MT and LXX 8.9-13 and AT 7.33-38," Text 21 (2002) 175-207; M. V. Fox, The Redaction of the Books of Esther: On Reading Composite Texts (SBLMS 40; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1991); idem, Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); R. Hanhart, ed., Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum Graecum, 8.3: Esther (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966); K. H. Jobes, The Alpha-Text of Esther: Its Character and Relationship to the Masoretic Text (SBLDS 153; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996); E. Tov, "The 'Lucianic' Text of the Canonical and the Apocryphal Sections of Esther: A Rewritten Biblical Book," Text 10 (1982) 1-25; H. G. M. Williamson, Studies in Persian Period History and Historiography (FAT 38; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004).

K. H. Jobes

ESTHER 6: PERSON

From her inauspicious beginnings as an orphaned young Israelite woman in exile, Esther came precipitously to the throne of Persia, where she acted with courage and determination to deliver her people. Nevertheless, her roles as wife to a pagan king and as activist against those who hated Jews have garnered her considerable criticism.

1. Esther's Identity
2. Assessing the Character and Actions of Esther
3. Lessons from Esther

1. Esther's Identity.

1.1. The Matter of Names. "Hadassah, that is, Esther" (Esther 2:7) is the only character in the book of Esther to have two names, indicative of her two worlds and the two identities that ultimately she would bring together in the power center of the Persian Empire. The Hebrew name "Hadassah" means "myrtle," which carried significant associations of hope (Neh 8:15; Is 55:13). Esther has popularly been identified with Ishtar, the goddess of both love and war. If this was intended as a "literary nickname," it was a good choice, as Esther proved herself in both realms. A seemingly better etymology derives the name from Old Iranian stara, meaning "star." In a further close study of the preservation of Old Persian forms, A. S. Yahuda concluded that "Esther" is the Persian equivalent of "Hadassah" and itself means "myrtle." While the Persian for "myrtle" is as, the name as it appears in the text preserves an older and longer form, the Medic astra via Old Persian. The rabbis pressed *intertextual connections even further, noting that Esther's name was related to the Hebrew word for "hide" (str). Citing Deuteronomy 31:18, they drew the parallels of God's being hidden because of the disobedience of the people, Esther's hidden identity, and God's own hid-denness in the book (b. Hullin 139b).

1.2. Esther's Two Worlds.

1.2.1. Esther's Jewish Heritage. Esther was a young Israelite woman and an orphan. Esther 2:7 emphasizes the absence of her parents, indicating twice that both had died. But for her cousin *Mordecai, who adopted her as his daughter, she would have been deserted. He cared for her, and she was submissive to his authority.

Although the book of Esther has received sharp criticism for its lack of overt religious language, it is evident that the main characters were infused with their Jewish tradition. When called upon to intervene on behalf of her people, Esther's final words to Mordecai were to enjoin the Jewish community to fast for three days, a most rigorous discipline. It seems that she was entirely familiar with the practice, the circumstances that would prompt such an endeavor, and the God to whom they would appeal.

1.2.2. Into the Persian Court. From that context, Esther was taken with the beautiful young virgins. The doublet describing Esther in 2:7 emphasizes her beauty: "beautiful of form" and "lovely in appearance." In other words, her extraordinary beauty far exceeded the qualifications for being rounded up when the search began for a new queen. Neither she nor Mordecai would have been able to prevent it; the description of the process uses three passive verbs indicating there was little likelihood of opposition (Esther 2:8). No doubt the environment to which she moved seemed a universe away from her Jewish home. Nevertheless, Mordecai made a daily practice of checking on her welfare (Esther 2:11).

Once Esther was in the confines of the court harem, her characteristic deference won her not only the approval of Hegai, the eunuch in charge of the young women, but also ultimately the favor of the king. In the interval, Hegai strategically shepherded her through the year of preparation. The treatment period was "prescribed" with oil massages for six months, no doubt to soften the skin, a significant matter in a hot and dry climate. This was followed by treatment with spices for another six months. The association of myrrh with sexual attraction and love is particularly evident in Song of Songs 1:13; 4:6, 14; 5:1, 5, 13 (see also Prov 7:17) (see Song of Songs).

The "rules of the contest" were that each candidate could ask for anything she wished to take with her to the king's palace (Esther 2:13), presumably in order to make herself memorable enough to be summoned again by name. This may also have been their "payment"; the story does not indicate what the items might have been or whether they could keep them. After one night with the king, the woman was a concubine, and if she was not summoned by name, she spent the rest of her life in the harem, essentially reduced to widowhood. It is not entirely clear where a young woman went when she left the king's bedroom in the morning. "Another part of the harem" (Esther 2:14 NIV) is literally "the second house of women," and there was now a different keeper, Shaashgaz, for the used concubines.

1.3. Was There a Historical Esther? Neither *Vashti nor Esther appears in the extrabiblical texts concerning the Persian Empire, raising the question of the historicity of these characters.

1.3.1. Scant Likelihood That Esther Would Become Queen. It has been claimed that the likelihood of Esther becoming queen was slim because the queen was supposed to be chosen from among the seven families whose nobles had participated in the overthrow of the Magi when Darius came to power (Herodotus Hist. 3.70-71, 84). The record in Herodotus, however, reflects an agreement among those conspirators just one generation before Xerxes (see Ahasuerus). This was not, therefore, a long-standing tradition. Further, it would omit the line of Cyrus itself, and yet the roster of Darius's four wives included two daughters of Cyrus, one of whom was Atossa (Herodotus Hist. 3.88), and Xerxes was the son of Atossa. This objection carries little weight.

1.3.2. Absence of Vashti from the Historical Record of Xerxes' Reign. The most challenging problem is the identity of Esther's predecessor, Vashti. Xerxes came to the throne in 486 BC, and ostensibly Vashti was the reigning queen only until her deposition in 483 BC (Esther 1:3). Herodotus (Hist. 9.108-112), however, indicates that Xerxes' wife was Amestris and describes her as masterminding a horrifying royal intrigue after the campaign to Greece in 480 BC. One possibility is simply to state that neither Esther nor Vashti rose to the surface in Herodotus's records of royal women, of which there may have been quite a number if the lurid circumstances portrayed by Herodotus reflect a pattern for Xerxes. Amestris, after all,

was a much more colorful character.

It may be possible, however, that Amestris and Vashti were the same individual. Names are notoriously fluid in transition from one language to another. Although "Vashti" bears little resemblance to "Amestris," it represents the English version of the Hebrew rendition of a Persian name. When Herodotus put the Persian name into Greek, substitutions were necessary because neither the first nor the second consonant had an equivalent in Greek. Amestris not only was Xerxes' wife but also was the daughter of one of his commanders, Otanes, who was one of the aforementioned seven (Herodotus Hist. 7.61). She had already borne Xerxes two sons, and Artaxerxes, the third, was born in 483 BC. These circumstances may have meant practically that although she could be banished from Xerxes' bedroom and deprived of the crown, there were limits on the banishment and good political reasons for keeping her in the extensive royal household.

Shortly after these events Xerxes headed off to wage war on the western front and was thus occupied for the next three years. It could be that Esther 2:1 ("after these things") refers to this passage of time and that the wholesale roundup of young women did not commence until his return. We do know that Esther's first entrance (after a year of preparation) was in the seventh year of the king, which would have been 479 BC (Esther 2:16). In the meantime, Herodotus (Hist. 9.108-112) dishes up the tidbit about Xerxes' dalliance with his niece, Amestris's jealousy, and her cunning and brutal revenge. It may be that after all these events Xerxes was more than ready for a new queen! Perhaps his remembering Vashti and what she had done (Esther 2:1) was not entirely with fondness if that memory included her activities in the intervening three years. In any case, the narrative by Herodotus does not explicitly state that Amestris was queen from the seventh to the twelfth years of Xerxes' reign.

2. Assessing the Character and Actions of Esther.

An initial reading of Esther's story leaves one with deep admiration for her courage and resilience in the midst of tragic, trying and extremely dangerous circumstances. As the narrative unfolds, her character develops from what appears to be an initially submissive charge of her cousin to a remarkable authority figure. Her demeanor in the court changed from pleasingly demure to brilliantly strategic. Nevertheless, critics of Esther have arisen in several quarters.

2.1. Esther Deemed a Deficient Role Model.

2.1.1. Feminist Reading of Esther. From a *feminist perspective, Esther's character is anemic in contrast to Vashti, who resolutely refused to be an object in the king's possession. Although the text does not explicitly state why Vashti refused to appear at the king's banquet, it is not difficult to surmise that she was loath to display herself before a large group of men well under the influence of their wine. Her assertiveness eliminated her from the court. Esther, by way of contrast, passively did what the authoritative voice commanded, whether it was Mordecai, Hegai or the king. Once she became queen, she exercised manipulative feminine wiles. All of this has prompted readers from the feminist perspective to view the text as unpleasantly subversive (see Feminist Interpretation).

2.1.2. Esther's Lack of Moral Judgment. From another quarter, Esther is deemed an appalling role model because she seems to have had no qualms about entering the harem and participating in a contest the sole focus of which was to satisfy the pagan and lascivious king's sexual appetite. From the outset of Israel's history, intermarriage with the people groups in Canaan was forbidden (Deut 7:1-4) because of the temptation to idolatry. The same motivation was behind the severe measures during the reform activities of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 9:1-2; Neh 13:23-27) when foreign wives were put away. These took place in the mid-fifth century BC, about a generation after the time of Xerxes and Esther. Clearly, her marriage to a pagan king was reprehensible, as was her shameless participation in the royal court activities.

2.1.3. Esther's Abuse of Power. Even worse than her spineless caving in to the comfortable non-kosher life in the palace was her heartless brutality once she got her hands on power. Not only did she devise the banquet scheme so as to bring about the complete humiliation and demise of Haman; she then refused his pitiable plea for his life as he fell at her feet terrified of the king's wrath. After the death of Haman, she and Mordecai joined forces and engineered a counter-edict that sanctioned brutality on the part of the Jews who were defending themselves. Just as damning was Esther's inability to leave well-enough alone after the first day of fighting between the Jews and their enemies; she had the cruel intent to inflict more violence in Susa for a second day and even asked that the ten sons of Haman be hanged publicly. And finally, the entire text celebrates the establishment of a new festival that commemorates a time of wholesale bloodshed (see Purim).

2.2. Restoring the Character of Esther.

2.2.1. Esther "Won Favor" in the Court. The text is emphatic that Esther was "taken" as part of the roundup. In contrast to the potential influence of Queen Vashti, who was fearsome enough to cause the king's chief advisor, Memuchan, to quail, Esther had no such position from which to stage any kind of resistance to the king's men. Nevertheless, contrary to a common presentation of Esther as comprehensively insipid, it is clear that from the moment she set foot in the harem, she was an actor within the wider machinery of the royal household and the court. The hint to this effect lies in the Hebrew idiom translated "she won favor" (which appears repeatedly), a more dynamic expression than the usual "found favor." This says something about her demeanor both in public and in private. Furthermore, she successfully mediated between Mordecai and the king when the first assassination plot was uncovered (Esther 2:22).

2.2.2. Esther's Courageous Choice. When it came time to move into the public arena, Esther courageously faced what appeared to be two equally dismal options. Mordecai's challenge to her was inescapably bleak: "Do not think that because you are in the king's house you alone of all the Jews will escape. For if you remain silent at this time, will relief and deliverance for the Jews arise from another place?" The implicit answer to that question was no. "You and your father's family will perish. And who knows but that you have come to the royal position for such a time as this?" (Esther 4:13-14). Generally, the first part of Esther 4:14 is translated "If you remain silent at this time, relief and deliverance will arise from another place, but you and your father's family will perish." It is possible, however, to read it as a question that is both preceded and followed by threats of her own demise along with all the other Jews. This suggests that Mordecai's words are not posed as a hopeful expectation of deliverance from somewhere. Instead, the implication was that once Haman discovered that Esther was both Jewish and related to Mordecai, her fate would be a terrible one. Mordecai did not say how he anticipated that Haman might find out that detail or precisely from what “quarter” this treachery might come. Esther’s dilemma was one repeated throughout history; she was hemmed in by circumstances and expected either death as the penalty for breaking the royal law or death at the hands of mob violence. Mordecai’s use of “who knows” in this context is a strong statement that Esther was indeed the Jews’ only hope and that she was brought to this point for this time.

This was the critical moment for Esther, and she chose publicly to identify with her people even at the likely cost of her life. Her strength of character was manifested in her resolve both to defy the king’s law and to confront Haman, the second-most powerful person in the empire. In this pivotal moment she took command, giving orders to Mordecai to mobilize their people. With the knowledge that fasting was an ancient and venerable part of her tradition, Esther called for a corporate and comprehensive fast, thus continuing the communal participation in this crisis that had begun earlier as a response to the edict. This exceeded all mandated fasts for severity: there was to be neither eating nor drinking for three days and nights. It was a radical appeal for God’s intervention. Esther further determined that her young women (who may not have been Jewish) would fast in the same manner along with her. Following that, she would enter into the king’s presence.

Her closing words to Mordecai are telling. In spite of this dramatic corporate appeal for divine mercy, she may have expected it to fail. It was, after all, contrary to the Persian law, whose effects she knew firsthand! Her statement can equally well be translated “When I perish, I perish,” indicating her recognition that death was the likely outcome (Esther 4:16).

2.2.3. Dealing with the “Enemies of the Jews.” Finally, what about the apparently wanton bloodletting at the end of the book, beginning with the death of Haman? To address this question, it is necessary to study the nature of Haman’s treachery in its wider context. When Haman, whom the narrator repeatedly calls “the enemy of the Jews,” initially went to the king to propose their destruction, he kept his charge vague, which was indispensable to gaining the permission that he sought. “There is a certain people dispersed and scattered among the peoples in all the provinces of your kingdom whose customs are different from those of all other people and who do not obey the king’s laws; it is not worthwhile for the king to let them rest” (Esther 3:8). “A certain people” made them sound sinister, in that they were unnamed, and yet they are only “one” and therefore insignificant and dispensable. Haman’s presentation started with the truth; they were indeed a dispersed people and, in some ways, separated. The accusation then moved to a half truth, that they had different customs from those of all other people, and finally to an outright lie, that they did not keep the laws of the king.

Declaring, “It is not worthwhile for the king to let them rest,” Haman proposed a decree as the solution. “If it pleases the king, let a decree be written to annihilate them, and I will put ten thousand talents of silver into the royal treasury for the men who carry out this business” (Esther 3:9). There is a further malevolent facet to Haman’s presentation to the king, and here we must presume that the narrator of the Hebrew text was careful to preserve a significant *word play in the dialogue. Haman may have intentionally played on the similar sounds of ’bd (lē’abbēdām, “to annihilate them”) and ’bd (la’ābādīm, “for slaves”). If so, that would explain his appeal to the value of not allowing this unnamed people to “rest.” It might also provide an interpretive framework for understanding Esther’s reference when she revealed Haman’s treachery at the second banquet to the effect that if they had only been sold into slavery, she would have kept silent (Esther 7:4). And finally, it might explain why the king seemed so entirely obtuse about the decree to which Esther referred. Perhaps he had been led to believe that Haman’s intent was enslavement, when really it was wholesale murder. At any rate, in speaking to the king, this was the only term that Haman used; when the decree was written, with its triple terminology, there was no mistake as to what he meant. “Dispatches were sent by couriers to all the king’s provinces with the order to destroy, kill and annihilate all the Jews— young and old, little children and women—on a single day, the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, the month of Adar, and to plunder their goods” (Esther 3:13). Esther therefore justifiably identified Haman to the king as “this evil Haman” (Esther 7:6).

The specific wording of this original decree is critical for understanding what happened when Mordecai and Esther issued their counter-decree. Once Haman was removed from the scene, the immediate tension subsided, perhaps for several months. Nevertheless, the edict still stood, and it was for that reason that Esther had to make a second and very emotional appeal, falling at the king's feet, weeping (Esther 8:3) and pleading that the original decree of annihilation be revoked. It is important to note that her initial and primary request was the revocation of the decree. When that was refused, other means had to be adopted. In the name of the king, Mordecai issued a decree granting the Jews in every city the right "to assemble and to stand for their lives; to destroy, kill and annihilate any armed force of any nationality or province that might attack them, little children and women, and to plunder their property" (Esther 8:11).

In the prior decree the objects of "to destroy, kill and annihilate" were "all the Jews, from young to old, little children and women." Here, "little children and women" immediately follow "those attacking them," suggesting that the Jews were given permission to kill those in every location who were still intent on carrying out the original decree by attacking them and their families. In light of the irrevocable decree that officially sanctioned their demise, Jewish action was inevitable. The narrative calls the victims of the Jews "enemies" and "those who hated them," noting that they were "men." The verbal pair "to kill" and "to annihilate" recurs in this description of the Jewish attack on their attackers (Esther 9:5, 6, 12) and represents the measured response put precisely in the terms of the decrees. If the five hundred men killed in Susa represented those who had attacked Jews, we might conclude that there was great hostility to Jews right in the capital. Once the bloodshed subsided, the narrative repeatedly emphasizes that the Jews got rest from their enemies (Esther 9:16-18).

Just as the relief is emphasized, so also is the fact that the Jews did not take any plunder from their enemies, even though they were permitted to do so by the measure-for-measure form of the decree. This last detail is stated three times immediately following the number of persons slain (Esther 9:6-10, 15, 16).

3. Lessons from Esther.

Although the central theological notion in Esther is that human devices cannot counteract the sovereign will of God that his chosen people survive, these providential "coincidences," numerous as they are, are lodged in contexts that demand responsible and faithful human choices and action. In the face of apparent divine silence, God's people are compelled to choose between the imperfect alternatives that arise in the real ambiguities of life, just as Esther did. Finally, Esther challenges all readers to consider in what manner God has prepared each of us "for such a time as this."

See also ESTHER 1: BOOK OF; MORDECAI; PURIM; ROYAL COURT; VASHTI; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Baldwin, Esther (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1984); T. K. Beal, The Book of Hiding: Gender, Ethnicity, Annihilation, and Esther (London: Routledge, 1997); S. B. Berg, The Book of Esther: Motifs, Themes and Structure (SBLDS 44; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); A. Berlin, Esther (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2001); J. Berman, "Hadassah Bat Abihail: The Evolution from Object to Subject in the Character of Esther," JBL 120 (2001) 647-69; F. W. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Dallas: Word, 1996); M. V. Fox, Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); B. Grossfeld, The Two Targums of Esther (ArBib 18; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991); L. R. Klein, "Honor and Shame in Esther," in A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susanna, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 7; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 149-75; T. S. Laniak, Shame and Honor in the Book of Esther (SBLDS 165; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1998); J. D. Levenson, Esther (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); M. Simon, trans., Midrash Rabbah: Esther (London: Soncino, 1939); C. A. Moore, ed., Studies in the Book of Esther (New York: KTAV, 1982); L. B. Paton, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Esther (ICC; New York: Scribner, 1908); J. Rosenheim, "Fate and Freedom in the Scroll of Esther," Prooftexts 12 (1992) 125-49; W. H. Shea, "Esther and History," Concordia Journal 13.3 (1987) 234-48; B. D. Walfish, Esther in Medieval Garb: Jewish Interpretation of the Book of Esther in the Middle Ages (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993); J. M. Wiebe, "Esther 4:14: 'Will Relief and Deliverance Arise for the Jews from Another Place?'" CBQ 53 (1991) 409-15; J. S. Wright, "The Historicity of the Book of Esther," in New Perspectives on the Old Testament, ed. J. Barton Payne (Waco, TX: Word, 1970) 37-47; A. S. Yahuda, "The Meaning of the Name Esther," JRAS (1946) 174-78.

E. A. Phillips

ETHICS

When we speak of ethics, we are speaking of relationship—our relationship to God, to our neighbor, and to the world we live in, and the proper conduct of these relationships. The English word ethics is derived from the Greek word ethos, which bears the sense of "conduct" or "practice." The OT does not have a synonymous term. Perhaps the closest relative to this word is mûsâr, which means "discipline" or "teaching" (Kaiser, 2). The term mûsâr is suggestive of an electric fence that shocks cattle, preventing them wandering into dangers such as the edge of a cliff. So this term is more indicative of the warning system of OT ethics than of the day-to-day principles that regulate human behavior. Although it belongs in the category of ethics, it is only one dimension of this field, thus illustrating the observation that the OT has no single term for ethics.

1. Methodology for the Study of Old Testament Ethics
2. Is Old Testament Ethics Normative or Descriptive?
3. The Basis for the Old Testament Ethical System: Creation and Response
4. The Ethics of the Wisdom Literature, Psalms and Writings
5. Social Levels of Wisdom Ethics
6. Conclusion

1. Methodology for the Study of Old Testament Ethics.

Methodology is critical to understanding the Bible, as with any literature. One's approach to the study of OT ethics is crucial, and one method of study will shape the outcome in a way that another might not. The historical-critical method, for example, approaches the biblical text, and thus the study of ethics, through the lens of this methodology. The Wisdom literature, the Prophets and the Pentateuch have their own critical histories, and so their ethics will not look alike. In fact, the historical-critical method has generally viewed the Prophets as representing the highest form of OT ethics. They do not, so the proponents of this method insist, depend so heavily on the Pentateuch, since that portion of the OT was developing only parallel to the Prophets, and only in certain aspects, but did not reach its ethical zenith until the postexilic era. Yet, there is good reason to insist that the Prophets, Wisdom literature and *Psalms, along with much other material of the OT, are premised on the Torah legislation and the "primal events" of Israel's history (Fletcher, 50).

Although B. Childs's canonical method is not ignorant of the results of the historical-critical method, it nevertheless takes more seriously the final form of the literature as we have received it and insists that no study of Scripture is complete until that full dimension of the biblical text has been given its full right to speak. The works of W. C. Kaiser Jr. and C. J. H. Wright fall within this methodology. Generally speaking, this method assumes that there is an underlying unity in the OT that finds its origin in the stories and legislation of the Pentateuch. If we think of the three paradigms of OT faith as Torah, prophecy and wisdom, Torah would form the vertex of the triangle, with prophecy and wisdom being the two flanking sides. That is, the fundamental principles of Israelite religion are laid out in the Torah (see Law), with its stories and laws, while the prophets distill the moral essence of the Torah and make that their primary message. At the same time, the wisdom teachers, especially as represented by the book of *Proverbs, draw upon the language and precepts of Torah to commend their ethical position to their students and community of faith. R. E. Murphy (1978, 39) called this a "shared approach to reality," shared by prophets, priests and *sages alike in varying degrees. This writer assumes that the ethics of the Wisdom literature, Psalms and the Writings is essentially a modification of Torah ethics but still identifiable as Torah.

The book of Proverbs presents the sage's instruction as Torah (Prov 3:1; 4:2; 7:2), as it also presents the teaching of parents (Prov 1:8; 6:20). The book of *Ecclesiastes, breathing a different atmosphere than Proverbs, no longer espouses the view that one must believe because the parents did, with *Qohelet taking the liberty to explore the range of wisdom options and life experiences, only to conclude that the whole duty of humankind is to "fear God and keep his commandments" (Eccles 12:13). The book of *Job, in comparison, is concerned with the relationship between the divine and the human, which Job explores in dialogue with his friends, finally submitting himself to the overwhelming power of the Creator, who speaks out of the whirlwind, chiding Job for his presumptuous spirit. *Song of Songs, despite its strongly sexual tone, raises the age-old issue of the relationship between life and death (Song 8:6) and redraws the primal contrast as one between love and death, declaring that love, unlike life, cannot be cancelled out by death (Murphy 1990, 100-105; Webb, 30-32). The book of Psalms is very different from these four books, for it is an anthology of prayers, hymns and meditations collected over hundreds of years. Yet, remarkably, the book preserves the basic ethical system of the wisdom books and indeed, given Psalm 1 as our clue, is set forth by the final editor as a book of wisdom piety.

2. Is Old Testament Ethics Normative or Descriptive?

Before we proceed further, we should consider the question of whether or not OT ethics has a normative force—that is, applies to all ages and societies. This position stands over against the view that the laws of the Torah are descriptive—that is, are essentially historical information whose prescriptive character was binding only on ancient Israel. For Christians, this question is tied to the issue of the place of the OT in the Christian faith. This has been a hotly debated topic through the centuries, and the church's position generally has been to separate the moral and ritual laws and to designate the moral laws as normative and the ritual laws as descriptive. This approach is basically valid, but we do have to answer the question, as R. Wilson (65) has insisted, of why Christians do not accept certain laws, such as the laws that prescribe the execution of heretics (Deut 13) or the annihilation of one's enemies (Deut 20), both of which seem to have a moral rather than a ritual thrust. The distinction that Christians traditionally have made is derived in large part from the NT ethic of love as taught by Jesus: we are to love our enemies and turn the other cheek to our abusers (Luke 6:27-31). Yet this law of love is derived from the OT itself, for Israel was directed to love the Lord with their whole being (Deut 6:5) and to love their neighbors as themselves (Lev 19:18). In fact, OT ethics endorsed a broad range of behavior, extending all the way from "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" (Exod 21:24 [the law of retaliation]) to the law of loving God with all one's heart and loving one's neighbor as oneself. Although Christians have to some extent embraced the full range of this ethical system, Jesus emphasized the upper end of the OT ethical range (Mk 12:28-31) and de-emphasized the lower range by commanding love for one's enemies (Mt 5:43-46). By that authority, Christians have tended, at least in the modern era, not to execute heretics and not to annihilate their enemies.

3. The Basis for the Old Testament Ethical System: Creation and Response.

The ethical system of the OT is not laid out in systematic form; rather it is found in various dimensions of the Hebrew Bible, beginning with creation itself. Two concepts in the book of Genesis lay the foundation for OT ethics.

3.1. God's Image. The first concept is God's creation of humanity in his own image (Gen 1:26-27). Initially, the Creator put his stamp, his own image and likeness, upon the human person, so that Israel and all humanity to follow could never deny that the creation had a direct relationship to the Creator. Forever God had stamped upon humanity the personal pronoun mine, but Adam and Eve tried to erase the divine claim and replace it with their own possessive pronoun, ours. OT ethics is the system of human behavior that regulates the human-to-divine and human-to-human relationships, whose object is to reestablish God's claims on his creation.

3.2. God's Goodness. The second concept is the idea of God's goodness. Standing behind the creation story of Genesis 1 is the repeated declaration about creation that "God saw that it was good" (Gen 1:4, 10, 12, 18, 21, 25). This declaration points in the direction of, and climaxes with, the consummate "and behold, it was very good" (Gen 1:31). The idea of "good" in Genesis 1 had not yet flowered into the virtue of "goodness," but the Supreme Good, as W. Bruce (18) calls it, has already become the foundation of OT ethics because the creation narrative reveals the basic character of God, who is good, and who declared his creation to be good, a reflection of his own character.

This idea of "good" occurs in company with that of "evil" in Genesis 2—3, when the Lord God commanded Adam not to eat of the tree of "the knowledge of good and evil." Space here does not permit a discussion of the nature of that knowledge, but we can note that "good" was paired with “evil,” drawing out the notion of a contrast between the two. The point is that the “good” of Genesis 1 is not lost as the story of the generic created order opens out into the creation of individuals (Gen 2) and their subsequent fall (Gen 3); rather, the introduction of the “good” in Genesis 1 is followed by its pairing with “evil” in Genesis 2—3, thus setting the stage for an ethic that is distinguished by good and evil. Admittedly, the problem of good and evil is not treated in any systematic way in the OT. The book of Job is the closest that the Hebrew Scriptures come to such a treatment, and it is far from being a systematic one. In fact, the theological thrust of Job is much more in the direction of Job’s relationship to God, and thus the human-divine relationship, than of the problem of good and evil.

Deuteronomy sets forth the same set of choices between good and evil, associating good with life, and evil with death, precisely the associations of the Genesis account. When Deuteronomy introduces this dual concept, it is not coincidental that Moses describes the innocence of childhood as an absence of the knowledge of good and evil (Deut 1:34). Nor is it by chance that the land of Canaan is designated the “good” land, just as God called his creation “good” (e.g., Deut 1:25, 35; 3:25). Canaan was, in Deuteronomic terms, a reclaimed Eden.

The assumption of the Genesis text is that God is good, but the first time that the text informs us that God himself knew good and evil is after the fall (Gen 3:22). Yet Adam and Eve, once they had acquired this treasured knowledge, did not know good and evil as God did; rather, theirs was a distorted knowledge acquired from the vantage point of disobedience. From that point on, the OT seeks to introduce a corrective into the divine-human relationship, a corrective that could result only from obedience to God’s commandments because the problem arose from the violation of the divine command. God’s knowledge of good and evil, perfect and undistorted, set the stage for future revelation of the nature of sin and its corrective, redemption. Obedience becomes the means of implementing the corrective, but the story of redemption is far wider and more complex than the matter of obedience to God’s laws. The factor of grace both surrounds the theme of obedience and augments it. That is to say, once human beings have obeyed God’s commands, it is only divine grace that puts the stamp of acceptance on their response, and, beyond that, human obedience falls short of meriting the divine blessing, which is nothing more than a gift of grace.

3.3. Obedience as Ethical Response. Actually, the concept of redemption as such does not occur in the Wisdom literature (Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs and some psalms), which is a quandary in itself. Yet, it may very well be that wisdom as a religious paradigm attempted to reclaim creation from the nature religions of Israel’s world and, in so doing, shifted creation into the place of redemption. That is not to suggest that redemption as a function of the divine will was lost. In fact, it was preserved in the human function of obedience to the divine laws and in the ethical healing effect that this obedience had on the divine-human relationship. Thus wisdom presents us with a theological paradigm in which creation, rather than redemption (as in the case of the Pentateuch and the Prophets), has become the central feature of God’s self-revelation. Yet creation was in itself revelatory, and in the natural order one was to see and again acknowledge God’s claims on the world. Although not the same as redemption, it had a redeeming quality.

The idea of a good creation, with the consummate “It was very good,” modulates in the Genesis narrative into the idea of obedience. The elemental nature of the fall narrative lies at the base of OT ethics. The first law was God’s command not to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, in which the notion of good begins to take shape and assume its place as the opposite of evil. Even though the meaning of these two terms is not explicated in the narrative, the text implies that “good” was associated with the Creator, who brought a good world into existence and formed humankind in his own image before he distinguished the creation as “very good.” From that point on, at least up through the Abraham narrative, the virtue of obedience became the criterion by which the character of the major actors was measured. Childs (204-21) titles his discussion of ethics “The Shape of the Obedient Life.” In obedience to God’s command, “Noah did this; he did all that God commanded him” (Gen 6:22; cf. Gen 7:5, 9, 16). The narrative about Babel again shows humanity’s attempt to erase the divine “mine” and replace it with the human claim “ours” (“Come, let us build ourselves a city, and a tower with its top in the heavens, and let us make a name for ourselves" [Gen 11:4]). Of significance is the recurrence of the divine plural "Let us go down" (cf. "Let us make man in our image" [Gen 1:26]), which signals God in his eternal fullness, whether we understand it as a trinitarian plural or otherwise. In both instances the action that this plural signifies was of monumental importance and, like the Noah account, is followed by another narrative of obedience, the story of Abraham: "So Abram went, as the LORD had told him" (Gen 12:4). The narrative of obedience is further sustained in the covenant of circumcision: "Then Abraham took his son Ishmael and all the slaves born in his house or bought with his money, every male among the men of Abraham's house, and he circumcised the flesh of their foreskins that very day, as God had said to him (Gen 17:23 NRSV [italics added]).

In Genesis 18 the Lord introduced a question that divulged the spiritual stature of Abraham: "Shall I hide from Abraham what I am about to do, seeing that Abraham shall become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him?" (Gen 18:17 NRSV). The Lord's answer to the question disclosed the role that Abraham was to play in the ethical life of Israel: "No, for I have chosen him, that he may charge [šwh] his children and his household after him to keep [šmr] the way of the LORD by doing righteousness and justice; so that the LORD may bring about for Abraham what he has promised him" (Gen 18:19 NRSV).

The patriarch was to teach his children and household the ethical ways of life, in the writer's words, "the way of the LORD by doing righteousness and justice." This story naturally continues in the birth of Isaac, with Abraham as the model and the agent of obedience: "And Abraham circumcised his son Isaac when he was eight days old, as God had commanded him (Gen 21:4 NRSV [italics added]). The narrator installs the capstone of the theme in Genesis 26:5, when he declares that: "Abraham obeyed [šm'] my voice and kept [šmr] my charge [also from šmr], my commandments [from verbal root šwh, 'command'], my statutes, and my laws" (Gen 26:5 NRSV).

The task of humanity, as the author states it in Genesis 2:15, is "The LORD God took the man and put him in the garden of Eden to till it and keep [šmr] it." The verb šmr has changed, from "keeping" the garden to "obeying" God, both ideas expressed by the same word. For Abraham, it is no longer maintaining what was committed to mankind—keeping the garden—rather the charge has become communicating the ethical demands of God to future generations. Therefore, before the Lord formally gave the law to Israel on Sinai, Abraham was already the model of the law-keeper in his life of obedience, in contrast to Adam and Eve.

These narratives of obedience lay the foundation for the law that follows in the Torah, law that called for obedience, which was the positive response to the good God, both creator and law-giver. When Moses set the words of the law before Israel at Sinai in the form of the so-called Covenant Code (Ex 20:22–23:33), the people ratified it with words that resonate with the Noahic and Abrahamic response of obedience: "All that the LORD has spoken we will do and we will be obedient" (Ex 24:7; also Ex 19:8).

Although the Torah narrative does not consciously lay out the foundation of the OT ethical system, the pattern is nevertheless woven into the fabric of the narrative as an intermittent color, and when we look at the narrative landscape, we see the obedience theme as part of the color scheme. Thus the Torah relates the story of Israel's beginnings as a history of obedience to God and his laws.

4. The Ethics of the Wisdom Literature, Psalms and Writings.

The Wisdom literature, Psalms and Writings are a diverse collection of books. The remainder of this article deals largely with the Wisdom literature, under the assumption that wisdom in its preexilic and postexilic forms essentially represented the ethical norm of Israel's faith, stripped of the ritual trappings of Mosaic faith and of the covenantal language of the prophets. Yet the proponents of wisdom did not abandon ritual or covenant. Although those were not the frontispiece of faith, they did not detract from the ethical core of Israel's faith. Wisdom was a religious paradigm that put forth the essential elements of Mosaic religion, not abolishing them altogether but rather setting forth their moral essence. Thus the cultic system became less important than the ethical meaning that stood behind it, in much the same way as the prophets understood the sacrificial system (Mic 6:8). The prophets did not eliminate it but rather put forward its ethical meaning.

4.1. Proverbs as the Ethical Norm. A case can be made for viewing the book of Proverbs as the book that sets forth the ethical norm of Israelite faith, particularly as the wisdom thinkers wanted to present it. Hezekiah's part in one stage of its editing was no accident but rather most likely was an intentional effort to provide an ethical norm for reformation and renewal. Although Proverbs does not parade the covenantal frame of the faith, it is not unaware of it. This is evidenced in the fact that Proverbs overwhelmingly employs the covenant name for God, "YHWH" (87x), suggesting that the thought of Proverbs belongs in the theological category of Mosaic religion (Waltke, 44-45). In addition to this observation, the doctrine of *creation occurs numerous times, distributed quite consistently in the various collections (Waltke, 68):

Collection 1	3:19-20; 8:22-31
(Prov 1—9)
Collection 2	14:31; 16:11; 17:5;
(Prov 10:1—22:16)	20:12; 22:2
Collection 3	29:13
(Prov 25—29)
Collection 4	30:2-4
(Prov 30—31)

In fact, the ethical system of Proverbs cannot be understood without a knowledge of creation: "The LORD by wisdom founded the earth; by understanding he established the heavens; by his knowledge the deeps broke open, and the clouds drop down the dew (Prov 3:19-20 NRSV).

This same theme is played out again in Proverbs 8 when Wisdom revealed that the Lord possessed her at the beginning of his work. The announcement of wisdom in Proverbs 8, however, is more an announcement of her presence at creation—thus implying her authority (Waltke, 69)—than a declaration of instrumental creation. While John refers to the Word rather than wisdom, he combines these two truths in his prologue, the instrumental nature of the Word and its presence in creation: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God [presence], and the Word was God. He was in the beginning with God [presence]; all things were made through him, and without him was not anything made that was made [instrumental]" (John 1:1 NRSV).

4.2. The Central Moral Virtues: Righteousness, Justice, Equity. The introduction to Proverbs

(Prov 1:1-7) lays out for consideration several ethical terms for the moral virtues. W. Brown (25) understands these virtues to fall into systematic categories, giving a *chiastic center with the "moral, communal virtues" as the nuclear focus ("righteousness, justice, and equity" [Prov 1:3b ESV]):

- A Intellectual values: wisdom and instruction (v. 2a)
- B Literary wisdom: insight (v. 2b)
- C Instrumental virtue: wise dealing (v. 3a)
-
- D Communal Virtues: righteousness, justice, equity (v. 3b)
-
- C' Instrumental virtues: prudence, knowledge, discretion, listening, guidance (vv. 4-5)
- B' Literary wisdom: proverbs, sayings, words of the wise, riddles (v. 6)
- A' Intellectual virtue: fear of the Lord (v. 7)

Some may disagree with Brown's categories, but the text does tend to thrust the communal virtues of "righteousness, justice, and equity" to the center of the ethical system. That judgment is verified when the teacher of Proverbs 2, after having instructed his students in the way of wisdom, summarily concludes, "Then you will understand righteousness and justice and equity, every good path" (Prov 2:9 ESV).

4.2.1. Righteousness. The use of the first word, *"righteousness" (sedeq), to describe accurate weights (Lev 19:36), suggests that the term, in its most basic meaning, refers to a standard by which other weights were judged to be accurate or inaccurate, a notion that Proverbs affirms (Prov 11:1; 16:11). This primary meaning transfers naturally to moral conduct, both of the individual and the community. Modeled by the Creator himself, this is the standard by which the individual and community are judged (Ps 35:24). It is not an arbitrary standard but rather is one that is foundational to God's own being: "Righteousness and justice are the foundation of your throne." Ethics reflects God's character. This truth is emphasized in the Torah when the Lord instructs the Israelites to conduct their lives in accordance with his character: "Be holy, for I am holy" (e.g., Lev 11:44). Nor is it an impersonal measurement, for "steadfast love and faithfulness go before you" (Ps 89:14). God holds individuals and Israel alike to a standard of conduct, yet that standard is established and maintained by a strong measure of grace, intended for the welfare and betterment of human society and humanity's relationship to the Lord.

Actually, one cannot separate individual and community ethics. The individual ethic feeds into the community and builds its character, while the community ethic supports and undergirds the individual ethic. The OT knows a very delicate balance between individual and corporate identities. They blend into each other, and one validates the other. They do not exist independently.

4.2.2. Justice. The second term, justice (mīšpāṭ), belongs to the legal vocabulary of the OT, though not exclusively. Both the verb (spt) and the noun refer to an action that restores the order of a community (Liedke, 1393). In the relative sense of these terms, justice is what must be done in a given situation to restore and assure conformity to righteousness (šedeq, šēdāqā). Although we should not overstate the case, justice has an action nuance compared to the more stative nuance of righteousness (Wright, 256-57). Thus these two terms often pair up to express the idea of "social justice" (Ps 72:2), even taking the dual concept to its source at the throne of God (Ps 97:5) and attributing to this duality an interactive force in the individual's life: "I put on righteousness [šedeq], and it put on me; my justice [mīšpāṭ] was like a robe and a turban" (Job 29:14 [my translation]).

This manner of individual and community conduct produces a state of order in accordance with the Creator's will. Human society, in terms of the Wisdom literature and Psalms, was to reflect the order of creation. In reference to Psalm 146:4, W. Brueggemann (155) comments that God's creation "has a specific ethical commitment and bias, against the 'plans' of the wicked, who attempt to utilize the power of creation for their own destructive ends." The standard of maintenance of this world is righteousness.

4.2.3. Equity. The third major term of the central ethical system set forth in Proverbs is "equity" (mēšarīm or yēšarīm), a word that bears the sense of "straight" (from yāšār), often applied to speech (Prov 8:6), and sometimes used almost synonymously with righteousness (Ps 9:9). God's words and commands are "straight," or they are "upright," characterized by integrity

(Ps 19:9), and the Lord judges the nations with equity (Ps 9:9; 96:10; 98:9). The mode by which God judges the world is the same one that regulates the conduct of the human community (Prov 1:3; 2:9; 8:6, 9).

4.3. The Fear of the Lord Incarnate. The summary statement of ethical behavior is contained in the phrase "the fear of the LORD" (Prov 1:7; 9:10). Brown (28) calls this the "external contours of ethical character" and observes that "the 'fear' of God deals fundamentally with the heart and center of character, namely the position of the person in relation to God."

4.3.1. Job. An "incarnation" of this person who fears the Lord occurs in Job 31, where Job's self-confession contours the spiritual disposition of the righteous individual. The prologue had described Job as a man who was "blameless and upright [yāšār, related to mēšarīm], one who feared God and turned away from evil" (Job 1:1, 8; 2:3). Then the climactic moment in the dialogue comes when Job announces that God (not humans) knows the way to wisdom, and he is not only the Creator of the world but also the one who defines wisdom itself and, on this occasion, defines it in the same terms that he has used to describe his servant Job in the prologue (Job 1:1): "And [God] said to man, 'Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to turn away from evil is understanding'" (Job 28:28 ESV). By dramatic irony, the reader knows that God is describing his servant Job, to the dismay of Job's friends, and even more important is the fact that this is the only point in the dialogue where we hear the Lord's voice, thus signaling its importance.

The fear of God, then, is a disposition that involves a moral commitment that causes one to shun evil. This divine affirmation of Job's wisdom and thus his character in the poem on wisdom is underscored by Job's own confession in Job 31 of his righteous life. Here, at the end of the dialogue, in order to establish his innocence, Job takes not one oath, but several, to set securely his righteousness before God. The outline of this profile presents the reader with that of the righteous person. Job's relationship to his fellow human beings is largely the subject of this profile: *women (Job 31:1-12), slaves (Job 31:13-15), the poor (Job 31:16-23) and his enemies (Job 31:29-30). Quite significantly, however, he deals with his attitude toward wealth (Job 31:23-24), the power source of much social injustice in ancient times (as well as modern), and the troublesome issue of idolatry (Job 31:26-28), which would have been the most flagrant violation of the OT ethical code, verbalized in the first commandment (Ex 20:3).

Job's oath to establish his innocence toward women—he had not committed adultery (Job 31:1-12)—includes not only the denial of the act itself (Job 31:9) but also of the mental violation of other women (Job 31:1), in keeping with the tenth commandment (Ex 20:17). The ethical principles of Proverbs demand that the patrons of wisdom abstain from adultery (Prov 5; 6:20-35; 7), quite in keeping with Job's understanding of its seriousness, even though Proverbs may be more concerned with the effect of adulterous behavior on society, whereas Job's concern was God's own view of his personal righteousness (Job 31:4).

Job's treatment of his slaves stemmed from his conviction that the same God had made them both (Job 31:15)—a high ethic, to be sure. No less elevated in the ethical system was the view that his treatment of the poor arose from a compassionate conviction that he should treat them as if he were their father or mother (Job 31:18). Not surprisingly, the psalmist, as often was the case, shared the ethics of wisdom and depicted the Lord as the father of the fatherless and the protector of widows (Ps 68:5). This comes close, suggests G. Fohrer (15), to the commandment "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev 19:18). The proverbs of *Solomon lay out the view that kindness to the poor is equivalent to honoring God (Prov 14:31), and lending to the poor is lending to the Lord (Prov 19:17), an idea also attested by the psalmist (Ps 41:1).

Perhaps most impressive of all is Job's attitude anticipating Jesus' teaching regarding moral posture toward enemies: we should love our enemies and pray for them (Mt 5:43-48). Although Job asserts that he did not rejoice when his enemies fell into trouble (Job 31:29-30), there is still a difference between Job's position and Jesus' teaching, but Job is definitely looking ahead in Jesus' direction.

When we look at this portrait of the righteous man in Job 31, we must confess that, as Fohrer says, Job "stands almost alone upon an ethical summit" (Fohrer, 19). His ethics was cut from the fabric of wisdom teaching, and that teaching was probably more orthodox and normative in the late preexilic and postexilic eras than frequently recognized.

4.3.2. The Excellent Wife. In addition to the general description of those individuals who portray the ethical conduct prescribed by Proverbs, this book also incarnates that person who fears the Lord in the "excellent wife" (Prov 31:10-31). Using the literary form of an *acrostic poem, the poet proceeds through the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, exhausting all twenty-two letters to symbolize a full and complete description of the wise woman, who is synonymous with the "righteous" woman. As such a person, the practical activities of her life verify her spiritual status. Compared to Job 31, hers is a much more practical wisdom, although that is not to be viewed in any disparaging way. This woman is the paragon of "the helper fit for him," the original description of Adam's complement (Gen. 1:18 RSV). She inspires trust in her husband (Prov 31:15), has the best intentions to do good and not harm (Prov 31:12), is diligent in her labor and business dealings (Prov 31:13-18), provides for her maidens (Prov 31:15 [cf. Job 31:13-15]), gives to the poor (Prov 31:20 [cf. Job 31:16-23]), and kindly teaches wisdom (Prov 31:26). Her works praise her in the gate of the city (Prov 31:31). In summary, she turns the commands of wisdom into a beatitude (Prov 31:28) (Brown, 38).

5. The Social Levels of Wisdom Ethics.

Wisdom ethics can be viewed on the level of the individual, the community and the court. Proverbs is a mixture of all three ranks of the social order and the ethical system that regulates them. At one stage of the social ladder, the individual is commanded to keep wisdom's teachings ("My son" [e.g., Prov 2:1; 3:1]), and at another, the community is the object of wisdom's commands ("Hear, sons" [Prov 4:1]). We might say that wisdom sought to change the society from the bottom up, from the individual to the community. The prophets had sought to change it from the top down, from the community/nation to the individual. The two perspectives are complementary. At the higher end of the social spectrum, however, were the king and his *royal court. Despite the power of kings, Wisdom would have them know that they reign only by her authority and sanction (Prov 8:15-16). Their throne, like God's, is established by righteousness (Prov 16:12), and their court is distinguished by right speech (Prov 16:13). Laying aside ethical concerns for a moment, one must pay attention to the sheer authority and power of kings and seek their favor (Prov 16:14-15). In addition to Solomon's imprimatur on Proverbs, Hezekiah added his own contribution (Prov 25:1), exercising his prerogative as king to "search things out" (Prov 25:2). But one cannot expect to turn the searchlight upon the king himself and figure him out, for his heart is not subject to human searching in the same way as one would search out ideas (Prov 25:3). He must be kept at an awesome distance. Yet, the simple principle by which a king secures his court is to remove the undermining elements of evil so that his throne will be established in righteousness (Prov 25:4-5). In view of his power, all the king's subjects should approach him not presumptuously but rather humbly, and if they are worthy, he will elevate them (Prov 25:6-7).

6. Conclusion.

Although the motif of obedience to God's commands is not an explicit theme throughout the Wisdom literature, wisdom's teachings are premised upon it. I have suggested that obedient response to wisdom's instruction is none other than an adaptation of the legal system of the Torah, with its ethical claims in the forefront. This response, laid out in the opening chapters of the Torah, underwrites the entirety of wisdom ethics or any other ethical representations of the OT. It is premised upon the nature of the God whose demands, first revealed in Scripture as putting his imprimatur of goodness on the world that he created. So God's subjects should obey his commandments because he is good.

See also CREATION THEOLOGY; KINSMAN-REDEEMER AND LEVIRATE; LAW; MARRIAGE AND SEX; RIGHTEOUSNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barton, Understanding Old Testament Ethics (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2003); W. P. Brown, Character in Crisis: A Fresh Approach to the Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); W. S. Bruce, The Ethics of the Old Testament (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1895); W. Brueggemann, Theology of the Old Testament: Testimony, Dispute, Advocacy (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997); B. S. Childs, Old Testament Theology in a Canonical Context (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989); V. H. Fletcher, "The Shape of Old Testament Ethics," SJT 24 (1971) 47-73; G. Fohrer, "The Righteous Man in Job 31," in Essays in Old Testament Ethics: J. Philip Hyatt, in Memoriam, ed. J. L. Crenshaw and J. T. Willis (New York: KTAV, 1974) 1-22; W. C. Kaiser Jr., Toward Old Testament Ethics (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1983); G. Liedke, "שָׁפֵט spt, to judge" TLOT 3.1392-99; R. E. Murphy, Song of Songs (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); idem, "Wisdom—Theses and Hypotheses," in Israelite Wisdom: Theological and Literary Essays in Honor of Samuel Terrien, ed. J. G. Gammie et al. (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978) 35-42; E. Otto, Theologische Ethik des Alten Testaments (TW 3/2; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1994); idem, "Of Aims and Methods in Hebrew Bible Ethics," Semeia 66 (2004) 161-72; B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1—15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); B. G. Webb, Five Festal Garments (NSBT; Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2000); R. R. Wilson, "Sources and Methods in the Study of Ancient Israelite Ethics," in Canon, Theology, and Old Testament Interpretation: Essays in Honor of Brevard S. Childs, ed. G. M. Tucker, D. L. Petersen and R. R. Wilson (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988) 62-74; C. J. H. Wright, Old Testament Ethics for the People of God (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004).

C. H. Bullock

EVIL. See THEODICY.

EXILE. See ESTHER 1: BOOK OF.

EXPERIENTIAL INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS.

F

FEAR OF THE LORD

The fear of God/Yahweh is a major theme in the Psalms and Wisdom literature, but it is not found in the other books considered in this volume. It is also found in the Torah (e.g., Ex 9:30; 18:21; Deut 2:25; 5:29), the Historical Books (e.g., 1 Sam 12:14, 24) and the Prophets (e.g., Is 8:13; Jer 5:22, 24; Mic 6:9).

1. Terminology
2. Proverbs
3. Job
4. Ecclesiastes
5. Psalms
6. Conclusion

1. Terminology.

The Hebrew term for fear typically used in the expression “fear of God/Yahweh” is yir’at, from the verb yr’. W. Van Pelt and W. Kaiser (NIDOTTE 2.527-33) indicate that the word has a semantic range that runs from respect to horror. It is difficult to determine the exact English equivalent to this word in the phrase. In most occurrences the “fear of God” is a virtue that is encouraged and leads to right behavior and good results. In some occurrences the “fear of God” is negative (see below on Ecclesiastes as well as reference to the Historical Books there). Thus it is potentially misleading to say that yir’at always means “fear” or “respect.” But even in its positive use (such as Prov 1:7), there is a debate as to whether it means “respect” or “fear.” It may be that the word falls somewhere in between these two English words. “Respect” may not do justice to the gravity of the word, though “fear” may connote an unhealthy dread. Still, the object of fear is the Creator of all, the one who is sovereign over his creation. Those who experience fear in his presence know their rightful place in the universe. An English word that may be a candidate for translation is “awe,” understood as veneration of the sacred. With this definition we come close to an understanding of *worship, which van Pelt and Kaiser believe is appropriate for yir’at with God or Yahweh as its object.

The verb paḥad and its nominal form can also be used with God as object. Many translations render both paḥad and yr’ as fear, thus obscuring any difference between the two. It is true that paḥad yhw/’ēlōhīm is found more often in negative contexts, particularly referring to the kind of dread that God’s enemies experience in holy war or in the context of (potential) judgment on Israelites (1 Sam 11:7; 2 Chron 17:10; 20:29). Even so, it can be used in the sense of a virtue like yir’at yhw/’ēlōhīm (2 Chron 19:7, and the epithet “Fear of Isaac” [Gen 31:42, 53]). It occurs in this sense in our literature in Psalm 36:2; 119:120 and Proverbs 28:14. In the following discussion we will not differentiate between paḥad and yir’at yhw/’ēlōhīm since there is not a significant (or at least discernible) difference in meaning.

2. Proverbs.

“Fear of the Lord” is a fundamental theological idea in the book of Proverbs (Longman 2006, 57-58, 100-104). According to Proverbs 1:2, the purpose of the book is to teach the reader “wisdom and discipline.” As one can see in chapters 10–31 (which contains most of the actual proverbs), wisdom is a practical category, a kind of skill in living. The proverbs are pithy observations, admonitions and prohibitions that advocate certain behavior that the book defines as wise, and discourages other behavior (often the opposite) that it calls foolish. For instance, Proverbs 10:4 states: “A slack palm makes poverty; a determined hand makes rich,” the former behavior is *folly and the latter is wise. Such proverbs seem devoid of theological content, but this is true only if they are read outside of the context of the entire book.

The preface (Prov 1:1-7) concludes with perhaps the book's most memorable statement:

The fear of Yahweh is the beginning of knowledge,
but fools despise wisdom and discipline.
(Prov 1:7)

The preface of the book gives way to a series of speeches, mostly of a father to his son, but occasionally of a woman named Wisdom to all the men who are passing by her mountaintop house (see Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly). Chapters 1–9 form a unit that introduces the proverbs of chapters 10–31. As a matter of fact, they provide a kind of lens through which the individual proverbs in those latter chapters should be read. It is interesting that we find the teaching about the “fear of Yahweh” being the “beginning of knowledge” not only at the beginning of this first part of the book but also at the end, thus forming an inclusio* (Prov 9:10, though here “wisdom” [hokmā] is used rather than “knowledge” [dāʿat]). The phrase is also found in Proverbs 1:29; 2:5; 3:7; 8:13, as well as Proverbs 10:27; 14:2, 26, 27; 15:16, 33; 16:6; 19:23; 22:4; 23:17; 24:21; 28:14; 29:25; 31:30.

But what does it mean that the fear of Yahweh is the beginning of knowledge/wisdom? We have already discussed the difficulty of giving a precise English equivalent to fear in this context, though the basic premise seems to be that to fear Yahweh is to stand in a subservient position to him, to acknowledge one's dependence on him. In this it seems to be the opposite of being “wise in one's own eyes,” a point that is made explicitly in Proverbs 3:7. (“Don't be wise in your own eyes. Fear Yahweh and turn away from evil.”) Thus it is appropriate to think that proper fear of Yahweh leads to humility and an avoidance of pride, an attitude frequently advocated in Proverbs (Prov 3:5; 6:17; 11:2; 15:25, 33 [in context with “fear of Yahweh”]; Prov 16:5, 18, 19; 18:12; 21:4, 24; 22:4 [again, with “fear of Yahweh”]; Prov 25:5-6, 27; 26:12; 29:23; 30:1-4, 13).

But what does it mean that such an attitude is the “beginning” of wisdom? The word “beginning” (reʾšit) has the sense not only of “first” but also of “foundation” or even “source.” It may not be stretching the concept too far to think of the beginning of wisdom functioning as a presupposition or preunderstanding. It is the first thought that makes all other thoughts fall into place. As M. L. Barre (41) states it, “Fear of Yahweh . . . is the first step—‘square one’—in the quest for a meaningful existence.” Proverbs does not try to prove the existence of God; it rather presents God's existence as a presupposition that is manifest in its history and nature.

Note that such a claim means that there can be no wisdom/knowledge apart from a relationship with God. Wisdom begins not by accumulating facts, but by having a relationship with God. On one level, from the viewpoint of Proverbs (and the rest of the Bible), this makes perfect sense. How could someone be considered wise if they do not know the most basic and important thing about the universe? Thinking about life begins with the acknowledgment that God is at the center of the universe, not humans (“wise in our own eyes”). Such a perspective also means that one listens to God about how to live life. (For instance, in the words of Proverbs, God's words are presented as coming from the mouth of the father.) One thinks of the Garden of Eden and the choice that Adam and Eve made to reject divine instruction (“Do not eat of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.”), but under the influence of the “shrewd” (wisdom gone wrong) serpent to replace the divine instruction with their own assertion of what is right and wrong (Gen 3).

If “the beginning of wisdom is the fear of Yahweh,” does that mean that those who do not worship Yahweh have no contribution to make? To judge by the number of times Proverbs seems to utilize the wisdom traditions of other cultures (Egypt and Mesopotamia) (see Proverbs 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background), it seems that the Israelite sages do think they have something to offer, though it is hard to think that they would judge an Egyptian sage, even one from whom they have gained some helpful insight about life, as really wise, since they worshiped false gods. Israelite sages might have chalked up their insight to no more than an ability to express some rhythm of creation into a memorable saying, though they did not discard their insight because of their pagan beliefs. Even so, they adapted it to a Yahwistic framework.

Furthermore, notice that this phrase's insistence that wisdom begins with a relationship with God demonstrates that the very concept is theological and not just practical. In other words, Proverbs 10:4 (quoted above) is giving more than advice about how to avoid poverty. By implying that hard work is wise and laziness is foolish, it is saying that those who work hard are acting like proper worshipers of Yahweh, and those who are lazy are not.

The “fear of the Lord” is thus the beginning of wisdom and sometimes functions as a close synonym of wisdom. Both are connected to ethical behavior. Woman Wisdom herself proclaims: “Those who fear Yahweh hate evil, pride and arrogance, and the path of evil. I hate a perverse mouth” (Prov 8:13; see also Prov 14:2; 16:6; 23:17; 24:21). As such, fear of Yahweh also leads to reward (“The reward of humility, the fear of Yahweh, is wealth, honor, life” [Prov 22:4; see also Prov 10:27; 14:27; 19:23]).

3. Job.

The book of Proverbs advocates the fear of God as the starting point for wisdom, and associates blessings in life with the way of wisdom. The book of Job opens with a description of the protagonist as the epitome of the wise man. The very first verse of the book says: “There was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job, and that man was innocent and virtuous, fearing God [yārē ‘ēlōhim] and turning away from evil.” Accordingly, he enjoys the good things of life, wealth and a big, happy family” (Job 1:2-3). This assessment of Job’s character is expressed not only here by the narrator but also by God himself (Job 1:8; 2:3). It is even shared by the Accuser (haššāṭān) (see Satan). However, the latter wonders about Job’s motivation. On the one hand, it leads him to be particularly careful in his piety, offering sacrifices “just in case” (Job 1:5), but the Accuser suspects that he does that out of self-interest. In Job 1:9 he wonders out loud before God: “Is it for no good reason that Job fears God?” Thus God permits the Accuser to remove the blessings to see whether he will remain steadfast in his fear of God. Indeed, Job passes the two tests (Job 1:22; 2:10).

However, as his suffering continues for a period of time beyond the tests, Job grows impatient. After seven days and in the presence of his three friends, Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar, Job curses the day of his birth in a heart-rending complaint. This complaint propels the three friends into a defense of God based on classic *retribution theology in a three-cycle debate that extends from Job 4 to Job 27.

The fear of the Lord comes up several times in the context of the debate. In Eliphaz’s first speech, he is relatively respectful of Job’s previous piety but shocked at this complaining outburst. He thus prods him by saying, “Is not your ‘fear’ your comfort? Is not the innocence of your ways your hope?” (Job 4:6). Here the comforting fear is the fear of Yahweh, which if he has, so Eliphaz implies, will lead to his ultimate restoration. In his response to this speech, Job counters by charging his friend with treason of their friendship by saying, “A despairing man should have the devotion of his friends, even though he forsakes the fear of the Almighty” (Job 6:14). Job does not admit to so forsaking the fear of Yahweh, but he is saying that even in such a situation friends should stay devoted. They think he has betrayed Yahweh and use that to justify their attack. Job says that even if this were the case, they should remain loyal.

The next time Job refers to fear of God it is in the negative sense of terror (not unprecedented elsewhere, see Ecclesiastes). He wants to talk to God, to set him straight. Job, after all, also holds to the belief that only sinners should suffer. He knows he is innocent, so God must be unjust (Job 9:21-24). He wishes he had an arbitrator or mediator to lessen his “fear of God,” so he can stand up to him.

Eliphaz next comes back to the theme of the “fear of God” in his second speech (Job 15:4). Here he castigates Job’s wisdom. He suggests that his arguments undermine “fear of God.” Next, it is again Eliphaz, this time in his third speech, who raises the issue of the fear of God. He ridicules Job’s claim of piety by mockingly asking him, “Is it for your fear that he reproves you?” (Job 22:4).

In the disputations, when “fear of Yahweh” is used positively as a virtue, it is used by one of the three friends, usually Eliphaz, to question Job’s proper attitude toward God. Of course, readers of the book know what the characters of the book do not. Job does not suffer because of a lack of fear of God. Ironically, Elihu, the brash young man who comes in after the debate with the three friends, tries to prod Job to a proper fear of God, which he thinks he lacks, by emphasizing God’s greatness and power (Job 37:24).

Though the expression “fear of God” does not appear in the Yahweh speeches or in Job's response to them, we certainly can understand the effect of these speeches as inducing such fear. In Job 38—42 God confronts Job—not because of a sin that led to his suffering but because of his growing impatience with God—with his wisdom and power, and reduces Job to his knees. Here we see Job regain a sense of the fear of God.

In this survey of the theme of the fear of God in the book of Job, we have intentionally passed over its most famous use in Job 28. We have done this because the question of this chapter's place in the book is a serious question. In terms of its content, it is a magnificent assertion of God's wisdom. Human beings can do marvelous things like mine the earth for precious gems and metals. But wisdom is beyond them. The last lines of the poem answer the question of the location of wisdom: "The fear of the Lord—that is wisdom, and to shun evil is understanding" (Job 28:28).

The issue has to do with the location of Job's speech. It occurs at the end of the disputation but is followed by Job's further protestation of innocence and complaint (Job 29—31). Job 28 anticipates the conclusion of the book in its assertion of God's wisdom, but more turmoil follows before the resolution in Job's repentance. Perhaps the best explanation for this is that the book well represents the psychology of a sufferer (see Lo). In the midst of pain, people can have moments of clarity but then fall back into despair.

4. Ecclesiastes.

In Ecclesiastes *yr*³ with God (only ʿēlōhīm, never Yahweh) as object occurs seven times (Eccles 3:14; 5:6 [English 5:7]; Eccles 7:18; 8:12 [2x], 13; 12:13). Increasingly, commentators have recognized two voices in the book. In Ecclesiastes 1:12—12:7, Qohelet speaks in the first person; in Ecclesiastes 1:1-11; 12:8-14 someone else (often called the *frame narrator or second wise teacher) speaks about Qohelet to his son (Eccles 12:12; see Fox, Longman, Bartholomew). Thus, most of the occurrences of "fear God" occur in Qohelet's speech, though it is used once by the second speaker. The frame narrator's exhortation to "fear God" (Eccles 12:13) almost certainly conforms to the positive use of the phrase as found in places like Proverbs 1:7, since in the same context he also urges obedience to God and an expectation of a future judgment (Eccles 12:13-14).

Commentators, however, are divided over the force of the expression when used by Qohelet himself. Is he advocating a proper pious attitude toward God (so Whybray) or is he suggesting that God acts in the way that he does to frighten people into submission rather than to arouse a sense of respectful awe (Longman, Crenshaw)? In favor of the latter approach is the context of the phrase (so Mavis 216-36), though commentators will continue to disagree over this interpretation as long as they disagree about whether there is tension or agreement between the thought of the body of the book in relationship to the epilogue.

5. Psalms.

The fear of yhwh/ʿēlōhīm is a theme encountered over forty times in the book of Psalms, always in the positive sense. W. P. Brown (91-92) tries to establish distance between the use of the phrase in Psalms and Proverbs: "In the psalm [he is speaking specifically of Ps 34, but using this as exemplary], reverence establishes 'refuge' from evildoers; in Proverbs the 'fear of YHWH' provides enlightenment and fosters integrity, the beginning point of moral growth (Prov 1:7; 9:10). For the psalmist, salvation—rather than formation—is paramount." This statement has merit, but the real issue is not so much that the concept is different in the two books but rather the way it is used. In Psalms, as in Proverbs, those who fear Yahweh have put themselves in a properly submissive relationship to God.

Space will not permit an analysis of every use of the phrase "fear Yahweh/God" and its variants in the Psalms, but a few summarizing comments and highlights are in order.

The phrase "those who fear Yahweh/God" in the Psalms is a way of referring to God's people. It is found in connection with "the righteous" (Ps 15:4), "the descendants of Jacob" (Ps 22:23) and those who are obedient to God's law (Ps 112:1; 119:63), God fearers are the ones to whom God reveals his covenant (Ps 25:14), and thus their hope is in his covenant love (Ps 33:18). They are the ones who have taken refuge in God (Ps 31:19) and experience his deliverance (Ps 34:7). Though the expression refers to his people who worship him, the book of Psalms expresses the hope that in the future all people and all nations will fear him (Ps 33:8).

The psalms not only describe God's people as “God fearers,” they also exhort the worshiping community to fear God (Ps 34:10). In Psalm 86:11, the psalmist asks God to give him an “undivided heart” in order to fear him. Indeed, just as the psalms hope for the day the nations will fear God (see reference to Ps 33:8 above; Ps 67:7; 102:15), they also admonish them to fear God as well (Ps 2:11: “You kings. . . . Serve Yahweh with fear and rejoice with trembling”).

Those who do fear the Lord experience wonderful blessings. Above, we saw that they are those who know God’s deliverance (Ps 85:9) and *protection (refuge, see also Ps 33:18; 60:4). They know God’s love and compassion (Ps 103:11, 13, 17). They are also recipients of God’s teaching as well as blessed with prosperity and a long family line (Ps 25:12-13), and food (Ps 111:5). They indeed “lack nothing” (Ps 34:10). Those who fear Yahweh are happy (Ps 112:1; 128:1). Accordingly, they are to serve God (Ps 2:11), praise him (Ps 22:23), be humble (Ps 55:19), trust him (Ps 115:11), rejoice (Ps 119:74) and bless Yahweh (Ps 135:20).

Psalm 111:10 is a particularly interesting use of the phrase because here we have the full expression “the fear of Yahweh is the beginning of wisdom” found also in Proverbs and Job. It is paralleled by the expression “all who follow his precepts have good understanding.” Psalm 112 then begins with the admonition: “Blessed is the man who fears Yahweh, who finds great delight in his commands.” The connection between fearing God and obedience to the commandments and wisdom brings out a connection between wisdom and *law only hinted at in Proverbs. Also of interest are the parallels between Psalm 112, which describes the godly man, and Proverbs 31:10-31, which describes the godly woman (the “noble woman”) who is also called a God-fearer (Prov 31:30).

6. Conclusion.

Thus the “fear of yhwh/’ēlōhīm” is a major theme in Psalms and Wisdom literature. Indeed many, though not all, of the psalms in which “fear of YHWH/’ēlōhīm” is found may be categorized as wisdom psalms (e.g., Pss 34; 112) (see Wisdom Poetry). Fear is a virtue that leads to piety, praise and humility, since one who fears God recognizes that God, not oneself, is the center of the cosmos.

See also ETHICS; GOD; PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF; WISDOM AND BIBLICAL THEOLOGY; WISDOM AND COVENANT; WISDOM THEOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. L. Barre, “Fear of God and the World View of Wisdom,” BTB 11 (1981) 41-43; C. Bartholomew, Ecclesiastes (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, forthcoming); W. P. Brown, “‘Come, O Children...I Will Teach You the Fear of the Lord’ (Psalm 34:12): Comparing Psalms and Proverbs,” in Seeking Out the Wisdom of the Ancients: Essays Offered in Honor of Michael V. Fox on the Occasion of His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, ed. R. L. Troxel, K. G. Friebe and D. R. Magary (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005) 85-102; D. Cox, “Fear or Conscience? Yir’at YHWH in Proverbs 1-9,” Studia Hierosolymitana 3 (1982) 83-90; J. L. Crenshaw, Ecclesiastes (Westminster John Knox, 1987); M. V. Fox, “Frame-Narrative and Composition in the Book of Qohelet,” HUCA 48 (1977) 83-106; A. Lo, Job 28 as Rhetoric: An Analysis of Job 28 in the Context of Job 22-31 (VTS 97; Leiden: Brill, 2003); T. Longman III, Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem., Proverbs (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, 2006); R. Mavis, “The Epilogue of Ecclesiastes and the Meaning of the Book” (Ph.D. diss.: Westminster Theological Seminary, 1999); R. E. Murphy, “Religious Dimensions of Israelite Wisdom,” in Ancient Israelite Religion: Essays in Honor of Frank Moore Cross, ed. P. D. Miller Jr. et al. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987) 449-58; W. V. Van Pelt and W. C. Kaiser Jr., “yr’,” in NIDOTTE 2.533-37; R. N. Whybray, Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989). T. Longman III

FEMINIST INTERPRETATION

Feminist interpretation is defined as reading the text as a woman and letting a feminist perspective influence one’s reading and interpretation. This article provides a survey of feminist interaction with *Psalms, *Proverbs, *Job and the five scrolls: *Song of Songs, *Ruth, *Lamentations, *Ecclesiastes and *Esther.

1. Introduction to Feminist Interpretation
2. Psalms
3. Proverbs
4. Job
5. Song of Songs
6. Ruth
7. Lamentations
8. Ecclesiastes
9. Esther

1. Introduction to Feminist Interpretation.

By its very nature, feminist interpretation is pluralistic; that is, there are no right or wrong readings. Hence, feminist critics may advocate different and often contradictory readings of the same text. Further, the starting point of feminist interpretation of the Bible is not the biblical text in its own right but rather the concerns of feminism. Recognizing that in the history of civilization *women have been marginalized and denied access to positions of authority and influence, feminist scholars seek to expose the strategies by which men have either justified their control over women or encouraged female complicity in their own subordination. In the particular case of the Bible, there is abundant evidence to show that the Bible was produced mainly by men and for men. Most of the characters that appear are male, and in the few cases where women appear, they are mostly presented as someone's wife or daughter, rarely in their own right. When they do appear autonomously, they are famous not for their womanly experience but rather for achievements in roles that received recognition in male domains, such as warrior, prophet or judge (e.g., Deborah). Moreover, even if not all the authors were male, it is the male worldview that is dominant, shared by both men and women at the time. Thus, if the Bible presents us with men's view of women—what men thought women were like, or what they wished them to be—the task of the feminist critic is either to discover traces of female voices within the Bible or to read them into the Bible. Therefore, feminist scholars often find it necessary to step outside the text and raise questions not only about what the Bible says about women but also what its underlying assumptions of gender are. Several methodological approaches are used, most commonly anthropology, sociology and literary criticism (see Social-Scientific Approaches; Rhetorical Criticism). The first two seek to learn about women's lives in biblical times, while the third exposes strategies by which women's subordination is inscribed in and justified by texts, focusing on women as characters, on women as readers, or on gender bias in interpretation (see Exum 1995, 65-70).

2. Psalms.

Few attempts have been made to read the Psalter through a woman's eyes, and many of those are *intertextuality studies. For example, U. Bail proposes reading Psalm 55 as a lament by a woman who has been raped. While arguing neither for female authorship nor for rape being the event that triggered the composition in the first place, Bail nevertheless demonstrates how it may serve as a way for woman today to express their suffering as a result of rape. She begins by exploring the *imagery of Psalm 55 and interprets the assaulted city as a metaphor for a woman's body (Heb 'ir ["city"] is a feminine noun), an apt interpretation given the close connection between military defeat of a city and rape of its female inhabitants. The references to the perpetrator being a person close to the victim (Ps 55:12-14) fit the idea of rape as well, since most rapes are carried out by a person known to the victim. Finally, Bail explores the solutions offered by the psalmist. The raped woman wishes for the death of her assaulters (Ps 55:15), and yet, aware that this might not happen, she also disassociates herself from her painful experience using the motif of the desert to symbolize a utopian dream of escape (Ps 55:6-9). Ultimately, she asserts both her own identity and her trust in Yahweh (Ps 55:17-19, 22-23).

A different intertextual reading is offered by B. LaNeel Tanner. Using the Genesis account of Rachel and Leah and their jealousy and competitiveness in the areas of Jacob's love and of childbearing as the starting point (Gen 29—31), LaNeel Tanner reads Psalm 109 as "a prayer for Leah and Rachel when their father forced them to marry Jacob." For example, Psalm 109:1-5 is interpreted as voicing Leah's and Rachel's feelings of hatred of their immediate surroundings, including each other. Of special interest is the idea of the oppressor's children in Psalm 109:9-14. Though these two women are silent in the Genesis account, LaNeel Tanner gives them a voice here in Psalm 109 that reminds us that they too suffered from the antagonism between women, as can be seen later in the Joseph narrative (Gen 37—50), where the sons of Leah turn against the son of Rachel. The psalm ends on a note of praise, read through the statements in Genesis 29:33; 30:6 that Yahweh heard Leah and Rachel.

Another approach, chosen more rarely, is to investigate the symbolism of imagery found in the Psalter. For example, S. Schroer (1998) investigates the biblical metaphor of "Yahweh's wings," found primarily in the Psalter. It is inspired by the behavior of the female goose-vulture, and its use often indicates comfort (parental), *protection and healing. This imagery was often associated with goddesses in ancient Near Eastern and Egyptian images, but there are no traces left of this in Israelite *worship. Instead, the imagery of the protective wings is incorporated by the Israelites into the image of (male) Yahweh, symbolizing not only his protective and nurturing character but also the more dynamic aspects of healing and giving of new strength.

3. Proverbs.

The feminist discussion of Proverbs focuses primarily on the strange/foreign woman in Proverbs 7 and the contrasting picture of Lady Wisdom and Lady Folly in Proverbs 8 (see Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly). Feminist scholars are divided in their evaluation of these figures and their interpretation. Other areas of interest are the instruction to King *Lemuel by his mother (Prov 31:1-9) and the *acrostic poem to the "Woman of Worth" (Prov 31:10-31).

3.1. The "Strange" Woman. A negative female character is mentioned throughout the book of Proverbs, variously called "strange" (Prov 2:16; 5:3, 20; 7:5), "foreign" (Prov 2:16; 5:20; 6:24; 7:5; 23:27), "evil" (Prov 6:24), "married" (i.e., unfaithful) (Prov 6:26) and "foolish" (Prov 9:13). The identity and the role of this woman, here treated collectively and named "the strange woman" (see Yee 1995, 111), are much discussed in feminist interpretation. For example, C. V. Camp (2000, 58-66) compares the imagery of the foreign woman in Proverbs 7 with, among other texts, Ezra 9—10; Nehemiah 13; Malachi 2:10-16 and concludes that the key issue with the woman in Proverbs is not so much the fear of idolatry or of intermarriage with women from outside the Judahite community as it is social control of women's and young men's sexual behavior (see Marriage and Sex). The strange woman is a cross between an adulterous woman and a prostitute; she is a woman who is sociosexually deviant, alien to the family structure. In this way, she is "strange" or "foreign"; she represents a contrast to what is familiar and "our own." Furthermore, Proverbs 7 describes not the behavior of a particular woman but rather the epitome of deviant sexual behavior outside the control of the patriarchal society. Thus, the strange woman is a symbol of the greatest evil imaginable, portrayed as an improbable combination of sexually deviant activities: she is about to commit adultery against her own husband, but rather than being a passionate affair, the act is calculated, anonymous sex with a stranger, and an innocent lad at that. Moreover, she is wanton, dressed up but not being a prostitute. She is not controlled by a male and is outside the boundaries of male-controlled sexuality. Lastly, her sexuality is mixed with ritual aspects: she is polluting holy space by engaging in sex during a festival and using the money that she earns to pay her vows (Prov 7:14) and compounding the priestly anointing oil to perfume her illicit sexual encounter (Prov 7:17).

3.1.1. A Male or Female Voice in Proverbs 7? Similarly to the case of Song of Songs, a number of mainly feminist scholars argue in favor of female authorship of Proverbs 1—9 and/or a female identity of the wisdom teacher in the same text. In view of the references to the teaching of the mother (Prov 31:26), the advice to listen to a mother's instruction (e.g., Prov 1:8; 23:22-25), and the teaching of Lemuel's mother (Prov 31:1), male authorship of the entire book of Proverbs need not be taken for granted, even though male authorship may sometimes be implied (e.g., reference to a father's advice in Prov 4:1). One key issue is how to relate to the androcentric values of the text. On the one hand, A. Brenner and F. van Dijk-Hemmes (57-62, 113-30) state that if we see Proverbs as authored by a man, then the text reflects male ideas of women. Alternatively, given that women often internalize the male point of view even when it is not beneficial for them, if Proverbs was (partly) written by a woman, the actual message of the text comes to the same. On the other hand, A. O. Bellis (1998) argues that the sentiments expressed in Proverbs 1—9 could easily have been uttered by a woman who disagrees with the androcentric values, given that the critical issue of the discourse is not so much the restriction of women's freedom as that of men. As such, the advice against "the strange woman" should be regarded not as misogynist but rather as a way of promoting a more egalitarian sexual ethic, expressed within monogamy, from which women stand to gain.

3.1.2. Is the Bad Woman Actually Bad? M. Heijerman outlines three different possible pictures of "the strange woman" that can be derived from the text: "the mother's rival," "the men's scapegoat" and "the needy woman." According to the first portrait, the speaker is the mother of the foolish man, and she sees "the strange woman” as her rival, the one who will break the bond between her and her son. She wants her son to behave sensibly, but most of all she wants to maintain the bond with him and thus her influence over him. Thus the strange woman is a woman who, according to the mother, has not adapted herself to the patriarchal society. As such, she is a threat to the future of the son and therefore also to the happiness of the mother. According to the second portrait, the speaker divides women into two categories, whores and saints, with “the strange woman” clearly belonging to the former. We learn very little about the woman herself from this portrait, only what the man thinks of her, a man who is suspiciously interested in her while at the same time showing disdain for her. The third portrait depicts a helpless woman in a man’s society who, left without money due to her husband’s absence, turns to prostitution in order to pay her vows. It is also possible that she is turning to adultery due to infertility: suspecting that the fault lies with her husband rather than with her, this is one possible way of getting a son, the crowning glory for a woman in the patriarchal society. Thus, rather than being a rebel against her society, as was the woman of the first portrait, she has adapted herself to the patriarchal society and does everything to uphold its values.

3.1.3. Contrast to Lady Wisdom. Women and/or the female in Proverbs tend to be described as either good (e.g., “Lady Wisdom” in Prov 8) or bad (e.g., “the strange woman” in Prov 7), and this polarization is the subject of much discussion. For example, G. Baumann (76-78) investigates the repercussions of this split for women into “whores” and “saints” then and now. Similarly, C. Newsom discusses the preoccupation with women in Proverbs 1–9. She begins by pointing out that the particular style of discourse—a father giving advice to a son—makes the advice influential and at the same time easy to adopt. Newsom points out that families are not ideologically innocent places, although they give the appearance to be so just because everybody has one. Throughout this advice the danger of the strange woman is polarized by the wholesomeness of Lady Wisdom and a person’s own wife. Together, the two women define and secure the boundaries of the symbolic order of patriarchal wisdom. One guards the gateway to hell, the other to heaven. In contrast, as a way of escaping this division of women into whores and saints, C. V. Camp (2000, 72-89) suggests looking at the strange woman and Lady Wisdom as two aspects of the same identity—an interpretation suggested by the many parallels between the descriptions of the two figures, especially in terms of shared vocabulary. Through this deconstructive reading of the text it is possible to undercut its obvious message of absolute opposition between good and evil and instead to highlight “their paradoxical, but experientially validated, unity” (Camp 2000, 88). Discussing the same interlocking imagery between the strange woman and Lady Wisdom, but reaching less positive conclusions, G. A. Yee (1995) explores how the shared vocabulary and imagery create a picture in which the strange woman functions as the antithesis of Lady Wisdom. The two ostensibly propose the same thing to the son, but the narrator is clear in detailing the outcome of both choices. The result of this for female readers is disturbing. Given the often sexual imagery whereby the son should embrace Lady Wisdom like a lover rather than being enticed by the strange woman, the woman reader is asked to participate in an experience from which she is explicitly excluded. She can identify with the male son and thus translate the female imagery into a male one. Alternatively, the female reader must identify with either Lady Wisdom or the strange woman.

3.2. Lady Wisdom. Personified wisdom (see Personification), often called Lady Wisdom, is the subject of the discourse in Proverbs 8. The portrayal of her as a female character is regarded positively by several feminist scholars as opening a way of approaching and worshipping Yahweh in a female yet biblical image. For example, C. V. Camp (1987) discusses how Lady Wisdom can provide women with a feminine aspect of the divine. She states that to acknowledge the goddess of Wisdom “could be an extremely liberating step for reformist Jewish and Christian feminists that would provide further common ground with those women who have opted out of the tradition in favor of contemporary goddess religion.” As such, this metaphor can speak powerfully to women claiming either goddess or Judeo-Christian tradition. Along similar lines, G. Baumann (70-76) sees Lady Wisdom as a female mediating figure fully integral to the worship of Yahweh. She is a figure of goddess-like rank at Yahweh’s side who, because of her knowledge about the order of the world, is able to give humans advice. She has, however, no cult, and it is doubtful whether she was ever regarded as a character independent of orthodox worship of Yahweh. This may diminish her influence and, indirectly, women's influence as well. She has no direct influence in Yahweh's decision-making, and by not being a goddess in her own right she has less authority and runs the risk of losing her relevance within the context of Israelite theology. Moreover, in her role as a mother who lovingly cares for her children, who nourishes and educates them, and who embodies the authority and will of the father while he is absent, Lady Wisdom is a female role model of the past that serves less well for women today who are active in the political and decision-making realms. Similarly, S. Schroer (1995) argues that the fact that Lady Wisdom, together with authentic feminine experience and identity, was integrated as an aspect of Yahweh offers a possibility for identification for women today. In contrast, Hadley suggests that the references to Lady Wisdom in Proverbs 1; 8; 9; Job 38 constitute a literary compensation for the gradual eradication of the worship of a female goddess and of its assimilation into worship of Yahweh. In particular, J. M. Hadley suggests that the underlying goddess is that of Asherah, known from Canaanite mythology and also as Yahweh's companion in the texts from Kuntillet Ajrud.

3.3. Wisdom and Women's Roles in Society. C. R. Fontaine (1995) discusses the social roles of women in the world of wisdom. She begins by defining the concept of "sage," rejecting the limited definition of a sage as a person with scribal education who has composed a book or piece belonging to the wisdom literature of the ancient world. As such, all but very few women would be excluded. Instead, she suggests a fuller definition, defining the sage as a person who routinely performs one of the following tasks: authorship, scribal duties, counseling, management of economic resources, conflict resolution, teaching and healing. In this wider sense, also a woman could be considered "wise." She then outlines three areas in which female sages function and compares the biblical evidence with that of the rest of the ancient Near East. First, in the private domain, the duties of a capable wife included many "wise" tasks, including teaching and making practical decisions for the running of the household (Prov 31). Her opposite is the woman in Proverbs 7:5-27, who embodies the converse of true, life-giving wisdom. Second, in the public domain, the best example is the queen mother's instruction in Proverbs 31:1-9, with her opposite exemplified by Queen Jezebel, an educated foreign woman who used her intelligence to manipulate her weak husband, Ahab, for her own purposes (see 1 Kings 16:31—21:29). Third is the province of counseling, healers and mourners, where women have left their mark, again both positively as a healer and negatively as a source of death. In this way, the social roles of women are echoed in the two twin figures of Lady Wisdom and Lady Folly. Focusing on the last aspect, Schroer (1995) notes that Lady Wisdom often is described partly as a counseling woman (e.g., Prov 8:12, 14-16). Schroer also highlights the many references to wise counseling women outside the Wisdom literature: the counseling wise woman (e.g., 2 Sam 14), the wise wife (e.g., Sarah in Gen 16; Michal in 1 Sam 19) and the counseling mother of a king (e.g., 1 Kings 2:13-23; 2 Chron 22:3), for better or for worse. In this way, the representation of personified Wisdom as a counseling woman is rooted in sociocultural factors related to Israelite tradition. At the same time, counseling women were respected as the representatives of Lady Wisdom. Schroer concludes with the hope that such a divine image might have exercised influence on women's own position and social reality.

4. Job.

The book of Job is a male-oriented one, containing a few female characters (Job's wife and daughters), whose appearances are limited to the prologue and the epilogue. The bulk of the book is taken up by the speeches of Job, his friends and Yahweh. Nonetheless, several areas of the text invite feminist interpretation (Maier and Schroer). First, Job's daughters seem to have a status within the family that is more prominent than what is typically assumed about the position of daughters in ancient Israel. As such, they can serve as a positive focal point for feminist interpretation. For example, noting that they, in contrast with Job's sons, are named, and drawing attention to the parallels with Zelophehad's daughters (Num 27; 36), who also inherited from their father, C. Maier and S. Schroer portray a Job who, through his own suffering, has come to realize that these women are also entitled to a self-sufficient and financially secure life, independent of men. Second, the divine speech in Job 38–42 provides a platform for a more universal outlook upon life. By rejecting that Job is the center of the universe, the poem points to a less anthropocentric relationship between humans and Yahweh. Similarly, the implicit critical attitude toward the patriarchy expressed in the poem on wisdom (Job 28) can provide a new reading of Job: wisdom, like Yahweh, cannot be bought and is hidden from all. Third, the feminist scholar can look for the suppressed voice of Job's wife. In light of her share of Job's suffering—after all, like Job, she lost her children and her position in the society—she too is a righteous sufferer, a female one who can speak for the many women, past and present, whose suffering is unheard.

Of these three areas, Job's wife has received the most attention, in particular her single statement in Job 2:9 (“Do you still persist in your integrity? Curse God and die”). For example, E. van Wolde (1995, 201-6) treats the statement by Job's wife as pivotal, causing Job to begin questioning Yahweh. By echoing the vocabulary of Yahweh (Job 2:3) and that of the accuser (Job 1:11; 2:5b), adding only one new word (“die”), she urges Job to change from his earlier passivity and to confront Yahweh. She gives her husband a choice, implied in the dual meaning of the Hebrew verb brk, (“bless”/“curse”): he can either curse Yahweh, which might cause Yahweh to abandon him, thus resulting in his death, or he can bless Yahweh and die with that blessing on his lips. These words result in a change in Job's relation to Yahweh, from accepting Yahweh's actions (Job 1:21-22; 2:10) to questioning them.

In contrast, L. R. Klein highlights the misogynist aspects of the book of Job. Looking at the use of form and language, Klein compares the male characters' verbosity and the beauty of the poetry of their statements with the mere six Hebrew words spoken by Job's wife. This lack of speech suggests that women are related to the periphery, given only those words that no man can utter. Moreover, it equates women with the wicked (Job 2:10). The daughters born after the calamity are given more of an identity in that they are given names and are described as beautiful (Job 42:14-15). Nonetheless, Klein sees this as yet another example of misogyny: the text discloses that male desire is enjoyed when the object is young, beautiful and a virgin/ daughter. The mature and accessible wife is not given any thought. Further, Job sees only his own suffering and desires and spares little thought for those of his wife. His wife is presented as wanting only Job's well-being (Job 2:9), and no word is mentioned about her own loss of children and esteem. In fact, if Job were to lust after a woman, he envisions that his own wife would bear the brunt of the punishment (Job 31:9-10)!

5. Song of Songs.

There is much positive to be said about Song of Songs from a feminist perspective. In no other biblical book are female characters given so much voice, and in no other book is women's sexuality described in such a positive light. Nonetheless, there are of late also more cautious feminist interpreters. One such cautionary voice is J. C. Exum (2000), who lists ten reasons to be alert, including the possibility that the women featured in the text may be the creations of male authors, maybe even representing a male fantasy of the ideal woman rather than representing a female voice, and that even though women are attributed a lot of sexual freedom, the text itself makes clear that “bad things happen to sexually active, forward women” (Exum 30).

5.1. Authorship. One feminist concern is the possible female authorship of at least parts of Song of Songs, depending on each scholar's view of the history of the text. Several matters point in this direction: poetic descriptions of a man's body, feminine aspects of the portrayed ways of life (e.g., mother's house [see Meyers 1993a]) being referred to, the use of the narrative “I” denoting the female lover (Goitein 1993, 58-59), the unusually high ratio for the Bible of female speakers (Brenner and van Dijk-Hemmes, 88-89), women referring to each other as beautiful, lack of inequality of strength between the male and the female characters, and the fact that the woman usually takes the initiative (Bekkenkamp and van Dijk 1993, 79-80).

Looking at the issue from a different direction, J. Bekkenkamp and F. van Dijk (1993, 69) suggest that “what the female texts . . . have in common is their lack of the specific biblical metaphorical language, in which aspects of femininity or male-female relationships are used as symbols for other, ‘more important,’ realities.” In favor of regarding Song of Songs as a female text, Bekkenkamp and van Dijk (1993, 69) point out that the religious nature of Song of Songs is expressed not in “YHWH-talk” but in language and symbolism taken from the daily life in a village and from nature.

5.2. Intertextuality. Female scholars often highlight how a particular text benefits from a comparative reading with other texts, both within and outside the biblical *canon, and how this highlights certain aspects of the given text. One way of reading intertextually is by tracing the development of a given topic throughout the Bible. Notably, intertextuality does not work in one direction only: if a later text draws on the imagery of an earlier one, this later text stays in the mind of the readers when they return to the earlier one and thus influences the reading of the earlier one. Another way of reading intertextually is through juxtaposition: two or more biblical books are brought into conversation with each other. In this way, the order and the hierarchy of the canon are disrupted, and novel ways of looking at a text appear. Lastly, several scholars break free of the biblical canon and read cross-culturally, comparing the biblical text with literature ranging from contemporary Greek novels to modern children’s books (see van Wolde 1997b, 427-33).

In the case of Song of Songs, feminist scholars read Song of Songs intertextually primarily with Genesis 2–3; Hosea 1–3; Proverbs 7, mainly focusing on the contrasting picture of female sexuality. For example, P. Trible (144-65) reads Song of Songs as a poem that seeks to rectify the situation recorded in Genesis 2–3. By using primarily literary techniques, Trible highlights the ways in which Song of Songs reuses the imagery of Genesis 2–3 (garden, Yahweh’s withdrawal/absence, sexual union, fruit, plants, animals, parents). This reuse creates a contrasting picture: the fruit is no longer forbidden but rather to be savored, and the animals are friends rather than foes later to be crushed. In particular, the punishment is reversed: instead of the woman’s desire for the man being part of her punishment, he will desire her. Similarly, J. Bekkenkamp and F. van Dijk (1993, 82-83) argue that Proverbs 7, because of the use of similar wordings, can be interpreted as a reaction to Song of Songs. The area of contrast is primarily that of female sexual initiative: whereas the “I” of Song of Songs is actively looking for her lover as an expression of her love for him, the teacher in Proverbs warns his young male disciples of the danger of women who make the first move. Sexuality is permitted and can even be enjoyed, but only as the result of male initiative. Lastly, F. van Dijk-Hemmes (1993a) reads Song of Songs alongside Hosea 2, arguing that Hosea 2, by using motifs from Song of Songs, transforms the woman and her seeking for love into a harlot who shamelessly goes after her lover. In this way, Hosea 2 conveys the male point of view while suppressing the female side.

5.3. Allegorical Interpretations. Throughout the history of interpretation Song of Songs has more often than not been allegorized, and one reason for this might be the female character’s lack of conformity to the male idea of the female; her initiative and forwardness are unbecoming, and so another interpretation must be more correct (Bekkenkamp and van Dijk 1993, 80-81). In view of this bias, feminist scholars often do not accredit the allegorical readings with any value for today’s women. Lately, however, several scholars have looked anew at the allegorical approach to see if anything can be salvaged for the feminist reader. Among them, A. Ostriker suggests that the motif of “love” in Song of Songs can be read to mean both and simultaneously physical and spiritual, profane and sacred love. Furthermore, in view of the comparatively egalitarian view of love in the human sphere, she poses the question of whether such a nonhierarchical love relationship can be possible also with Yahweh.

5.4. The Wasfs. The imagery of especially the last wasf* (Song 7:2-8), often considered bizarre, and its implication for women is much debated. Attempts are made both to redeem the imagery and to problematize it. Positively, M. Falk (1993) compares it with the often equally peculiar metaphors used by past and contemporary poets and suggests that we need, through critical analysis, to bridge the cultural gap between us and Song of Songs. The solution may be found in less precise translations. For example, where an image depends on familiarity with a foreign landscape (e.g., Song 6:5; 7:4-5), it may be preferable to exclude that reference and to substitute something more familiar to the modern, non-Israelite reader. From a different aspect, C. Meyers (1993a) highlights that the imagery has a traditionally male quality, either being military or denoting fierce animals. When, like here, it is applied to a woman, it creates an allusion to female power appropriate to the internal world of Israelite households, where women exercised strong and authoritative positions. Finally, A. Brenner (1993) suggests that rather than redeeming the imagery of the last wasf, it should be recognized as a double-edged parody. On one level, it is a male parody of a not-so-beautiful yet sexually attractive woman. On a deeper level, presuming female authorship, it is a subtle critique of male chauvinism. In contrast, F. C. Black treats the imagery more negatively. In a comparative study, she points out that in many readings, including the ones of Meyers and Brenner, the female body is on display and is described in grotesque terms. Thus, the text compromises her body image and her sexuality, thereby rendering a positive reading doubtful. Instead, Black urges us to accept that the text depicts a woman as ridiculous and thereby reveals a certain unease on the part of the woman's lover and hence on the part of the primarily male audience that gazes upon her, and to begin working from there.

6. Ruth.

The book of Ruth has received mixed reviews by feminist scholars (for a useful overview, see Meyers 1993b, 87). On the one hand, it is deemed positive that a book featuring primarily women and their heroic deeds is given a place in the canon. On the other hand, there is the feeling that Ruth and *Naomi, however pleasant they may be, are but pawns in the patriarchal society, exploited for their biological role in maintaining male lineages. Feminist scholarship focuses mainly on the characters of the book, its possible female authorship and intertextuality.

6.1. The Characters of Ruth, Naomi and Orpah.

P. Trible (166-99) offers a positive evaluation of the character of Ruth. Even though one concern of the book is indeed the need for a male heir to preserve the family patrimony, the book highlights the courage, independence and devotion of Ruth and Naomi, and its focal point is their struggle to survive successfully in a man's world. Throughout the narrative the women take the initiative, thus shaping their own destiny despite living in a patriarchal world. Ruth is the "defier of custom, the maker of decisions, and the worker of salvation" (Trible, 184). When Boaz acts, it is in reaction to Ruth's initiative. As a whole, the book of Ruth suggests a theological interpretation of feminism: "women working out their own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is YHWH who works in them" (Trible, 196).

More specifically, the issue of Ruth's Moabite nationality is often addressed. What did it mean for Ruth to leave her own nation, culture and religion and to embrace that of her late husband and her mother-in-law? Simultaneously, the character of Orpah has been lifted out of obscurity, suggesting that she, alongside Ruth, can serve as a role model: in contrast to Ruth, she chose to remain in her own culture rather than turning her back on it. For example, B. Honig discusses several aspects of immigrant integration into the adopted culture, asking in particular what Ruth, the alien, provides for the Israelites that an indigenous heroine cannot provide. Honig notes that immigrants have two effects on a society. Positively, immigration reflects the admirable qualities of the adopted country by showing that foreigners are prepared to leave their own land for the benefits of the new one. Negatively, immigrants are feared for the influence that they will have on the receiving nation. In the case of Ruth, Honig suggests that her immigration is the vehicle through which the law comes alive again: "Ruth's choice of the Israelites re-marks them as the Chosen People, a people worthy of being chosen" (Honig, 55). At the same time, Ruth is threatening: she is a foreigner of a hated nation who is dwelling in the midst of the people of Bethlehem. And, as the end of the book alludes, she is never fully incorporated into the Israelite society. Despite her imminent marriage into the society, she is still referred to as Ruth the Moabite (Ruth 4:10). Thus she stays a foreigner. In fact, one way of interpreting Ruth's disappearance after giving birth to Obed at the end of Ruth 4 is to see it as the result of prejudice and lack of integration. Naomi is given the son because Ruth the foreigner cannot be trusted to raise her son properly, in the Israelite way.

From a more personal point of view, L. E. Donaldson discusses the inherent tension between Moab and Israel as displayed by Orpah and Ruth. Donaldson compares the two women with the responses of Native American women to the early European settlers. Dismissing the biblical claim to primacy of the Israelite faith and ensuing culture, Donaldson places Orpah in the center and sees her as a true role model for Native American women. Rather than courting the culture of the dominant power and in the end adopting it, like Pocahontas, Orpah, after her marriage to the Israelite Chilion, returns to her own culture and her own gods. Bringing attention to the ingrained hostility between Israel and Moab, Donaldson describes Ruth indirectly as an indigenous woman who abandons her own background to align herself with those who “break down [the Moabites’] altars etc.” (Deut 12:3). Thus, Orpah is the one character who gives hope to Native American women, by choosing the house of her clan and the spirituality of her mother over the desire for another culture.

6.2. A Female Voice. Feminist scholarship is interested in the possibility of female authorship of the book of Ruth. Thus, alongside treating the text as written by a male author and accordingly seeking to expose and evaluate its androcentric values, several scholars read the book as a female text. In this area, F. van Dijk-Hemmes (1993b) discusses the possibility of a female voice in a given text, postulating three main criteria for uncovering such traces: the absence of marked androcentrism, a redefinition of reality from female perspective, and a narrative differentiation of the views attributed to female as against male figures. In addition to these, van Dijk-Hemmes suggests the possibility that although the final literary product was penned by a male author, the underlying oral tradition is the “collective creation of women’s culture.” She finds that the book of Ruth fulfills all these criteria. For example, the cooperation and mutual respect between Naomi and Ruth stand in sharp contrast to the rivalry of other women couples such as Rachel and Leah, Hannah and Peninnah, and Sarah and Hagar as depicted in other, more androcentric parts of the Bible. Further, the mention of “mother’s house” is suggestive of a reality depicted differently from the prevalent male perspective. Moreover, van Dijk-Hemmes follows those scholars who seek Ruth as a book that came into being and was transmitted within circles of professional narrators, and she suggests that the Ruth and Naomi story belongs to the repertory of a female storyteller, “a woman old and wise like one of the heroines of her story, Naomi.” A detailed study of one of these aspects, the expression “mother’s house” (Gen 24:28; Ruth 1:8; Song 3:4; 8:2) is offered by C. Meyers (1993b). Among other things, Meyers explores how this expression points to a female perspective and thus a female voice within the book of Ruth. Furthermore, she explores its sociological background and how it testifies to, among other things, women’s considerable power within the household. Meyers conclude that when Naomi uses the term “mother’s house” in Ruth 1:8, she allows us to hear the language of female experience.

6.3. Intertextuality. Lastly, the book of Ruth has been read intertextually by feminist scholars. For example, E. van Wolde (1997b) highlights the many shared semantic features between the book of Ruth and the narrative of Judah and Tamar in Genesis 38: both women are childless widows, Judah and Boaz are elderly male relatives, both women’s actions share the purpose of providing a male heir to the family, both their actions contain elements of concealment and deceit, and both women are neglected at the end of their respective stories. Based on this comparison, van Wolde proceeds by claiming that both Ruth and Tamar are eye-openers. Tamar opens Judah’s eyes to the knowledge about his son Er’s refusal to provide his brother with an heir and Yahweh’s subsequent punitive deed. Similarly, Ruth opens Boaz’s eyes to her situation and makes him aware of his possibilities as redeemer and seed supplier. Moreover, Ruth also opens Naomi’s eyes, transforming her from a childless widow embittered toward Yahweh to a woman with hope for a future and offspring.

7. Lamentations.

The little that has been written about Lamentations from a feminist perspective focuses largely on the *personification of Jerusalem as a woman and whether or not this image is positive for women then and now. Jerusalem is portrayed as Yahweh’s beloved daughter, the spokeswoman for the grieving community, and finally also the victim who confronts Yahweh about his mistreatment of her (Lam 2:20-22).

B. B. Kaiser (166) maintains the positive side, arguing that the adoption of a metaphor of painful female experience was not done in a judgmental way in order to expose the community’s sin. On the contrary, by identifying with a suffering woman, the (male) author of Lamentations sought to achieve a more powerful expression of suffering. A contrary position is taken by K. M. O’Connor (188-89). While acknowledging that Jerusalem as Yahweh’s daughter appears first to provide contemporary women with a female biblical symbol of high dignity, suggesting that the authors were aware of women's suffering and valued them highly enough to employ them as metaphors of the pain of the community, O'Connor highlights that this imagery can also be harmful for women. Jerusalem is portrayed as a subordinate of the male deity, an object of scorn, the cause of her own suffering (Lam 1:5), and as a woman who collaborates in her own abuse.

Three particular female images have been noted by scholars. The first image is the portrayal of Jerusalem in Lamentations 1 as a woman who is unclean due to her menstruation (Lam 1:9, 17; cf. Lev 15:19-30). Again, Kaiser interprets this imagery positively, regarding the poet's impersonation of a menstruating woman to intensify the expression of anguish as "remarkable in a culture in which attitudes towards menstruation were hardly progressive" (Kaiser, 176). In contrast, O'Connor (189) points out that menstruation, a natural condition of the female body, is used here as a metaphor of shame and humiliation. The same shamefulness of a woman's body is also implied in the picture in Lamentations 1:8, where *Zion is described as naked, symbolizing her degradation and bodily humiliation. The second image is the way in which Jerusalem gives voice to her suffering. According to O'Connor, the reader hears a battered woman, a woman who is beaten and tortured by Yahweh, whom she trusts, and who laments how he inflicted her sorrows in his anger (Lam 1:12-13). Moreover, like contemporary victims of domestic violence, Jerusalem blames herself for her afflictions and acknowledges Yahweh's right to abuse her. Indirectly, this passage "justifies abuse of women by portraying YHWH as the abuser" (O'Connor, 189). The third image is that of motherhood. T. Linafelt (1997) proposes a reading of Lamentations in terms of its concern for children—mother Zion's dying children. This is a reading of a despairing mother who is trying to get Yahweh's attention on behalf of her children, but Yahweh does not respond.

8. Ecclesiastes.

Very little has been written on Ecclesiastes from a feminist perspective. Although there are sections that may testify to a positive view of women (e.g., a positive view of sexuality in Eccles 9:9), the bulk of the material witnesses to a more negative evaluation (e.g., Eccles 3:5-6). The section that has received most attention is Ecclesiastes 7:25-29. In particular, the statement "more bitter than death is (the) woman" (Eccles 7:26) is the source of much controversy among both translators and exegetes. Was Ecclesiastes a misogynist, the opposite, or something in between? E. S. Christianson provides a useful overview of the variety of interpretations and explores their implication for gender relations. He concludes that a plain reading of the text points to the misogyny of Ecclesiastes, but he also acknowledges that the effort of those scholars who seek to render Ecclesiastes as someone standing outside the views of his own society provides useful confrontation that forces us to reexamine the text again and again. C. R. Fontaine (1998) supports the idea that the plain sense of the text of Ecclesiastes conveys a negative view of women, and she continues by exploring how this negative view was taken up and indeed strengthened by later Jewish and Christian interpreters. In the case of Christianity, she concludes with a discussion of religiously based misogyny, influenced in part by statements such as Ecclesiastes 7:25-29, and its role in the witch hunts in early modern Europe.

Other passages have been examined by feminist scholars. Notably, A. Brenner (Brenner and van Dijk-Hemmes, 133-63) counterreads the poem in Ecclesiastes 3:1-9 as a male poem of desire. She focuses on the imagery of the millstone in Ecclesiastes 3:5, which often is given a sexual interpretation in traditional Jewish exegesis (cf. Job 31:9-10): one "casts stones" when one's wife is ritually pure, while one should abstain from doing so when she is unclean—that is, during her menstrual period. This equation of women with stones is troublesome, and Brenner asks what happens to women within the "life" described in the poem? Are they also cast away? In the light of Brenner's counterreading, this verse declares that there exists a (proper?) time for indulging in the sexual act or for getting rid of a woman. In view of the poem as a whole, this interpretation renders it a male love poem exploring the fluidity of love and sexual desire, and how love and sex are dynamic, at times changing and mutating into their opposite.

9. Esther.

The feminist discussion of the book of Esther is largely centered on the two main female characters, *Vashti and *Esther, and how they are represented. Another area of feminist discussion is the Diaspora background of the narrative and its significance for the portrayal of the characters.

9.1. The Characters of Esther. Feminist scholars are divided in their evaluation of Esther. Characteristics that are regarded as valuable by some scholars, such as her shrewd use of her femininity, charm, pliability and diplomacy, are derided by others who regard Esther as a male fantasy of the ideal woman rather than as a role model that modern women would wish to embrace.

Beginning with a positive evaluation, White portrays Esther as the successful Diaspora Jew. Esther symbolizes the vulnerability and weakness of the Diaspora Jew in two ways: not only is she a Jew in the midst of the Persian Empire and thus marginal, but also she is a woman and thus subordinate to the males surrounding her. As such, her success is doubly remarkable and thus also a model. First, Esther knows to appreciate the advice of more experienced seniors, *Mordecai and Hegai. Thus she is showing herself to be cooperative, an important characteristic for a successful court life. Second, once she becomes queen, she uses her elevated position to enhance the position of her relatives, in this case Mordecai. In contrast, Mordecai, although a sympathetic character, is not equally successful in that he refuses to fit into the situation in which he finds himself. He alienates Haman by refusing to bow down to him. In doing so, Mordecai puts his own community at risk and has to rely on Esther's position to repair the damage. Third, even when taking charge, Esther remains circumspect. Rather than blurting out her request to the king immediately, she wisely takes precautions such as dressing up and asking people to fast on her behalf. This is not cowardice but rather a realistic assessment of the situation. White concludes that Esther, by accepting the reality of a subordinate position and learning to gain power by working within the structure rather than against it, shows how a Jew can build a successful and fulfilling life in the Diaspora (cf. Niditch 1993, 138-40). Along the same lines, S. Niditch (1993) sees Esther as an archetype of a wise woman: "She knows enough to take good advice and to be self-effacing, humble and even-tempered" (135). Esther's cleverness emerges in the way she employs her womanly assets to seduce Haman and *Ahasuerus: she dresses for success, uses flattery, wine and food to reach the king, and is self-effacing in her overall demeanor. Nonetheless, Niditch (1993, 36, 39) points out that Esther, while being "an altogether appealing portrait of women's wisdom for the men of a ruling patriarchate" is "hardly an image meaningful or consoling to modern women." Regarding Esther less enthusiastically, Wyler examines Esther's relationship with Mordecai and points out her compliance with Mordecai's authority throughout her career. Esther is only briefly in command after her confrontation with Mordecai (Esther 4:13-14). Yet as soon as the pogrom against the Jews is past, she slips back into obscurity again, and it is Mordecai, in his new role as vizier, who receives the new power rather than Esther.

9.2. The Character of Vashti. Vashti is in many respects Esther's counterpart. Whereas Esther is portrayed as subdued, obedient, womanly and clever, Vashti comes across as a person with a well-developed sense of (her own) human dignity and the boldness to stand up against royal power that has turned violent. When the king summons her to his drinking party, for the purpose of parading her beauty before his courtiers, she refuses (Esther 1:10-12). It is possible, although not explicitly stated, that Vashti had good reasons, either her modesty or her queenly position, for her refusal to be a spectacle for drunken men. As a result of her disobedience, the king, prompted by his advisors, decides to legally ban a wife's disobedience to her husband, lest all the women of his empire rebel against their husbands. What is needed, according to M. Gendler, is a more balanced picture of the two women. The present condemnation of Vashti's independence and pride, together with the praise of Esther's piety, beauty and obedience, often induces women to choose Esther as the role model. Instead, Gendler suggests reinstating Vashti alongside Esther, in this way combining the attributes of these two women: pride tempered by humility, independence checked by heartfelt loyalties. Such women would be more whole than those who simply seek to emulate Esther.

Vashti's behavior versus that of Mordecai is another topic of feminist discussion. In a sense, Mordecai's refusal to bow to the vizier Haman and the subsequent decision to punish the Jewish population of Persia (Esther 3) is parallel to the episode of Vashti's refusal (Esther 1): because two individuals, out of their own dignity and sense of self, refuse to comply with royal orders, their corporate society suffers (Wyler, 122). Gendler, investigating the estimation of these two characters in traditional exegesis, concludes that similar behavior in men and women is treated differently: whereas Vashti is condemned for her defiance and refusal to submit to Ahasuerus's demands, Mordecai is highly admired for his refusal to debase himself before Haman.

9.3. Comparisons Between the Different Versions.

The text of Esther is preserved in three different versions: the MT, the LXX and the Alpha text (see Esther 5: Greek Versions). Several scholars, feminist and otherwise, discuss the differences between the different versions. Of special interest to feminist scholars are the different portrayals of the feminine characters as evidenced in the different versions, and how these narratives in general reflect women's status. For example, K. de Troyer compares the limited section Esther 2:8-18, concerning Esther's preparation and selection as Ahasuerus's queen, and concludes that both the MT and the Alpha text are written from a male perspective, the former aiming at an audience of both men and women, and the latter strictly at men. In contrast, a more female perspective, together with a faint note of criticism of the earlier male bias of the MT, can be detected in the version preserved in the LXX. Reaching a different conclusion, T. K. Beal argues that the events narrated in Esther 1 predispose us to view the rest of the book in a certain way. In the case of the MT, the portrayal of Vashti as a heroine in a gender-based conflict against Ahasuerus and his male counselors causes the reader to side with the queen against the king. In contrast, the extended versions found in the LXX and the Alpha text, which include an episode in which Mordecai saves the king from a plot against his life, station the reader in favor of Mordecai and hence also in favor of the king, while Vashti is made to stand in relation with those plotting against the king and later also with Haman. Finally, L. Day (237-41) offers a more extensive analysis of the three versions and of their respective portrayals of the main characters. Although the results of Day's study as a whole go beyond feminist concerns, it has significant implications for feminist hermeneutics.

First, the diversity of the characterizations of Esther allows us to ask new questions with regard to Esther and to utilize her as a model in different ways. Second, the paradigmatic character of the book of Esther is connected with the search of feminist scholars today for a liberating way to claim the Bible as authoritative. In regarding Esther as Scripture, we can find in all three figures of Esther models for faithful living.

See also ESTHER; HERMENEUTICS; NAOMI; RUTH; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC INTERPRETATION; VASHTI; WOMAN WISDOM AND WOMAN FOLLY; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. U. Bail, "Vernimm, Gott, mein Gebet: Psalm 55 und Gewalt gegen Frauen," in Feministische Hermeneutik und Erstes Testament: Analysen und Interpretationen, ed. H. Jahn timer (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1994) 67-84; ET, "'O God, Hear My Prayer': Psalm 55 and Violence against Women," in Wisdom and Psalms, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/2; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 242-63; G. Baumann, "A Figure with Many Facets: The Literary and Theological Functions of Personified Wisdom in Proverbs 1-9," in Wisdom and Psalms, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/2; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 44-78; T. K. Beal, "Tracing Esther's Beginnings," in A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susanna, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 7; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 87-110; J. Bekkenkamp and F. van Dijk, "The Canon of the Old Testament and Women's Cultural Traditions," in Historiography of Women's Cultural Traditions, ed. M. Meijer and J. Schaap (Language, Culture and Female Future 3; Dordrecht: Foris, 1987) 91-108; repr. in A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 1; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 67-85; A. O. Bellis, "The Gender and Motives of the Wisdom Teacher in Proverbs 7," BBR 6 (1996) 15-22; repr. in Wisdom and Psalms, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/2; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 79-91; F. C. Black, "Unlikely Bedfellows: Allegorical and Feminist Reading of Song of Songs 7.1-8," in The Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/6; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000) 104-29; A. Brenner, "'Come Back, Come Back the Shulammitte' (Song of Songs 7.1-10): A Parody of the wasf Genre," in On Humour and the Comic in the Hebrew Bible, ed. A. Brenner and Y. T. Radday (JSOTSup 92; Sheffield: Almond, 1990) 251-76;

- repr. in A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 1; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 234-57; A. Brenner and F. van Dijk-Hemmes, On Gendering Texts: Female and Male Voices in the Hebrew Bible (BIS 1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1993); C. V. Camp, "Woman Wisdom as Root Metaphor: A Theological Consideration," in The Listening Heart: Essays in Wisdom and the Psalms in Honour of Roland E. Murphy, O. Carm., ed. K. G. Hoglund et al. (JSOTSup 58; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987) 45-76; idem, Wise, Strange, and Holy: The Strange Woman and the Making of the Bible (JSOTSup 320; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 2000); E. S. Christianson, "Qoheleth the 'Old Boy' and Qoheleth the 'New Man': Misogynism, the Womb and a Paradox in Ecclesiastes," in Wisdom and Psalms, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/2; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 109-36; L. Day, Three Faces of a Queen: Characterization in the Book of Esther (JSOTSup 186; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1995); K. de Troyer, "An Oriental Beauty Parlour: An Analysis of Esther 2.8-18 in the Hebrew, the Septuagint and the Second Greek Text," in A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susannah, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 7; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 47-70; L. E. Donaldson, "The Sign of Orpah: Reading Ruth through Native Eyes," in Ruth and Esther, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 2/3; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999) 130-44; J. C. Exum, "Feminist Criticism: Whose Interests Are Being Served?" in Judges and Method: New Approaches in Biblical Studies, ed. G. A. Yee (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995) 65-90; idem, "Ten Things Every Feminist Should Know about the Song of Songs," in The Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/6; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000) 24-35; M. Falk, "The wasfs," in Love Lyrics from the Hebrew Bible: A Translation and Literary Study of the Song of Songs (BLS 4; Sheffield: Almond, 1982), 80-87; repr. in A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 1; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 225-33; C. R. Fontaine, "The Social Roles of Women in the World of Wisdom," in A Feminist Companion to Wisdom Literature, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 24-49; idem, "'Many Devices' (Qoheleth 7.23-8.1): Qoheleth, Misogyny and the Malleus Maleficarum," in Wisdom and Psalms, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/2; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 137-68; M. Gendler, "The Restoration of Vashti," in The Jewish Woman: New Perspectives, ed. E. Koltun (New York: Schocken, 1976) 241-47; S. D. Goitein, "The Song of Songs: A Female Composition," Studies in the Bible (Tel Aviv: Yavneh Press, 1957) 301-7, 316-17; repr. in A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 1; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 58-66; J. M. Hadley, "Wisdom and the Goddess," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 234-43; M. Heijerman, "Who Would Blame Her? The 'Strange' Woman of Proverbs 7," in A Feminist Companion to Wisdom Literature, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 100-109; B. Honig, "Ruth, the Model Emigrée: Mourning and the Symbolic Politics of Immigration," in Ruth and Esther, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 2/3; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999) 50-74; B. B. Kaiser, "Poet as Female Impersonator: The Image of Daughter Zion as Speaker in Biblical Poems of Suffering," JR 67 (1987) 164-82; L. R. Klein, "Job and the Womb: Text about Men, Subtext about Women," in A Feminist Companion to Wisdom Literature, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 186-200; B. LaNeel Tanner, "Hearing the Cries Unspoken: An Intertextual-Feminist Reading of Psalm 109," in Wisdom and Psalms, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/2; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 283-301; T. Linafelt, "Surviving Lamentations," HBT 17 (1995) 45-61; repr. in A Feminist Companion to Reading the Bible: Approaches, Methods and Strategies, ed. A. Brenner and C. Fontaine (FCB 11; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997) 344-57; C. Maier and S. Schroer, "What about Job? Questioning the Book of 'The Righteous Sufferer,'" in Wisdom and Psalms, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/2; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 175-204; C. Meyers, "Gender Imagery in the Song of Songs," HAR 10 (1986) 209-23; repr. in A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 1; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993a) 197-212; idem, "Returning Home: Ruth 1.8 and the Gendering of the Book of Ruth," in A Feminist Companion to Ruth, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 3; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993b) 85-114; C. Newsom, "Woman and the Discourse of Patriarchal Wisdom: A Study of Proverbs 1-9," in Gender and Difference in Ancient Israel, ed. P. L. Day (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989) 142-60; S. Niditch,

"Esther: Folklore, Wisdom, Feminism and Authority," in Underdogs and Tricksters: A Prelude to Folklore (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987) 126-45, 168-70; repr. in A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susannah, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 7; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 26-46; K. M. O'Connor, "Lamentations," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992) 187-91; A. Ostriker, "A Holy of Holies: The Song of Songs as Countertext," in The Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/6; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000) 36-54; S. Schroer, "Wise and Counselling Women in Ancient Israel: Literary and Historical Ideals of the Personified HOKMA," in A Feminist Companion to Wisdom Literature, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 67-84; idem, "'Under the Shadow of Your Wings': The Metaphor of God's Wings in the Psalms, Exodus 19.4, Deuteronomy 32.11 and Malachi 3.20, as Seen through the Perspective of Feminism and the History of Religion," in Wisdom and Psalms, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/2; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 264-82; P. Trible, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); F. van Dijk-Hemmes, "The Imagination of Power and the Power of Imagination," JSOT 44 (1989) 75-88; repr. in A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 1; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993a), 156-70; idem, "Ruth: A Product of Women's Culture," in A Feminist Companion to Ruth, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 3; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993b) 134-39; E. van Wolde, "The Development of Job: Mrs Job as Catalyst," in A Feminist Companion to Wisdom Literature, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 201-21; idem, "Texts in Dialogue with Texts: Intertextuality in the Ruth and Tamar Narratives," BibInt 5 (1997a) 1-28; repr. as "Intertextuality: Ruth in Dialogue with Tamar," in A Feminist Companion to Reading the Bible: Approaches, Methods and Strategies, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 11; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997b) 426-51; S. A. White, "Esther: A Feminine Model for Jewish Diaspora?" in Gender and Difference in Ancient Israel, ed. P. L. Day (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989) 161-77; B. Wyler, "Esther: The Incomplete Emancipation of a Queen," in A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susanna, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 7; Sheffield:

Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 111-35. G. A. Yee, "'I Have Perfumed My Bed with Myrrh': The Foreign Woman ('išša zārā) in Proverbs 1-9," JSOT 43 (1989) 53-68; repr. in A Feminist Companion to Wisdom Literature, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 110-26. L.-S. Tiemeyer

FESTIVALS. See CULT, WORSHIP: PSALMS; MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS; PURIM.

FLORAL IMAGERY

Floral imagery is understood as anything related to plant life that is mentioned in the poetry and Wisdom literature of the OT. Here, this huge subject will be divided in terms of those plants whose products are consumed, those whose products are either applied to the person or used for other human activities, and those plants that are otherwise mentioned in the Wisdom literature. In many cases, various identifications have been proposed for some of the flora described here. This is especially true where the item occurs only once and is therefore subject to a variety of possible referents, given the absence of a more precise description. Designations of various plants are made primarily on the basis of three sources: (1) ancient West Semitic and other Near Eastern sources, including the Hebrew Bible, where the term or its cognate occurs and is described; (2) later sources, including translations of Hebrew terms in the Greek LXX, the Syriac Peshitta, the Latin Vulgate, and the Aramaic *Targumim, as well as the rabbinic literature that comments on the plants mentioned in the Bible; (3) the environment, including both the paleobotanical analyses that recover flora at various archaeological sites throughout the biblical world and what is known of the present ecology in these lands and what kinds of flora the environment supports.

1. Variety of Flora in Ancient Israel
2. Edible Flora
3. Cosmetics and Aromatics
4. Other Plants

1. Variety of Flora in Ancient Israel.

The wide-ranging topography and numerous ecological zones of Palestine allow for the appearance of numerous and varied types of flora. Beyond that, its neighbors to the north and south were famous for the cedars of Lebanon and the papyrus of Egypt. Finally, the land's role as a crossroads for trade and mercantile activity brought to it exotic spices and other precious materials from South Arabia and beyond. The poetry of the Bible, with its richness of imagery and expression, found a ready source for inspiration in the beauty and variety of floral sources. One of the earliest Hebrew inscriptions (some would claim that it is closer to Phoenician), dating c. 900 BC and found at the south Palestinian city of Gezer, is itself a poem describing the agricultural year. Beginning with the autumn, it takes the reader through the twelve months of the year and mentions no less than four types of flora, despite its brevity:

Two months of ingathering,
Two months of sowing,
Two months of late sowing,

A month of chopping flax,
A month of barley harvest,
A month of harvest and measuring,

Two months of grape cutting,
A month of summer fruit.

Some seven centuries later, well into the Hellenistic period, the writer of Sirach personifies wisdom in a series of similes drawn from the flora of the region:

I was exalted like a cedar in Libanus, and as a cypress tree upon the mountains of Hermon.
I was exalted like a palm tree in En-Gaddi, and as a rose plant in Jericho,
as a fair olive tree in a pleasant field,
and grew up as a plane tree by the water.
I gave a sweet smell like cinnamon and aspalathus, and I yielded a pleasant odour like the best
myrrh,
as galbanum, and onyx, and sweet storax, and as the fume of frankincense in the tabernacle.
As the turpentine tree I stretched out my branches, and my branches are the branches of honour and grace.
As the vine brought I forth pleasant savour, and my flowers are the fruit of honour and riches. (Sir 24:13-17 kjv)

More than a source of life, the flora served as a potent source of poetic imagery for Israel's poets and sages.

2. Edible Flora.

The staple diet in ancient Israel consisted of products made from barley and wheat grains. In addition to the production of bread, the grain could be roasted and eaten as soon as it was gathered (Ruth 2:14). Harvested in March/April, barley was presented as a firstfruits offering at the Feast of Unleavened Bread. *Naomi and her daughter-in-law *Ruth arrived in Bethlehem at the beginning of the barley harvest, and it was during that harvest that she gleaned in the fields of *Boaz (Ruth 1:22; 2:17). She remained until the end of the wheat harvest, which would follow the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost, in May/June (Ruth 2:23). At that time the firstfruits of the wheat harvest were presented to God. "Barley" and "wheat" can be used as a word pair, as in Job's self-imprecation for briars and weeds instead of wheat and barley (Job 31:40). However, wheat appears more frequently in the poetic literature to describe desirable images. Barley was the food of farm animals and of the poor. Whereas barley never occurs in *Psalms, God's promise to satisfy Israel with the finest of wheat parallels honey (Ps 81:16 [MT 17]) and national peace (Ps 147:14). Sirach 39:26 also refers to wheat, along with salt, honey, milk, wine and oil, when describing what is necessary for a person to live.

The product of the grains most frequently consumed was bread. For *Job, divine instruction is treasured more than his daily bread, which he does not hesitate to share with the poor (Job 23:12; 31:17). In Psalms the dominant imagery for bread includes themes of basic sustenance (Ps 37:25; 104:15), fellowship (Ps 41:9 [MT 10]), evil and evildoers (Ps 14:4; 53:4 [MT 5]; 80:5 [MT 6]), and the manna in the wilderness (Ps 78:25; 105:40; cf. Wis 16:20). In *Proverbs bread imagery is used in connection with the recurring themes of wickedness (Prov 4:17) or idleness (Prov 31:27) and of bread as the essential commodity of life (Prov 6:26; 28:21; 30:8). The well-known proverb of Ecclesiastes 11:1, admonishing the reader to cast bread upon the waters and to find it again much later, also suggests the theme of a basic commodity, as do the occurrences in *Lamentations (e.g., Lam 1:11; 2:12) and in Sirach (e.g., Sir 10:27; 12:5).

Olives and grapes were the other two crops chiefly cultivated in biblical times. Ideal for the rocky hillside soil of the Mediterranean region, the olive tree does not compete for arable soil with the grains. As a major source of oil and fat in the human diet, it is used in parallel with cream in Job's description of his earlier blessed life (Job 29:6). Its long lifespan, as well as the strength and endurance of such a tree, invites comparison with those who belong forever to the house of God (Ps 52:8 [MT 10]). Perhaps the same characteristics lie behind a blessing of children who will be like olive shoots, not to mention the export of oil as a major source of economic success for Palestine (Ps 128:3). The olive tree is a symbol of fruitfulness (Sir 50:10). The misfortune of the wicked is likened to the loss of olives and grapes, where these occur in parallel (Job 15:33). Grapes are mentioned explicitly elsewhere in the biblical poetic books only in Psalm 80:12 (MT 13), where the lack of protection allows passers by to pick them, just as God allows foreigners to invade Israel. A cluster of grapes represents the female lover's breasts in Song of Songs 7:8 (MT 9), suggesting fecundity and the object of desire. Treading the winepress full of grapes is an image of the labor of learning wisdom (Sir 33:16-17), as the flower before the ripened grape is an image of youth searching for wisdom (Sir 51:15). In addition to one of the necessities of life, the grape's "blood" serves as a libation to God (Sir 39:26; 50:15).

References to wine occur frequently and in many forms. There is the vinegar of wine used for dipping bread (Ruth 2:14), which also appears as an unpleasant drink (Ps 69:21 [MT 22]). There is also the royal wine drunk by the king of Persia and his guests (e.g., Esther 1:7-10) and by the children of Job in their partying (Job 1:13, 18). Elsewhere, wine can be a symbol of joy and blessing (Ps 4:7 [MT 8]; Prov 3:10; Eccles 9:7; 10:19) or of calamity and judgment (Ps 60:3 [MT 9]; Prov 4:17). Wine mixed with (narcotic?) substances provides an image of the worst of divine judgment (Ps 75:8 [MT 9]) and of the seduction that leads to death (Prov 9:2, 5). It is also a symbol of immoderation, and its use in Proverbs brings poverty to those who wish to succeed (Prov 20:1; 21:17; 23:20, 30, 31; 31:4) but relief for those in distress (Prov 31:6). More than any other book, *Song of Songs images the inebriation of wine in kissing (Song 1:2; 7:9 [MT 10]) and in lovemaking (Song 1:4; 4:10; 5:1; 7:2 [MT 3]; 8:2). Nevertheless, in later Jewish Wisdom literature its dominant image is that of the ungodly (Wis 2:7) and of a source of ruin when drunk to excess (Sir 9:9; 19:2; 31:25-31). Even here, however, wine imbibed in moderation is a joy (Sir 31:28; 32:5-6; 40:20; 49:1).

The date palm appears in Song of Songs 7:7-8 (MT 8-9), where the male likens his lover to such a tree, and her breasts to its cluster of fruit. This echoes an image found on iconography for millennia throughout the ancient Near East (Keel, 240-48). The honey produced from the dates could be a special sweetness and a source of energy. It is sometimes indistinguishable from the honey produced by bees. Date honey may appear as a blessing in Job 20:17 and as a picture of the sweetness of God's law in Psalm 119:103. In Proverbs the lips of the adulteress drip honey (Prov 5:3), and overindulgence in the sweet liquid leads to illness (Prov 25:16, 27; 27:7). The male in the Song of Songs finds milk and honey under his lover's tongue (Song 5:1). In Sirach honey is also paired with milk, including the promise of the land of milk and honey (Sir 39:26; 46:8). It also describes remembrances of saintly figures (Sir 49:1).

The fig tree ripens its fruit several times between June and September, encouraging an image of diligence in order to gain as much fruit as possible (Prov 27:18). Its early harvest produces the sweetest fruit and is the time for the lovers in Song of Songs (Song 2:13). Elsewhere, the loss of fig trees and sycamore figs is a sign of God's judgment against Egypt (Ps 78:47; 105:33). A different tree, the almond tree, produces white blossoms and serves as a metaphor for old age and the coming of white hair (Eccles 12:5).

The pomegranate, a round red fruit filled with seeds, is a symbol of fruitfulness and fertility. Among the psalms and in Wisdom literature it occurs only in Song of Songs. It is used in the pictures of the garden—a metaphor for the female body and its beauty and fruitfulness (Song 4:13; 6:11; 7:12 [MT 13]; 8:2). The pomegranate is also used to describe the female's cheeks or temples hidden behind her veil (Song 4:3; 6:7).

The Hebrew term tappūah appears in Proverbs 25:11, where it describes golden representations of this fruit set in silver. Some, however, understand this as grapes of gold rather than a fruit normally associated with the Hebrew term. Elsewhere the term occurs four times in Song of Songs (Song 2:3, 5; 7:8 [7:9 MT]; 8:5), where the tree-grown fruit is sweet and refreshing, producing fragrant breath. The last occurrence in Song of Songs associates the tree with a place of sexual arousal and conception. Although some have identified the fruit as apricot or quince, the most likely designation remains the apple. Despite claims to the contrary, the apple is not limited to more northern areas. It occurs frequently in Greco-Roman literature and appears much earlier in Sumerian texts. The apple in the expression “the apple of one’s eye” (Ps 17:8; Prov 7:2; Sir 17:22) is not a reference to a fruit in the original languages; rather, it literally describes the “(little) person” reflected in the pupil of the eye.

3. Cosmetics and Aromatics.

Psalm 45:8 (MT 9) introduces the robes of the royal bride as being perfumed with myrrh, aloes and cassia. Myrrh is a reddish gum resin of some value that would have been imported from southern Arabia. Its value and desirability form a picture of the female’s lover (Song 1:13; 5:13), of the perfumed female (Song 3:6; 4:14), of her breasts (Song 4:6) and of the feverish perspiration as she opens to her lover (Song 5:1). Both aloe and cassia derive from India, although the former is also found in eastern Africa and Yemen. It is small with jagged edges to its leaves. The red flowers produce an aromatic juice that was used in embalming processes in Egypt. Like myrrh, aloe describes the female (Song 4:14). In Proverbs 7:17 the bed of the seductress corresponds to the robes of Psalm 45, as it is perfumed with myrrh, aloes and cinnamon. Here cinnamon substitutes for cassia.

Following the MT, spikenard and henna are associated with myrrh in Song of Songs 1:12-14 as perfumes that describe the female and her regard for her lover. Spikenard, or pure nard, comes from the Himalayas. On the other hand, henna occurs as a yellow flower that is native to Palestine. It is commonly used as a reddish dye and can be applied to the body as a deodorant and perfume. With myrrh, spikenard and henna occur in these verses to describe the increasing intimacy that the female envisions for her and her lover.

The greatest concentration of fruits and aromatics occurs in the male’s description of his lover’s body as a garden that he visits in Song of Songs 4:13-14: greenery, a garden of pomegranates, the best of fruits, henna and spikenard, spikenard and turmeric, spice cane and cinnamon, trees of frankincense, myrrh and aloes, the best spices. “Turmeric,” rather than “saffron,” best renders karkôm as an aromatic from southeastern Asia. The yellow substance from the flower can be used as a dye and a spice. Spice cane and cinnamon are used with myrrh to produce the holy anointing oil of the tabernacle in Exodus 30:23. If spice cane originated in southeast Arabia, cinnamon came from eastern India, Sri Lanka and China. “Frankincense,” rather than “incense,” best renders lēbônâ (“whiteness”). Like myrrh, it occurs in southern Arabia and Somaliland (i.e., Djibouti, Somalia and southeastern Ethiopia). Its association with royalty in Song of Songs 3:6 and with myrrh in Song of Songs 4:6 attest to its rarity and value. It was burned to produce a pleasing aroma (Sir 24:15; 39:14; 50:8 [with roses and lilies]). Sirach 24:15 compares the aroma of frankincense with cinnamon and aspalathus, and with myrrh, galbanum, onyx and sweet storax.

If the term ’ezrâ in Psalm 37:35 is to be so read (and not a metathesis of a form of ’erez [“cedar”]), then this may designate the bay laurel, a tree accommodated to rocky hillsides whose leaves form wreaths and can be made into a spice. The caper tree is mentioned in Ecclesiastes 12:5. Apparently, it was believed to function as an aphrodisiac (NIV: “desire no longer is stirred”). Ecclesiastes 7:6 identifies the thorny burnet, whose leaves could be used as a potherb.

Flowers whose aroma could be appreciated include the ḥābaṣṣālet, which is variously rendered as “crocus,” “asphodel,” “rose” or some other flower bulb. Precise identification is uncertain (cf. the blossoms in Song 2:12), but it serves as a symbol of fertility and beauty in the wilderness (see Is 35:1) and similarly of the female as she describes herself in Song of Songs 2:1. There as well she compares herself to the šūšan, sometimes understood as a lily but best interpreted as a water lily or lotus (1 Kings 7:26) and borrowed from the Egyptian term. Although used medicinally in Egypt, lilies appear in the titles (or melodic directions) for four psalms (Ps 45; 60; 69; 80). The flower is mentioned eight times in Song of Songs, whether to describe aspects of the female’s beauty (Song 2:2; 7:2 [7:3 MT]), the male’s beauty (Song 5:13), or the beautiful setting of the woman’s features and the couple’s love (Song 2:16; 4:5; 6:2, 3; cf. Sir 39:14). If lotuses can arouse emotions of beauty and love, wormwood or gall can reflect the bitterness of folly or the despair of God's absence (Prov 5:4; Lam 3:15, 19).

If the hallāmût of Job 6:6 is a vegetable, not an egg or cheese, then it is likely the mallow, a wild plant with a hairy stem and leaves and reddish flowers. Its mucilage is referenced here as being flavorless. The mandrakes, or love fruits, were associated with fertility (Gen 30:14-16). Although their fruit could serve as food and their roots possessed narcotic properties, the focus of Song of Songs 7:13 (MT 14) considers the pleasing and distinctive fragrance that arouses and delights in the context of lovemaking.

4. Other Plants.

Although many of the following plants might be listed under edible flora, their use for human consumption is not described in the Bible.

Identified variously as bramble or buckthorn, the ʿāṭād grows to threaten the pots in Ps 58:9 (58:10 MT). Although its black fruit was used medicinally, this was not the focus of the psalmist's comment. Another plant native to the desert areas of Palestine is the broom bush. This bush grew to be four to twelve feet in height, and the biblical poets focus on its roots, which were used for charcoal. It forms an undesirable fruit in Job 30:4, and its burning coals are the substance of punishment in Psalm 120:4. Elsewhere are other plants of the thorny type. The basic bramble or thorny plant is used to describe the paths of the wicked (Prov 22:5; cf. 2 Esdr 16:32, 77) and the extent to which the hungry will go to gain food (Job 5:5). Nettle occupies the wilderness (Job 30:7) and grows wherever the land is not tended (Prov 24:31). Another type of thorny plant (hēdeq) blocks the way of the lazy person (Prov 15:19). A final type of thorn bush or thistle (hōah) occurs as an example of a curse (Job 31:40), a metaphor for the misuse of a proverb (Prov 26:9), and as an image of the friends of a woman in comparison with her surpassing loveliness (Song 2:2). Only in Sirach (Sir 28:24) do thorns become a means of defense for one's possessions.

A poisonous plant (rōʾš), possibly related to hemlock, describes the bitter feelings of the author who saw Jerusalem destroyed (Lam 3:19).

The trees found in the poetic and wisdom books include the willow (ʿārābā), the pine or cypress (bērōš), and the cedar (ʿerez). The willow or poplar was a tree associated with the exiles in Babylon (Ps 137:2) and with the streams by which they grow (Job 40:22). Found along waterways, the tree is a source of dye, medicines and wood for small objects. The pine is a home for the stork (Ps 104:17). The already noted cedar is one of the most frequently mentioned of all flora. It occurs some seventy-three times in the Bible, nine of which are found in the poetic books. Evidence of its wood appears in biblical-period strata from many ancient sites in and around Palestine, attesting to its use in major (often state-sponsored) projects of the period of the monarchy. The cedars are associated with the cedars of Lebanon (Ps 104:16), often used for building materials (1 Esdr 4:48; 5:55). They are powerful trees (Ps 80:10 [MT 11]) planted by God (Ps 104:16). The might of the behemoth has a tail that is compared to the cedar (Job 40:17), just as others will use it for an image of personal strength and security (Sir 24:13; 50:12). Yet the voice of the Lord is powerful enough to break these mighty trees (Ps 29:5). In Song of Songs cedar wood builds the house of the lovers (Song 1:17) and is the material that the female uses to describe her lover's appearance (Song 5:15). It is also a strong material used to defend the female's sister (Song 8:9). Thus the cedar tree is used to represent strength and power, as well as security and a certain nobility. This is reflected in the cedar of Lebanon, a tree that can reach over one hundred feet in height and half a millennium in lifespan. These facts, combined with the tree's massive size, provide a vivid picture of strength and endurance. At least once, the cedar appears in parallel with the palm tree (Ps 92:12 [MT 13]), where both trees symbolize growth and success. In Song of Songs the female is compared with the palm tree in terms of her height and beauty (Song 7:7-8).

This survey does not exhaust all the flora mentioned in the wisdom and poetic books. General terms for grass (ʿēseb, deše) [Job 5:25; 6:5], salty and bitter herbs (mallūah, mārōr) [Job 30:4; Lam 3:15] and flowers (šiš) [Ps 103:15] all imply the presence of a rich and verdant physical world that could stimulate the imagination of Israel's poets and sages.

See also ANIMAL IMAGERY; ARCHITECTURAL IMAGERY; CREATION IMAGERY; IMAGERY; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; WASF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. O. Borowski, Agriculture in Iron Age Israel: The Evidence from Archaeology and the Bible (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1987); idem, Daily Life in Biblical Times (SBLABS 5; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2003); F. N.

Hepper, Illustrated Encyclopedia of Bible Plants: Flowers and Trees, Fruits and Vegetables, Ecology (Leicester: Inter-Varsity Press, 1992); R. S. Hess, Song of Songs (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, 2005); D. C. Hopkins, The Highlands of Canaan: Agricultural Life in the Early Iron Age (SWBA 3; Sheffield: Almond, 1985); I. Jacob and W. Jacob, “Flora,” ABD 2.803-17; O. Keel, The Song of Songs (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); P. J. King, Jeremiah: An Archaeological Companion (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1993); P. J. King and L. E. Stager, Life in Biblical Israel (LAI; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); W. D. Suderman, “Modest or Magnificent? Lotus versus Lily in Canticles,” CBQ 67 (2005) 42-58.

R. S. Hess

FOLLY

Folly is the antithesis of wisdom (Prov 15:21; Eccles 2:13, 19), and the fool is one who hates “knowledge” and the “fear of the LORD” (Prov 1:22, 29). The book of *Proverbs in particular offers an extensive character study of fools and their ways, while the books of *Psalms and *Ecclesiastes further illustrate the nature of folly. *Job will not be considered here because, although it deals with the character of wisdom, it explicitly treats folly only very marginally.

1. Terms for “Fool/Folly” and Some Related Concepts
2. Folly in Proverbs
3. Folly in Ecclesiastes
4. Folly in Psalms
5. The Characteristics of Folly
6. The Consequence of Folly
7. New Testament Development

1. Terms for “Fool/Folly” and Some Related Concepts.

The Hebrew words ʿewil, kēsîl, sākāl and nābāl are traditionally rendered “fool,” and their associated abstract nouns, principally ʾiwwelet, kēsîlūt, siklūt and nēbālā, “folly.” Closely associated terms include peṭî (“simple, gullible”), ḥāsar-lēb (“mindless”), baʿar (“senseless”) and lēš (“mock”).

Apart from the “simple” (peṭî), whose manner of life is not yet fixed, the universe of the Wisdom writings, particularly Proverbs, seems, at least on the surface, to be divided into two entrenched camps: the wise and the foolish. The two commonest terms for “fool” in the Wisdom writings are kēsîl (71x in the OT, all in the Wisdom books) and ʿewil (22x in the Wisdom writings, 4x elsewhere in the OT). For the kēsîl (“fool”), folly is a way of life, one not based on revealed knowledge and covenantal *righteousness. If the fear of Yahweh is the fundamental principle of wisdom (Prov 1:7; 9:10), it is the lack of such fear that characterizes the fool (Prov 1:22, 29). The fool is not so much one who inherently lacks intelligence as one who is morally perverse and resistant to the way of the Lord. As such, the fool is contrasted with the “righteous” and closely identified with the “wicked,” who delight in doing evil (Prov 10:21, 23; 13:19), just as the “wise” and the “righteous” are coreferential (Prov 9:9; 23:24; Eccles 9:1). The word ʿewil is used with little if any differentiation from kēsîl, though some detect in ʿewil a slightly stronger term. Fox (41) suggests that the ʿewil is obtuse because of moral perversion, whereas the kēsîl is or is likely to become morally perverse because of obtuseness, but this subtle distinction is difficult to sustain. Where the two roots are brought into association (and the two terms for “fool” are never found in parallel), it is always the kēsîl (“fool”) who is said to practice ʾiwwelet (“folly”), and in ways suggesting that this folly is both a cause and a result of being a kēsîl, most notably Proverbs 14:24: “the folly [ʾiwwelet] of fools [kēsîlim] yields folly [ʾiwwelet]” (cf. Prov 12:23; 13:16; 14:8; 15:2, 14; 17:12; 26:4-5, 11).

Another word group is derived from the root skl. Sākāl (“fool, foolish”) and siklūt (siklūt)/sekel (“folly”) are restricted in the Wisdom literature to Ecclesiastes (Eccles 1:17; 2:3, 12, 19; 7:17, 25; 10:1, 3, 6, 13, 14). Again, such folly is the result not of a lack of intelligence but rather of a morally perverse stance (“wickedness is folly,” or perhaps “folly is wickedness” [Eccles 7:25]), and it is difficult to discern any significant difference in meaning from the other words for “folly” discussed above.

The root nbl is more sparingly used in the Wisdom writings for “fool” and “folly” (9x) and may represent the most hardened of the categories normally glossed as “fool.” Through a study of its use elsewhere in the OT, Phillips suggests that a nābāl (“fool”) is one who exhibits serious disorderly and unruly conduct leading to the breakup of a relationship. This is borne out by its use in Psalms 14:1; 53:1, where the nābāl (“fool”) is the practical atheist whose frame of reference excludes God and the divine revelation. Such fools revile and mock Yahweh’s name—that is, God and his revealed character (Ps 74:18, 22). In Proverbs 30:32 such a fool (nābāl) is one who indulges in self-exaltation and plans evil, while in Proverbs 17:7 such fools have “arrogant lips.” At the heart of such folly is the quest for human autonomy, the reliance on one’s own resources and the failure to acknowledge that true knowledge is derivative from God’s—the sin of the garden of Eden. This is not markedly different from the opinionated and self-reliant fool (kēsīl) of Proverbs 18:2; 28:26 or of the fool (’ewīl) in Proverbs 12:15 whose “way seems right to him.”

The peṭī (related to pātā [“be open”]) is simpleminded, lacking experience in making moral choices, ready to believe anything (Prov 14:15) (Waltke, 93). Though this word is used without a pejorative tone in Psalms, where it even suggests childlike trust (Ps 19:7; 116:6; 119:130; cf. 1QpHab XII, 4), in Proverbs (15x) it refers to those who are easily led astray (generally the young). It is such impressionable youth who are the target of the competing attentions of *Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly in Proverbs 9. The Wisdom books operate with a doctrine of original sin, for “folly is inherent in a child” (Prov 22:15). The “simple” in Proverbs are not so much morally neutral as morally tainted by the company that they keep (“fools” and “mockers” [Prov 1:22]). Left uncorrected, the innate “perversity” (mēsūbā [Prov 1:32]; elsewhere only in the Prophets) of the young will naturally tend to the practice of folly and is in need of the remedy of knowledge and prudence (Prov 1:4; 22; 8:5; 14:18; 21:11).

On the other end of the scale, and closely related to the terms for “fool” discussed above, is ba’ar, which refers to a “senseless” person (Ps 49:10; 92:6; 94:8) whose behavior seems less than fully human (Ps 73:22; Prov 30:2). Perhaps the strongest of the words associated with fools is lēš (“mockers”), one who behaves with overbearing arrogance and who seems locked into a cynical mindset that allows no room for correction (Ps 1:1; Prov 1:22; 3:34; 9:7, 8, 12; 13:1; 14:6; 15:12; 21:24).

2. Folly in Proverbs.

By far the most extended treatment of the nature of folly is to be found in the book of Proverbs. Proverbs 1–9 is devoted to an elaborate depiction of wisdom, though at many points the character of folly and those whose lives are caught up in it is implicit by way of antithesis with the depiction of wisdom, without a word for “folly” necessarily being mentioned (e.g., Prov 1:10-19). Likewise in the sentences that constitute the bulk of the book from Proverbs 10, the nature of folly is revealed explicitly by reference to fools and their behavior and inferentially from its contrast with the character of wisdom. Proverbs 10–15, with its more antithetical style of sentence proverbs, has a greater concentration of explicit statements about folly beginning with the programmatic “A wise son is a joy to his father, but a foolish son is a source of grief to his mother” (Prov 10:1). What follows is a character sketch of a fool, told with touches of humor—for example, the exaggeration in the image of a fool sleeping through harvest (Prov 10:5). The composite portrayal of a fool is designed to reveal the ugliness and ruinous nature of folly. As with all proverbs, one must ponder whether statements about fools are intended as universals or as illustrations of the foolish behavior of some in some situations. Is it always the case that silence is a sign of wisdom, and loquaciousness the mark of a fool (Prov 10:19)? It will sometimes be wise to respond to a fool according to his folly, and sometimes not (Prov 26:4-5).

Just as wisdom is portrayed in the book of Proverbs as a woman inviting the young to her banquet (Prov 9:1-6), so too is folly personified (Prov 9:13-18), and both figures have attracted considerable scholarly interest (see Waltke, 83-87). Both women vie for the attentions of the impressionable, and the appeal of their competing attentions is enhanced by sexual imagery. Each seeks to influence the civic and religious life of the community (“the highest point of the city” [Prov 9:3, 14]); each uses alluring speech and the promise of delectable food as enticements to enter her house. Whereas Wisdom is open and honest in her dealings, casting a watchful eye over her charges (Prov 4:6), Folly is “loud-mouthed” and “ignorant” (or “uncaring”) (Prov 9:13), thus sharing some characteristics with her targeted clientele (Prov 9:16). She offers her guests illicit fare: “stolen water and food eaten in secret” (Prov 9:17).

Just as suggestions have been made for the origin of the figure of Woman Wisdom in female deities, similar suggestions have been made in the case of Woman Folly. Principal among the deities proposed are Ishtar-Astarte and Anat (Fontaine, 142). Like Anat in the Ugaritic text Aqhat, Folly is depicted as a seductive harlot (for the background of prostitution in the ancient world, see Lang, 97-109).

There are similarities in the depiction of Woman Folly and of the “strange woman” (iššā zārā/nokriyyā) of Proverbs 2:16; 5:3, 20; 6:24; 7:5; 20:16; 22:14; 23:27; 27:13. Although this figure is sometimes regarded as a foreign seductress, with perhaps overtones of cultic prostitution (cf. 1 Kings 11:9-13; see Blenkinsopp), a better understanding might be that the woman is simply the wife of another man, and thus is an adulterous (presumably Israelite) woman (Whybray, 72-73) whose blandishments embody all that is alluring but off limits to the one who seeks to live by wisdom (Prov 2:16; 5:3; 7:5). While at one level such passages address the literal problem of sexual license, since adultery functions (particularly in the Prophets) as a common image of apostasy (Jer 3:9; Ezek 6:9; Hos 1:2), the figure of the adulterous woman (likened also to a harlot [Prov 23:27]), with the emphasis on her seductive speech (Yee), may serve to suggest other forms of waywardness (Camp, 40-71). The *personification of Folly in Proverbs 9, then, may be simply a creative projection of this image (assisted by the feminine gender of kēsīlūt [Prov 9:13]), similar to the personification in Psalm 85:10 of “righteousness and peace.” Both the “strange woman” (Prov 2:10-19; 5:1-6) and the personified Folly of Proverbs 9:13-18 are counterposed with Wisdom. The reference to “covenant” in Proverbs 2:17 (its only occurrence in Proverbs) would seem to point beyond the breach of a literal marriage covenant to Israel’s covenant unfaithfulness to God. J. Crenshaw (80) notes the prophetic influence on the personified Wisdom. There may similarly be an indication of prophetic language in Proverbs 9:16, with its use of the prophetic term sūr (“turn aside, deviate” [cf. Jer 6:28]), thus casting Folly in the role of a false prophet. So it would seem that, with J. Miles (87-101), we should see the figure of the “strange woman” as merging with Woman Folly and filling out the picture. Whereas Wisdom presents as a trustworthy figure, operating in the light, her counterpart is a creature of the night, whose ways are deceptive.

3. Folly in Ecclesiastes.

While also using kēsīl for “fool,” Ecclesiastes employs as its characteristic word for “folly” siklūt (śiklūt), with sākāl for “fool” (Eccles 1:17; 2:3, 12, 13, 19; 7:17, 25; 10:1, 3, 6, 13, 14). Such folly is closely associated with “madness” (hōlēlūt [Eccles 1:17; 2:12; 7:25; 9:3]; hōlēlūt [Eccles 10:13]) as a description of the lifestyle that exalts the pursuit of pleasure, and the one whose thoughts are recorded wonders if there is any advantage of wisdom over folly (Eccles 1:17; 2; 6:8; 7:25). In keeping with the tenor of the book, Ecclesiastes portrays folly as a perplexing phenomenon of the real world to be reckoned with, a consequence perhaps of the warped post-fall state of the world (Eccles 7:13). It is frustrating when fools, for example, unsuited to positions of responsibility, are found in high office (Eccles 4:13; 10:6). In other sections of Ecclesiastes are found sentiments reminiscent of the more conventional sentences of the book of Proverbs regarding folly (Eccles 2:13; 5:1, 3-4; 7:4-5, 9, 17, 25; 9:17; 10:1-3, 12-15).

4. Folly in Psalms.

Folly is only an incidental topic in Psalms (Ps 14:1; 38:5; 39:8; 49:10; 53:1; 69:5; 74:18, 22; 85:8; 92:6; 94:8; 107:17), and Psalms presents a somewhat different angle from that of Proverbs. The psalmist seems more ready to acknowledge the ever-present folly or threat of a slide into folly on his own part or of the people of God (Ps 38:5; 69:5; 85:8; 107:17). Psalm 107 is typical of this sentiment in describing the wavering faith of the “redeemed of Yahweh” (Ps 107:2), some of whom “became fools through their rebellious ways” (Ps 107:17) and who then cried out to Yahweh in their distress and were delivered (Ps 107:19). It is also in Psalms that we find the nearest thing in the OT to an expression of atheism or, more accurately, the sin of total disregard for God that characterizes the fool (nābāl [Ps 14:1; 53:1]), the universal attitude of those who pit themselves against God and his people. Once, in a passage akin to the mood of Ecclesiastes, the psalmist laments the common fate that befalls the wise and fools (Ps 49:10).

5. The Characteristics of Folly.

From the books of Proverbs, Psalms and Ecclesiastes some common characteristics of folly may be noted. Much of what is said about fools concerns their speech. A fool’s mouth is his or her undoing (Prov 18:7) because what is on the tongue and the lips betrays what is in the heart or mind (Prov 10:20-21; 12:23; 15:7, 28; 16:23). The mouth of the fool (kēsīl) both “feeds on” (Prov 15:14) and in turn “spouts” folly (’iwwelet [Prov 15:2]). Fools speak too soon and without listening (Prov 12:23; 18:13). They say too much (Prov 26:7; Eccles 5:3, 10:14). They slander others (Prov 10:18; 11:12; 20:19), are quarrelsome (Prov 20:3), irascible (Eccles 7:9), quick to take offense (Prov 12:16) or verbally aggressive (Prov 29:9). Although fools can at times say valid things such as proverbs, these proverbs, lacking a revelatory frame of reference, are “disabled” (Prov 26:7; cf. Sir 20:20).

More generally, fools are marked by their arrogant and self-confident stance (Prov 14:16) and their complacency (Prov 1:32). They are lazy (Prov 24:30; Eccles 4:5), improvident (Prov 21:20), careless (Prov 26:10) and unreliable (Prov 26:6). They are insincere in their religious commitments (Eccles 5:1, 4) and seek their own pleasure as their highest end (Eccles 7:4). But once they get an idea in their heads, there is nothing stopping them (Prov 17:12). By their behavior, fools are a cause of shame and grief to their parents (Prov 15:20; 17:21, 25; 19:13), a nonentity in the community (Prov 24:7) and held up to public shame (Prov 3:35) (see Honor and Shame).

However, folly is not ultimately about isolated acts of stupidity or waywardness but rather is about a different epistemology, a different orientation to knowledge (Crenshaw, 81). It is succumbing to the allure of this world’s godless knowledge as opposed to the knowledge that is based on the “fear of Yahweh” (Prov 1:7, 29). The choice is between autonomy and submission to the Creator. Since “water reflects a face as a person’s heart reflects the person” (Prov 27:19), all of the specific outworkings of folly are evidence of a heart-orientation (Ps 14:1; Prov 5:12; 12:23; Eccles 7:4; 10:2) that rejects the revelation of God. The fool is one who literally has a “deficiency of heart” (hāsar-lēb)—that is, someone who lacks sense (Prov 6:32; 7:7; 9:4, 16; 10:13, 21; 11:12; 12:11; 15:21; 17:18; 24:30) and thus is self-deluding (Prov 14:8).

6. The Consequence of Folly.

What, then, is the outcome of folly? Is there a remedy for folly, or are fools (excluding perhaps the “simple” [peti] beyond hope? On the one hand, there are absolute statements about the irremediable state of the fool: “Even if you grind a fool [’ēwīl] in a mortar, grinding him like grain with a pestle, you cannot remove his folly [’iwwelet] from him” (Prov 27:22). The categories of wise and fool seem, at least in Proverbs, to be largely unalterable categories, and the fate of fools seems to be fixed. At the very least, when left undisciplined and uninstructed, folly persisted in leads to ruin and death (Prov 1:32; 5:23; 8:36; 10:8, 10, 14, 21; 14:12; 15:10; 16:25; 19:3, 18; 23:13; Eccles 4:5; 7:17). The fate of mockers is to be on the receiving end of the awful divine mockery (Prov 3:34).

Such statements need to be read in the context of the purpose of Proverbs as a book of instruction to the young and of warning to them to reflect on their relationship to God and pay attention to the instruction of the book before such attitudes harden, without identifying when that moment comes. Just as the wise need and benefit from reproof, and hence are not above the danger of sliding into folly (Prov 17:10), so also there are indications that enmeshment in folly is not irreversible. The cry “How long will mockers delight in mockery and fools hate knowledge?” (Prov 1:22; cf. Ps 94:8), akin to the anguished laments of Psalms 6:3; 13:1, suggests a hope that folly will not have the last word, and that those who currently deserve the appellation “fools” may not be irredeemable. The experience of the people of God in Psalm 107 rather suggests that mercy may be the hope of those at least of God’s people who lapse into foolish behavior but who utter a heartfelt cry for deliverance. Though difficult and of uncertain outcome, since fools tend to despise discipline (Prov 1:7) and ridicule or abuse the means of restoration through sacrifice (Prov 14:9; Eccles 5:1), instruction is urged as the remedy (Prov 8:5), and discipline for fools is encouraged in the hope of a change of orientation (Prov 10:13; 16:22; 19:29; 22:15).

The choice between wisdom and folly is presented as the fundamental and most crucial decision to be made in life, particularly by the young—the choice between life and death—and so, in slightly different language, echoes the covenantal choices of life and death offered to Israel in places such as Deuteronomy 30:15.

7. New Testament Development.

The treatment of folly in the Wisdom writings forms the background to Jesus’ strong language concerning the seriousness of calling someone a “fool” in Matthew 5:22. All the more striking, then, is Jesus’ illustration of the wise and foolish builders in Matthew 7:26-27, where it is the failure to put Jesus' own words into practice that puts one into the same category as the "fools" of the Wisdom writings, thus implicitly identifying Jesus with Yahweh as the source of knowledge for right living. Similarly, folly characterizes those who are unprepared for the coming of the messianic "bridegroom" (Mt 25:1-13). Paul's characterization of the cross as foolishness in the estimation of the "perishing" is an indictment on them for their failure to acknowledge the true wisdom from God (1 Cor 1:18-25).

See also PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF; WISDOM THEOLOGY; WOMAN WISDOM AND WOMAN FOLLY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Blenkinsopp, "The Social Context of the 'Outsider Woman' in Proverbs 1-9," Bib 72 (1991) 457-73; C. Camp, Wise, Strange and Holy: The Strange Woman and the Making of the Bible (JSOTSup 320; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000); J. Crenshaw, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (rev. ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); C. Fontaine, Smooth Words: Women, Proverbs and Performance in Biblical Wisdom (JSOTSup 356; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); M. Fox, Proverbs 1-9 (AB 18A; New York: Doubleday, 2000); B. Lang, Wisdom and the Book of Proverbs: An Israelite Goddess Redefined (New York: Pilgrim Press, 1986); J. Miles, Wise King—Royal Fool: Semiotics, Satire and Proverbs 1-9 (London: T & T Clark International, 2004); A. Phillips, "NEBALAH—A Term for Serious Disorderly and Unruly Conduct," VT 25 (1975) 237-41; B. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); N. Whybray, The Book of Proverbs: A Survey of Modern Study (HBI 1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); G. Yee, "'I Have Perfumed My Bed with Myrrh': The Foreign Woman (iššā zārā) in Proverbs 1-9," JSOT 43 (1989) 53-68. J. Davies

FOOL, FOOLISHNESS. See FOLLY.

FORM CRITICISM

Form criticism is a foundational exegetical method in the modern critical interpretation of biblical texts. It analyzes the formal features of a text, including its unique syntactical and semantic form or literary structure and its typical linguistic genres that give shape to the text and function within it to facilitate its expression. Form criticism functions both synchronically to analyze the present literary form of the text and diachronically to ascertain and examine its compositional history in relation to its postulated written and oral stages. It works in tandem with other critical methodologies, such as *rhetorical criticism, redaction criticism (see Editorial Criticism), tradition-historical criticism (see Historical Criticism), *textual criticism, canonical criticism (see Canon), newer literary criticisms, the social sciences (see Social-Scientific Approaches) and linguistics in the interpretation of biblical texts. Form criticism is intimately concerned with the societal, historical, literary and conceptual settings in which the biblical texts were produced, in which they function, and in which they are read.

1. Form-Critical Theory
2. The Development of Form-critical Methodology
3. Form-Critical Study of Cultic Poetry
4. Form-Critical Study of the Wisdom Literature
5. Didactic Narrative

1. Form-Critical Theory.

A full understanding of the technical terminology employed in the field is essential. "Form" (German, Form) refers to the unique formulation of an individual text or communication, whereas "genre" (German, Gattung) refers to the typical conventions of expression or language that appear within a text. Genre does not constitute form; it functions within form. Other key terms include Sitz im Leben ("setting in life" or "societal setting"), Sitz im Literatur ("setting in literature" or "literary setting"), Formkritik ("form criticism," or the analytical study of the formal features of a text) and Formgeschichte ("the history of form"), which refers to the historical development and function of forms and genres in texts.

Each text is uniquely formulated and constitutes a singular event of communication in relation to the language in which the text is written or translated. Every language, including biblical *Hebrew, Koine Greek and biblical Aramaic, employs a combination of typical semantic, syntactic, and generic linguistic features and elements that are combined to produce its unique textual expressions. Thus, analysis of the formal literary structure of a biblical text requires a full understanding of the semantic and syntactical dimensions of biblical Hebrew, Koine Greek and biblical Aramaic in order to enable the interpreter to grasp the means by which a text organizes and presents its contents. Such formal literary structure appears in the seven-day creation pattern in Genesis 1:1—2:3, in which six days are devoted to creative acts and the seventh day is reserved for the Sabbath as a day of rest and renewal in all creation. It appears in the *acrostic patterns of the book of *Lamentations, in which each verse begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet as an artistic device that conveys the singer's grief at the downfall of Jerusalem (e.g., Lam 1). Job 10—11 employs the patterns of disputation and forensic speech to convey the demands of *Job for a fair hearing from YHWH.

Analysis of the textual versions of the Hebrew Bible requires a similar understanding of the semantic and syntactical dimensions of the language into which the text is translated or presented, such as Qumran Hebrew, Koine Greek once again, targumic Aramaic, Syriac, Latin and the various dialects of Ethiopic, Coptic, Arabic, Armenian and other relevant languages, in order to facilitate interpretation of the means by which each version reads and conceptualizes the biblical text in question. The versions are not simply translations of biblical texts; they present interpretations of biblical texts based upon the perspectives of their respective translators and the communities in which they were read. The interpreter cannot simply assume that a translated text conveys the same understanding as the parent text. The formal presentation of each text, whether it is a parent or a derivative text, must be evaluated on its own terms. The LXX, for example, reads Psalm 9 and Psalm 10 as a single psalm, so that Psalm 9, which praises G-d for turning back enemies, is combined with Psalm 10, which calls upon G-d to protect the people by punishing the wicked who threaten the people, to produce a text that ultimately demonstrates YHWH's *protection of the righteous. The LXX and targumic versions of *Esther include additional material that refers specifically to G-d in order to address the problem of divine absence in the Masoretic Hebrew form of the text.

Although each text is unique, it employs typical linguistic patterns or genres that function within a specific social, literary or historical context to facilitate the presentation of its contents and ideas. An example of a modern genre is the contemporary novel, which employs typical elements, including a lengthy narration, well-developed plot lines and characterizations, and some challenge that must be addressed by the fictional or semifictional characters in an effort to entertain, stimulate and influence the reader. Alternatively, the ubiquitous offer of a credit card or loan, which emphasizes favorable interest rates, low monthly payments and easy acceptance, is a well-known standard form or genre in contemporary American society. Biblical texts likewise employ typical genres that were easily recognized by ancient readers. The etiological legend, in which the origins and significance of a contemporary practice, social identity or institutional structure is explained, is well known in biblical narrative (see Gen 28, which explains the origins of the Bethel sanctuary). Likewise, the prophetic judgment speech, in which future or past disaster is explained as a punishment brought upon those who have violated some divine or human expectation or norm of behavior, appears frequently in prophetic and narrative literature (see Amos 2:6-16, in which the prophet threatens northern Israel with divine judgment for failing to observe YHWH's requirements for social justice expressed in Ex 20—24). A typical psalmic genre is the song of complaint, or *lament, in which the psalmist addresses YHWH in an attempt to resolve a threat (see Ps 7, which requests that YHWH defend the singer against unnamed enemies). A typical wisdom genre is the *proverb, a brief saying that may employ *word play, onomatopoeia or other devices to capture the attention of the audience and convey an important teaching derived from experience in life or the observation of nature (note Prov 1:7: "The fear of YHWH is the beginning of knowledge; fools despise wisdom and discipline"). Each of these examples employs typical patterns of linguistic expression, but each is a unique formulation that conveys specific contents in relation to the social, literary and historical settings in which it functions.

Early form critics focused especially on Sitz im Leben, but the development of form criticism over the course of the twentieth century has prompted interpreters to recognize a variety of contexts in which a text is produced and in which it functions. Thus, the social, literary and historical settings of a text are key factors in influencing both its composition and its function or interpretation in the contexts in which it is employed and read.

Setting is frequently a very challenging aspect of form-critical research insofar as the early literary as well as the social and historical settings of a text must be reconstructed, and because these settings can change so frequently throughout the lifetime of the text in question. Most interpreters agree that the social setting of the psalms is the liturgy of the Jerusalem temple (see Cult, Worship: Psalms), in which the psalms would function individually and perhaps collectively as liturgical expressions of praise for YHWH, lament at misfortune or threat, thanksgiving for divine beneficence, and so forth in relation to the daily and festival calendar of ancient Israel or Judah. Unfortunately, the Bible provides little guidance as to when and how such psalms might function (see, e.g., 1 Chron 16, which portrays the singing of portions of Pss 96; 105; 106 when *David brings the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem), and interpreters are compelled to reconstruct the liturgical occasions in which the psalms would function. Because of the emphasis in Wisdom literature on a father who instructs his son, the roots of wisdom are often identified with family or clan instruction, although the later development of education in ancient Israel and Judah might well call for professional instructors who would take on apprentice students or teach in some sort of school (see Sages, Schools, Education).

The literary setting of a text also plays a key role in interpretation. Later interpreters read *Song of Songs as an allegory for the relationship between YHWH and Israel in Judaism or between Christ and the church in Christianity. Song of Songs is also recognized for its wisdom functions, in part because it employs images of creation and human sexuality to depict the relationship between the two lovers, but the original function and social setting of this composition are now lost. Christian versions of the OT also play a role in characterizing Song of Songs as a wisdom book because of its placement together with *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes and *Wisdom of Solomon due to its purported Solomonic authorship. Song of Songs is recognized for its associations with Passover in Judaism insofar as the Jewish Bible presents Song of Songs as one of the five *Megillot ("Scrolls"), each of which is read as part of the liturgy for a Jewish festival. Such a setting informs the allegorical interpretation of Song of Songs in Judaism as a portrayal of the relationship between YHWH and Israel at the exodus from Egypt.

The historical setting of a text is frequently an important aspect of composition when it is known. Thus, an understanding of the late eighth century BC is key to the interpretation of oracles from Isaiah ben Amoz in Isaiah 1–39. When considered in relation to *Psalms, Wisdom literature, and narratives such as *Ruth and *Esther, however, the historical setting is very problematic. Many interpreters read Ruth or Esther as historical reports that describe with or without some degree of accuracy the events that they report. But when readers recognize the didactic and satirical aspects of these compositions, Ruth emerges as a didactic narrative that emphasizes the legitimacy and importance of conversion to Judaism in the Persian period, and Esther emerges as a Hellenistic period examination of the human responsibility to act in the absence of G-d at a time of threat by a foreign government.

2. The Development of Form-Critical Methodology.

Form criticism emerged in Germany during the late-nineteenth century under the influence of the rationalist perspectives of the European Enlightenment, German philosophical and theological idealism, and the romanticist perspectives of emerging German statehood. It originated in reaction to the dominant literary-critical concern of scholars such as J. Wellhausen with the identification of the original sources that stood behind the present form of the biblical text together with the historical settings and religious perspectives of their authors. H. Gunkel (1862-1932), the originator of form-critical research, was heavily influenced by the folklore studies of Wilhelm and Jakob Grimm and the "history of religions" perspectives that emerged throughout the nineteenth century. He sought to push behind the literary sources identified by scholars to reconstruct the oral stages of tradition, mythology and folklore that would shed light on the life and religious perspectives of the people of ancient Israel and the Near Eastern world.

Gunkel, like many of his time, chauvinistically viewed the ancients as primitive, relatively simple-minded illiterates who were, on the one hand, capable of perceiving the divine at a most basic and ideal level but, on the other hand, incapable of formulating or memorizing lengthy texts. He therefore emphasized the role of short, self-contained literary units in biblical exegesis that represented the ideals of primitive ancient Israelite religiosity. Such short, self-contained and stereotypical texts developed out of a long history of oral transmission among the people until they were assembled into larger narrative cycles, sagas, poetic collections, and so forth, while generally still at the oral stage, and later written down by writers concerned with preserving and editing Israelite tradition.

Gunkel's own research began with a study of the mythological and folkloric background of the NT book of Revelation, which naturally prompted his interest in the mythological and folkloric traditions of the book of Genesis. His groundbreaking commentary on Genesis emphasized the various types or genres of Israelite oral traditions, such as the folktales and myths about the gods and primal human beings, the epic traditions about the lives of the ancestors, or the etiological traditions concerning the origins of tribal and national groups, cultic institutions and practices, geological features, and so on. Because Gunkel was fundamentally interested in the Sitz im Leben of texts, such as the family or tribal storytellers of the oral tradition or the cultic performances of narrative or liturgical traditions, his research turned to the psalms. Gunkel's 1933 Einleitung in die Psalmen, completed after his death by his student J. Begrich, defined the basic types of psalms, such as the *hymns, individual and communal complaints, royal psalms (see Kingship Psalms) and *thanksgiving psalms, as well as their liturgical functions, which continue to stand as the basis for modern research of the psalms.

Gunkel's interest in the Sitz im Leben of biblical literature, particularly his interest in the liturgical settings and functions of cultic poetry, continued in the work of his student S. Mowinckel (1884-1965). Because he was Norwegian, Mowinckel was heavily influenced by Scandinavian scholarship, which emphasized a combination of comparative religion and religious anthropology. Such interest was motivated by the study of the oral literature and religious traditions of the Norse peoples of Scandinavia, who were known especially for the composition of the Icelandic sagas concerning the exploits of Norse heroes, as well as those of the Laplander peoples of the north, whose religious traditions resembled those of Asia and the Americas. He was therefore far more interested in the functions of religious traditions and their oral transmission than in their origins or ideal genres, as indicated in his highly influential 1921-1924 six-volume Psalmstudien. The intense interest in Babylonian mythology and liturgical traditions of the time prompted Mowinckel's interest in the liturgical performance of the psalms. His interest and perspectives were particularly influenced by the Babylonian Akitu, or New Festival, in which the Enuma Elish, or Babylonian Creation Epic, was performed to commemorate the rule over creation by Marduk, the Babylonian city-god and creator of the world, together with the rule of the Babylonian king. Mowinckel argued that an analogous Israelite New Year was the liturgical Sitz im Leben for the performance of many of the psalms that would celebrate YHWH'S kingship over creation (see Kingship Psalms), authorization and support for the Davidic monarchy, protection for Jerusalem in particular and Israel in general, and so forth. A particular feature of his research was the recognition that psalms or cultic poetry also appeared in the narrative-historical and the prophetic literature (e.g., Ex 15; Judg 5; Is 12; Hab 3), which suggested that these literatures may also have played a role in Israel's cultic liturgy. Such a phenomenon also highlighted the influence that genres of one type might have on others.

A. Alt (1883-1956), another of Gunkel's students, emphasized the question of institutional setting in his foundational study of the forms of biblical *law. His primary area of expertise was the history, archeology and geography of the land of Israel. He is especially well known for his studies on the origins of Israel in Canaan and the development of the Israelite state as the result of a long process of Israelite settlement among the Canaanites and the efforts of the monarchy to create political and religious unity in an area that had previously been dominated by Canaanite city-states largely controlled by Egypt. His study of Israelite religion emphasized its origins in Canaanite religious practice, particularly the patriarchal or ancestral cults that informed the ancestral traditions of the Pentateuch.

Alt's study of the origins of Israelite law emphasized the formal differences between the two basic types of laws in the Pentateuch. The first was the casuistic law, which included a protasis, or formal statement of the legal case or issue at hand, often introduced by a conditional particle ("if/when a man does such and such"), and the apodosis, or formal decision as to how the case is to be resolved (“then he/you shall do such and such”). The second was the apodictic law (see, e.g., the Decalogue in Ex 20; Deut 5), which categorically commands or prohibits certain behaviors (“you shall/shall not”). Because the casuistic laws corresponded to those found in the Babylonian law codes, such as the Code of Hammurabi, Alt posited that the casuistic laws represented a pre-Israelite Canaanite law form that perhaps developed from Babylonian law that was taken over by the Israelites. The apodictic laws, because of their categorical authoritative formulation, originated among the Israelites in the desert before their settlement in Canaan and were read to the people in the temple or cultic settings of later times as a means of instructing the people in YHWH’s laws. Later studies, such as W. Richter’s 1966 monograph Recht und Ethos, argued that the apodictic laws were not laws at all, because they lacked any means to adjudicate the issue in question, but instead must be recognized as the products of clan or family wisdom and instruction in which a father instructed his children in the expected norms of behavior. Again, such a conclusion points to the interrelationship between generic categories and the influence that one genre might exert on another.

The question of the formation of state continued to influence form-critical work through the first half of the twentieth century, particularly because Germany had only unified as a state in 1870, but the rise of Nazi Germany in the 1930s and 1940s prompted German form critics in particular to focus on the development of history-writing in ancient Israel, particularly because history is such an important means by which modern nations give accounts of themselves, evaluate their actions, and impart identity to their people.

The work of G. von Rad (1900-1971), who was heavily influenced by Alt, is particularly important in relation to the development of OT theology, but his concern with biblical theology begins with a preoccupation of the role that theology plays in the development and conceptualization of historical writing. His 1938 form-critical analysis of the formation of the Hexateuch (Genesis–Joshua) emphasized its role in the development of Israel’s self-understanding and religious outlook. Von Rad posited that the J stratum of the Hexateuch, which established the earliest, basic narrative framework of the Pentateuch and Joshua, had developed out of short, self-contained localized cultic traditions such as the creedal formula in Deuteronomy 26:5b-9 cited by Israelite farmers at sanctuaries when they brought the first fruits of their harvests and flocks to the altar for sacrifice (see also Deut 6:20-24; Josh 24:2b-13). Insofar as this creedal confession articulated YHWH’s acts on behalf of the people—that is, how the wandering ancestor Jacob went to Egypt few in number, was enslaved by the Egyptians, and was delivered by YHWH to be brought to this land flowing with milk and honey—they imparted national identity and theological outlook to the people of Israel now settled in the land. They also provided the basis for the expansion of the tradition into the full form of the J stratum of the Hexateuch in the early days of the formation of the Davidic monarchy and ultimately into the final form of the Hexateuch completed by the P stratum in the postexilic era. Insofar as the Hexateuch includes liturgical compositions that instruct the people in the acts of YHWH on behalf of Israel (e.g., Ex 15), von Rad’s work opens the way for tracing the influence of liturgical and wisdom concerns in the composition of Israel’s narrative historical literature, but his historical interests also determined his view of wisdom, which he understood as Israel’s witness to its experience of YHWH in history. Nevertheless, he examined a number of basic wisdom genres, including the proverb, numerical sayings, autobiographical stylization, didactic poetry and narrative, dialogue, fable and allegory, and prayer.

A similar concern emerges in the work of M. Noth (1902-1968), one of Alt’s students, who specialized both in the history and archeology of ancient Israel as well as in the tradition-historical composition of Israelite historical narratives. Noth differed from his friend von Rad by positing that the sources or strata of the Pentateuch could not be traced through Joshua and arguing instead that the laws and theological outlook of the book of Deuteronomy provide the historiographical and religious perspectives for the writing of an Israelite historical work that comprised Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings. This so-called Deuteronomistic History took up older, localized traditions and incorporated them into a larger historical work that gave account of Israel’s history from the time of Israel’s entry into the land under Joshua through the Babylonian exile when King Jehoiachin of Judah was finally released from prison by the Babylonian monarch Evil Merodach. The Deuteronomistic History was designed to explain the Babylonian exile as the result of divine punishment for Israel's failure to abide by YHWH's commands as expressed in Deuteronomy. The form-critical basis for Noth's contention appeared in the short, self-contained historical summaries of Israel's history, spoken either by a principal character in the work or simply by the Deuteronomistic History narrator (e.g., Josh 1; 23; 1 Sam 12; 1 Kings 8; 2 Kings 17), that displayed characteristic Deuteronomic language and theological concepts and gave historiographical unity to the composite work. Later studies would point to earlier stages in the composition that were designed to support King Josiah's attempts at national restoration and religious reform, but Noth's work paved the way for understanding the historiographical perspectives and didactic interests inherent in Israelite historical writing. Such concerns would point once again to the influence of wisdom circles in Israelite historical writing.

The aftermath of World War II saw many changes in the field of biblical studies in general and in form-critical theory in particular, as interpreters began to turn away from concern with the formation of state and the organs of central authority to explore a variety of methodological options in the reading of texts. One such impulse came from the work of Swiss theologian K. Barth, whose emphasis on the role of the word of G-d provided an important basis for theological critique of Nazi Germany and acquiescent elements of the church both during and after the war. Such a concern informed the form-critical work of C. Westermann, who throughout his career focused especially on defining the ideal genres of biblical literature as expressions of the word of G-d. He is well known for his studies of the pentateuchal narratives in which he focused especially on defining the ideal or original forms of the divine promises to the ancestors; his studies of prophetic speech, including the generic characters of the prophetic judgment speeches and words of salvation; his study of Job, which isolated genres such as dialogue, lament and disputation prior to announcement of the divine word at the culmination of the book; and his studies of the cul-tic laments and hymns of praise, which functioned as ideal expressions of the divine word. Westermann's concentration on identifying the ideal genres that stood behind the text proved to be somewhat of a problem in later exegesis, however, insofar as his definition of the generic characteristics behind the text would then serve as the basis for emending the text in question. For Westermann, genre constituted text, but later research demonstrates that genre functions within uniquely formulated texts.

The emerging methodological pluralism of the second half of the twentieth century would further influence form criticism in various ways. French scholars in particular began to explore the fields of linguistics, literature and sociology as concern with central leadership and authority faded in favor of greater interest in the lives of common people in general and the function of language and texts in society. Such work prompted a shift from defining the original oral forms of biblical literature to interpretation of the later and larger written compositions that now appear in the various forms of the Bible and the social contexts in which they functioned. *Rhetorical criticism emerged as both an outgrowth from and complement to form-critical research. As conceived by J. Muilenberg, who began his career as a high school English teacher, biblical interpreters must learn to pay close attention to the rhetorical dimensions of larger literary texts and the rhetorical devices employed to give them literary unity and artistic design. Muilenberg did not propose an abandonment of the traditional form-critical focus on the short, self-contained, original unit but rather saw rhetorical criticism as a means to address a much fuller interpretation of a text. Later rhetorical critics, such as P. Tribble, have called for attention to the persuasive aspects of a text—that is, the means by which a text is designed to interact with its audience and to elicit some response, such as the adoption of a particular viewpoint or course of action. Later rhetorical criticism also calls for the study of the *intertextual character of texts, both in terms of the interrelationship among subunits within a text and the interrelationship with other texts by citation or allusion. In this respect, texts may engage with dialogue among themselves, whether deliberately or not. Dialogue and persuasion are key to the didactic character of the Wisdom literature and to the liturgical character of Psalms and Lamentations, in which people address G-d to express their relationship with the divine or to elicit a response. Such work must be conceived as a fuller realization of form-critical theory insofar as it addresses the forms and functions of texts in relation to social context.

The study of linguistic theory provides important methodological foundations for form criticism's concern with both the literary and linguistic structures and the communicative functions of biblical texts. Early work by F. de Saussure demonstrated that each text constitutes a communicative event in which the basic linguistic elements of langue, the common structures of expression in a linguistic system (i.e., grammar, semantics, syntax), and parole, the individual forms of expression in which a text appears, combine to generate the communicative event. V. Propp's analysis of Russian folklore further refined this model by distinguishing the communicative roles of the "actant," who sends and defines communication according to his or her own conceptualization of the event, and the "receiver," who receives the communication and interprets it in relation to his or her own linguistic and conceptual context. K. Koch applied these models to biblical exegesis, arguing that langue refers to the underlying genres that inform the composition of biblical texts, and that parole refers to the individual literary presentation or form of the text. The actant encapsulates the intentions of the author of a text, and the receiver indicates the redactor who interprets and redefines a text by placing it into its later redactional context. Later interpreters influenced by reader-response criticism argue that the receiver would constitute the audience of the text, whether ancient or modern, which plays such an important role in construing the texts and thereby in defining its interpretation. Although the author's or sender's intentions played an important role in formulating the text, reader-response theorists argue that those intentions are not always known or relevant insofar as a text takes on its own life to be construed by its readers once it is written.

W. Richter draws upon linguistic theory to make important contributions to form-critical theory by arguing that exegesis must be understood first and foremost as a literary science. Interpreters must engage the linguistic features and structures of a text, including both its semantic and its syntactical dimensions, in order to interpret its outer literary form or linguistic expression (parole) in relation to its inner form or the deep structure of the concepts and contents that it communicates (langue). He therefore differentiates between the Sitz im Leben, in which language is generated and in which it functions, and the Sitz im Literatur, in which the text appears. Although Richter's model calls for the initial analysis of the synchronic form of a text as literature, his work displays a marked interest in the redaction-critical reconstruction of earlier text forms that purportedly stand behind the present form of the text. His students, such as H. Schweizer, have played important roles in laying the foundation for a linguistic assessment of Hebrew according to its semantic, pragmatic and syntactical dimensions as the basis for assessing the literary forms of biblical texts.

R. Knierim has played an important role in bringing form-critical theory from Germany to the United States and in reflecting upon its theoretical dimensions. He has especially emphasized the formal interpretation of the synchronic dimensions of biblical texts, not because diachronic interpretation is irrelevant, but because synchronic analysis enables the interpreter to engage the text first on its own terms without allowing the presumed diachronic dimensions of texts to control and thereby skew interpretation. Form-critical study of biblical texts necessarily involves redaction criticism at the outset insofar as texts appear in their final redactional forms, and the interpreter is obligated to engage the synchronic form of the text in order first to understand its formulation and conceptualization and then to determine if evidence exists to posit earlier text forms that might be reconstructed from the text at hand. Study of the formulation of a text points to its underlying or infrastructural conceptualizations that drive the composition of the text and play an important role in determining its present form. Knierim's understanding of conceptualization draws heavily on structural anthropology, which examines the deep structures of the human mind based in the structures of language and society and their influence on human communication and worldview. Based in part on Knierim's influence and the emergence of newer literary and text-critical methods, recent form-critical work has focused on the interpretation of larger literary units, particularly entire biblical books, in both their synchronic and diachronic dimensions.

3. Form-Critical Study of Cultic Poetry.

3.1. The Book of Psalms. The book of Psalms has been a primary subject of form-critical research from the beginnings of the discipline through the present. Although the history of form-critical research on Psalms has focused on defining the genres and functions of individual psalms and psalm collections, current form-critical theory calls for initial consideration of the final form of the book of Psalms. The common assertion that the book of Psalms functioned as the hymnbook of the Jerusalem temple may well be true, but the current presentation and arrangement of Psalms provide only a limited indication as to how it would have served in such a role. The account of David bringing the ark to Jerusalem in 1 Chronicles 16, which employs elements from Psalms 96; 105; 106, suggests that the choice of individual psalms for liturgical use was not entirely dependent on their individual placement in the current form of the book (although each appears in the fourth subdivision of the Psalms [see below]).

Most of the psalms have individual superscriptions that characterize them by technical terms indicating type and function, authorship or ascription, setting and so on (see Psalms 5: Titles), but the synchronic macrostructure of Psalms comprises five books, each of which concludes with a doxology or formulaic expression of praise of YHWH: bārūk yhwh ("Blessed is YHWH") in the case of the first four doxologies, and halēlū-yāh ("Hallelujah") in the fifth. The five books and their concluding doxologies include Psalms 1—41 (Ps 41:13); Psalms 42—72 (Ps 72:18-19); Psalms 73—89 (Ps 89:52); Psalms 90—106 (Ps 106:48); Psalms 107—150 (Ps 150:1-6). Rabbinic tradition maintains that the five-part structure of Psalms deliberately correlates with the five-part structure of the Torah (Midr. Ps. 1:2) and reduces the number of Psalms to 147 so that they will correlate with the 147 šedārīm (sections of the Torah), which would have been read on each Sabbath in the triennial lectionary cycle employed in antiquity (b. Ber. 9b-10a). Such a view presupposes rabbinic combinations of Psalm 1 and Psalm 2, and possibly Psalm 114 and Psalm 115, and Psalm 117 and Psalm 118. Indeed, many modern scholars note that Psalm 1 and Psalm 2 together function as an introduction to the book of Psalms insofar as the initial concerns with Torah and *righteousness in Psalm 1 and YHWH's relationship with the David-ic king in Psalm 2 set basic themes that appear throughout the book. Likewise, Psalm 150, a hallelujah psalm, may serve as a conclusion to the book as a whole as well as to Book 5. Evidence for a correlation of the books of Psalms with the books of the Torah or of the individual psalms with the individual sections of the Torah read in the triennial cycle is lacking thus far. Evidence is also lacking for a correlation with the five-part macrostructure of Lamentations or the five Megillot (Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther), read on Jewish festivals. G. Wilson argues that the current sequence of books in Psalms presupposes a concern with explaining the demise of Davidic kingship by pointing to YHWH's ultimate sovereignty. J. Crenshaw notes a progressive movement from lament in the first book to praise in the fifth. No explanation for the five-part structure of Psalms has yet gained full acceptance. Textual versions must also be considered insofar as the LXX adds Psalm 151, and the Syriac Peshitta adds Psalms 151—155.

Diachronic factors must also be considered in assessing the final form of the book of Psalms, most notably due to the statement in Psalm 72:20: "The prayers of David ben Jesse are completed," which suggests that Books 1 and 2 may once have formed an early version of Psalms. Additional evidence for early collections of psalms include the predominance of psalms ascribed to David in Books 1 and 2; the Elohist Psalter of Psalms 42—83, so-called because of its preference for the Hebrew term ʾlhym ("G-d") in place of the divine name yhwh ("L-rd"); the collection of the Psalms of *Asaph (appointed as Levitical singer by David in 1 Chron 6:39) in Psalms 50; 73—83; the Psalms of the Sons of Korah (appointed as temple gatekeepers in 1 Chron 9:19; 26:1, 19, and functioned as temple singers in 2 Chron 20:19; Korah led a failed revolt against Moses in Num 16, but Num 26:9-11 indicates that his sons survived) in Psalms 42; 44—49; 84—85; 87—88; the hallelujah psalms in Psalms 111—112; 106; 133; 135; 146—150; and the Songs of Ascent (Heb šir hamma'alōt), or pilgrimage psalms, in Psalms 120—134, which celebrate the liturgical ascent or pilgrimage to the Jerusalem temple. The first-century AD Qumran Psalms Scroll (11QPs^a) includes a unique arrangement of thirty-nine psalms from the book of Psalms; 2 Samuel 23:17; Sirach 51:13-30; Psalms 151; 154; 155; and additional material not previously known.

Form-critical research on Psalms has identified a number of basic genres of cultic poetry that stand behind the individual psalms. Each type has its own distinct ideal structure and function that informs the unique form, function and composition of each psalm. At times, multiple genres appear within an individual psalm to serve the purposes for which it was composed and for which it functions. Likewise, typical structural elements of genres may be lacking in individual psalms for similar reasons.

The fundamental genre of cultic poetry is the hymn of praise, which appears in Psalms 8; 19; 29; 33; 47; 65; 66; 78; 93; 95—100; 103—106; 111; 113; 114; 117; 134; 135; 136; 145—150. The hymn of praise is based on a simple two-part structure that includes the call to praise, in which the community is summoned to assemble (presumably in the temple) to praise YHWH, and the basis or reasons for the praise, which include YHWH's might, sovereignty and mercy in delivering the people or the king from threat by enemies or other afflictions and in ensuring the order of creation.

The most prevalent type of cultic poetry in the book of Psalms is the lament or complaint, which constitutes approximately one-third of the Psalter, apparently because the fear of threats of whatever sort is a major motivating factor in liturgical addresses to the divine. These psalms appear as community laments, in which the nation as a whole addresses YHWH at a time of national threat or crisis, and as individual laments, in which an individual addresses YHWH in a time of need. Community laments appear in Psalms 12; 44; 60; 74; 79; 80; 83; 85; 90; 94; 108; 123; 129; 137. Individual laments or complaints appear in Psalms 3—7; 9—10; 13; 14; 17; 22; 25; 26; 28; 31; 35; 36; 38; 39; 40; 41; 42—43; 51; 52; 53; 54—59; 61; 64; 69; 70; 71; 77; 86; 88; 102; 109; 120; 130; 140—143. Typical elements of lament or complaint genre include the address to YHWH, in which YHWH is invoked; the complaint proper, which lays out the situation of crisis that has prompted the nation or the individual to appeal to YHWH; the request for help from YHWH to resolve or alleviate the crisis; the affirmation of trust in YHWH, which confirms the nation's or the individual's confidence in G-d; and a vow to praise YHWH once the crisis has passed.

The thanksgiving psalm genre appears in Psalms 18; 30; 32; 34; 40; 66; 92; 116; 118; 138.

The thanksgiving psalms are designed to express thanks to YHWH for deliverance from some threat or crisis, and they appear to presuppose liturgical processions in the temple (Ps 118:19-29) or a thank offering (Ps 66:13-15; 116:12-19). Typical elements of the thanksgiving psalm include an invitation to give thanks to YHWH, often employing a form of the Hebrew verb ydh (e.g., hōdû lyhwh ["Give thanks to YHWH"]); an account of the crisis and YHWH's actions of deliverance or relief; praises of YHWH for having acted; offertory formulae to accompany the presentation of a thanksgiving sacrifice; blessings for the participants in the ceremony; and an exhortation to trust in YHWH.

The so-called royal psalms appear in Psalms 2; 18; 20; 21; 45; 72; 89; 101; 110; 132; 144. They were composed, very likely during the monarchic period, to address some event in the life of the king. Royal events might include, for example, a king's coronation, wedding, victory in battle and deliverance from enemies. They comprise a particularly controversial genre because they lack any typical structure and are instead identified by their concern with the monarch. Indeed, they frequently display elements of complaint, thanksgiving and hymns, which suggests that they are not a genre per se but instead thematically define psalms that employ various generic elements to serve their respective purposes.

The Songs of Zion appear in Psalms 46; 48; 76; 84; 87; 122 (cf. Ps 132, which is identified as a royal psalm). These songs have no typical formal structure or elements but instead are identified by their celebration of YHWH's choice of *Zion as the site for the temple or divine presence in the world. Many of the Zion psalms presuppose a liturgical procession, which suggests that they were composed to function as part of celebration of YHWH's sovereignty in the world.

Wisdom and Torah psalms appear in Psalms 1; 19; 37; 49; 73; 112; 119; 127; 128; 133. The wisdom and Torah psalms seem to be designed for meditation or reflection on issues pertaining to G-d, *worship, study of Torah and life in the world. They have no set structure or elements and appear to be defined on thematic grounds. Consequently, their identification as discrete genres is questionable.

Various liturgical psalms appear in Psalms 15; 24; 50; 68; 81; 82; 95; 115; 132. Many presuppose antiphonal dialogue associated with liturgical action, but their identities as distinct genres are often questionable. Entrance liturgies, which express the ideal qualities of one who enters the temple, appear in Psalms 15; 24. Psalm 50 takes up covenant renewal. Psalms 68; 91; 118; 132 take up liturgical processions. Psalm 81 anticipates repentance by the people, and Psalm 82 calls for judgment against the foreign gods for failing to do justice.

3.2. The Book of Lamentations. The book of Lamentations is designed to lament the destruction of the city of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 587/6 BC. It is traditionally ascribed to the prophet Jeremiah in both Judaism and Christianity due to his penchant for lamentation and to the statement in 2 Chronicles 35:25 that Jeremiah wrote laments over the death of Josiah. Christian Bibles therefore locate Lamentations with the book of Jeremiah in the OT. Jewish tradition, however, places Lamentations among the five Megillot because it is read on the Ninth of Av, the traditional day of mourning in Jewish traditions for the destruction of Solomon's temple by the Babylonians in 587/6 BC and the destruction of the second temple by the Romans in AD 70.

The macrostructure of Lamentations displays a five-part structure that comprises the five chapters of the book. Each part expresses communal mourning or lament over the fate of Jerusalem, generally portrayed metaphorically as the desolate Daughter Zion (Heb bat-šyyôn). Lamentations 1 laments Jerusalem's misery; Lamentations 2 focuses on YHWH's actions against Jerusalem; Lamentations 3 focuses on the suffering of an unidentified man who affirms confidence in YHWH and appeals for repentance; Lamentations 4 emphasizes YHWH's anger against the people for their sins; and Lamentations 5 appeals to YHWH to restore the people and temple when the punishment is complete. The rationale and setting for the structure of Lamentations appear to lie in the mourning and appeal for restoration. Such lamentation rituals are mentioned in Jeremiah 41:5; Zechariah 7:3-5; 8:19. Repentance and reconstruction may well constitute the underlying conceptualization of Lamentations.

Lamentations is based especially in the dirge genre, which is generally identified as a funerary genre for mourning the dead. It is characterized by the introductory exclamation 'êkâ ("Alas!") and a characteristic 3/2 poetic *meter that employs three heavy beats in the first stanza followed by two heavy beats in the second stanza. This characteristic Qinah (Heb qînâ ["lament"]) meter may accompany a limping processional walk to symbolize mourning (cf. the limping walk and drawing of blood by the prophets of Baal in 1 Kings 18). The genre appears to draw heavily on the lament or complaint genre found throughout Psalms. It also employs the classic acrostic form, a poetic esthetic device in which each stanza of poetry begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet from 'ālep to tāw. City lament genres are also known from ancient Sumer, where they functioned as apologies for the formation of new ruling dynasties in the aftermath of the collapse of the older ruling dynasty and its capital city. They also appear to presuppose mourning rituals for the male fertility gods, Baal of Canaan and Dumuzi or Tammuz of Mesopotamia, who were conceived to have died and entered the underworld during the dry summer season. Mourning rituals for each god were enacted to ensure that their respective consorts or goddess—Anath for Baal, Inanna for the Sumerian Dumuzi, Ishtar for the Babylonian Tammuz—would restore them to the world of the living to inaugurate the rainy season (for Baal, see 1 Kings 18; for Tammuz, see Ezek 8).

4. Form-Critical Study of the Wisdom Literature.

4.1. The Book of Proverbs. The book of Proverbs is the classic example of Wisdom literature in the Hebrew Bible. The introductory superscription identifies the book as "The Proverbs of Solomon ben David, King of Israel" (Prov 1:1). Following superscriptions in Proverbs 10:1; 25:1 likewise attribute the following material to *Solomon, who is lauded in Israelite historical tradition for his wisdom and for his composition of three thousand proverbs (see 1 Kings 5:9-14; cf. 1 Kings 3:4-28; 10:1-13; 2 Chron 1:7-13; 9:1-12). Although Solomon is known for his wisdom, most interpreters are reluctant to conclude that he is indeed the author of Proverbs. Kings in the ancient world tended to be patrons of literary works written by others in the *royal court. The superscription in Proverbs 25:1 states, "These too are the proverbs of Solomon which the men of Hezekiah transmitted," and other superscriptions in the book refer to sections attributed to "the wise" (Prov 24:23), "the words of Agur ben Jakeh, the Massa; the oracle of the man to Ithiel, to Ithiel and Ucal" (Prov 30:1), and "the words of Lemuel, king of Massa, with which his mother disciplined him" (Prov 31:1).

Proverbs constitutes a form of traditional instruction known throughout the ancient Near East, but especially in Egypt, of a father, a mother, a king, a priest, a wise man or other notable who instructs sons, daughters, disciples, and so forth in the means by which one comes to understand the world and to live productively and responsibly in it. Proverbs is addressed to young men, and it focuses especially on "the fear of YHWH" as the basis for wisdom (see Fear of the Lord). It emphasizes proper conduct in relation to other human beings (particularly those in positions of power and authority), proper relations with *women, productive work and personal habits, and the observation of other human beings as well as the natural world as important bases for gaining an understanding of the principles by which the world works. The synchronic formal structure of the book includes six sections, each introduced by a superscription, as indicated above, which identifies the following material by type and authorship. Proverbs 1–9 emphasizes piety and wisdom as paths to success in the world and employs allegorical presentations of wisdom as an ideal wife contrasted with a promiscuous woman (See Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly) to illustrate its teachings on proper conduct in the world. Proverbs 10:1–24:22 is a lengthy discourse that seems to comprise a number of earlier collections of proverbs and other didactic forms (see Discourse in Proverbs). It emphasizes the problems inherent in pride, sloth, gossip and deceit, and it favors virtues such as faithfulness, self-control, sobriety and industriousness. Many argue that Proverbs 22:17–24:22 is an early collection that resembles the Egyptian Instruction of Amenemopet. Proverbs 24:23–34 emphasizes the practice of justice and the avoidance of laziness. Proverbs 25–29 especially employs comparative statements to emphasize the proper behavior of the king and the importance of perception in the world. Proverbs 30 calls for moderation in one's behavior and consumption. Proverbs 31 presents the instruction of a queen mother to her son concerning overindulgence in drink and with women, and it concludes by extolling the ideal woman.

The basic genre of Proverbs and all Wisdom literature is the didactic speech, which may appear in any oral or written form that conveys instruction to the reading or listening audience. Characteristic genres in Proverbs begin with the māṣāl ("proverb"), one of the "short sayings" employed in Wisdom literature to convey important teachings. It generally employs a short, *parallel structure and sometimes uses metaphor or allegory to convey its teaching in a form that is easily remembered and quoted at opportune times. It likely derives from popular oral culture, although it now appears in highly sophisticated literary works, such as Proverbs, which presuppose an educated and elite audience. The graduated numerical saying that cites successive numbers of comparable phenomena in the world is an important device for collecting examples to make a point from the comparison, as in Proverbs 30:18–20, which cites three and then four things that the speaker cannot fathom, culminating in the way of a young man with a maiden. Allegories also play a role in Proverbs and in Wisdom literature in general, particularly the comparison of an ideal wife to a cistern from which one drinks for life. Hymns appear in Proverbs as an artistic form that is adopted to pedagogical interests, such as the portrayal of the ideal woman in the acrostic song of Proverbs 31:10–31.

The presentation of royal characters and elite society in the book, together with the sophisticated literary and pedagogical style, points to the royal court as the likely setting for the book of Proverbs. Many speculate that it was produced by a circle of the wise who may have functioned as professional teachers of young students who would aspire for positions of responsibility in the royal court, the temple or elsewhere in ancient Israelite and Judean society.

4.2. The Book of Job. The book of Job differs markedly from the book of Proverbs. Whereas Proverbs envisions a stable social, religious and natural world order that one must observe in order to learn to live successfully in the world, Job presupposes that chaos and absurdity reach to the very highest levels of creation, including even G-d, to undermine any sense of justice and order in the world of human beings or creation at large. In this manner, the book of Job is designed to probe the question of *theodicy—that is, the presumption of G-d's power, justice and righteousness. Although the book of Job ultimately affirms G-d, it points to the human right and responsibility to raise such questions, particularly insofar as life in the world does not always work out in quite the way that a book such as Proverbs might presuppose. Indeed, the wisdom poem of Job 28, which points to the hidden nature of wisdom in the world, alludes to the basic principle of Proverbs that the fear of YHWH is the beginning of wisdom to make its point that only G-d truly understands wisdom. The *suffering of the righteous and attempts to accuse those who suffer of wrongdoing that caused the suffering in the first place are fundamental concerns of the book of Job.

The formal structure of the book of Job is based on a didactic narrative that presents a dialogue involving Job, his wife, his three friends Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Naamathite, a fourth figure named Elihu ben Barachel, and finally G-d. The subject of the disputation is Job's suffering and speculation on the part of Job's friends concerning the wrongdoing that he must have committed to deserve such a fate. The narrative begins in Job 1—2 with an account of Job's exemplary piety, righteousness and good fortune in life, Satan's conversation with G-d, in which *Satan states that Job will curse G-d if he is afflicted and G-d acquiesces to the test, and Job's afflictions, including the deaths of his ten children, the loss of all his wealth and property, and his affliction with physical ailments. After he declines his wife's suggestion that he curse G-d and die, Job initiates the dialogue with his three friends by lamenting the day of his birth. Throughout the dialogue in Job 3—27, the three friends articulate a standard theology of reward and punishment in which they contend that Job must have committed some sin that prompted his misfortune. For his own part, Job maintains that he is willing to suffer the consequences if guilty; but also, he cannot understand what he could have done to deserve such suffering and demands an explanation from G-d. Following the wisdom poem in Job 28, which emphasizes that true wisdom is known only to G-d, Elihu continues the *debate with Job in Job 29—37 to no resolution. Finally, G-d appears in Job 38—42 to answer Job. G-d provides no evidence or explanation but demands to know how Job presumes to require an explanation from the creator of the universe. When Job repents, G-d restores Job's fortunes and agrees to Job's request not to punish his friends. The book offers no satisfactory answer to Job's questions but nevertheless speaks to the reality of human life in which people often suffer without apparent cause.

The book of Job clearly employs the didactic narrative as the narrative framework of the book in Job 1—2; 38—42, dialogue between Job and his friends throughout Job 3—27; 29—37, and the hymn extolling the hidden nature of wisdom in Job 28. The most important genre in Job is the disputation speech, which both Job and his friends employ throughout the book to critically examine the arguments offered by each side and to assert their own arguments concerning the nature of suffering, Job's guilt or innocence, and the questions concerning the role of G-d as righteous judge. The disputation speech is characteristic of wisdom, prophetic (Ezek 18:1-20), diplomatic (2 Kings 18—19/Is 36—37) or courtroom (1 Kings 3:16-28) settings. Many interpreters note the forensic style of the argumentation as if the setting were an ancient Israelite courtroom. Basic elements of the genre include a statement of the thesis to be disputed, the counterthesis for which the speaker argues, and the dispute or argumentation proper.

Job is generally recognized as a highly sophisticated and challenging piece of literature that would have found its setting in the highest levels of Israelite and Judean wisdom and educational circles, including the royal court and the temple.

4.3. The Book of Ecclesiastes. Ecclesiastes appears, together with Proverbs and Song of Songs, as a book attributed to Solomon in the Christian OT because its superscription identifies it as "the words of Qohelet ben David, King in Jerusalem." The Tanak includes it as one of the five Megillot insofar as it is read as part of the liturgy for the festival of Sukkot. Sukkot celebrates the completion of the harvest and onset of the rainy season following the New Year in the fall when the people of ancient Israel and Judah lived in temporary dwellings called sukkôt ("booths") while gathering the fruit harvest. Sukkot also commemorates the forty years of wilderness wandering at the time of the exodus when Israel lived in temporary dwellings while traveling. Ecclesiastes' focus on the transitory nature of life therefore associates it with the temporary dwellings that symbolize Sukkot.

Ecclesiastes is presented as a first-person discourse on the part of the anonymous *Qohelet, clearly identified as a royal figure and presumed to be Solomon in his old age. Following the book's superscription (Eccles 1:1), the synchronic literary structure of the book includes an introductory motto and poem (Eccles 1:2-3, 4-11) that set the basic concerns of the book as a reflection on the transitory nature and constancy of life insofar as there is nothing new under the sun. The subsequent body of the book (Eccles 1:12-11:6) includes a series of discourses on Qohelet's experience in life, a meditation on the life's experiences and their times, oppression, toil and indolence, companionship, religious duties, wealth, the relations between rulers and subjects, divine action, death, chance, wisdom and *folly, and risk. A concluding poem (Eccles 11:7-12:7) reflects on youth and old age, an *inclusio (Eccles 12:8) reiterates the book's concern with futility, and the epilogue (Eccles 12:9-14) concludes by calling on the reader to fear G-d and observe G-d's commandments as the task of humankind.

The dominant genre of the book of Ecclesiastes is the royal testament, well known from Egyptian examples, in which a king or other figure of authority reflects on life as a legacy for the benefit and instruction of those who someday perhaps would fill similar roles. It therefore employs the *autobiographical form or first-person narration as a type of didactic narrative or discourse for the purpose of instruction. As part of its discourse, Ecclesiastes employs classical wisdom forms, such as proverbs, parables or allegories, numerical sayings, comparative statements and poetry analogous to hymns, as literary devices that facilitate reflection on the concerns of the book. Like Proverbs, Ecclesiastes presupposes an educational setting in the royal court and perhaps in the temple as well.

4.4. Song of Songs. Song of Songs appears together with Proverbs and Ecclesiastes in Protestant versions of the Christian OT because of its attribution to King Solomon ben David. It appears as the first of the five Megillot in the Jewish Tanak because it is read as part of the liturgy for the festival of Passover. Both Christianity and Judaism read the Song of Songs's presentation of the relationship between the two lovers as allegory. In Christianity the relationship between the lovers signifies the relationship between Christ and the church. In Judaism the relationship between the lovers signifies the relationship between G-d and Israel, which was especially identified with the exodus from Egypt. Such allegory builds upon the many presentations of the relationship between G-d and Israel as a relationship between husband and wife (e.g., Is 49-54; Jer 2; Ezek 16; Hos 1-3; Zeph 3:14-20).

The superscription of the book identifies it as "The Song of Songs, which was Solomon's" (Song 1:1). The superscription is generally understood to attribute the book to Solomon either as author or as patron. Such attribution is based in part on the statements concerning Solomon's wisdom and composition of poetry in 1 Kings 5:9-14 and his reputation as a lover of women as expressed in 1 Kings 11:1-5 (cf. 1 Kings 10:1-13; 2 Chron 9:1-12). The body of the book, Song of Songs 1:2-8:13, presents a poetic or liturgical dramatization in five major movements or scenes of a love relationship between a woman and a man. Each of the first four movements concludes with a formulaic *refrain addressed to the daughters of Jerusalem. The first movement (Song 1:2-2:7) portrays the woman's expressions of desire for her lover. The second movement (Song 2:8-3:5) describes the approach of the lover and woman's efforts to search for him throughout the city. The third movement (Song 3:6-5:8) portrays the woman's anguish at the loss of her lover. The fourth movement (Song 5:9-8:4) portrays the lovers reunited. The fifth movement (Song 8:5-14) speaks elliptically of the consummation of the relationship.

Song of Songs is especially known for its use of allegory, metaphor and simile—typical wisdom genres—in its portrayal of the lovers in the drama and their interrelationship. Imagery of the natural world, such as fruit, flowers and animals of various types, are cited to convey their beauty, sweet aromas, strength and ardor and to apply these qualities to the portrayal of the two lovers and their surroundings. The use of the wasf, a literary device known from Egyptian love poetry of the fourteenth through the twelfth centuries BC, employs metaphorical images of flowers, plants, animals, gold, jewels and so forth to portray the physical form and charms of both lovers as they approach (e.g., Song 4:1-8; 5:10-16; 7:1-10). Critics trace the background of Song of Songs to Egyptian love poetry and to Sumerian love poetry that was sung in conjunction with the sacred marriage rituals of the Sumerian New Year celebration. Similar rites may have been known in ancient Israel, although the portrayal of maiden dancing in the vineyards around the Shiloh sanctuary at the festival of Sukkot is now adapted for polemics against the tribe of Benjamin in Judges 21:19-24. Perhaps Song of Songs functioned in the liturgy of the Jerusalem temple for Passover, Shavuot or Sukkot, each of which marks stages in the agricultural season of ancient Judah. Insofar as the festivals celebrate fertility of the flock and the harvest, they also evoke images of human love. Song of Songs might also have found a place in the royal court of Jerusalem.

5. Didactic Narrative.

5.1. The Book of Ruth. The book of Ruth appears among the Historical Books of the Christian OT following Judges and prior to 1 Samuel due to its portrayal of *Naomi and her Moabite daughter-in-law Ruth during the period of the Judges. Ruth appears as one of the five Megillot in the Jewish Tanak insofar as it is read as part of the liturgy for the celebration of Shavuot ("Weeks"), which celebrates the revelation of the Torah at Mount Sinai. Because of its association with the revelation of Torah at Sinai, Shavuot is also associated with the welcoming of converts into the Jewish community.

Although Ruth is presented as a historical narrative, it is designed as a didactic narrative or *novella, typical in Jewish literature of the Persian and Hellenistic periods (see, e.g., Esther; Dan 1—6; Tobit; Judith; 3 Maccabees) that affirms the acceptance of foreign converts to Judaism. Gunkel classified it among the folktales of the Hebrew Bible, although later interpreters recognize didactic narrative as a derivative form of Wisdom literature. Ruth employs a typical narrative episodic structure to relate the efforts of two women, Naomi and Ruth, to return to the land of Israel to restore their lives following the deaths of their husbands while living in the land of Moab. The narrative focuses especially on Ruth, a Moabite woman, who swears loyalty to Naomi and to her G-d, thereby making her a model for a convert to Judaism. Ultimately, Ruth marries *Boaz, a kinsman of her late husband, in a levirate (see Kinsman-Redeemer and Levirate) *marriage intended to preserve the line and legacy of the family (see Deut 25:5-10). Because the family of her late husband is based in Bethlehem, Ruth ultimately becomes the ancestor of King David ben Jesse of Judah and Israel.

The major motifs of the book draw heavily on Genesis 38, which portrays Tamar's efforts to engage her father-in-law, Judah, in a levirate marriage following the deaths of his two sons, who had died after marrying her. Many interpreters see Ruth as a challenge to the expulsion of foreign wives by Ezra and Nehemiah, but such a view fails to note that only those women who continued in their foreign religious practice and customs were expelled; those women who had affirmed G-d and Jewish religious practice are not mentioned (Ezra 9—10; Neh 13:23-28). The book of Ruth likely was written during the early Persian period, but it supports the actions of Ezra and Nehemiah by presenting Ruth as a role model for foreign women married to Jewish men at the time.

5.2. The Book of Esther. The book of Esther appears together with Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah among the Historical Books of the Christian OT due to its portrayal of the deliverance of the Jewish people by *Esther and *Mordecai during the reign of the Persian monarch *Ahasuerus (Xerxes I). Esther appears among the five Megillot of the Jewish Tanak because it is read as part of the liturgy for the celebration of *Purim, which celebrates the deliverance portrayed in Esther.

Esther is presented as a historical narrative, but its pronounced use of satire, hyperbole and an impossible historical scenario mark it as an example of the wisdom-oriented didactic narratives or novellas typical of the Second Temple period. The historical Ahasuerus—King Xerxes I of Persia (ruled 486-465 BC)—was barred by Persian law from marrying women outside of a selected circle of Persian noble families, and ultimately he was assassinated by a circle of people that included his own nephew. The Esther narrative, in order to emphasize the potential threat against the Jewish people posed by a negligent foreign government against the background of foreign rule of Judah, portrays him as a drunken fool who pays little attention to the affairs of government and court (unlike the historical Xerxes I). Major characters are modeled on earlier biblical models: Mordecai and Esther are descended from Kish, the father of Saul; Haman, the Persian minister who seeks to destroy the entire Jewish people, is identified with Agag, the Amalekite king who posed a mortal threat to Israel and whom Saul failed to kill (1 Sam 15). The Hebrew version of Esther makes no mention of G-d at all, which is deliberate insofar as the book presents a typical episodic narrative structure designed to examine the human responsibility to act against threat in a time of divine absence. Esther, a Jewish woman intermarried with the Persian king, emerges as the heroine of the narrative to illustrate that everyone, no matter how unlikely, has the responsibility to act in a time of crisis. The LXX form of Esther introduces additional material that introduces references to G-d into the narrative, apparently because its author was troubled by the absence of G-d in the Hebrew version.

See also CULT, WORSHIP: PSALMS; CULT, WORSHIP: WISDOM; EDITORIAL CRITICISM; LAMENT, PSALMS OF; NOVELLA, STORY, NARRATIVE; ORAL POETRY; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; THANKSGIVING, PSALMS OF; WISDOM POEMS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. J. Buss, Biblical Form Criticism in Its Context (JSOTSup 274; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999); G. W. Coats, ed., Saga, Legend, Tale, Novella, Fable: Narrative Forms in Old Testament Literature (JSOTSup 35; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985); J. L. Crenshaw, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); idem, The Psalms: An Introduction (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); E. S. Gerstenberger, Psalms: Part 1, with an Introduction to Cultic Poetry (FOTL 14; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); idem, Psalms: Part 2, and Lamentations (FOTL 15; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); H. Gunkel, The Folktale in the Old Testament (Sheffield: Almond, 1987); H. Gunkel and J. Begrich, Einleitung in die Psalmen: Die Gattungen der religiösen Lyrik Israels (HKAT; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1933); J. H. Hayes, ed., Old Testament Form Criticism (San Antonio: Trinity University Press, 1974); P. G. Kirkpatrick, The Old Testament and Folklore Study (JSOTSup 62; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1988); R. Knierim, "Old Testament Form Criticism Reconsidered," Int 27 (1973) 435-68; idem, "Criticism of Literary Features, Form, Tradition, and Redaction," in The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. D. Knight and G. M. Tucker (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985) 123-65; K Koch, The Growth of the Biblical Tradition: The Form-Critical Method (New York: Scribner, 1969); idem, Was ist Formgeschichte? Methoden der Biblexegese (3rd ed.; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1974); S. Mowinkel, Psalmenstudien (6 vols.; Kristiania: J. Dybwad, 1921-1924); R. E. Murphy, Wisdom

Literature: Job, Proverbs, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Esther (FOTL 13; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); W. Richter, Exegese als Literaturwissenschaft: Entwurf einer alttestamentlichen Literaturtheorie und Methodologie (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1971); idem, Recht und Ethos: Versuch einer Ortung des weisheitlichen Mahnspruches (SANT 15; Munich: Kösel, 1966); H. Schweizer, Metaphorische Grammatik: Wege zur Integration von Grammatik und Textinterpretation in der Exegese (ATSAT 15; St. Ottilien: EOS Verlag, 1981); M. A. Sweeney, "Form Criticism," in To Each Its Own Meaning: An Introduction to Biblical Criticisms and Their Applications, ed. S. L. McKenzie and S. R. Haynes (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999) 58-89; M. A. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi, eds., The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); P. Tribble, Rhetorical Criticism: Context, Method and the Book of Jonah (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); G. M. Tucker, Form Criticism of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); C. Westermann, Praise and Lament in the Psalms (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); idem, The Structure of the Book of Job (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); G. H. Wilson, The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (SBLDS 76; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985).

M. A. Sweeney

FORTRESS. See ARCHITECTURAL IMAGERY; PROTECTION IMAGERY.

FRAME NARRATIVE

A frame narrative is a narrative within another narrative. A common example is found in the book of Deuteronomy, where a narrator begins the book by saying, "These are the words of Moses" (Deut 1:1) and then continues to provide the setting and context for the book (Deut 1:2-5). Moses' first sermon begins in Deuteronomy 1:6, "Yahweh our God spoke to us at Horeb," and he goes on to address Israel in several sermons over the next thirty-three chapters. Throughout the sermons the narrator introduces and even interrupts Moses on several occasions before finally concluding the book with a short memorial and a description of Moses' death in Deuteronomy 34. In this way, the narrator "frames" Moses' sermons and provides a perspective through which Israel can appropriate them in each new generation. The effect of this kind of framed narration both enhances and transforms what would otherwise be a simple narrative. It is only in recent decades that the nature and functions of frame narratives described here have been applied to the interpretation of biblical books. Here we will survey the frame narratives in the wisdom books (*Job, *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes), making note of the most prominent scholarly contributions.

1. Understanding Frame Narrative
2. Frame Narrative in Job
3. Frame Narrative in Proverbs
4. Frame Narrative in Ecclesiastes
5. Conclusion

1. Understanding Frame Narrative.

To grasp how a frame narrative enhances and transforms an otherwise simple narrative, it is first helpful to understand the general category of the literary frame to which the profound and specialized frame narrative belongs. Nonnarrated frames are quite common in literature and borrow their name from the frames in picture and portrait art because they represent the boundaries or frontiers that arise in texts through changes in voice, genre, scene, language and so on. In classic literature we can compare the neat and careful framing of Jane Austen's character portraits in Mansfield Park and Pride and Prejudice with the more ambivalent frames that Henry James creates using melodramatic scenes to contrast with the overall pictures in his novels (see Caws). In the OT, *Song of Songs seems to be carefully framed by a woman's voice calling for her lover to meet her in their marriage chambers (Song 1:2; 8:13-14). Still, such simple frames, and their literary and aesthetic effects, are typically perceived subconsciously by the reader.

The frame narrative, however, is an especially explicit type of frame that draws attention to itself in a way that radically transforms a narrative. Such is the effect of the framed narration in Gulliver's Travels or in films such as Citizen Kane, Big Fish and Magnolia, where the occasional voice behind the story guides and directs the audience. The artistic "frontiers" of these frames form an "in-between world" (Traber, 221) that simultaneously gives readers the sense of belonging to and seclusion from the narrated drama. Such narrative voices can be either the main story that frames and is fed by an inner narrative (as in Deuteronomy) or a minor outer voice that orients or qualifies the dominating inner narrative (as in Ecclesiastes). Significantly, frame narratives are much stronger than genre, language or scene frames for their ability to direct the reader toward certain modes of interpretation and to effect intellectual, ethical and spiritual transformation.

That is, the literary form in frame narratives leads to existential levels of transformation such that the act of reading (or hearing or viewing) yields both reflection and understanding (see Caws, 4, 25; Dittmar, 192). For example, using repetition or highlighting in stories, frame narrators become "aids to perception" (Caws, 4) that point to the important or high points in a text. In a similar way, the voice of the frame narrator can also distance itself from the central narrative and create juxtaposition that "engenders interpretation," as in the books of Job and Ecclesiastes (see Dittmar, 191). M. A. Caws (14) observes that frames "call forth the maximum potential in our reading resources" and involve us in ways that a one-dimensional story cannot. In other words, by giving the reader a distanced yet participatory perspective on a story, a frame narrative intentionally creates space for self-examination as the reader moves back and forth between frame and story, between inclusion and exclusion, thereby leading readers to evaluate their own reading methods, values and epistemologies in light of those in the frame and body. In sum, frame narratives add a sophistication to texts that engages the full range of cognitive, spiritual and emotional aspects of human nature and thereby imbue the reading process with countless avenues to entertain, guide, challenge and transform an audience.

2. Frame Narrative in Job.

The book of Job has many frames that arise from changes in scene, voice, language and perspective (see Polzin). The most salient of these is a frame narrator who tells Job's story from a "God's-eye perspective" by prefacing the book in Job 1:1—2:12, introducing most of the speeches in Job 3—42, and providing the conclusion in Job 42:7-17. The perspective of this "omniscient narrator" in the frame is written in prose, and it stands alongside the longer set of human speeches in Job 3—42, written in poetry, and creates a sense of contradictory juxtaposition between the divine and human views of Job's suffering (Habel, 25-35). The juxtaposition is accentuated by the different sides of Job that we find in the two sections: silent and reverent in the frame, and sporadically reactive in the poetic body (Brenner). Through this juxtaposition the frame and the body draw attention to the “bipolarity” or “dichotomy” that exists between Job’s belief and his experience—a tension or conflict common to everyone who trusts in God’s sovereignty while living in a fallen world.

Furthermore, the three cycles of speeches between Job and his four friends in the central chapters (Job 3—37) also represent a kind of literary framing that amplifies the tension of the contrary juxtaposition. As the story progresses, the reader obtains at least five perspectives on the relationship between belief and experience: (1) the narrator’s (and God’s), (2) the friends’ in Job 3—25, (3) Elihu’s in Job 32—37, (4) Job’s in the frame and (5) Job’s in the body. These levels of juxtaposition are a part of the book’s literary craftedness, which is not written in a way that spews forth universal dogma on the nature of suffering or God’s sovereignty. On the contrary, Job’s frame-narrative structure demonstrates the natural complexity that arises in communities where tragedy presses in and individuals living in community attempt to cope. The frame narrator thus captures readers in a story that leads them through these many perspectives and thereby simultaneously challenges them to evaluate their own response to the unavoidable tension between belief and experience. In the closing section of the frame the reader is invited to follow Job, as it were, into a higher level of *wisdom—a wisdom highlighted in Job 42:7-8, where God declares his approval of Job’s speech. God’s approval likely refers not just to Job’s confession in Job 42:1-6 but rather to Job’s words throughout the book, which, in the face of tragedy, have been able to achieve a balance between God’s sovereignty and human experience, thus turning the experiences of suffering into discovery. The frame narrator also effects a second turn, transforming what seems to be a traditional ancient tragedy—with Job as the suffering hero—into a mosaic that displays the wisdom, mystery and faithfulness of the Creator (Job 42:10-17).

3. Frame Narrative in Proverbs.

Although Proverbs is not a narrative with a sustained plot, conflict and resolution, it does have a discernable framing structure and sense of progression that perform the essential roles of a frame narrative. Its frame consists of theological admonitions, interludes and poems in Proverbs 1—9; 30—31, which surround the body of short traditional proverbs in Proverbs 10—29. In the opening frame (Prov 1—9) a series of ten admonitions (Prov 1:1; 1:8-19; 2:1-22; 3:1-12, 21-35; 4:1-9; 4:10-19; 4:20-27; 5:1-23; 6:20-35; 7:1-27) by the father continually appeal to his “son” to follow the way of wisdom, leading readers to identify with the student and embrace the teachings of the book. The frame has two more prominent characteristics. First, “the fear of Yahweh” (see Fear of the Lord) as the beginning (and foundation) of wisdom stands at both ends of the book (Prov 1:7; 31:30) in addition to appearing twelve more times throughout Proverbs. Wisdom is thus understood as more than simply a pragmatic enterprise; rather, it is the natural and proper outflow of the life that has been brought into a loving relationship with Israel’s redeeming and creating God. Second, the frame is further nuanced by the feminine motifs that increase the urgency of the father’s admonitions. In Proverbs 1—9 these motifs are expressed in the five interludes (Prov 1:20-33; 3:13-20; 6:1-19; 8:1-36; 9:1-18) placed between the father’s ten admonitions. The feminine motifs return again in the portrait of the “valiant” woman in Proverbs 31:10-31, which closes the book with a remarkable *personification of wisdom centered on the fear of Yahweh (Van Leeuwen; Wolters).

Using the motifs of alluring *women and the fear of Yahweh, the frame embeds wisdom in the fullest imaginable range of human life and culture that can be experienced in God’s created order (see Camp). In Proverbs 1—9 the women lure the reader at the levels of sensuality, sustenance and prosperity, inviting the passer-by to turn to their houses and partake of their feasts. Their appeals communicate the urgency of mortal consequences as the paths of wisdom and folly (and the houses of these two women) ultimately lead to life and death (see Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly). All the while, fearing the Creator and Redeemer continually depicts the pursuit of wisdom as a relational and religious journey. Finally, the valiant woman in Proverbs 31 appeals to the practical and aesthetic dimensions of life, personifying wisdom as she excels in areas of business, charity, household management, parenting and marriage (Wolters). In this way, the frame shapes reading habits in order to involve readers in God's design for the aesthetic, moral, economic, spiritual and vital nature of life. Wisdom is that most valued treasure (Prov 2:4; 3:13-18; cf. Prov 31:10), which equips God's creatures to walk fittingly within this design.

4. Frame Narrative in Ecclesiastes.

If Ecclesiastes is not the most recognized frame narrative, it certainly is the most controversial, as is evidenced by an increasing number of scholars who variously try to account for the strategic differentiation between the book's main voice (*Qohelet) and the voice of a frame narrator. Most scholars assign Ecclesiastes 1:1-2; 7:27; 12:8-14 to the frame, and the remainder of the book to Qohelet (Longman, however, also attributes Eccles 1:3-11 to the introductory frame). Most also agree that the narrative voice in the first two framing sections maintains a fairly neutral stance in regard to Qohelet's own message. However, both the translation and the interpretation of the narrator's final epilogue (Eccles 12:8-14) are highly disputed, leading to at least three different perspectives on the relationship between Qohelet and the frame.

4.1. Distance and Neutrality. M. V. Fox initiated the turn to frame-narrative analysis some thirty years ago, and despite the anticipated maturation of several decades of research, he has consistently represented the frame as a distancing voice in the book. So, although his translation of the closing epilogue (Eccles 12:8-14) implies that the narrator has fairly strong reservations about Qohelet's wisdom, Fox still sees the narrator in a position of distanced neutrality that affords the reader the space to evaluate both sides of the book (Fox 1977, 103-5) while upholding Qohelet as a sage honestly seeking wisdom in the face of the realities that try his faith. E. S. Christianson also makes a strong case for this "distanced" position and sees the neutrality as a key strategy in leading readers into moral and epistemological self-examination. For both Christianson and Fox, Qohelet's own tendency to observe himself observing is a clue to the multileveled nature of his rhetoric—a rhetoric that demands the reader's self-examination.

4.2. Opposition and Rejection. T. Longman follows Fox's more pessimistic translation of the epilogue yet suggests that this betrays the narrator's reproachful and decided opposition to Qohelet. In this case, Qohelet in the body emerges as a "skeptic" whose theological message can be summarized thus: "Life is full of trouble and then you die" (Longman, 34). According to Longman (274-84), the frame narrator in turn shuns his unproductive musings in favor of a more traditional admonition to fear God and keep his commandments (Eccles 12:13-14). Furthermore, Longman's pessimistic translation of the final epilogue parallels his preference to render Qohelet's thirty-eight uses of hebel as "meaningless." In other words, he sees Qohelet's self-centered and skeptical search for wisdom continually leading to a meaningless end, which the orthodox frame narrator rightly denounces.

4.3. Irony and Inclusion. Scholars such as C. G. Bartholomew and C. L. Seow take a third perspective on the book in which Qohelet and the frame, through a subtle use of irony, are in fact aligned in the end. As Seow (38) says, "The perspective of the book is one and the same as the framework." In defense of this position, the frame narrator's final epilogue is given a less pessimistic translation (see the arguments in Bartholomew, 158-70). And, besides the translation and role of irony in the book, these scholars prefer to render hebel with a more metaphorical sense of "enigma" or "vapor," which assigns to Qohelet a certain awareness of the skepticism that he aims to deconstruct using his polished rhetorical skills and self-involved irony.

As can be seen in the unique intersection of literary, epistemological and linguistic variables in the interpretation of Ecclesiastes, accounting for the role of the frame narrative is an extremely complex task. Nevertheless, whatever the relationship between Qohelet's words and the frame, to one degree or another all the aforementioned scholars agree that the frame-narrative provokes the reader (and reading community) to assess the many perspectives presented in the book and, in doing so, to engage in a self-reflective assessment of personal epistemology and theology. The frame narrative, then, can be seen as a masterful tool in its ability to engage, challenge and shape its reading audience.

5. Conclusion.

The frame narrative provides invaluable insights into understanding the sophisticated literary dynamics of many biblical books. Its presence in Job, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes creates a web of interactions between aesthetic artistry and spiritual and existential transformation. The particular strength of the frame in the Wisdom literature, as we have seen, is to involve readers in self-examination of their morality, epistemology and values and then move them along the path toward a more mature wisdom. And, whereas the frame in Proverbs serves largely to keep wisdom in its proper submission to Yahweh, the frames in Job and Ecclesiastes illumine for readers the many and varied perspectives that are all appropriate to living in the world that God himself has made with wisdom (Prov 3:19-20). Using frames, wisdom thus achieves a unity and foundation amidst the diversity of human experiences.

See also RHETORICAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. G. Bartholomew, Reading Ecclesiastes: Old Testament Exegesis and Hermeneutical Theory (AnBib 139; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1998); A. Brenner, "Job the Pious? The Characterization of Job in the Narrative Framework of the Book," JSOT 43 (1989) 37-52; C. V. Camp, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs (BLS 1; Sheffield: Almond, 1985); M. A. Caws, Reading Frames in Modern Fiction (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1985); E. S. Christianson, A Time to Tell: Narrative Strategies in Ecclesiastes (JSOTSup 280; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); L. Dittmar, "Fashioning and Re-Fashioning: Framing Narratives in the Novel and Film," Mosaic 16.1-2 (1983) 189-203; M. V. Fox, "Frame-Narrative and Composition in the Book of Qohelet," HUCA 48 (1977) 83-106; idem, Ecclesiastes (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2004); N. C. Habel, The Book of Job (OTL; London: SCM, 1985); T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); R. Polzin, "The Framework of the Book of Job," Int 28 (1974) 182-200; C. L. Seow, Ecclesiastes (AB 18C; New York: Doubleday, 1997); C. Traber, "In Perfect Harmony? Escaping the Frame in the Early Twentieth Century," in In Perfect Harmony: Picture and Frame, 1850-1920, ed. Eva Mendgen et al. (Amsterdam: Van Gogh Museum, 1995) 221-47; R. C. Van Leeuwen, "Liminality and Worldview in Proverbs 1-9," Semeia 50 (1990) 111-44; A. Wolters, The Song of the Valiant Woman: Studies in the Interpretation of Proverbs 31:10-31 (Carlisle: Paternoster, 2001).

R. O'Dowd

G

GATE. See ARCHITECTURE.

GOD

Any attempt to discuss God in a short compass is, in the nature of the case, a daunting task. But it is doubly so in regard to wisdom, poetry and writings. First, there is a wide range of ideas concerning God in this collection of literature. The whole gamut of OT theological concepts is found here, from the intimate and personal Yahweh of the covenant in *Psalms to the distant and almost unknowable God of *Ecclesiastes, and everything in between. Second, that the task is difficult is implied in what was just said: the different genres involved display the multiplicity of ideas in differing constellations. For these reasons, the present article does not attempt to provide an integrated discussion but rather is organized along genre lines.

1. Divine Titles
2. Psalms
3. Wisdom Literature
4. Writings

1. Divine Titles.

One indication of the diversity of thought in this collection of material is in the distribution of the divine names. “God” (’ēlōhīm) occurs 404 times in Psalms. The Tetragrammaton (yhwh, usually rendered “the LORD”) occurs almost twice as often, 731 times. In the Wisdom literature (*Job, *Proverbs, Ecclesiastes) there is a striking reversal of the frequency of the occurrences of these names in Proverbs on the one hand and Job and Ecclesiastes on the other. “God” appears only six times in Proverbs, while “the LORD” occurs eighty-seven times. In Job “God” occurs 118 times and “the LORD” only thirty-three times, and almost all of those in the prologue (Job 1–2) and the epilogue (Job 42:7-17). In Ecclesi-astes “God” appears forty-one times and “the LORD” not at all. In the remaining literature (*Ruth, *Lamentations, *Esther, *Song of Songs) the variety continues. As is famously known, God does not appear by title in the book of Esther. But it is also true that a divine title occurs only once in Song of Songs: “the LORD” (Song 8:6). In Lamentations and Ruth it is “the LORD” that dominates: forty-three times in Lamentations, twelve times in Ruth. In contrast, “God” appears only once in Lamentations and three times in Ruth. Broadly speaking, these differences can be understood as relating to functional distinctions (as opposed, for instance, to evidence of differing sources). In general, when “God” is used, the writer is referring to the Deity in a more general and abstract way. On the other hand, when “the LORD” is used, the reference is generally to the personal God revealed in the covenant and elsewhere in Israel’s experience. This distinction is by no means absolute, but it is broadly useful.

Among other titles used for God in the OT only “the Almighty” (šadday) and “the Most High” (’elyôn) occur with any frequency in these books. “The Almighty” is virtually limited to Job (31x). As with the predominance of “God” in Job, so the frequency of this title speaks of God in more abstract and less personal terms. “The Most High” occurs twenty-two times in Psalms. It is hard to determine any pattern in its usages. It occurs in context with “The LORD” almost exactly as often as it does with “God” (for further discussion, see 2.3.2 below, on God as king in Psalms).

As noted at the opening of this section, the diversity of the ways in which the divine name is used in these parts of the OT is a witness to the richness of the understanding of God that they express.

2. Psalms.

It has been somewhat jocularly said that God is the “center” of OT theology. That is certainly true in regard to Psalms. God is the subject of every psalm. If it is a *lament, it is a lament to God for the situation in which he has allowed his servant to languish. If it is a *hymn, it is in praise of the character and nature of God. If it is a song of *thanksgiving, it is an expression of gratitude for something God has done in the worshiper’s life. If it is a *kingship psalm, it is extolling God’s monarchy of the world and his establishment of his *messiah on the throne of Israel. If it is a *wisdom psalm, it is admonishing persons to immerse themselves in God’s wisdom as it is found in his word. Thus, the psalms are not about the “religion” of Yahweh; rather, they are about Yahweh and Israel in dialogue (so Kraus, 12 [following von Rad]).

2.1. Titles for God in Psalms. We get some sense of this divine centrality when we discover that in the 150 psalms the two main titles for God appear almost 1,200 times, with “the LORD” occurring approximately twice as often (784x; yhwh 688x, yāh 43x, ’ādōnāy as a divine title 53x) as “God” (404x). Given that there are approximately 2,500 verses in Psalms, this works out to an average of one reference to God by name in every other verse throughout the entire corpus. Obviously, such a statement is a broad generalization, since there are many verses where a title may appear twice. However it gives some specificity to the point being made.

When the distribution of the two names is studied, some interesting patterns emerge, for the overall 2:1 ratio is not maintained in specifics. In the first book (Pss 1–41) “the LORD” occurs 290 times as against 68 occurrences of “God,” or close to a 4:1 ratio. But in the second book (Pss 42–72) and throughout much of the third (Pss 73–89) the ratio is reversed, with “God” occurring 301 times and “the LORD” occurring 110 times. However, if one limits the consideration to Psalms 42–83, at which point a fairly obvious shift in proportions emerges, the difference is more striking: 281 to 69, or almost exactly the reverse of the first forty-one psalms. Given this fact, it will be obvious that there is a greater preponderance of “the LORD” from Psalm 84 to the end of the collection: 421 to 98, more than 4:1. One should not place undue weight on word counts such as this, but it is still helpful to give some sense of proportion. It also lends support to the emerging consensus that the present collection of the psalms is not in the random order that may appear to be the case at first glance. Clearly, the first forty-one and the last sixty-seven psalms are “Yahwistic,” while Psalms 42–83 are “Elohistic.” Scholars have debated, and will continue to debate, exactly what these facts mean for the origins of the psalms and for the development of Israelite theology, but those concerns need not detain us here.

Two further points should be made. The first has to do with the most frequent use of ’ēlōhim, which is as an object of a possessive pronoun or noun, as in “my God,” “our God,” “God of Jacob/Israel,” or “God of truth, salvation, etc.” In many of these cases the phrase is used to modify either “the LORD,” as in Psalm 18:28, or “God,” as in Psalm 67:6. In these cases the line between noun and title begins to become blurred (see also Ps 59:5). The two titles may also appear as a parallel pair (e.g., Ps 18:6, 21; 24:5; 29:3; 55:16; 69:13; 94:22). The second observation has to do with Psalms 14; 53. These two are virtual duplicates except for one thing: Psalm 53 uses “God” exclusively, whereas in Psalm 14 four of the seven occurrences of the divine name appear as “the LORD.” Several different explanations for this phenomenon have been put forward, none of them compelling. At a minimum, the two psalms indicate that the two titles were understood to function in an overlapping way.

An additional title of God occurs with some frequency in the psalms. This is “the Most High” (’elyōn). Of the fifty-three OT occurrences of this title, twenty-two are in Psalms. It occurs equally often as a qualifier of “the LORD” as with “God” and does not seem to be limited to any particular context. The bulk of the occurrences are found in the second and third books, between Psalm 46 and Psalm 97 (18x), with no occurrences after Psalm 107. As might be expected, the title occurs most frequently in contexts related to God’s power and sovereignty (e.g., Ps 47:2; 89:27; 97:9). However, it also occurs in the context of praise and *worship (e.g., Ps 7:17; 9:2; 46:4; 50:14), while Psalm 91 speaks of “the Most High” as one’s personal hiding place and refuge (Ps 91: 1, 9).

2.2. The Character of God in Psalms. When surveying the psalms, one cannot escape the dominant impression that these poems are above all else concerned to praise, bless and thank God. Even the laments, which struggle over God’s apparent absence or inactivity, typically end with a vow of praise to be given not if God acts, but when he acts. Why is this the case? The simple answer is that the psalmists are overcome with the gracious and dependable character of this God. They cannot say enough good things about him.

This is largely so because of one overriding quality of God expressed in the psalms: hesed, a quality that no single English word adequately expresses. The variety of English translations of this term is witness to this fact. Even a partial list includes “goodness,” “kindness,” “mercy,” “grace,” “love,” “steadfast love,” “unfailing love” and “loving-kindness.” Interestingly, although the term occurs some 250 times in the Hebrew Bible, there has yet to be found a cognate for it in any other Semitic language. This suggests a situation analogous to agapē in NT Greek, where an obscure Greek word was adapted to express an understanding of love not found in classical Greek thought. Be that as it may, hesed conveys the idea of the intentional kindness, generosity or loyalty of a superior to an inferior, especially when it is undeserved. Although the term can be used of humans to each other (see 4.4 below), it is primarily used of God from its first occurrence, in Genesis 19:19, onward. This is certainly true of the psalms. More than half of the total occurrences of the word are found in Psalms (130x), and virtually all refer to God. It is a source of praise (136x), a reason for hope of forgiveness and restoration (Ps 51:1), a cause for concern when apparently withheld (Ps 77:8), and a cause for confidence in distress (Ps 59:8). Ultimately, God’s hesed is the reason why laments typically end in a vow of praise. As Psalm 86:5 says, “You, O LORD, are good and forgiving, full of hesed to all those who call upon you.” This quality shapes every other quality of God and every other role that he plays. If he becomes angry, it is but for a moment, because his hesed endures forever (Ps 103:8-11); if he is the righteous judge, his ordering of his world will always be tempered by his hesed (Ps 89:32-33).

Two other qualities are regularly mentioned in the context of hesed. They are goodness (tôb) and faithfulness (’ēmûnâ). The classic statement of the first is found in Psalm 136:1 (see also Ps 106:1; 107:1, 118:1, 29). God’s goodness is directly related to his nature. That which is good, as Genesis 1 shows, is fully in keeping with the created nature of things. This repeated statement,

“He is good,” is a way of saying that God never acts out of keeping with the best interests of the cosmos that he created. Since God is unlimited in power, he certainly could do so, but the psalmists testify in wonder that this God of hesed never does.

In that regard, God is utterly reliable. This is the point of the second concept, ’ēmûnâ (“faithfulness”). The consonantal base of the word is ’mn (“be firm, reliable”). The concept occurs no less than seven times in Psalm 89. In the first two verses the singer sets the tone, twice using “faithfulness” as the poetic equivalent and development of hesed. Yahweh’s grace, compassion and patience are absolutely fixed and dependable. They are so for every generation (Ps 100:5; 119:90), and that truth needs to be made known to each new generation (Ps 40:10; 89:1).

This idea of the Lord’s unfailing goodness, dependability and grace is a surprising one in the world of ancient Near Eastern religion, where the gods were thoroughly inconsistent. If they were good on some occasions, they were bad on others. If they were dependable in some instances, they were quite fickle in others. But Yahweh, “the Holy One of Israel” (Ps 71:22; 78:41; 89:18), was not so. His character was the same in all circumstances. This recognition had a profound impact upon the understanding of the concept “holy.” It was no longer primarily a description of “otherness,” or what Rudolf Otto called “the numinous.” Rather, since Israel’s God alone was rightly called “holy,” and since he was one both in essence and character, then “holy” was no longer limited to the divine essence, but rather its meaning was also to be defined by his unique character. “Holy” occurs in all its forms in Psalms more than 50 times. Most of these are adjectival uses identifying something associated with the Lord, as in “holy temple” (Ps 79:1), “holy oil” (Ps 89:20) and “holy arm” (Ps 98:1). However, this deeper understanding of the unique, “holy” character of God is also apparent, as in Psalm 22:2-5. Because the “Praise of Israel” is “holy,” he can be depended upon not to remain silent but rather to faithfully answer prayer. In Psalm 30:5, to joyfully remember the holiness of the Lord is to recall that his anger is but for a moment, while his favor is for a lifetime. To praise the Holy One of Israel is to recount his faithfulness as he acts in *righteousness to redeem his people. In fact, in Psalm 145:17 “holy” and “righteous” are synonyms used to describe the Lord.

All this leads to a characteristic term in Psalms for the nature of God: his “name.” It is widely recognized that the “name” of God is not a label or a title but rather a term for his very nature (“what he is in himself” [Kraus, 21]). Thus, when God’s “name” is said repeatedly to be “holy” (Ps 33:21; 99:3; 103:1; 105:3; 106:47; 111:9; 145:21), a highly significant point is being made. This is so because God’s “name” is not primarily expressed in his otherness. When the psalmists speak of God’s holy name, they are thinking of his hesed, of his goodness, of his faithfulness, and of his righteousness (Ps 138:2). This is what it means for God to be holy. The fact that the singer is going to extol these “in the face of the gods” is quite significant. He is saying that the “gods” do not even have the right to be called “holy.” Yahweh alone is truly other, both in essence and character.

2.3. The Roles of God in Psalms. God’s character is revealed in the psalms through several roles that he is said to play in regard to the cosmos and in particular in regard to human beings. Among these are creator, king/judge, covenant Lord, Father, redeemer/deliverer.

2.3.1. Creator. As elsewhere in the OT, so also in Psalms there is no question how the earth came into being. It came into being as a result of the express will of the sole creator, Yahweh, the Lord. He is “the maker of heaven and earth” (Ps 115:15; 124:8; 134:3). All that is the result of his spoken command (Ps 33:6; 148:5); it is the work of his hands (Ps 100:3; 138:8). This latter point is significant in biblical theology because the Bible is at pains to assert that the gods are the work of human hands. This is true not only of the actual idols but also of the theology of idolatry, which is an attempt to make the cosmos amenable to human manipulation and control. So the psalmists can assert that God is high over all the heaven and the earth (Ps 113:4; 148:13), and that he is greater than all the gods (put together?) (Ps 86:8; 96:4; 135:5). The writers are free enough from any mythological outlook that they can playfully call the sea monsters and the deeps—elements that the myth-makers used to express the forces of chaos that constantly threatened the gods—to come and give praise to the true creator of the universe (Ps 148:7).

Because the Lord is the maker of all things, all things are at his beck and call. They join in the song of praise (Ps 103:22), and when they seem to be a threat to God’s people, they are no threat to him (Ps 46:2-4); rather, he commands them with calm assurance, and they do his will.

2.3.2. King/Judge. Because God is the maker of the universe, he is its true king (Ps 93:1; 95:3). He rules it with complete sovereignty, and there is nothing to threaten it, most of all not the kings of this earth (Ps 47:1-9). He laughs at their attempts to shake off his sovereignty and to make themselves absolute (Ps 2:4; 59:8). And as king, he is the one who assures that the proper order of things is maintained (Ps 89:14; 98:9; 105:7). This was the task that kings across the ancient Near East took upon themselves. Although it is not incorrect to translate the word for this order as “justice” (mīšpāt), that is only one aspect of a far larger concept. Where there is disorder from the creation plan, there is injustice, oppression, violence and murder. What the psalmists tell us is that where the true king is allowed to rule, there mīšpāt is to be found (Ps 7:11), and they look forward to that great day when the divine order will, through the Lord’s messiah, prevail over all the earth (Ps 2:7-12; 89:27-28; 96:10; 110:5-6).

2.3.3. Covenant Lord. Not only is the Lord the king of the universe, but also he is the king who has entered into covenant with his chosen people (Pss 78; 106). But unlike the suzerains of earth who tended to use covenants to bind their subjects while freeing themselves, this covenant Lord has bound himself as well (Ps 106:44-46). And so the psalmists sing the praises of the one who has kept his covenant even when his partners have broken theirs (Ps 78:38-39; 89:33-34). And in that covenant he has revealed the mīšpāt that he has written into his world (Ps 119:149). His instructions are without a blemish, turning a person around (Ps 19:7). To master them and live by them is to come to know wisdom, to inherit the earth (Ps 1:2; 37:30-31; 111:7-10).

2.3.4. Father. But beyond this covenant relationship the psalms depict Yahweh as one who plays an even more personal role in relationship to his people. He is the Father, who will take up his children when their earthly mothers and fathers forsake him (Ps 27:10; 68:5; 89:26). He is the true husband to Israel his beloved (Ps 60:5; 108:6; 127:2). This deeply personal note is sounded again and again as the poets take God’s care over them and his intense interest in their concerns as a given. They call upon him in every difficulty, secure in the certainty that he is immediately available to them. This is no “Life Force,” no “Unmoved Mover,” no “Ultimate Concern.” Neither is this the physical father, as the Canaanite god El was said to be the “father of the gods.” This is “the lover of my soul” (Ps 31:7; 34:2-22; 84:2) who is the final “refuge” to whom every human can fly (Ps 25:20; 91:2; 141:5).

2.3.5. Redeemer/Deliverer. In the light of all of the aforementioned roles, it is not surprising that the writers of the psalms see the Lord as the one who delivers from every trouble, who redeems from every captivity. The cries of the lamenters are based upon this certainty and grow out of the confusion over why God the deliverer has not yet acted. The hymns extol his nature as redeemer, and the songs of thanksgiving overflow with praise for his deliverance. As the creator, he will accomplish his deliverance, which cannot be deterred or defeated. As the just king, he will not allow the disorder of sin to prevail in his kingdom. As the covenant Lord, he will bring the blessings of the covenant upon any who will put themselves in the position to receive them. As the Father, he is moved with compassion at the plight of his people.

3. Wisdom Literature.

One of the characteristics of ancient Near Eastern wisdom literature is its so-called humanistic bent (see Crenshaw, 55). There is little reference to the divine to be found in it. This wisdom is a thoughtful distillation of the truths of human experience, whether positive or negative. It was not thought to be received from the gods, nor did relations with the gods have much to do with it other than limited counsel about how to conduct oneself in religious settings. This is not at all the case with the Israelite Wisdom literature. Although it does bear unmistakable family resemblance to the other wisdom literature in literary features as well as in its focus on what can be learned from life, God is hardly peripheral to its concerns. Indeed, it might be argued that God is central to the OT Wisdom literature. That is most obviously the case with the book of Job, where the whole focus is on the attempt to justify God's behavior or to call him to account for it. But it is also true with Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, in which the first continually explains the success of good behavior and the failure of bad behavior by reference to Yahweh's desires and intentions, and the second, while insisting on the unintelligibility of much of God's activity, still maintains that one had better do what God wants!

In all three cases the basis for human choices is not the pragmatic results of human experience but rather “the fear of God/the LORD” (Job 1:1, 8-9; 2:3; 4:6; 28:28; Prov 1:7, 29; 2:5; 3:7; 8:13; 9:10; 10:27; 14:2; 15:6; 16:6; 19:23; 22:4; 23:17; 24:21; 31:30; Eccles 3:14; 5:7; 7:18; 8:12-13; 12:13). The description of the fear of God at the end of Ecclesiastes is as good a one as can be found in short compass: it is to keep the commandments of God, for he will bring every person to judgment for every action. This is very far from the idea that one should decide for or against a behavior on the basis of its proven chances of success. Rather, a behavior's chances of success are (or at least should be) in direct relationship to what the Creator/Judge of the world has determined. And where was the Creator's will for human life to be found? It was to be found in his covenant with Israel. What this means is that while the Israelite Wisdom literature shares many superficial features with that of Israel's surrounding cultures, it is essentially different from them at heart. It also means that the assertion that the Wisdom literature provides an alternative to revelation through salvation history with revelation through ordinary experience (Murphy, 126) is not correct. What it does mean is that Israel's understanding of the significance of ordinary experience was thoroughly conditioned and profoundly altered by what it had learned about God in the arena of salvation history.

3.1. Proverbs. In Proverbs “the LORD” (86x) is far and away the most common title for the Deity, far exceeding “God” (6x). As noted above, this is directly opposite to Job, where “God” (118x) is much more common than “the LORD” (33x), and Ecclesiastes, where “the LORD” does not appear at all. This fact suggests that Proverbs is at pains to assert that it is Yahweh, Israel's God, the God of the covenant, who is in fact the sole fount of wisdom in the earth. This would make sense if *Solomon was indeed the originator of the collection. The empire that his father had bequeathed to him certainly would have suggested that Yahweh was indeed the God of the world, and the insistent monotheism that Solomon had received through the books of Moses would have argued that Yahweh is the only God, of the world, the only source of wisdom.

Whatever the explanation of the fact might be, a fact it is. Wisdom is not merely something that humans discover, it being incipient in the world as it is. Rather, wisdom is the creation and possession of God. It exists in the world because it is an expression of the consistent character of things as the Creator made them. He is the source of wisdom and has made the world according to it. Thus, to gain wisdom is to discover the ways of the Lord. That means that acting wisely is not merely a smart thing to do. Rather, it is to fear the Lord. On the other side of the coin, acting foolishly is not merely a stupid thing to do, but is to defy the Lord. Ultimately, in that it denies the verities of existence, *folly is an abomination to God. Thus, in the end we are not speaking merely of the wise person, but about the righteous person. Nor are we speaking about the fool or the scoffer, but about the wicked person. Wisdom has been effectively moved from something primarily pragmatic aimed at achieving success in life to that which is in keeping with the moral reality of things, and foolishness is not merely stupid, but morally wrong (so especially in Psalm 1).

The well-known statement in Proverbs 1:7, “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge,” sets the stage for the Yahwistic understanding of wisdom (see also Prov 9:10, near the end of the opening division of the book, and Prov 15:33). Proverbs 2:5 makes much the same point but goes farther to say that knowledge too is from God. To fear the Lord is to turn away from evil (Prov 3:7). Indeed, it is to hate evil (Prov 8:13; see also Prov 16:6). The *fear of the Lord results in long life (Prov 10:27; 19:23), in confidence (Prov 14:26), and in riches and honor (Prov 22:4). However, if it ever comes to a choice between abundance and the fear of the Lord, the sages urge us to choose the latter every time (Prov 15:16). To fear the Lord is to choose the straight path instead of the crooked (Prov 14:2) and to take the Lord into account in everything that we do (Prov 30:9).

All of this is so because wisdom comes from the Lord (Prov 2:6; 19:21; 21:30; 22:12). Indeed, wisdom was his first creation (Prov 8:22). The verb for “create” used in that statement is not bārāʾ, which speaks of bringing a new thing into existence; rather, it is qānā, which refers to bringing something into existence for oneself, as in “to create wealth.” God did not create wisdom as a new thing. It was indeed who he was in himself. But he quantified it, as it were, when he brought the world into existence. Modern attempts to suggest that “wisdom” (the fem. noun ḥokmā) was once the female consort of God are wrong-headed in the extreme (see Waltke 2004, 83-87). The point is simply to assert in the strongest figurative terms that wisdom is not some principle that exists in tandem with, or even apart from, the Lord but rather is indeed implicit in all that he, the all-wise God, has made (Prov 3:19; see also Prov 20:12; 22:2, 12; 29:13).

This explains the frequent statement that certain behaviors are “an abomination to the LORD.” They are not merely stupid, or even wrong; they are a denial of the very way the Lord has made the cosmos. The list of these is instructive. There is the crooked (or perverse) behavior (Prov 3:32; 11:20; 15:9), haughty eyes, a lying tongue, bloody hands, a scheming heart, feet running to evil, a false witness, and one who pits brothers against each other (Prov 6:16; see also Prov 12:22; 15:9, 26; 16:5), a false set of scales (Prov 11:1; 16:11; 20:10, 23), insincere sacrifice (Prov 15:9; 21:3), condemning the innocent and justifying the wicked (Prov 17:5). In his wisdom the Lord has made the world according to certain standards; to deviate from those patterns, even if in the short term the deviation seems to yield good results, is the way of a fool.

On the other hand, the wise choose the Lord’s way, entrusting themselves to him (Prov 3:5; 16:20; 22:19; 28:25; 29:25), committing their way and works to him (Prov 16:3), determined to honor him in all things (Prov 3:9), waiting for him rather than attempting to solve their problems without reference to him (Prov 20:22), seeking him and his blessing in all things (Prov 28:5). This is the wise course of action because God stands behind all things. All that is, is because of him (Prov 16:4; 20:24; 21:1; 22:2; 29:13, 26). He understands all things as they really are and evaluates them correctly, things that no human is capable of (Prov 5:21; 15:3, 11; 16:1, 2, 9, 33; 17:3; 20:24, 27; 21:2, 31; 24:17-18). All this is to say that we are not ultimate, and to act as though we are is rankest foolishness. Instead, we ought to try to learn God’s ways, commit ourselves to following those ways with all the sincerity that we can muster, and entrust the outcome to him, recognizing that we do not know all things and cannot foresee all outcomes and are almost infinitely capable of self-deception.

When we act in those ways, the book tells us, we will be the beneficiaries of the Lord's elemental goodness and love. One expression of that love will be discipline and reproof (Prov 3:11-12). But if we profit from those and choose the ways of God's righteousness, we will live under his favor (Prov 8:35; 18:22), will have our physical needs supplied (Prov 10:3), will have our posterity secured (Prov 15:25), have access to the Lord in prayer (Prov 15:29), have peace with our enemies (Prov 16:7), have a place of refuge in him (Prov 10:29; 18:10), and have his defense when we are unjustly charged (Prov 29:26).

3.2. Job. As noted above, the majority of the references to the Deity in the book of Job use the title "God" (118x). "The LORD" appears only thirty-three times, almost all in Job 1–2 (the "prologue") and in Job 42:7-12 (the "epilogue"). This fact could be argued to support the conclusion that these two sections of the book are from a different hand, but it must also be considered whether the different titles may relate to the differing views of God prevailing in the sections (on the integrity of the present book, see Janzen, 23-24; contra Pope, xxi-xxv). On this point it is important to note that the long disputation by Elihu, unanswered by Job (Job 32–37), is also thought by many to be a later addition (see Pope, xxvii; but also see Hartley, 28-30). But the title used exclusively there is "God," the one that predominates in the rest of the body of the book (Job 3:1–40:6). Note also that the final section of Ecclesiastes (variously understood as Eccles 12:1-14 or Eccles 12:9-14) is also thought to be from the hand of someone wanting to make the generally pessimistic outlook more palatable. But it continues to use "God" like the rest of the book does. These thoughts are not meant to foreclose discussion on the composition of Job (or Ecclesiastes), but they are meant to say that the conception of God that an author wishes to convey may be at least as important a consideration in the choice of titles as is the assumption of differing authors.

The predominant use of "God" is consistent with the major concern in Job: divine justice considered in broad and general terms. This is not to say that God is thought of in primarily impersonal terms—far from it. Nor is it to say that the God of the covenant is entirely absent from these writings. The occasional appearance of "commandment" in a covenant context, although admittedly rare in Job and Ecclesiastes, still indicates that what is being said is not in ignorance of that whole side of God. Rather, the concern is to deal with broader, even more basic questions. Job, along with Ecclesiastes, is asking the question of whether there is any fundamental consistency at the heart of the Deity. It is for this reason that the term "God" predominates. The location of Job in "the land of Uz" (frequently associated with Edom) and in a patriarchal milieu also reinforces the idea that the concerns addressed in the book are not confined to persons within the Israelite covenant.

This conclusion is furthered when we discover that of the forty-eight OT references to God as "the Almighty" (šadday), fully thirty-one of them are found in Job. Of these, sixteen are in the mouths of Job's so-called comforters, including Elihu, and fourteen come from Job. One, in Job 40:2, comes from God himself. As the English translation rightly suggests, this title speaks of the inimitable power of God. In Job it most often appears as the poetic equivalent of "God," and whatever is said of God is also said of the Almighty. However, it should be noted that in almost all cases of such synonymous parallelism in Job, "Almighty" occurs in the second colon. Since the second colon regularly serves to intensify, clarify or specify what the first colon is saying, the point being made is that the God being described is indeed the one whose power is irresistible.

But Job in particular suggests that the understanding of God cannot stop (or begin, for that matter) on that note. Regardless of the ancient Near Eastern wisdom traditions that probably provided the starting point for the Israelite reflections, God is not merely an invisible and irresistible force with which we must, willy-nilly, come to grips. The self-revelation that God had given to Israel precluded that. At the heart of the universe is a divine person, and the personal character that God was revealing in Israel's experience had to be factored into any consideration of issues of divine justice. Thus, it is significant that the use of the Tetragrammaton is not restricted in Job to the prologue and the epilogue; it occurs elsewhere, at Job 12:9; 38:1; 40:1, 3, 6; 42:1. The occurrences in Job 38; 40; 42 have to do with Yahweh's personal confrontation of Job. This is no longer an invisible, abstract force providing the hypothetical explanation of things; this is now the transcendent, personal Creator, who stands outside the circle of time and space, having brought it all into existence in his own divine wisdom and power. This is not just “God” or “the Almighty” somewhat abstractly conceived; it is “the Person,” and to call that person only “God” would be to do him a grave injustice. In that regard, the lone occurrence in Job 12:9 is interesting. “The LORD” is said by Job to be the sustainer of all life, something that the rest of creation understands very well. In fact, the rest of what is now Job 12, which contains no further titles, may well be understood as a hymn to Yahweh because it develops further the theme of Yahweh’s wise sustaining of the earth as an expression of his absolute sovereignty. It is a bit ironic that it was not until the personal revelations recorded in Job 38—42 that the full implications of what he had said in Job 12 became fully real to Job.

In Job 1—2 occurrences of “God” and “the LORD” are fairly evenly distributed. Usually, “the LORD” is used in the dialogue between him and “the Accuser” (haśśātān), and one evidence of the functional distinction mentioned above may be found in the statement that “the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD” (Job 1:6). “Sons of God” was a technical term identifying the angelic host. Another is the statement “Then Satan answered the LORD, ‘Does Job fear God for nothing?’” The “fear of God” is a figure of speech for “living in such a way as to recognize divine authority” (Job 1:1, 8, 9; 2:3; 4:6) (but note the very anomalous “fear of the LORD [ʾādōnāy]” in Job 28:28). But it is the personal Yahweh with whom Job and all persons have ultimately to deal. Job expresses this truth when he says, “The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away. Blessed be the name of the LORD” (Job 1:21). Interestingly, the narrator then goes on to say, “Job did not sin or blame God.” So although the line between God conceived of as deity and God conceived as personal creator and sustainer of the universe was discernible, it was still fluid.

The explanation for Job’s *suffering that is found in Job 1—2 is troublesome. Does God have a right to permit one of his minions to deprive us of the blessings of life and to plunge us into the depths of physical pain as some sort of cosmic test? And even if he does have that right as the Creator, does not the fact that he would do so call into question his fundamental goodness that the psalms so eloquently praise? How could the God of mīšpāt, that right order upon which the functioning of all things depends, willingly allow such disorder to come into existence? These are profound questions, and they receive very profound answers. However, the apparently casual nature of the dialogue in Job 1—2 might cause us to overlook them. That evil in the form of injustice and undeserved suffering is in the world is a given. But why is it in the world? Around the world, thinkers, from the most primitive to the most sophisticated, have been in general agreement. They have concluded that there are two principles inherent in the nature of things, one of order and the other of disorder. It is incorrect to call either one “good” or “evil.” That would be like calling the positive pole on a battery “good” and the negative pole “evil.” These principles simply are. We humans give them value qualities only because we find order more conducive to our pleasure, comfort and security, concerns to which we tend to give ultimate significance.

To this idea of two eternal coexistent principles, the Bible, and particularly Job, answers with a resounding no. First of all, God is not one of two eternal principles; God is a unique person, incomparable in every degree. “The Accuser” (from which the NT undoubtedly derived the proper noun *Satan) is no parallel to God. In fact, he has no capacity for independent action; he does nothing except in reaction to God. The LORD, the sole Creator, has invested his creation with certain unchanging behavioral standards against which his human creatures may be evaluated (“blameless and upright, a man who fears God and turns away from evil” [Job 1:8]). There is such a thing as evil, therefore, something that is positively contrary to the purposes of the Creator. And why does this exist? It exists not in defiance of the good Creator but rather solely by his permission. Job’s statement that both good and evil stem solely from God (Job 2:10) is a remarkable one in the ancient world. Yet, evil is not inherent in God, and as the epilogue makes clear, it does not in any sense qualify his goodness.

But if that is so, why would God permit such things that would contradict his ultimate intentions for the world? The answer is implicit in the prologue. The Accuser insists that Job has chosen to follow God’s intentions for humans solely because they have a short-term payoff for Job. He denies that Job has made this choice because these behaviors are intrinsically right, being rooted in the character of the Creator, or even more deeply, because of Job's fundamental commitment to the God who has decreed them. What is being said is that righteousness, as the Bible understands it, is only possible as a relational choice. Righteous behavior is not the thing itself; rather, it is a "symptom," a symptom of something else, that something else being a lifelong choice of God. The Accuser insists that Job has not chosen God but rather has chosen pleasure, comfort and security. If those were taken away, he maintains, that fact would become quite clear. What does become clear is the stunning fact that although Job rants at God and accuses him of cruelty, Job will not deny him. The Accuser's case is so thoroughly discredited that he does not even appear in the book again. As in Genesis 3, the ultimate issue is not between Satan (the Accuser) and God but rather between God and his creatures.

Thus, Job says what the Bible says elsewhere: evil exists in the world for one reason only: relational choice is possible only in the presence of an alternative. God has given his hesed (Job 10:12) to humans and wishes for a free return. Unless there is a real choice possible, unless humans can choose God in spite of everything, then righteousness, as Satan knows, is meaningless.

In Job 3 we move to the more abstract treatment of divine justice. From here on through the end of Job's speeches (Job 32), God is mentioned explicitly about three times per chapter. A few chapters have as many as seven references, whereas a few have none. But whether there are more references or fewer, God is never far from the center of the discussion, for the whole effort of the comforters is to say that God has done rightly to treat Job as he has, whereas Job is insisting just as vehemently that God has been wrong to do so. Interestingly, Job seems farther from God after the efforts of the comforters than he was before they began.

Interpreters have struggled over how much authority to accord to the assertions of the comforters (see Hartley, 129). Clearly, Job's interlocutors are wrong about him. Are they equally wrong in what they say about God? It seems as though the problem is not so much in the assertions themselves as in the absolutism with which they are asserted. Does God punish the wicked and reward the righteous? Certainly, there are many other places in Scripture that answer yes to that question and do so with vigor, not the least of which is the other major piece of Wisdom literature in the OT *canon, the book of Proverbs. So what is the problem? Perhaps it is in insisting that these maxims apply to all persons without fail. One of the characteristics of wisdom is that it is "context-specific." Thus, it is possible to find directly contradictory proverbs side by side (Prov 26:4-5). Each has validity in a given circumstance, but neither is absolutely so all the time. The world that Yahweh has created is more complicated and the impact of sin more convoluted than aphoristic wisdom can comprehend. So here, it is not that the comforters are absolutely wrong about God, but rather that they are more in love with the neatness of their own paradigms than they are with either God or his people. The result is that Job, who was willing to resign himself to God's ultimately good care (Job 2:10), though in anguish (Job 3:1-26), is driven by their logic to wonder about the very goodness of God (Job 10:13-22). If it is true, Job says, that the only people who are punished by God are the wicked, and if he, Job, is manifestly being punished even though he has done everything right, then evidently God has found some hidden wickedness that Job does not even know of. But if that is so, why did God even make us? No one can be right before God. Did he make us for destruction (Job 10:18)?

As the exchange goes on, it becomes more strident on both sides. Job is more convinced of his righteousness and the consequent injustice of God, while the comforters become more strident in their assertions that only a truly stupid person could say that God is not just (Job 8:2-3). These attacks move Job even farther: he asserts that God has viciously attacked him without warrant (Job 16:6-14), that God has "wronged" him (Job 19:6). To all of this the comforters can only say that such talk is the true proof that Job has been a wicked man all along (Job 15:5-6; 18:21; 20:29; 22:4-11). Ultimately, Bildad seems reduced to a vicious spluttering (Job 25:1-6), and Zophar is rendered speechless.

Job's final speech (Job 26-32) restates his convictions and his anguish. God is hidden and cannot be reached or understood (Job 26:5-14), but he does punish the wicked (Job 27:13-23). Thus, the whole sum of wisdom is to fear the sovereign ('ădōnāy) and to depart from evil (Job 28:28). Yet, that is what Job has done, and what has happened? Not only has God ranged himself against Job, but also he provides no comfort when Job is mocked by the worthless children of people whom he had once graciously helped (Job 29—30). But Job is righteous, and if God would just give him a chance, he would make God admit it (Job 31).

To this point in the book, the argument has basically gone nowhere. It has had two sides, with no meeting point in the middle. Each side is a model of syllogistic reasoning. On the one side, the major premise is that God punishes the wicked with suffering, and the minor premise is that Job is suffering; the conclusion must be that Job is wicked. On the other side, the major premise is that Job is righteous, and the minor premise is the same: Job is suffering; the conclusion is that God is unjust. Given that the conclusion of the one is a denial of the major premise of the other, there can be no resolution. Into all of this comes another voice attempting to break the stalemate. Though still upset at Job's gaucherie in charging God with wrong, Elihu offers some other explanations for suffering. Unfortunately, though all of them are true enough in other contexts, none of them applies to this context. It is true that God uses suffering to reveal himself to people (Job 32—33). It is also true that God uses suffering to discipline and correct people (Job 34). Likewise, God teaches us to hold him in awe through suffering (Job 35—37). But we the readers know that none of them is the correct explanation of Job's suffering.

The failure of Elihu and the other comforters is not much different from Job's. All of them are attempting to force God into the grid of their own rationality. All of them are attempting to explain God's actions on their own terms. The sin of Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar was to deny the truth about Job in their zeal to make God look good. Job's fault was to say that God had no right to do what he did to him. In the end (Job 38—41) God simply asks, in very graphic terms, who is the cause and who is the effect. Isaiah uses the language of the pottery, asking whether the pot can accuse the potter of going about his work in the wrong way (Is 29:16). The book of Job says that since we cannot even explain the creation, it is foolish for us to demand that the Creator explain himself to us.

3.3. Ecclesiastes. As mentioned above, the only title used for the Deity in Ecclesiastes is "God," even in Ecclesiastes 12, where there seems to be an attempt to put the teachings of *Qohelet into the wider context of Scripture.

This is perhaps as it should be in a book that generally speaks of God in abstract terms. Here the concerns of Job are put into an even wider perspective. "Under the sun," God's ways seem to have no consistency at all. Wise and foolish perish alike. Moreover, the wise often suffer and the foolish often prosper. It would be bad enough if it were that way all the time, but it is not. Sometimes the wise prosper and the foolish suffer. The problem is that one cannot predict when it will happen. Furthermore, it seems that whatever promises ultimate satisfaction in this life always falls short in the end. Nothing quite lives up to its "billing." Life, to Qohelet, seems full of disappointment; all that seems to promise significance ("glory") actually turns out to be empty and worthless ("vanity").

The writer seems to be saying that if we use human experience strictly as our guide, then those who say that life makes sense are talking nonsense. Why he does not allow special revelation (which comes from "beyond the sun") to be brought into the picture more fully is not made clear. It is as though he has set himself an exercise to discover what he can about reality while limiting himself to data from this world. Unlike Proverbs, which celebrates the overwhelming consistencies in God's world, Qohelet ruminates over the troublesome inconsistencies, of which it seems there should be none if there is a good and all-powerful God. One would think that, as in Job, Qohelet would desire to call God to account for this state of things. But that is not the case. The determination to limit the data to this world seems almost absolute. God is not seen as one whom it is possible to confront. He is an inescapable reality, and the world, with its odd set of givens, is unquestionably his work, but he is not presented as a person with whom one could enter into dialogue. In fact, he is all but completely hidden from us. We can discover neither him nor the meaning of what he has done (Eccles 3:11; 7:14; 8:17; 9:1; 11:5).

One might think that in such a case Qohelet would simply dispense with God altogether. If God is beyond our reach and his work is largely unintelligible, then he is of no consequence to us. But that is not the case. There is a God who has made all things (Eccles 11:5), and everything that is, is given from his hand (Eccles 1:13; 2:24; 3:10, 13; 5:19; 6:2; 8:15; 12:7). These are the facts, and there is no way a mere human can rectify them to his or her own liking (Eccles 3:14; 7:13). Still, the question is not merely how to make the best of a bad situation. Things are not as they are merely as a fiat from a hidden Creator. At this point we must observe that if the writer is indeed restricting himself to the data of experience, he is uniquely perceptive. In fact, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that in spite of his self-imposed restriction, data from special revelation has crept into his thinking. For instance, he declares that he knows that God originally made all men upright (Eccles 7:29), something that certainly does not emerge from human experience. Furthermore, he repeatedly states that God will bring all people into judgment (Eccles 3:17; 5:6; 8:12-13; 11:9; 12:14). Judgment according to what standard? The answer is supplied in Ecclesiastes 12:13: judgment will be according to the commands of God that have been revealed. Given that fact, we are not surprised at the repeated injunction to “fear God” (Eccles 3:14; 5:7; 8:12; 12:13).

It is significant that the observations about life found in Ecclesiastes are very much like those to be found in the so-called existentialist writers from the middle of the twentieth century (see Gordis 1968, 112-21). However, the conclusions of these modern thinkers about the course of action to be taken are dramatically different from those of Ecclesiastes. The existentialists concluded that all events were the result of random chance, with the result that nothing means anything. However, for some unknown reason, humans have to have meaning in order to survive. Thus, we must boldly choose to give ourselves meaning, all the time knowing that there is no such thing. A moment's reflection shows how far Qohelet is from that conclusion. One's situation in life is given by God, and thus there is a possibility of deriving joy from it (Eccles 2:24-25; 5:19-20; 9:7), however temporary and passing that may be. In fact, it is the attempt to invest life “under the sun” with some eternal quality that is doomed to failure, because God has planted eternity in our hearts (Eccles 3:11). Thus, the challenge is to allow each moment to have its own limited value and not to demand of it what could only be true in eternity. Furthermore, we are going to be held accountable for our choices, so we should make them wisely, not giving the temporal a value which the eternal God has withheld for himself (Eccles 8:12-13). The choices in life are not to be made with a kind of proud absolutism stemming from one's own sovereignty over a meaningless world (note the admonition against foolish vows in Eccles 5:1-7). Rather, they should be made with a quiet humility, recognizing that we have not determined either the parameters of our lives or the standards by which our lives will be judged. And if we cannot explain why everything is as it is, we know enough to make those humble daily choices.

4. Writings.

4.1. Esther. The absence of any explicit reference to God in this book is often attributed to its lateness (the events described would have taken place 483-471 BC) when it is said that the same reverence for God that eventually prevented the speaking of the divine name prevented any overt reference to God at all (see Moore, 636). Thus, it is suggested that the statement by *Mordcai that help will come to the Jews from “another place” (Esther 4:14) is in fact a veiled reference to God. If that is so, it would reflect the same kind of confidence in God that is found elsewhere in these writings. God might not care for his people at the time and in the way the speaker might choose, but there is no doubt that he would respond in his own way and fulfill his ancient promises to his people.

Another possible explanation for the absence of any explicit reference to God in Esther is that it is a deliberate strategy to emphasize the providence of God (Jobes, 43-44). Was God present with his people in exile if there was no explicit word from him about their situation? The answer clearly is yes. He was at work in the “coincidences” that made it possible for what the enemy intended for evil to actually turn out for good for his people (see Gen 50:20). When these coincidences are understood against the backdrop of the rest of the canon, it becomes apparent that even when God seems silent, he is at work on behalf of his people in precisely the same ways as when there was an explicit word.

4.2. Song of Songs. Although Song of Songs has one occurrence of “the LORD” (Song 8:6), the situation is not materially different from Esther, for the reference is of almost no theological significance. Most modern versions actually take it as an adjective of intensity. Thus, the literal “[jealousy is] like a flame of the LORD” is rendered with “like a mighty flame” or something similar. The absence of reference is the more striking because both Jews and Christians have taken this book to be an allegory of the love of God for Israel and/or the church. Persons such as Bernard of Clairveaux have written hundreds of pages about God's love as revealed in the book. It would seem that an appropriate approach to interpretation lies somewhere between a modern skepticism of any "spiritualizing" and the ancient enthusiasm for it. It is hard to believe that the book would have been accorded canonical status (or that the question of canonicity would have even arisen) unless the community had heard the book saying something to them about the God whom the whole Bible reveals (see Longman 2001, 56, 70).

That said, what does the book reveal about the love of God, or, to put it another way, about the nature of the love that God has put into his world? Unquestionably, it speaks of the passion of God's love. God is no "Unmoved Mover," unfeelingly putting processes into motion with calm unconcern for what their outcomes might be. Rather, God desires us with all the consuming desire of a young lover, and we have all the power to wound him that a lover alone has.

The book also tells us that God's love is personal. The love here is between two persons. God does not love us in the same way that he loves his creation. For his love to be known, it must be reciprocated, and reciprocated with the same kind of passion that he has. Being personal, God's love is complex. The relationships described in the book are not simple and straightforward. Reciprocal, personal, passionate relationships are involved. Faith is not merely an intellectual, contractual kind of arrangement. Instead, it involves the deeply affectionate surrender of the soul. It involves "knowing" the other with all the intimacy with which that word is invested in Hebrew (yāda^c).

Song of Songs also conveys to us God's delight in his creation. This is found not only in the way the book expresses the joy of sexuality but also in the references to the goodness of nature and its fecundity. Yet this is by no means a "baptized" fertility myth. No reader would take the book to be hymning the fertility of a divine cosmos, unless led to do so by someone with another agenda. Nature is clearly seen, especially in the light of the rest of the canon, as the product of a good and beneficent Creator. This is an important message for much of the Christian church, which has been infected by a dualism that holds suspect the material world and the desires rooted in it. Song of Songs tells us that in spite of the fall, which has corrupted the way we think we can use the world and its desires to serve our own selfish purposes, God does not see the world and its desires as having become evil (see Barth, 3.1:313-14).

4.3. Lamentations. When reading this book, one is most immediately struck by the pathos of the writer and his situation. However, a study of the references to God in the book reveals a depth of theology that we may overlook in the emotions of sympathy and compassion. Early in the book the references are all to the fact that God has done a terrible thing to his people (Lam 1:5, 12, 14, 15; 2:1, 2, 7, 8, 17). And although the writer freely admits that God was right to do what he did (Lam 1:18) in punishment of his people's rebellion, and that the people had been warned long in advance (Lam 2:17), there is still the sense that the punishment should not have been this severe (Lam 2:20). In this light, it does not seem accidental that the graphic description of God's implacable pursuit of the sufferer in Lamentations 3:1-18 only refers to God with the impersonal third-person pronoun until finally in Lamentations 3:18 the writer says that everything he had hoped for "from the LORD" has perished. God's manner of accomplishing his sovereign purposes (cf. Lam 4:11; 5:19) is beyond human understanding and explanation.

Yet, God is not seen to be implacable. He is always "biddable," to use an archaic but eminently serviceable word. The personified city continually cries out to the Lord to look on its grief in the evident confidence that he will do so and be moved by what he sees (Lam 1:9, 11, 20; 2:18, 20; 5:1, 21). And it is that confidence that perseveres in the darkest hour. After the heart-rending reminiscence of God's actions leading to the death of all hope in Lamentations 3:1-20, the sufferer remembers something else: the Lord's great love (hesed) and unfailing compassion. As a result, hope revives (Lam 3:24). This signals a certain change in emphasis in the book. Alongside the continuing lament there is a new emphasis on the positive characteristics of the Lord: his moral rectitude, which will mean that the enemies cannot continue in their ruthlessness indefinitely (Lam 3:36, 64), and his goodness and determination to save (Lam 3:25-26, 50, 58). This means that there is the real possibility of repentance and restoration (Lam 3:40-41). These, however, are not a foregone conclusion. In the end, Israel must face the terrible reality that unless God lovingly gives them this spirit of repentance, there is no hope whatsoever for them (Lam 5:19-22).

4.4. Ruth. The portrayal of God in the book of Ruth stands in dramatic contrast to that found in Lamentations. Here it is the covenant faithfulness of the Lord that holds center stage. From the report that he had visited his people to lift the famine (Ruth 1:16), until the women's celebration that he had given Naomi "a redeemer" (Ruth 4:14), it is the work of Yahweh on behalf of his people that receives true prominence. Ironically, the accomplishment of that work depends heavily on the faithfulness of the Moabite woman, Ruth, as she chooses to make the "the LORD, the God of Israel" (Ruth 2:12) her "God" (Ruth 1:16). What this says, of course, is that Yahweh is interested not so much in the creation of a people as in covenant faithfulness (cf. Is 56:1-8). That point is quite significant in the context of the genealogy of the Davidic dynasty. The establishment of that dynasty is indeed about the securing of a people's existence. But what is the defining characteristic of that people? Is it racial or behavioral? The apostle Paul insisted, on the basis of Genesis 15, that it was the latter (Rom 4:16-17; Gal 3:6-9), and the book of Ruth seems to bear him out.

The book begins with expressions of *Naomi's implicit faith in the midst of resignation. She invokes the blessings of the Lord on her daughters-in-law (Ruth 1:8-9) while saying that it is because of the Lord that she finds herself destitute (Ruth 1:13, 21). In Ruth 2 the Lord is considered to be the source of blessing and reward (Ruth 2:4, 12, 20; 3:10). He is the one who makes possible conception and birth (Ruth 4:12, 13). He is the one who does the unexpected, giving abundance to the destitute, and children to the widow (Ruth 2:20; 4:14). Underneath all of this is the understanding that was so prominent in Psalms: he is the God of hesed, the undeserved favor of a superior to an inferior. Naomi invokes it on her daughters-in-law (Ruth 1:8). Ruth demonstrates it to her mother-in-law (Ruth 2:11-12; cf. 3:10). Naomi recognizes it in the providential bringing together of Ruth and Boaz (Ruth 2:20). Boaz generously attributes it to Ruth on the threshing floor (Ruth 3:10). The God of the book of Ruth is at work in history to accomplish his good purposes of redemption from every wrong that troubles his human creatures, from death to destitution to the sins of greed and oppression.

See also CREATION THEOLOGY; DIVINE COUNCIL; DIVINE PRESENCE; FEAR OF THE LORD; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; LIFE; THEODICY; THEOPHANY; WISDOM THEOLOGY; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. Allen, Psalms (WBT; Waco, TX: Word, 1987); idem, Psalms 101-150 (WBC 21; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); K. Barth, Church Dogmatics, ed. G. Bromiley (4 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1956-1975); J. Blenkinsopp, Wisdom and Law in the Old Testament: The Ordering of Life in Israel and Early Judaism (rev. ed.; OBS; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995); L. Bosström, The God of the Sages: The Portrayal of God in the Book of Proverbs (ConBOT 29; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1990); W. Brueggemann, The Message of the Psalms (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984); R. E. Clements, "Wisdom and Old Testament Theology," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 269-86; P. Craigie, Psalms 1-50 (WBC 19; Waco TX: Word, 1983); J. Crenshaw, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); R. Gordis, The Book of God and Man: A Study of Job (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965); idem, Kohleth, the Man and His World: A Study of Ecclesiastes (New York: Schocken, 1968); J. Hartley, The Book of Job (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); J. G. Janzen, Job (IBC; Atlanta: John Knox, 1985); K. Jobes, Esther (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1999); W. Kaiser, "Integrating Wisdom Theology into Old Testament Theology," in A Tribute to Gleason Archer: Essays on the Old Testament, ed. W. Kaiser and R. Youngblood (Chicago: Moody, 1986) 197-209; D. Kidner, The Proverbs (TOTC; Chicago: InterVarsity Press, 1964); idem, Psalms 1-72 (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1973); idem, Psalms 73-150 (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1975); H.-J. Kraus, Theology of the Psalms (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); C. S. Lewis, Reflections on the Psalms (New York: Harcourt Brace, 1958); T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); J. C. McCann, A Theological Introduction to the Book of Psalms: The Psalms as Torah (Nashville: Abingdon, 1993); P. Miller, Interpreting the Psalms (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); idem, They Cried to the Lord: The Form and

Theology of Biblical Prayer (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); C. Moore, “Esther, Book of,” ABD 2.633-43; R. Murphy, The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); L. Perdue, Wisdom and Creation: The Theology of Wisdom Literature (Nashville: Abingdon, 1994); M. Pope, Job (AB 15; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965); M. Tate, Psalms 51-100 (WBC 20; Waco, TX: Word, 1990); B. Waltke, “The Fear of the Lord: The Foundation for a Relationship with God,” in Alive to God: Studies in Spirituality Presented to James Houston, ed. J. I. Packer and L. Wilkinson (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992) 17-33; idem,

The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); E. Zenger, A God of Vengeance? Understanding the Psalms of Divine Wrath (Louisville: Westminster, 1994).

J. N. Oswalt

GODS. See DIVINE COUNCIL.

GRAMMAR, HEBREW. See HEBREW LANGUAGE.

GREEK VERSIONS OF ESTHER. See ESTHER 5: GREEK VERSIONS.

GREEK WISDOM. See WISDOM, GREEK.

H

HEBREW LANGUAGE

The Hebrew language of the books of *Psalms, *Job, *Proverbs, *Song of Songs, *Ecclesiastes, *Lamentations, *Ruth and *Esther stands at the margins of Hebrew grammar description. Standard descriptions of biblical Hebrew, especially treatments of its syntax, are based primarily on the prose texts of Genesis through 2 Kings (excluding Ruth in the Hebrew canonical order) because of observed differences between the prose and poetic literature, on the one hand, and between early (preexilic) and late (postexilic) compositions, on the other. These two issues are sometimes interrelated, as observed in Gesenius's Hebrew grammar: "Many of these poetic peculiarities occur in the kindred languages, especially in Aramaic, as the ordinary modes of expression, and probably are to be regarded largely as archaisms which poetry retained" (Kautzsch, 13). The present article surveys, first, prominent characteristics of Hebrew language in the poetic books and, second, the types of language variation that appear in the books treated within this volume and some of the explanations that have been proposed for these variations.

1. Hebrew Poetry
2. Language Variation
3. Conclusion

1. Hebrew Poetry.

Most readers distinguish poetry from prose instinctively, especially when it is arranged in verse. Biblical scholars are likewise well assured that a distinction between poetry and prose can be made within the literature of the Hebrew Bible. The books of Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Lamentations and Song of Songs have long been recognized as poetry, in part in the case of Psalms because of its ubiquitous musical notations and directions (e.g., musical notations such as selâ [71x]; directions in the psalm titles such as the title to Ps 4: "To the [music] director on stringed instruments").

However, versification of poetry in the Masoretic Text tradition is extremely rare (e.g., Ex 15; Deut 32) apart from the notable exception of *acrostic poems, in which the lineation is marked by successive letters of the alphabet (e.g., Pss 37; 111; 119; Lam 3). Therefore scholars have had to find other bases for distinguishing poetry from prose. They have proposed various poetic devices that feature prominently in Hebrew poetry as constitutive of Hebrew verse, including *meter, *parallelism and *ellipsis (see Cloete, chaps. 2-3). However, several features of the language of Hebrew poetry may be identified as partially distinguishing it from prose. These include the relative scarcity of "prose particles" in Hebrew poetry, the prevalence of rare, archaic or archaizing vocabulary and morphology, more loose or free word order, and the meanings and patterns of the verbal forms.

1.1. Prose Particles and Hebrew Poetry. The term "prose particles" has been applied to several grammatical words that are, statistically speaking, characteristic of Hebrew prose versus Hebrew poetry. D. N. Freedman (6-8) observed that the definite article, relative conjunction and the (untranslatable) marker of definite direct objects are relatively less frequent in poetic texts in the Hebrew Bible than in prose texts. F. I. Andersen and A. D. Forbes (165-83) have substantiated this observation with their statistical analysis of how often each of these grammatical words occurs in each chapter of the Hebrew Bible: chapters with five percent or less frequency for these grammatical words are found in the books of wisdom (Proverbs and Job), lyrical poetry (Psalms and Lamentation) and oracular poetry (mainly Hosea and Isaiah); chapters with five to ten percent occurrence of these grammatical words, while still properly poetic, occur mainly within the prophetic books (Andersen and Forbes, 166); higher percentages of frequency for these prose particles appear in texts classified as prose.

Andersen and Forbes (167) conclude that “the particle frequency is a powerful discriminator between poetry and prose”; however, they decline to elaborate on why these prose particles pattern as they do. A probable explanation for the infrequency of these grammatical words in poetry is the quality of *terseness, characteristic of Hebrew poetry and of poetry generally. A. Berlin (7) identifies terseness with poetic lines “stripped of all but their essential components.” Terseness can be explained as the result of the balance between explicitness versus ellipsis and between redundancy versus ambiguity in Hebrew (and most) poetry. This balance entails restricting the use of explicit grammatical words such as the article (indefiniteness versus definiteness), relative conjunction (unmarked versus marked relative clauses) and direct object marker (unambiguous versus ambiguous argument structure) (see Berlin, 16).

This poetic characteristic of terseness is reflected in M. O'Connor's linguistic theory of Hebrew verse structure. O'Connor (138) defines Hebrew verse with a series of syntactic constrictors on poetic line length: poetic lines are limited to 0-3 clause predicators, 1-4 constituents and 2-5 units in length. These syntactic strictures on poetic line length further explain the relative paucity of prose particles in Hebrew verse: their use is partially constricted by the syntactic limitation on line length.

1.2. Vocabulary and Grammar of Hebrew Poetry. Hebrew poetry, especially archaic poetry, is characterized by the feature of rare or archaic vocabulary and word forms. Job and Song of Songs in particular have a high incidence of rare forms and hapax legomena (Greenspahn, 199-200). Statistically, rare vocabulary is found predominantly in the poetry rather than the prose portions of the Bible (Greenspahn, 38-39). In addition, words that occur commonly throughout prose and poetry often have more rare counterparts that are limited to poetry (see Sáenz-Badillos, 60). For example, šm^c (“hear”) occurs over one thousand times throughout the Hebrew Bible, whereas the denominative verb

ʔzn (“hear”) occurs just forty-two times, twenty-two times in the poetry of Psalms, Job, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, another nine times in the poetic prophetic literature of Isaiah and Hosea (see 1.1 above on “prose particle” frequency in these books), and once each in the archaic poems in Exodus 1; Deuteronomy 32; Judges 5. Similarly, of the fifty-six occurrences of p^l (“do”), the poetic counterpart of ʔh (“do”), forty-one are in Psalms, Job and Proverbs, with most of the remainder occurring in Isaiah, Hosea or the archaic poems of Exodus 15 and Numbers 23.

In addition to rare vocabulary, rare forms, or morphemes, are found in Hebrew poetry. For example, the third-person suffix -mw occurs nine and seven times, respectively, in the archaic poems of Exodus 15 and Deuteronomy 32, six times each in Psalm 59 and Psalm 73, five times in Psalm 2, and nineteen times in Job (Young 1993, 125-26). Similarly, the so-called hiriq compagnis—a suffixed long-i vowel, is mostly confined to poetry, both early and late (e.g., Deut 33:16; Ps 113:5, 6, 7, 9). The asseverative and vocative meanings for the lamed preposition, though paralleled in other Northwest Semitic languages, occurs in the Bible only in poetry—for example, ky lyhwh (“for truly Yahweh [is]”) in Psalm 89:18 (MT 89:19), and lrkb (“O rider”) in Psalm 68:34 (MT 68:35).

Although the syntax of biblical Hebrew word order is still not fully understood, it is widely recognized that Hebrew word order is less rigidly fixed in poetry than in prose, as is the case in many other languages (Watson, 49). Conventions of word order are often abandoned in poetry for the sake of verbal artistry, the most commonly noted perhaps being the inverted word order, or *chiasm. Chiastic word order in Hebrew poetry usually involves presenting the units of one line in inverse order from that of the preceding line. For example, compare the following two verses, where the first orders the elements the same way in the two lines (a-b-c / a'-b'-c'), while the second orders the constituents in chiasmic order (a-b-c / c'-b'-a').

mnšmt ʔlwh yʔbdw/ wmrwh ʔpw yklw

By-the-breath-of God they-perish / and-by-the-blast-of his-anger they-are-consumed (Job 4:9)

yšwb mlw brʔšw/ wʔl qdqdw ḥmsw yrd

Will-return his-own-mischief on-his-own-head

/and-upon his-head his-own-violence will-descend (Ps 7:16 [MT 7:17])

Peculiarities in the use of the verb forms in poetry is perhaps as much overstated as the looseness of word order. Influenced by the apparently radically different meanings for the verbal system in Ugaritic prose and epic poetry, scholars have been unduly swayed towards treating the verbal system of Hebrew poetry as completely distinct from that of prose (e.g., Niccacci, 194). However, one of the hallmarks of poetry is the flouting of language conventions that are well established in prose. Thus it would appear that the meanings/functions of the verb forms in prose are foundational for interpreting the forms in poetry.

Nevertheless, the vicissitudes of the history of the Hebrew language are such as to have created partial homonyms among several prefixed verb conjugations in biblical Hebrew. As a result, some verb forms are ambiguous among the imperfect, jussive and past conjugations. The past conjugation is of special interest because it is the most frequent verb form in prose, where it regularly occurs with a unique, distinguishing wa- prefixed conjunction. Not surprisingly, in poetry where particles such as the article and conjunction are often absent, this distinguishing wa- prefix is often missing from instances of the past conjugation in poetry—for example, ybqʿ (Ps 78:15); yšʾt (Ps 18:11 [MT 18:12]) (cf. wayyšʾt [2 Sam 22:12]).

Although none of the features of the Hebrew language enumerated here are alone determinative of poetry, together they illustrate general characteristics of Hebrew poetry. J. Kugel (302) observes, “‘Prose’ and ‘poetry’ are a matter of degree”; by contrast, it is the closely associated distinction between prose and verse that may be dichotomized (Cloete, 5).

2. Language Variation.

The language of the Hebrew Bible presents numerous grammatical and syntactic peculiarities. Various contributing factors to this state of affairs may be pointed out, including the approximate thousand-year time span in which the literature developed, differences in style among multiple authors and editors, and distinctive grammatical features peculiar to different genres.

Despite widespread regard for the “harmonizing activity of the Masoretes,” biblical scholars have long recognized variation in the language of the Hebrew Bible (Kautzsch, vii, 12). The traditional framework for treating these divergences recognizes two or three diachronic divisions and one primary synchronic division in the language of the Hebrew Bible. Diachronically, it is customary to distinguish between the language in those books dated to the postexilic period based on their content (e.g., Esther, Chronicles) and the language of books that have been traditionally seen as largely preexilic in origin (e.g., Ruth, Joshua—Kings). This bipartite division between Late (postexilic) Biblical Hebrew (LBH) and Standard (preexilic) Biblical Hebrew (SBH) is often made into a tripartite division by the additional distinction of Early Biblical Hebrew (EBH), thought to be attested in archaic poems dated to the early preexilic period based on grammar and motifs (e.g., Ex 15; Judg 5; Ps 29). Synchronically, scholars have posited dialectal differences in Hebrew between Northern (Israelite) Hebrew and Southern (Judahite) Hebrew (e.g., Rendsburg). Scholars have held that the majority of SBH compositions are written in the Southern Hebrew dialect and, concomitantly, reflect concerns surrounding the Davidic dynasty and the Jerusalem temple (e.g., the Deuteronomistic History).

The effect of these diachronic and synchronic divisions can be seen in the way biblical scholars have judged compositions that lack clear historical referents as to their provenance and date: those compositions whose language diverges significantly from the norm of SBH (attested in the prose of Genesis through Kings) are identified as either late compositions, thus belonging to the corpus of LBH, or early but northern in origin, having been written or influenced by a Northern Israelite Hebrew dialect. This is exemplified by the remark of S. R. Driver (449) that the linguistic peculiarities in Song of Songs “show either that it must be a late work (post-exilic), or, if early, that it belongs to North Israel.” A good deal of the material that is the focus of the present article falls within this category of compositions that lack clear historical referents, written in language that often diverges from the language of SBH; this characterization is particularly true of much of the book of Psalms, and the books of Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs. As a result, scholars and commentators have scrutinized the language in these books in attempts to establish their provenances and dates as well as to in turn use them to establish a coherent picture of the synchronic and diachronic variations in the Hebrew language discernable in the Bible.

However, some scholars have increasingly called into question this standard diachronic-synchronic framework as alternative explanations come to light for the language variation found in these books (e.g., the essays in Young 2003). For example, it has come to be widely held now that the Hebrew language of the post-biblical period developed from colloquial Hebrew of the biblical period, in contrast to the literary language in the Bible itself (Ullendorff, 11). Hence, it has been proposed that many of the linguistic peculiarities traditionally identified as Northern Israelite may simply be colloquialisms that have surfaced in the otherwise literary language of the Bible (Fredericks 1996). It has also been suggested that certain variations in language are intentional and rhetorical, such as dialectic features found in the speech of non-Israelite characters (Kaufman, 55). Finally, one scholar has explained certain language variation in the Bible in terms of an oral or a literary origin for the literature (Polak).

Given these multiple alternative explanations for language variation in the Hebrew Bible, the state of the question is more unsettled now than ever before. The situation is made especially difficult by the constant threat of falling into viciously circular arguments or special pleading with respect to the data. In the remainder of the present article some of the more notable peculiarities in these books are discussed with reference to these alternative explanations.

2.1. Psalms. On one level, *form criticism has isolated formulaic characteristics in the language in the book of Psalms, which has enabled the identification of various psalm types such as psalm of *lament, *hymn, and *thanksgiving psalm. On another level, the language of Psalms is largely resistant to other types of classification (see Driver, 383). Nevertheless, elements of the language (especially vocabulary) of certain psalms along with the much weightier evidence of motifs reminiscent of Canaanite culture (especially as exemplified in Ugaritic literature) have been used to date several psalms to the tenth century BC or earlier (e.g., Pss 18; 29; 68). For example, H. L. Ginsburg argued already in 1935 that Psalm 29 is based on a Phoenician original. Thirty years later M. Dahood (1975) noted that “virtually every word in the psalm can now be duplicated in older Canaanite texts.” In addition, Dahood observed similar parallelism structures in Psalm 29 as in Ugaritic poetry, as exemplified by the following two examples, which exhibit an a-b-c / a'-b'-d / a'-b'-e pattern.

hbw lyhwh bny 'lm / hbw lyhwh kbwd w'z / hbw lyhwh kbwd šmw

Give to-the-LORD, sons-of-God / give to-the-LORD honor-and-strength / give to-the-LORD the-honor-of-his-name (Ps 29:1-2)

klb arḥ l'glh / klb tat limrh / km lb 'nt atr b'l

Like-the-heart-of a-heifer for-her-calf / like-the-heart-of a-ewe for-her-lamb / so-(is) the-heart-of-Anat toward-Baal (CAT 1.6 II.28-30; Gibson, 77)

G. A. Rendsburg has sought to show that the language of certain psalms is evidence of dialectic differences between Northern Hebrew and Southern Hebrew. He identified Psalms 9—10; 16; 29; 36; 45; 53; 58; 74; 116; 132—133; 140—141, the Korah collection (Pss 42—49; 84—85; 87—88) and the Asaph collection (Pss 50; 73—83) as having Northern Hebrew features in their language (see Asaph and Sons of Korah). Rendsburg identifies rare linguistic characteristics that are cognate with other Northwest Semitic languages as evidence of Northern Hebrew dialectic influence—for example, the second-person feminine -kî (versus -k) and the third-person masculine -ôhî (versus -âyw) in Psalm 116: 7, 12, 19, both of which are identical to the Aramaic forms of the suffixes; the use of the relative words zê/zu and še in Psalms 9:15 (MT 9:16); 10:2; 133:2-3 (versus the prose particle relative 'ăšer), which have cognates in Ugaritic, Phoenician and Aramaic; and the Phoenician plural form 'išim (“men”) in Psalm 141:4 (versus the usual ānāšim).

In addition, Rendsburg identifies linguistically conservative features as evidence of Northern Hebrew dialectic influence, including the feminine noun termination -at (versus the usual -â) in Psalms 16:5-6; 53:1; 74:19; 88:1; 132:4, which is also cognate with the other Northwest Semitic languages, and the retainment of the third yôd root letter in verb forms where it generally elides in the biblical Hebrew forms—for example, yehšēyūn versus yehšū in Psalm 36:7 (MT 36:8) (see also Ps 36:9; 73:2; 77:4; 78:44; 83:3; 140:3).

2.2. Proverbs. The international connections of biblical Wisdom literature are well known. They are most clear in the parallel between Proverbs 22:17—24:22 and the Egyptian Words of Amenemope. However, Proverbs 30—31 also attests to the international character of wisdom literature. Many commentators translate Proverbs 30:1 as, “The words of Agur, son of Yaqeh, the Massaite,” a reading confirmed by “The words of Lemuel, king of Massa” (Prov 31:1) (e.g., Murphy 1998, 225). Elsewhere in the Bible “Massa” refers to a people or tribe from northern Arabia, related to Ishmael (see Gen 25:14; 1 Chron 1:30).

The language in these chapters underscores their international flavor. The Aramaic word for “son,” bar (versus Heb bēn), appears in Proverbs 31:2, and Proverbs 31:3 contains a masculine plural noun ending in the letter nūn, as in Aramaic and Moabite, in contrast to Hebrew, in which masculine plural nouns end with the letter mēm. The enigmatic phrase lēʾinʾēl in Proverbs 30:1 makes sense as an Aramaic palindrome: “I am not God” (see Murphy 1998, 226). The odd use of mah (“what”) in Proverbs 31:2, it has been suggested, should be understood as cognate to Arabic mah (imperative “hear”) (see Murphy 1998, 239).

2.3. Job. The book of Job shares the international flavor of wisdom literature found also in Proverbs. A veneer of internationalism is created by the names and locations of the principal characters (Job 1:1; 2:11). However, nowhere is the international character of the book more apparent than in its language, which has been described as a Northern Hebrew dialect, an admixture of Hebrew, and a translation of an Aramaic or Arabic original (see Andersen, 55-61; Gordis, 161, 343 n. 16; Young 1993, 132). In all cases, the book of Job is renowned for the difficulties posed by its rich (e.g., four names for “lion,” six words for “trap,” four synonyms for “darkness” [Gordis, 160]) and often abstruse vocabulary (over one hundred hapax legomena [see Greenspahn, 199]).

Particularly noteworthy are the “Aramaisms” and “Arabisms” in Job—that is, features of grammar and vocabulary that are shared with or explained only by recourse to one or the other of these languages. Job shares grammatical features (e.g., masculine plural noun ending -in instead of the customary -im) as well as vocabulary (e.g., maʿābād [“work”] in Job 34:25, versus Heb maʿāsē) with Aramaic, and Arabic has been the source of understanding for many of Job’s obscure words.

In addition, the book of Job exhibits features characteristic of early (archaic) poetry (e.g., third person suffix -mō, preservation of the third root letter w or y, enclitic mēm, relative zē [see Saénz-Badillos, 60]) and of late biblical Hebrew compositions (e.g., the verb qbl [“receive”]). However, many of these same features can be explained from language contact or as features of a Northern Hebrew dialect, in which case they have no bearing on the dating of the composition (see 2.1 above).

In all, the features of Job have resisted a consensus explanation. Neither the content nor the language of the book points to a definite time or place of composition. Although the theory that the book is a translation of an Aramaic or Arabic original is not seriously entertained anymore, if the international character of wisdom literature is taken seriously, an alternative explanation emerges that the book of Job is a non-Israelite composition, written in a closely related Canaanite dialect, such as Edomite (see Young 1993, 136).

2.4. Ruth. The book of Ruth presents an intriguing mixture of language elements that are associated with SBH and with LBH. This mixture admits of different explanations: some features may be truly archaic, others represent the intentional use of archaic language (i.e., archaizing), and others may be characteristic of a particular Hebrew dialect (Campbell, 25). F. Bush, in his commentary, presents an extensive list of those features that the language of Ruth shares with SBH and those that it shares with LBH, and he concludes that the split in the book should be explained by dating the composition to the exilic period, during the transition from SBH to LBH.

Bush (21), adopting Hurvitz’s approach to determining features of LBH, notes that the criteria for identifying a feature as LBH include (1) that it be widely distributed throughout the known postexilic books (e.g., Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah, Daniel, Zech 9—14), and (2) that it contrast with an alternative form of expression in SBH. Some of the SBH features that Bush (23-24) isolates in Ruth include the preference for the longer first-person pronoun ʾānōkī versus ʾānī, the productive use of the past narrative verb form, the defective spelling of “David” (dwd versus dwyd), and the use of the dual pronominal suffix, which, while rare in SBH, is wholly absent in LBH. Some of the LBH features of Ruth include the greater frequency (versus SBH texts) of objects suffixed directly to verbs, the greater frequency (versus SBH texts) of the preposition l rather than ʾl following the verb “say,” the occurrence of qwm in the Piel stem with the meaning “confirm, establish, effect” (Ruth 4:7), and the use of perfect with the waw conjunction in a successive chain of events (Ruth 4:7) (Bush, 26-27).

Bush assumes that each datum is characteristic of either SBH or LBH, and that therefore the mixture of features found in Ruth is determinative of a date of composition that lies between these two stages of language. The simplicity of Bush’s paradigm is evident when one considers the possibility of alternative explanations for mixtures of features. For example, Bush claims that wēnātan (perfect with waw conjunction) in Ruth 4:7 functions like the past narrative verb, which is the expected form here (i.e., wayyittēn). However, the verse may not be presenting a past narrative, as Bush assumes, but rather a past hypothetical or habitual situation: “a man would remove his sandal and would give it to the other party.” The use of the past narrative verb is unexpected here; rather, the perfect forms found here express unreal mood, indicated by the verb-subject word order (see Cook, 134-35).

2.5. Esther. Unlike the other books examined here, the setting of the story of Esther provides a decisive terminus a quo for the book, in the Persian period. This means that the language of Esther must belong to the later stage of biblical Hebrew. Nevertheless, several different judgments have been rendered on the language in Esther. C. A. Moore (lvii) characterized the language of Esther as being most similar to the LBH of Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah. By contrast, R. Polzin (74-75) has argued that Esther is imitative of SBH, in contrast to the LBH of Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, and R. Bergy (followed by Bush, 296-97) has more recently placed the language of Esther between LBH and Mishnaic Hebrew (MH).

Some of the features that Esther shares with MH against LBH compositions include the following: the gerund noun construction (hštyh) in Esther 1:8, which uses a noun pattern typical of MH and would be expressed with an infinitive in SBH and LBH compositions; vocabulary such as keter (“crown” [Esther 1:11]), maʾamar (“command” [Esther 1:15]), yšʾ (“reach out” [Esther 4:11]), šarbiʾ (“scepter” [Esther 4:11]) and illū (“if” [Esther 7:4a]); idioms such as gʾzr ʾl (“decree” [Esther 2:1], versus SBH šwh ʾl), šnh mn (“be different from” [Esther 3:8], versus SBH ʾhr) and kāšēr lipnē (“be acceptable before” [Esther 8:5]).

2.6. Song of Songs. The language of Song of Songs is striking in several ways. Most notable is its use of the relative conjugation še to the almost complete exclusion of ʾāšer (which occurs only in Song 1:1). Only the book of Ecclesiastes has more occurrences of še; however, it employs ʾāšer with almost equal frequency. This feature has been taken to be indicative of Aramaic influence or late date, especially in light of the similar, almost exclusive use of še in Mishnaic Hebrew. However, such conclusions are problematic in light of the appearance of še in archaic Hebrew poetry (Judg 5:7), and the judgment that še alternatively may be indicative of a Northern Hebrew dialect (see 2.1 above).

Evidence of foreign influence in Song of Songs is found in its occasional Aramaic spellings and foreign loanwords. The Aramaic spelling of nṭr (“keep, guard”), versus Hebrew nšr, is found in several places in the book (Song 1:6; 8:11, 12), and in one passage the Aramaic spelling bērôt (“juniper), versus Hebrew bērôs (Song 1:17), is used. The word pardēs (Song 4:13), often translated “park” or “enclosures,” is a Persian loanword; appiryôn (Song 3:9), variously translated “palanquin” (NRSV) or “chariot” (NIV), is possibly a Greek loanword.

The other striking linguistic feature is the number of hapax legomena, thirty-seven in all. Given the size of the book, it contains the highest proportion of such terms of any book in the OT. In addition, F. E. Greenspahn (199) classifies fourteen of these thirty-seven as “absolute hapax legomena”—that is, forms built on roots that are not used anywhere else in the Bible (see also Murphy 1990, 75).

2.7. Ecclesiastes. More than any of the other books under discussion here, Ecclesiastes has been at the center of discussions regarding the development of the Hebrew language (note particularly the several monographs from the late 1980s and early 1990s: Isaksson; Fredericks 1988; Schoors). The judgment by F. Delitzsch (190), made in the nineteenth century, on the language of Ecclesiastes is well known: "If the book of Koheleth were of old Solomonic origin, then there is no history of the Hebrew language." Despite the confidence expressed by this assessment of the chronological place of the language of Ecclesiastes, various explanations have been offered regarding the unique features of the book's language. These include that the book was originally composed in Aramaic and translated (poorly) into Hebrew; that it was written by an Israelite living in Phoenicia, and therefore is heavily influenced by Phoenician; that it is written in Northern Israelite Hebrew; and that it is reflective of spoken or colloquial (versus literary) Hebrew (see Seow, 20).

Perhaps a certain degree of truth about the matter may be found in each of these explanations. That it is post-Solomonic seems assured from its use of Persian loanwords—notably pitgām ("decision, announcement" [Eccles 8:11]) and pardēs ("park" [Eccles 2:5]). Features that have been identified as Phoenician and therefore "early," such as the feminine -at ending (versus Hebrew -ā), are also found in LBH (see Seow, 15). D. M. Gropp (34) has argued that the Aramaic šlyt ("ruler") is current only during the Persian period, after which raššay replaces it, seemingly placing Ecclesiastes firmly in the Persian period. Ecclesiastes shares features such as the frequent use of še (136x in the Bible, 68x Ecclesiastes) with other books identified as dialectically Northern, as Song of Songs (Seow, 17).

Several other features of the language of Ecclesiastes are outstanding. First and foremost is the high number of hapax legomena and unique expressions in the book. Some of the more notable ones from Delitzsch's long list include the use of the ʾnī form of the first-person pronoun exclusive of the ʾnōkī form, the use of the direct-object marker ʾet with indefinite objects, the zō form of the feminine demonstrative pronoun, and the negation of the infinitive by ʾen (Delitzsch, 190-98; see also Seow, 17-19).

3. Conclusion.

The peculiarities in the language of the books surveyed here have attracted the greatest attention among the books in the Hebrew Bible from those attempting to untangle the history and varieties of Hebrew in antiquity. The traditional approach ultimately presents itself as a dichot-mous model in which SBH is set up as the "norm" with which other varieties of Hebrew language are compared. This is evident from the large group of shared features in EBH, LBH and Northern Israelite Hebrew. This pattern of shared features calls these traditional divisions into question and raises the possibility of alternative explanations for the varieties of Hebrew found in the Bible.

Alternative explanations must take into account variation arising from possible diglossia (i.e., the coexistence of a literary language and a colloquial language) and other differences in registry, the affect of genre and subject matter on language, and the difficulty of distinguishing between archaic language (i.e., the use of older forms of language, often indicative of early compositions) and archaisms (i.e., the intentional use of older forms of language in mimicry of earlier compositions). Similarly, judgments on "loanwords" are notoriously difficult to make, in terms of what sort of influence one language might have had on another and in terms of dating.

These questions are often driven by ideological concerns, such as what are acceptable and unacceptable dates for biblical compositions, an undue pessimism about finding answers to these questions, or an a priori commitment to the lateness of all of biblical culture and writings. Positively, the current debate opens up possibilities of new approaches and answers to these questions.

See also ELLIPSIS; PARALLELISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. I. Andersen, Job: An Introduction and Commentary (TOTC; Leicester: InterVarsity Press, 1976); F. I. Andersen and A. D. Forbes, "'Prose Particle' Counts in the Hebrew Bible," in The Word of the Lord Shall Go Forth: Essays in Honor of David Noel Freedman in Celebration of His Sixtieth Birthday, ed. Carol L. Meyers and M. O'Connor (ASORSVS 1; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1983) 165-83; R. Bergy, "Late Linguistic Features in Esther," JQR 75 (1984) 66-78; A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1985); F. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Dallas: Word, 1996); H. F. Campbell Jr., Ruth (AB 7; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1975); W. T. W. Cloete, Ver-sification and Syntax in Jeremiah 2-25: Syntactic Constraints in Hebrew Colometry (SBLDS 117; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989); J. A. Cook, "The Hebrew Verb: A Grammaticalization Approach,"

ZAH 14 (2001) 117-43; M. Dahood, Psalms 1-50 (AB 16; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965); F. Delitzsch, Commentary on the Old Testament: Ecclesiastes and Song of Solomon, trans. M. G. Easton (repr.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1989); S. R. Driver, An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (New York: Scribner, 1908); D. C. Fredericks, Qoheleth's Language: Re-evaluating Its Nature and Date (ANETS 3; Lewiston, NY: Mellen, 1988); idem, "A North Israelite Dialect of the Hebrew Bible," HS 37 (1996) 7-20; D. N. Freedman, "Pottery, Poetry, and Prophecy: An Essay on Biblical Poetry," JBL 96 (1977) 5-26; J. C. L. Gibson, Canaanite Myths and Legends (2nd ed.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1977); H. L. Ginsburg, "A Phoenician Hymn in the Psalter," in Atti del XIX Congresso Internazionale degli Orientalisti: Roma, 23-29 settembre 1935 (Rome: Tipografia del Senato, 1938) 472-76; R. Gordis, The Book of God and Man: A Study of Job (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965); F. E. Greenspahn, Hapax Legomena in Biblical Hebrew (SBLDS 74; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1984); D. M. Gropp, "The Origin and Development of the Aramaic šallūt Clause," JNES 52 (1993) 31-36; B. Isaksson, Studies in the Language of Qoheleth, with Special Emphasis on the Verbal System (SSU 10; Uppsala: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1987); S. A. Kaufman, "The Classification of the North West Semitic Dialects of the Biblical Period and Some Implications Thereof," in Proceedings of the Ninth World Congress of Jewish Studies: Panel Sessions, Hebrew and Aramaic, ed. M. Bar-Asher (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1988) 41-57; E. Kautzsch, ed., Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar (2nd ed.; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1910); J. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); C. A. Moore, Esther (AB 7B; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1971); R. E. Murphy, Proverbs (WBC 22; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998); idem, The Song of Songs (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); A. Niccacci, The Syntax of the Verb in Classical Hebrew Prose, trans. W. G. E. Watson (JSOTSup 86; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990); M. O'Connor, Hebrew Verse Structure (repr.; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997); F. H. Polak, "Style Is More Than the Person: Sociolinguistics, Literary Culture and the Distinction between Written and Oral Narrative," in Biblical Hebrew: Studies in Chronology and Typology, ed. I. Young (JSOTS 369; London: T & T Clark International, 2003) 38-103; R. Polzin, Late Biblical Hebrew: Toward an Historical Typology of Biblical Hebrew Prose (HSM 12; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1976); G. A. Rendsburg, Linguistic Evidence for the Northern Origin of Selected Psalms (SBLMS 43; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990); A. Sáenz-Badillos, A History of the Hebrew Language, trans. J. Elwolde (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); A. Schoors, The Preacher Sought to Find Pleasing Words: A Study of the Language of Qoheleth (OLA 41; Leuven: Peeters, 1992); C. L. Seow, Ecclesiastes (AB 18C; New York: Doubleday, 1997); E. Ullendorff, "Is Biblical Hebrew a Language?" in Is Biblical Hebrew a Language? Studies in Semitic Languages and Civilizations, ed. E. Ullendorff (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1977) 3-17; W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (JSOTSup 26; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1986); I. Young, Diversity in Pre-Exilic Hebrew (EAT 5; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1993); idem, ed., Biblical Hebrew: Studies in Chronology and Typology (JSOTSup 369; London: T & T Clark International, 2003).

J. A. Cook

HEMISTICH. See POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF.

HERMENEUTICS

The word hermeneutics is used with varying meanings. This article treats it as a way of looking at the process involved in interpreting texts, the methods that we use, and the approaches that can open up their understanding. In doing exegesis, we seek to understand a text in its original context, in accordance with its own agenda and priorities; we may then move from exegesis to application. When we talk in terms of hermeneutics, we imply a recognition that even our exegetical study is affected by who we are—the questions that occupy us, the culture that we belong to, the way our church has taught us, our personal experience, whether we are wealthy or poor, whether we are male or female, and so on. Further, the process of understanding Scripture is not linear (as the exegesis-application model implies). There is an ongoing both-ways relationship between focusing on a passage's meaning in its own right and focusing on its significance for us in light of questions that concern us. This is as true of historical and critical study as it is of other approaches because the concerns, aims and methods of historical and critical study come from a particular culture, and historical-critical study discovers from the text what its methods allow. All this does not mean

(or need not mean) that we find in texts only what we know already. Our perspective and experience do make it possible for us actually to discover aspects of the texts' intrinsic meaning. The trick is to see how we can utilize the positive aspects of the way subjective factors enable us to see objective things in Scripture, and to safeguard against its negative aspects, the way it limits and narrows our perspective or makes us misperceive things. A significant means of making progress in that is looking at Scripture through other people's eyes, so as to perceive and then broaden the narrowness of our own vision.

The printed Hebrew-Aramaic Bible of Jews—the Scriptures that Christians call the Old Testament—comprises the Torah, the Prophets and the Writings. The books covered by this dictionary are the first two-thirds of the Writings; they are followed in the Hebrew-Aramaic order by Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah and Chronicles. The Torah, the Former Prophets and the Latter Prophets are all broadly coherent collections of books, and one can identify hermeneutical issues that apply to each of them as collections. The Writings do not have a congruity of that kind, and little can be said about interpretation that applies to all of them. But various approaches to interpretation may illumine different subgroups within the Writings.

1. Historical Interpretation
2. Sociological Interpretation
3. Liturgical Interpretation
4. Devotional Interpretation
5. Canonical Interpretation
6. Experiential Interpretation
7. Narrative Interpretation
8. Postmodern Interpretation
9. Feminist Interpretation
10. Typological, Allegorical and Christological Interpretation
11. Post-Holocaust Interpretation
12. Postcolonial Interpretation

1. Historical Interpretation.

1.1. The Writings as a Whole. Scriptural interpretation in the context of modernity emphasized understanding Scripture in light of its historical origin. This illustrates the culture-relative nature of approaches to interpretation, since many scriptural writings give little indication of their specific historical origin; indeed, they can sometimes seem deliberately to conceal it. Thus the dating of most of the individual books will always be a matter of debate. But compared with the Torah and the Prophets, in the Writings there are more specific references to the Second Temple period. This links with their location at the end of the Hebrew-Aramaic Scriptures; they likely reached their final form as a collection later than the Torah and the Prophets, and therefore they belong distinctively to postexilic times.

We may therefore ask how an understanding of the Second Temple period helps us understand their significance. This involves a circular argument, as the books themselves are our major source for knowledge of the period, though the argument's circularity does not make it wrong.

Ezra and Nehemiah indicate that life was hard for the Judean community in the Persian period, while *Esther and Daniel suggest that the position of Judeans in Persia, too, could be tough. Although Persian control gave Judah more internal freedom than obtained under the Babylonians, it was a province of the Persian Empire, a small community experiencing economic difficulties, partly through the burden of imperial taxation. It existed in uneasy relations or actual conflict with surrounding Persian provinces. And it knew internal tensions related to its economic difficulties and to attitudes to those surrounding peoples. Its experience thus fell far short of the glorious restoration of Israel that prophets had promised, and far short of the glorious events of centuries past related in Exodus, Joshua and 2 Samuel.

The Writings thus function as resources for a community living through tough times. How is it to survive? Continue to *worship Yahweh, cast itself on Yahweh, own its sinfulness, and trust Yahweh (*Psalms, *Lamentations). Reflect on its human experience of life, independently of the agenda or framework set by Yahweh's activity in relation to Israel in events such as the exodus and the making of the covenant (*Proverbs, *Song of Songs). Face the tricky theological questions raised by its experience and think boldly about them (*Job, *Ecclesiastes). See Yahweh's activity behind the scenes of its experience, protecting and using it, and be neither overwhelmed by the power of foreign peoples nor dismissive of them (Esther, *Ruth). Maintain confidence in Yahweh's sovereignty in the political affairs of the empire and over the broad sweep of history (Daniel). Keep telling its story with a recognition of what does get achieved (Ezra, Nehemiah). Do not undervalue the privilege of being able to worship Yahweh in the temple built by *David (Chronicles).

The circumstances of the church in post-Christian parts of the world parallel those of the Second Temple Judean community and thus give it a way in to understanding the Writings, and their varying invitations speak to its situation. If the church in the United States continues to decline, it will share with them in the potential of this parallel.

1.2. Individual Books. Most of the Latter Prophets begin with an introduction offering hermeneutical clues about how to read them. One clue is their reference to a particular human author and a particular historical context, the reign of certain kings. Interpreting them against their specific historical context is then both possible and necessary. Isaiah, Ezekiel and Zechariah, for instance, would not have delivered the same message had they lived in a different century. But in the case of most of the Writings, we do not know their author or what century they belong to. Interpreting them against their specific historical context is impossible and is therefore presumably (if one factors in God's providence) unnecessary.

English translations can give readers the impression that the Psalms begin in a way similar to the Latter Prophets, with the same pointer to understanding them against the background of their author and their author's day, since the expression "psalm of David" looks analogous to the expression "vision of Isaiah." Actually it is not. While "vision of Isaiah" is a construct phrase (the Hebrew equivalent of a genitive), the expression "of David" involves a preposition, le, and although it could mean "by David," it could just as easily mean "for David" or "belonging to David." Further, many psalm headings that include the phrase "psalm of David" also describe their psalm as "psalm of the choirmaster" or by means of another such term using the same prepositional construction. This is obscured by English translations, which have phrases such as "for the choirmaster," perhaps to avoid the problem caused by implying that the psalm had two or three authors. Yet further, although "David" can denote David the son of Jesse, the OT can also use the name "David" to refer to a subsequent Davidic king or a Davidic king to come in the future. So one way or another, there is no strong reason to take the "David" heading as an indication of a psalm's authorship and thus as an invitation to understand a psalm historically. And this fits with the fact that many "David" psalms look later than the time of King David (e.g., speaking as if the temple already exists). For Chronicles, the great significance of David is as the person who under Yahweh set up the arrangements for the temple's building and worship. The heading "of/for/to/belonging to David," alongside headings such as "of/for/to/belonging to the choirmaster," might have similar significance. It affirms that these prayers and praises belong to Israel's proper, David-authorized, divinely authorized worship. The hermeneutical clue that the heading offers is that readers can and should take these psalms as a guide to proper praise and prayer. (We will return to the headings that refer to specific incidents in David's life.)

The actual contents of the psalms also suggest that their date and origin is without hermeneutical significance. Although some psalms refer to circumstances that suggest particular events in someone's life, such as a defeat, an invasion, a wedding or an exile from Jerusalem (see, e.g., Pss 42—46), they never contain concrete information to enable readers to identify which defeat, invasion, wedding or exile. Actually, omitting such information makes it easier to use them; they do not give the impression of being limited in significance to one particular occasion.

Something similar is true about the Wisdom literature. Job is simply anonymous, like narrative works such as Ruth and Esther. As with Psalms, the perennial nature of its subject makes its date and authorship of little significance for its interpretation. It has been seen by some as the oldest book in the OT and by others as one of the most recent. This question affects understanding of the history of Israelite theology and religion; it makes no difference to the book's own meaning.

In some contrast, Proverbs is described as "the proverbs of Solomon," using the genitive, though subsequently, Proverbs 30 begins "the words of Agur," and Proverbs 31 "the words of Lemuel." Ecclesiastes is "the words of Qohelet, the son of David, king in Jerusalem," which suggests an association of its content with *Solomon but also points away from this association by not using the actual name (qōhelet might be a pseudonym or a description of a role [see Qohelet]). Song of Songs uses the same preposition as Psalms in describing itself as “of/for/by/to Solomon.”

Sayings of the kind that dominate Proverbs are usually compositions passed down in tradition; they do not exactly have “authors.” But in Middle Eastern nations such as Egypt, the king is responsible for encouraging and propagating learning and education and stands as an embodiment of wisdom. In Israel, Solomon occupies that position, and his relationship with these three books is analogous to David’s relationship with the “Davidic” psalms. They are Solomonic in the sense that they count as true wisdom. Like the psalms, they have canonical authority.

In the context of modernity, interpreters emphasized a historical approach to understanding Ruth. Its story is set in the period of the judges, but its last paragraph makes clear that it was written at least as late as David’s day, and its location in the Writings suggests that it comes from the postexilic period. That context highlights its emphasis on Ruth’s Moabite identity and on its relating how a Moabite comes to be part of David’s ancestry; it suggests a different attitude toward marriage with people such as Moabites from the one implied by Ezra 9 (see 5 below). But although a historical approach thus illumines one aspect of Ruth, it takes attention away from many aspects. The story of *Naomi and of Ruth and Naomi’s relationship, for instance, becomes insignificant. Historical interpretation both enlightens and obscures.

Among the books in focus in the present volume, Lamentations is the most amenable to historical interpretation, though even here the appropriateness of that approach has been questioned. The LXX provides Lamentations with a preface attributing it to Jeremiah in the aftermath of Jerusalem’s fall in 587 BC, and its consequent location after Jeremiah in the Christian Bible encourages the assumption that this is the context for understanding it. With hindsight, one should not be surprised that this consensus assumption has been questioned in our current period, in which every assumption is open to question, though there was a long time lag between scholarly abandonment of the idea of Jeremican authorship and scholarly questioning of the dating. But Lamentations parallels Psalms in containing no concrete indications of date and authorship. Historical criticism has stuck with the tradition of a date soon after 587 BC because that is the last fall of Jerusalem we know of in OT times. This at least gives us a context against which to imagine the book, and a historical approach thus contributes to its interpretation. But the book’s lack of concrete historical reference makes it likely that this is not the only key to it.

2. Sociological Interpretation.

Sociological interpretation of Scripture takes various forms, some closely related to historical interpretation. It may ask about the social location of the authors and readers of the books, even if we cannot identify their identity or historical setting, and of the way the books’ content reflects the position of authors and readers in the society and their interests. The material within Proverbs, for instance, may reflect the social contexts of the family (in many of the sayings), of the *royal court (in other sayings) and of the theological school (in the expositions of the significance of wisdom). But no doubt the social background of the actual book of Proverbs (like that of any biblical book and of most books in most contexts) will be that of educated, literary, urban, professional, well-to-do people. This may illumine aspects of its content, such as its attacks on laziness. Ecclesiastes is usually reckoned to have the same background, though its author then expresses disillusion with everything that educated, literary, urban, professional, powerful, well-to-do people have or value. Sociological approaches such as these suffer from the same difficulty as historical approaches: they have to connect a small number of dots on the basis of theories that come from outside the text, and thus they produce conflicting results (on sociological approaches to Proverbs, see Houston; on sociological approaches to Ecclesiastes, see Sneed).

This difficulty becomes clearer when we reconsider the process whereby H. Gunkel introduced sociological interpretation into the study of wisdom, poetry and writings. He sought to redirect study of the psalms from questions about their individual nature and their individual historical background to questions about their recurrent forms of speech and about the social context (Sitz im Leben) in which these belonged. This was a potentially fruitful approach, but Gunkel was prevented from realizing more of the potential of a sociological approach by assumptions about the nature of temple worship and about spirituality that he brought to his sociological study. Even the strong internal evidence within the psalms of their intrinsic link with corporate worship did not deflect him from denying that this was their true social context. Sociological approaches to the books have a hard time attending to the content of the books themselves rather than simply reading sociological theories into them. In theory, sociological interpretation should illumine the text; in practice, we would be unwise to rely too much on its alleged results. It may illumine the interpreters more than it does the texts that they interpret.

Asking about the social function of psalms of praise is more illuminating. In Christian worship, declaring that Jesus is Lord creates a world before us. The world and the church do not make it look as if Jesus is Lord; world and church do not live in light of this fact. Yet we know that Jesus is Lord, and proclaiming this reality builds up our capacity to continue believing it, even though empirical evidence imperils this conviction, and also builds up our capacity to live on the basis of the statement's truth. Analogously, psalms of praise function to create a world (Brueggemann). Israel knows that Yahweh is the great God and the great King, but the facts of life in Israel often make it look as if Marduk is the great god and Nebuchadnezzar is the great king. In singing the psalms, then, Israel both affirms that the real world is the one in which Yahweh reigns and builds up its capacity to live in light of that fact. Sociological interpretation thus links with liturgical interpretation.

3. Liturgical Interpretation.

Why do the Writings, this miscellaneous collection of books, come together at the end of the Hebrew-Aramaic Bible? There may be a connection with their relationship to worship, which may even explain the puzzling title "the Writings" (this expression, hakkētûbim, could just as easily be translated "the Scriptures," but the Torah and the Prophets are also part of "the Writings/Scriptures" in this sense). In synagogue worship the weekly Scripture readings come from the Torah and the Prophets. Some of the Writings are used in other ways in worship, but not to provide the regular weekly readings. The Torah and the Prophets are read; the Writings are Scriptures that are written but not read, in this sense (Barton).

The five scrolls of the *Megillot belong together in connection with worship because they came to be used (at least in Ashkenazi communities) at five annual occasions, Passover (Song of Songs), Pentecost (Ruth), the Ninth of Av, in July/August (Lamentations), Sukkot (Ecclesiastes) and *Purim (Esther). The nature of the link with these occasions varies. Song of Songs' association with Passover presupposes the book's interpretation as an allegory of the story of Yahweh's dealings with Israel over the centuries, beginning at the exodus. Ruth's association with Pentecost corresponds to the barley harvest setting of key scenes in the story. Lamentations' association with the Ninth of Av is more intrinsic to the book's nature, as this fast day commemorates the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple in 587 BC and in AD 70. The link between Ecclesiastes and Sukkot is perhaps that Sukkot is traditionally "the season of our joy," and Ecclesiastes points to false and true places to locate joy. Purim's association with Esther is also intrinsic to the book, which almost ends with Esther establishing this festival to celebrate the deliverance the story tells. A liturgical approach to the Megillot thus illumines aspects of some of them.

The psalm headings also reflect liturgical realities and point to a liturgical interpretation of the Psalter. Paradoxically, the very fact that many of these headings are now unintelligible reflects their liturgical significance; they are the ancient Israelite equivalents to "common meter" or "capo on second fret." For a half-century following on the work of S. Mowinckel, who himself took forward Gunkel's work, much scholarship assumed that the psalms' use in worship was the key to interpreting them, but in the late twentieth century this assumption lost traction. E. S. Gerstenberger attempted to move the focus of interest from the worship of the temple to that of local communities in Judah or in the Diaspora, but this also involves much reading into the texts. The general notion that the psalms were used in Israelite worship is secure enough and significant for their interpretation, but attempts to give more precision to the way they were used founder on the fact that neither their content nor their headings are specific enough in indicating the way they were used, and this focus has drawn attention away from the psalms themselves.

4. Devotional Interpretation.

There is an exception to the rule that the headings of the psalms do not have specific hermeneutical significance. A number of these headings link psalms with specific incidents in David's life. Psalm 51, as well as being "of/for/to the choirmaster," is "of/to/for David"; this heading then adds "when Nathan the prophet came to him after he [David] had gone to Bathsheba." Comparing these long headings with the content of their psalms reveals two features. There is a general fit between heading and psalm, and often there are concrete points of connection with the story that the heading refers to; it would be appropriate for David to cast himself on Yahweh's mercy in the way the psalm expresses it, and appropriate for him to plead that Yahweh's holy spirit not be taken away from him. Yet other specific features stand in tension with its use by David at this point. David could hardly say that he had sinned "only" against Yahweh, and it is odd for him to look for the building up of Jerusalem's walls, with the implication that they have been knocked down.

B. S. Childs (1971) has suggested a plausible understanding of the combination of correspondence and contrast between these long headings and their psalms. In effect, he suggests, they resemble the collocation of passages in a lectionary, which invites congregations to read several passages in relation to one another. The implication is not that these passages were written together or that they exactly correspond but rather that there is sufficient overlap between them to make it fruitful to bring them into mutual association. The analogy suggests that people who use the psalm or who read the relevant David story bring psalm and story together so as to find some indication of the way a person in David's position might pray or some indication of the circumstances in which one might pray this psalm.

The presupposition of these headings may be, then, that David has now become not only the patron of temple worship but also a model for spirituality, as Christians have in fact regularly taken him to be. People read David's story to gain enlightenment on their personal walk with God. The psalms then help them relate David's story to themselves.

Something similar is true about the role of the unnamed king in Ecclesiastes. The book emphasizes the way the things human beings use to bring them fulfillment and happiness cannot actually deliver. This Solomon-like king offers a model test case for this thesis because he was in a position to realize the goals that many people set for themselves. As king, he was able to study all the learning that was available, to indulge himself in pleasure to excess, to bring to completion great achievements in building and creativity, to accumulate great wealth, and to build up a harem. But none of it led anywhere; all of it seemed empty. He could thus testify to that fact for ordinary people who think that these things would give meaning to their lives. So the king becomes instructive for ordinary people's spirituality.

The implication of the way that Psalms and the wisdom books work is that people who bring to the books their own questions about their lives and their relationship with God will discover aspects of the texts' own meaning. On the other hand, like other approaches to interpretation, this has limitations, and it is particularly inclined to narrow down what readers see in stories such as Ruth and Esther, which are about much more than individuals and their lives.

5. Canonical Interpretation.

5.1. Individual Books. As well as drawing attention to their human authorship and their historical origin, the prophetic books describe themselves by means of expressions such as "the word of Yahweh." As well as being of human and historical origin, they are of divine origin.

The Writings do not take this form but rather present themselves as human words. The Christian description of the entire Scriptures as "the Word of God" implies that actually they are divine words just as really as the prophetic books; the difference lies in how God was involved in bringing them into being rather than in whether God was involved. The way the Writings present themselves suggests that these are works that God came to accept and authenticate rather than works that God initiated. (Theologically, we might still say that God's initiative was prior in bringing them into being; I speak here of the process as the scriptural writings themselves see it.)

When prophets describe something as "the word of Yahweh," they imply the conviction that for better or worse, this prophetic declaration will indeed come about. As Yahweh's word, it demands attention if hearers want to profit from its good news or evade its bad news. Recognizing books such as Psalms or Proverbs or Ruth as “the word of God” will have similar implications. It implies paying attention to them. It implies that churches should read them, whereas in practice churches rather neglect them. Where they do not simply ignore them, Christians may be inclined actively to discount them, implying that they cannot really be divine words. For instance, the psalms say things to God that Christians reckon no one ought to think or feel or say. Ecclesiastes says things to other people that Christians reckon no one ought to think or feel or say. Proverbs makes promises that Christians think cannot be relied on or are otherwise likely to be misleading (e.g., encouraging people to believe in a “prosperity gospel”). It is then Christian practice to ignore these words or reinterpret them so that they fit with what Christians find acceptable.

Although they do not describe themselves as the word of Yahweh, the books implicitly anticipate and counter this attitude by suggesting a claim to something like canonical authority. These are human words that offer authoritative teaching; they are designed to function as canon. The Psalter, for instance, divides into five books, marked by doxologies after Psalms 41; 72; 89; 106. It thus mirrors the Torah, which divides into five books (it is a Pentateuch). The Psalter is a book of teaching about praise and prayer that demands to be heeded in an analogous way to the way the Torah demands to be heeded. It decides what is proper praise and prayer.

The reference to Solomon in the introduction to Proverbs and Song of Songs implicitly ascribes quasi-canonical authority to these books. We have noted that describing them as Solomonic claims for them the kind of authority that attaches to the teaching of someone who is the embodiment of God-given wisdom in the OT story.

Ecclesiastes makes the same point in a slightly different way. It begins by describing its author as qōhelet, from the word for the Israelite worshiping congregation, the qāhāl. This teacher is thus someone who represents the congregation, not some heretic. The book’s closing paragraph nuances the point. It makes specific that Qohelet was indeed a wise man who taught insight to the people, one who taught truth. The description piles up words to underline the book’s nature and status in these general terms.

It then comes to comment on its particular nature, observing that in this case the sayings of the wise are like goads or spurs and like nails; it is extremely uncomfortable to have them driven home, but they achieve things as this happens. On the other hand, the conclusion goes on, the reader needs to be wary of them, and it adds the seminarian’s favorite verse, stating that of the making of many books there is no end and that much study is wearisome to the flesh. In its context, the point is that one Ecclesiastes is a good idea, but a Bible full of books like it would not be. Ecclesiastes then closes with a safe summary of the orthodox convictions whose difficulties much of the book is concerned to face.

5.2. The Collection as a Whole. The location of the books in the Hebrew-Aramaic canon and in the Greek and English canon also carries implications for their interpretation. In both orders Genesis through Deuteronomy comes first. Then things diverge. The Hebrew-Aramaic division of the canon demarcates the first five books from what follows as “the Torah” over against “the Former Prophets.” The Greek canon does not do so and thereby encourages readers to follow the narrative as it continues into Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings, with Ruth being inserted into this macronarrative at an appropriate point where it provides a foil to Judges and points forward to the story of David (Jobling). As is the case with a historical interpretation of Ruth, the effect is to highlight certain aspects of the story and to underplay others.

The Hebrew-Aramaic canon follows “the Former Prophets” with “the Latter Prophets”: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Hosea through Malachi. In the Greek canon these come at the end, with Lamentations and Daniel inserted at chronologically appropriate points. We have seen that the effect is to emphasize a historical approach to Lamentations by setting it in the context of Jeremiah’s ministry and lifetime. In the Greek canon, further, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah and Esther follow Joshua through Kings, in that chronological order. This again emphasizes a linear, narrative reading of the books, which fits Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah (not least given the overlap between the end of Chronicles and the beginning of Ezra). In Esther’s case, it has a parallel effect to the one it has on Ruth, making readers see it as part of a larger whole and not simply as a work in its own right, and underplaying other aspects of the story.

The placing of the Writings as a whole at the end of the Hebrew-Aramaic canon is usually reckoned to imply that they have less authority than do the Torah and the Prophets; their absence from the weekly synagogue lectionary fits with that (for other interpretations of the arrangement, see Miles; Dempster). In contrast, the Greek canon's locating of Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs in the middle of the collection gives these books more coherence than they have in the Hebrew-Aramaic canon. In the Greek canon they again appear in a quasi-chronological order. Job is traditionally assumed to be a figure from the time of Israel's ancestors, Psalms is associated with David, the last three books with Solomon. At the same time, all five books discuss perennial human issues concerning the nature and basis of human life and of a relationship with God, and they do so with little reference to God's acts in Israel's story, which elsewhere define the meaning of God and the way one would understand those issues. That perhaps reflects the books' historical background in the postexilic period, when the great acts of God belong in the distant past and are hard to relate to.

The Greek canon can be seen as arranged in such a way as to relate to the past (Genesis through Esther), the present (Job through Song of Songs) and the future (Isaiah through Malachi) (Wolff). This understanding parallels the dynamic and suggestive tensions and complementarities within the Writings and between the Writings and the other books. "Proverbs says, 'These are the rules for life; try them and you will find that they work.' Job and Ecclesiastes say, 'We did, and they don't'" (Hubbard, 6). In Psalms, *suffering usually comes despite people's faithfulness; in Lamentations, it comes because of people's waywardness. Ruth suggests an open stance toward foreign women who identify with Israel; Ezra urges a rigorous stance toward foreign women who do not. In Exodus, God acts in interventionist fashion to bring about Israel's deliverance, and a woman or two make it possible for a man to take the human lead in this process, while in Esther, Israel's deliverance comes about without divine intervention, and a man encourages a woman to take the lead. In Proverbs, right behavior is an expression of insight; in Deuteronomy, it is an expression of obedience to Yahweh. In Genesis 1–2, the relationship between a man and a woman is a practical one; in Song of Songs, it is a romantic one. We learn from the conversation within the Writings and between the Writings and other Scriptures about these questions.

6. Experiential Interpretation.

Although some of the Writings do present themselves as texts designed to function canonically, we have noted that more prominently than the prophetic books they present themselves as human words, and this provides a significant clue for their interpretation. The human experience of readers is a key factor in thinking about hermeneutics, and more systematically than any other parts of Scripture these books appeal to and speak in terms of human experience. Whereas Ruth and Esther relate the experiences of certain ordinary individuals, Psalms, Lamentations, Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs give prominence to first-person expressions of praise, prayer, insight, pain, questioning and enthusiasm. Of course, all human writing reflects human experience, and in the scriptural writings as a whole God speaks through that experience. But these books reflect human experience in a particularly explicit and systematic way.

The experiential aspect to hermeneutics is the focus of a significant nineteenth-century tradition of hermeneutics that saw interpretation as aiming to share or repeat the experience of the writers of a work, our own analogous experience being our way in to being able to do that (Schleiermacher; Dilthey 1976; 1985). Thus we come to these books as people who ourselves praise God, pray, reflect, doubt, suffer and love. If we do not do those things, it is unlikely that we would have a starting point for understanding these books; we would have to put ourselves empathetically into the position of people who indeed do those things. In principle, that is possible because we are human beings like them and have the potential for those experiences if not the experiences themselves. It means that we can understand something of what the books mean when they express their enthusiasm in praise, their pain in prayer, their agonizing about injustice in the world, and the thrill of their love.

At the same time, we then recognize that much of their praise, prayer, agonizing and thrill is quite different from anything that we experience. So our own experience both opens up the possibility of understanding and draws attention to our need to go beyond our own experience if we are to understand the texts. We are thus introduced to the “hermeneutic circle” or, better, “hermeneutic spiral,” and the notion of the merging of horizons (Gadamer; Goldingay; Thiselton). It is possible to settle for affirming the features that gel with our own experience and ignoring the rest; the hermeneutic process then becomes a vicious circle. Even the recent renewed appreciation of *lament psalms reflects something about us as readers, in a way analogous to the more traditional Christian emphasis on penitential psalms (Nasuti). Growing in our understanding involves starting from the overlap between our experience and the experience reflected in the text and letting that be a way into appreciating the aspects of the text that we have not experienced.

7. Narrative Interpretation.

Ruth and Esther are short stories. This description does not beg the question of whether they are more factual or more imaginative stories. (My view is that both historical facts and divinely inspired imagination have contributed to them.) But even if they are purely factual stories, they use the techniques of creative writing. Approaches to interpretation that are honed to the nature of creative writing thus contribute to their understanding.

First, character plays a key role in both stories, in the persons of Naomi, Ruth, *Boaz, *Ahasuerus, *Vashti, *Mordecai, Haman and others. Some of these are well-rounded characters with the complexity of human personality—Naomi, for example. Others are simpler characters presented in plain black-and-white fashion—Ahasuerus, for example. This is not to say that the real Ahasuerus was any less complex than Naomi but rather to comment on the role of the character within the story and the questions that are appropriate to understanding their role. Some characters (such as Boaz) are portrayed with sympathy, some (such as Haman) without. Interpreters vary in the way they understand the portrayal of Vashti. People who favor women’s subordination are negative about Vashti; people who oppose it are positive about the stance that she takes. The presuppositions that people bring to characters thus influence their interpretation.

Second, there is plot. The framework of Ruth involves the way a family from Bethlehem becomes the ancestors of Israel’s greatest king. But events at the beginning of the story threaten to derail this possibility, as the family has to leave Bethlehem for Moab, where all the men in the family die. The plot then has to get the family’s mother back to Bethlehem and make it possible for her to have a child who can turn out to be David’s grandfather. Like many plots, it involves a series of points where everything could go wrong (e.g., what if Naomi succeeds in persuading Ruth to stay in Moab?) and coincidences (Boaz is a member of Naomi’s extended family!). The framework of Esther involves the way the Jewish people in Persia escape a pogrom. In the background is some indulgent and then angry action on the part of the Persian king, interwoven with some assertiveness on the queen’s part, which leads to a Jewish girl becoming queen. The more direct background is a Jewish man’s resistance to bowing down to one of the king’s officials, which provokes the official to manipulate the king into authorizing the pogrom. Again coincidence plays a role (a Jewish girl becoming queen, Mordecai discovering a plot against the king, the king being unable to sleep one night), and again everything could go wrong (what if Esther had not bravely urged the king to reverse his action?). Like Ruth, Esther follows the standard linear plot form: the exposition of a problem, the complexities of events and actions that it leads to, and its eventual resolution.

Third, there is the viewpoint from which the story is told. In Ruth and Esther the story is told in the third person (contrast, in part, Nehemiah). Thus we do not discover as much about the thinking of these lead characters as we might if Ruth or Esther told the story in the first person. But the narrator can tell us things that no individual character in the story can know; the narrator knows things that members of the Persian court say to one another as well as things that ordinary members of the Jewish community say to one another. Indeed, the narrator sometimes knows what people are thinking, though this is only occasionally the case; the narrator does not know everything. It is more characteristic of OT narrative to allow the reader to infer from people’s words and actions what was going on inside them. Nor does the narrator know what God is thinking; at least, the story does not tell us. Nor does the narrator offer evaluative comments on people's actions (hence that fact that readers may understand Vashti's actions affirmatively or critically). This makes Ruth and Esther contrast with some other OT narratives. The effect is to tell a story that resonates with regular human experience, in which we regularly do not know what other people are thinking or what God is thinking. We have to work out whether and where and how God is involved in the story. On the other hand, even though told in the third person, the story sometimes adopts the perspective of one of the characters, as if we are looking over their shoulder even though not looking into their mind. Much of Ruth is actually told from Naomi's angle. (The book might more accurately have been called "Naomi and Ruth".) Much of Esther is told from Mordecai's angle, or Haman's.

There are broader aspects to the notion of viewpoint. Together the books imply that any activity of God that people in their context can look for takes place behind the scenes of history and human experience, not in the interventionist fashion of the stories in Exodus and Judges with which in other ways Esther and Ruth have points of contact. Associated with that is their shared conviction that Israelites, and specifically Israelite women, must take responsibility for their destiny and take bold action in relation to the men who hold power in their contexts, using their femininity as they do so.

Fourth, *ambiguity and irony play a part in the stories, related to questions about character, plot and viewpoint. In Genesis, Judges or 2 Samuel we may reckon that narrator and/or author and/or God disapproves of many of the actions that people undertake, though the narrative does not make this explicit. On the basis of information that the story as a whole conveys regarding the narrative's viewpoint, it assumes that readers can make the right inferences, and it leaves them to do so. On the other hand, in some stories there is room for debate about whether the narrator approves of what happens, or whether the author does, or whether God does. Both kinds of ambiguity (resolvable and irresolvable) appear in Ruth and Esther.

Ruth makes no comment on the death of the three men in the story. Is this Yahweh's judgment for the sons' marrying of Moabites? Does Ruth's audacious courting of Boaz relate to Israelite perceptions (or fantasies) of Moabite women? By the end of the story, it is at least clear that the narrator affirms Ruth precisely as a Moabite and believes that Israel should be open to members of other races who come to believe in Yahweh. The story's overall stance in relation to Ruth as a Moabite rules out that pejorative interpretation of the opening events. It is nevertheless an irony that it is a Moabite who provides David with his grandfather. Further, the story leaves ambiguous precisely what happened on the threshing floor, rather in the style of an old-school Hollywood movie; and the question "Was Naomi a scold?" (someone who is always complaining) could become the subject of a scholarly debate (Fewell and Gunn 1988; 1989, Coxon).

In Esther, in light of other parts of the OT, one might wonder whether Jews had any business staying in places such as *Susa and not returning to Jerusalem; the narrator presupposes that it is acceptable for Jews to let exile become dispersion, and that they can expect to find themselves preserved and even successful there. We have noted that the narrator makes no evaluative comment on the Persian men's concern that Vashti's action will encourage other Persian women's insubordination, but its portrayal of the king's general capacity for stupidity and manipulation points to sympathy for Vashti rather than for the king and his fellow husbands. With irony, it is the king's next wife who is the means of reversing his edict. Then with irony, the Jews finally indulge in the pogrom that they had themselves escaped; the narrative at least leaves open the question of whether the Jews had any business killing more than seventy-five thousand people. Indeed, disapproval of the book for this action misses the book's own implicit critique (Goldman): ironically, the Jews end up behaving like Persians at the moment when many Persians have become Jews.

An analogous set of literary approaches studies the nature of Hebrew poetry, with its use of genre, *parallelism and *imagery.

8. Postmodern Interpretation.

Beneath the surface of Ruth and Esther are some more elemental relationships or motifs that also underlie the other books, such as can be examined by structuralism. Further, stories also presuppose antinomies and take sides with regard to them; deconstruction brings these to the surface and questions their easy resolution (for Ruth, see Greenstein; for Esther and Job, see Clines; for both books, see Ruth and Esther, Bush).

Ruth and Esther also have in common that they manifest illuminating links with other OT material. Esther makes for comparison with the Joseph story as well as the exodus story, while Ruth makes for instructive comparison with the story of Tamar as well as other characters in the OT story and other parts of the OT, such as Isaiah 40–55 (Nielsen). The psalms have multiple such intertextual relationships with other parts of the OT (Tanner), such as the retelling of Israel's story in different psalms (see Intertextuality). Within the Psalter itself one can often trace the way similar phrases or lines or sequences of lines recur, in varying forms and combinations. Often it may be difficult to know whether such links or similarities are deliberate or coincidental, and if they are deliberate, to know which text came first, but the framework of intertextuality makes it possible to consider their significance without knowing the answer to those questions. Juxtaposing the texts still illumines each of them.

Such awarenesses are an aspect of postmodernity, one of whose features is the recognition that truth is more complicated than it used to be. Christians did once recognize that we actually understand only the hem of God's garments, and some Christian theologians have wondered whether theology best focuses on saying what God is not (e.g., God is not a created being, God is not located in space, God is not within time, God is not human). Postmodernism reminds us about mystery and complexity. Some of the Writings recognize the complexity of who God is and how we relate to God or recognize the limitations in what we can say about these matters.

Job begins from the question why bad things happen to good people, but this question raises more radical ones about God and humanity and their relationship. Using the form of a dramatic dialogue allows the book to look at the problem from a series of different angles and to propound a series of answers to these questions. It does not survey a number of answers and finally declare that one of them is right. All its answers have some truth in them, though they vary in their relevance to Job. Even Yahweh's response does not have the final word, as the end of the story implies a different perspective.

Job may have undergone a process of redaction (e.g., the prose framework of the story may be older than the poetic speeches, and the Elihu speeches may be a later addition). It may also have been subject to some accidental disorder-

ing, particularly in the third set of speeches between Job and his friends. But one implication of approaching the book in light of postmodern insights is that we are unwise to try to simplify or tidy the book. Its complexity and untidiness are one way its message is conveyed.

Ecclesiastes' postmodernity is expressed in its reaction to the difficulty of handling those big questions, not by sharing as many partial insights as possible but rather by emphasizing how few things we can say.

9. Feminist Interpretation.

Song of Songs and Ruth were among the first books of the Bible to attract feminist approaches to interpretation (Trible; Brenner 1993a; 1993b; 1995a; 1995b; Bach). *Feminist interpretation asks what happens when *women (or men) attempt to read Scripture in conscious awareness of distinctive features of women's lives (or of men's), such as their bodily experiences and their experience of subordination to men (or subordination of women). Contemporary Western women's insistence on seeing themselves as fully human and standing alongside men rather than as inferior to them opened up the possibility of recognizing the egalitarian aspect to the relationship portrayed in Song of Songs, where the woman speaks first and longest, and the man is not portrayed as the active "lover" and the woman as the acted-upon "beloved." It thus lets Song of Songs speak to subordinationist attitudes in the church. It opened up avenues of analyzing the relationship of Ruth and Naomi and the way they discover how to live as women in a men's world. Similar dynamics were perceived in Esther, the story of the radical feminist Vashti and the liberal feminist Esther (Clines), although they are still, like Ruth and Naomi, finally subordinated to men. In reverse fashion, feminist interpretation raises questions about the aphorisms in Proverbs and their understanding of women and men, and about the figure of the "strange woman," though noting how the aphorisms are set in the context of the different way womanhood features in the book's opening and closing chapters, which form a frame for understanding it (Camp). Feminist interpretation inquires further after the significance of the apparent absence or near absence of women from works such as Psalms and Job (Clines), though also of the potential of reading psalms as women's texts (Rienstra).

10. Typological, Allegorical and Christological Interpretation.

It became customary in Judaism to interpret Song of Songs as a figurative account of Yahweh's relationship with Israel. Successive chapters describe the love relationship between Yahweh and Israel, with its ups and downs, in the exodus period, at Sinai, in the wilderness, in the Promised Land, and so on. Christian interpretation from Origen onward similarly interpreted Song of Songs as a figurative account of Christ's love for the church or of God's love for the Virgin Mary or of Christ's love for the individual believer. Such understandings illustrate the process of interpreting a text in light of convictions that come from outside it.

Premodern reading of the passages in Job about a mediator, an advocate on high and a redeemer (Job 9:33-34; 16:18-20; 19:25-27) referred these passages to Christ. This came decisively to determine popular Christian understanding through the use of the last passage in Handel's Messiah. Like much NT reading of the OT, this made use of verbal points of connection that enabled the OT text to help people understand the significance of Christ, but it did not significantly open up the meaning of the OT itself. Indeed, there is a substantial gap between the inherent meaning of the passages and the significance of Christ (e.g., Job wants a mediator who will establish his innocence, not deal with his sin). The intuitive or occasional nature of such interpretation is reflected in the fact that Christian interpretation can also see Job himself as a type of Christ. He is supremely committed to God, profoundly tested by the will of both the Adversary and God, loudly crying out to God in his affliction, let down by his friends, required to sustain devastating suffering because of God's purpose, but finally restored.

Traditional Christian interpretation read the psalms as Christ's praise and prayers. This could take as its starting point the NT's use of some passages from the psalms to interpret the significance of Christ. This was facilitated by a process of reinterpretation of the psalms that had already taken place within Judaism. Some psalms refer explicitly to the king or the anointed one, and when Israel had no anointed king, these could be understood to refer to the king that Israel would surely again have one day, to a coming *Messiah. Given that the psalms in origin are not prophecies but rather declarations relating to Israel's actual kings, we might call the NT's adoption of this approach a typological understanding (Bateman).

We might also think in typological terms about the way Lamentations has been related to Christ's suffering. Lamentations is used in Holy Week in the service of Tenebrae ("Darkness"); Jerusalem's suffering, particularly as expressed in the protest of a male individual in Lamentations 3, can thus illumine Christ's suffering: "Is it nothing to you, all you who pass by?" (Lam 1:12).

The picture of God's wisdom in Proverbs embodied as a person standing alongside God (Prov 8:30) is not explicitly quoted in the NT, but its language and conceptuality underlie the way the NT speaks of Christ as God's Word and God's Wisdom, and it thus facilitates the NT's articulation of the idea that Christ could be divine and preexistent and yet also distinguishable from the Father. The relationship between the OT passage and the significance of Christ again involves overlap rather than identity, and when Christian interpretation sought to read Proverbs 8:22-31 as if it is actually about Christ, it found itself in trouble: reading the OT in Greek, the Arians could make better sense than could the Nicene fathers of the fact that the passage speaks of God's wisdom as being created by God.

11. Post-Holocaust Interpretation.

Christian and Jewish readings of Esther were decisively changed by the Holocaust. For Christians, the key interpretation is that of W. Vischer, who in the 1930s saw the need to read Esther in light of the Nazi persecution of the Jewish people. He attempted but failed to get the church to take seriously Esther's implications for the church's understanding of the Jewish people (and of itself), not least in light of Romans 9—11, and thus to commit itself to the Jewish people's defense. R. Bauckham revisited this reading of Esther when, decades later, Jews and Christians began to face the questions raised by the Holocaust. Among Jewish scholars, S. B. Berg (183-84) comments, "The rampant destruction of European Jewish communities in the recent past is similar to a threat described, but not fulfilled, in Esther. Haman's spiritual descendants proved more successful in attaining their goal of genocide. . . . One message of the Book of Esther, with its emphasis upon Jewish solidarity and human responsibility and action, remained unheard by Mordecai's and Esther's descendants." M. Fox similarly prefaces a study of Esther with an account of how the pogroms of a century ago as well as the Holocaust influence his reading of the book.

In related fashion, M. Kiszner comments that Lamentations comes "hauntingly alive" in light of the Holocaust. T. Linafelt suggests that one reason why Lamentations continues to haunt readers is that the book itself reaches no closure; it is full of protests to God that receive no response. Reading Lamentations in light of the Holocaust illustrates a difficulty that appears in connection with other approaches to interpretation. Either one assimilates Lamentations to the reading context and underplays the emphasis on the way it was Jerusalem's rebellions that led to its fall, or one assimilates Jewish suffering in the Holocaust and elsewhere and implies that it happened through the Jewish people's sins.

12. Postcolonial Interpretation.

The "wind of change" that a British prime minister recognized blowing through Africa in 1960 eventually issued not only in the political independence of former European colonies but also, in the 1990s, in the Two-Thirds World's quest for hermeneutical independence. As happened with feminist interpretation, this involved looking at the Scriptures with different eyes and seeing things that Eurocentric interpretation had not perceived, or seeing how Eurocentric interpretation had skewed things. Eurocentric interpretation thus has the man in Song of Songs addressing the woman as "fair," which rather presupposes that being "lovely" (yapeh) involves being white rather than black, while also (paradoxically) it has the woman declaring, "I am dark but beautiful." Is she suntanned or is she an African, and is it "but" or "and"? The psalms are illumined by awareness of African culture and traditions rather than simply the assumptions of Western scholarship and by awareness of the experience of exile (see Adamo; Isasi-Díaz [on Ps 137]; more generally, Patte). The traditional negative Christian interpretation of Esther might be seen in colonizing terms (Beal).

The period during which much of the material in these books grew or reached its final form was the time when Judah lived in a quasi-colonial relationship to the Babylonian and Persian Empires (Gottwald). Lamentations is then the hurt prayers of a people living under colonial domination, while Esther is the story of the relationship to the empire of members of a colonized people who live in the imperial capital.

Postcolonial perspectives throw light on Ruth (and vice versa) in paradoxical fashion because of their implications in relation to both Ruth the Moabite and Naomi the Israelite, let alone Elimelech and their sons. Elimelech, Naomi and their sons are forced to become immigrants in a foreign country with which Israel often had a hostile relationship. Ruth in due course commits herself to Naomi in a way that involves her becoming an immigrant in a foreign country and unconsciously challenging its people about what attitude they will take to this foreigner. Or is this people, like a colonizing power, taking away her identity (McKinley)? Women of African descent in the United States or in Europe and black women in South Africa have a way in to appreciating her story and may read it either way, as is also the case with Esther (Dube).

See also EDITORIAL CRITICISM; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; FORM CRITICISM; HISTORICAL CRITICISM; INTERTEXTUALITY; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; TEXT, TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. T. Adamo, "The Use of the Psalms in African Indigenous Churches in Nigeria," in The Bible in Africa: Transactions, Trajectories, and Trends, ed. G. O. West and M. W. Dube (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001) 336-49; A. Bach, ed., Women in the Hebrew Bible (London: Routledge, 1999); J. Barton, Oracles of God: Perceptions of Ancient Prophecy in Israel after the Exile (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1986); H. W. Bateman, "Psalm 110:1 and the New Testament," BSac 149 (1992) 438-53; R. Bauckham, The Bible in Politics (London: SPCK; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1989); T. K. Beal, The Book of Hiding: Gender, Ethnicity, Annihilation, and Esther (London: Routledge, 2002); S. B. Berg, The Book of Esther: Motif, Themes, and Structure (SBLDS 44; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); A. Brenner, ed., A Feminist Companion to Ruth (FCB 3; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993a); idem, ed., A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs (FCB 1; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993b); idem, ed., A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susanna (FCB 7; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995a); idem, ed., A Feminist Companion to Wisdom Literature (FCB 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995b); W. Brueggemann, Israel's Praise: Doxology against Idolatry and Ideology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); F. W. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1996); C. V. Camp, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs (BLS 11; Decatur, GA: Almond, 1985); B. S. Childs, "Psalm Titles and Midrashic Exegesis," JSS 16 (1971) 137-50; idem, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); D. J. A. Clines, On the Way to the Postmodern: Old Testament Essays, 1968-1998 (2 vols.; JSOTSup 292, 293; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); P. W. Coxon, "Was Naomi a Scold? A Response to Fewell and Gunn," JSOT 45 (1989) 25-37; S. G. Dempster, Dominion and Dynasty: A Biblical Theology of the Hebrew Bible (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2003); W. Diltz, Selected Writings, ed. and trans. H. P. Rickman (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976); idem, "The Understanding of Other Persons and Their Life-Expressions," in The Hermeneutics Reader: Texts of the German Tradition from the Enlightenment to the Present, ed. K. Muelher-Vollmer (New York: Crossroad, 1985) 152-64; M. W. Dube, ed., Other Ways of Reading: African Women and the Bible (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2001); D. N. Fewell and D. Gunn, "A Son Is Born to Naomi," JSOT 40 (1988) 99-108; idem, "Is Coxon a Scold? On Responding to the Book of Ruth," JSOT 45 (1989) 39-43; M. V. Fox, Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (2nd ed., Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method (New York: Crossroad, 1982); E. S. Gerstenberger, Psalms: Part 1, with an Introduction to Cultic Poetry (FOTL 14; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); idem, Psalms: Part 2, and Lamentations (FOTL 15; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); J. Goldingay, Models for Interpretation of Scripture (repr., Toronto: Clements, 2004); S. Goldman, "Narrative and Ethical Ironies in Esther," JSOT 47 (1990) 15-31; N. K. Gottwald, The Politics of Ancient Israel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); E. L. Greenstein, "Reading Strategies and the Story of Ruth," in Women in the Hebrew Bible, ed. A. Bach (London: Routledge, 1999) 211-31; H. Gunkel, Introduction to Psalms: The Genres of the Religious Lyric of Israel, completed by J. Begrich (MLBS; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998); idem, The Psalms: A Form-Critical Introduction (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); W. J. Houston, "The Role of the Poor in Proverbs," in Reading from Right to Left: Essays on the Hebrew Bible in Honour of David J. A.

Clines, ed. J. C. Exum and H. G. M. Williamson (JSOTSup 373; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2003) 229-40; D. A. Hubbard, "The Wisdom Movement and Israel's Covenant Faith," TynBul 17 (1966) 3-33; D. Jobling, "Ruth Finds a Home," in The New Literary Criticism and the Hebrew Bible, ed. J. C. Exum and D. J. A. Clines (JSOTSup 143; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 125-39; A. M. Isasi-Díaz, "By the Rivers of Babylon: Exile as a Way of Life," in Reading from This Place, 1: Social Location and Biblical Interpretation in the United States, ed. F. Segovia and M. Tolbert (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995) 149-64; M. Kiszner, "Holocaust Lamentations," http://www.ais.com/jewishissues/jewishsociety/Holocaust_Lamentations.asp; T. Linafelt, Surviving Lamentations: Catastrophe, Lament, and Protest in the Afterlife of a Biblical Book (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002); J. McKinley, "Reframing Her: Biblical Women," in Postcolonial Focus (BMW 1; Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix Press, 2004); J. Miles, God: A Biography (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1995); S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship (2 vols.; Oxford: Blackwell; Nashville: Abingdon, 1962); H. P. Nasuti, Defining the Sacred Songs: Genre, Tradition, and the Post-critical Interpretation of the Psalms (JSOTSup 218; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999); K. Nielsen, Ruth (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); D. Patte, ed., Global Bible Commentary (Nashville: Abingdon, 2004); M. V. Rienstra, Swallow's Nest: A Feminine Reading of the Psalms (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1992); F. D. E. Schleiermacher, Hermeneutics: The Handwritten Manuscripts, ed. H. Kimmeler (SBLIT 1; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977); F. Segovia and M. Tolbert, eds., Reading from This Place (2 vols.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); M. Sneed, "The Social Location of the Book of Qoheleth," HS 39 (1998) 38-51; B. L. Tanner, The Book of Psalms through the Lens of Intertextuality (SBL 26; New York: Lang, 2001); A. C. Thiselton, New Horizons in Hermeneutics (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992); P. Tribble, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); W. Vischer, "The Book of Esther," EvQ 11 (1939) 3-21; H. W. Wolff, The Old Testament: A Guide to Its Writings (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973).

J. Goldingay

HISTORICAL CRITICISM

It is a somewhat difficult task to categorize *Psalms, *Job, *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes, *Song of Songs, *Esther, *Ruth and *Lamentations together when dealing with historical criticism. In a sense, these books consist of material that is by and large outside the main “fireworks” of biblical criticism, which relates to the Pentateuch and the Historical Books, not to mention the prophetic literature. And yet, a number of interesting questions pertain to this material in this respect. For the purposes of the following discussion, first we will make some general observations about Psalms and the Wisdom literature, as they constitute the bulk of the material in question. After that, we will look at Psalms separately and then at the Wisdom literature, consisting of Job, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. We will conclude by looking at some issues in relation to Song of Songs, Esther, Ruth and Lamentations, which are fairly disparate from the standpoint of historical criticism, even if Esther and Ruth have overall similarities of genre.

1. Psalms and the Wisdom Literature
2. Song of Songs, Esther, Ruth, Lamentations
3. Conclusion

1. Psalms and the Wisdom Literature.

With Psalms and the Wisdom literature, we are, in a sense, dealing with quite a different set of questions than those associated especially with the Pentateuch and the Historical books and even the prophetic literature. Yet, in another sense, the underlying methods are similar to those applied to the Pentateuch and the Historical Books and the rest of the OT. The Wisdom literature is in many ways timeless, and except for the most conservative readers in the case of Job and Ecclesiastes and perhaps Proverbs, the problem of historical veracity is not a major issue in interpretation. As for Psalms, once the introductory issue of the superscriptions that relate to Davidic (or, for a smaller number of psalms, Mosaic or Asaphite) authorship has been cleared (see Psalms 5: Titles), again we can say that we are dealing with material that rather expresses the thoughts and emotions of the writer, not history writing. Even the historical Psalms 78; 105; 106 should be seen more as liturgical reiterations of salvation history than as historiography proper (see Tate, 284; Allen, 40-42, 49-53). In addition, recent advances in text- and reader-centered approaches for reading the OT texts have in themselves lessened interest in historical questions for many (see Longman 1989).

At the same time, while the focus is on didactic wisdom and on expression of emotion, and granting validity for many nonhistorical approaches to reading, the material does contain references to history. Also, in general, the distinction between history and ideology (or vice versa) is never clear-cut. Thus, while the focus of the historical Psalms 78; 105; 106, and any other psalms that contain historical referents, is not directly on the historical but rather on the didactical and liturgical, it should also be kept in mind that the Historical Books can be seen to have didactical purposes. For example, the book of Joshua can be seen to have been written to exhort the Israelites to remember the great deeds of Yahweh and thereby follow him, and the book of Kings to show the sin of Israel and thus instruct readers to learn from past mistakes. In other words, the difference between the historical psalms and the Historical Books is one of degree and focus rather than of type. Here we can then say that differences, though they exist, are fluid, and certain parts and features of Psalms and the Wisdom literature approach and share with those of the Historical Books. This fluidity between genres can also be extended further. For example, when one says that the prophets were spokespersons of Yahweh, it is impossible to say that none of the prophetic material includes wisdom elements, and, conversely, if wisdom is about knowing Yahweh and following him, such proclamation can easily move toward prophetic elements. In any case, some of the prophetic books and other books of the OT contain wisdom sayings or proverbs that are directly attributable as such (see, e.g., Jer 31:29, and the proverb in 1 Kings 20:11 set within a historical book).

Having said this and keeping in mind the fluidity between the genres and characteristics of the OT literature, we can move on to some specific features of historical criticism that pertain to Psalms and the Wisdom literature in particular. The history of the criticism until the mid-1970s is well summarized by R. E. Clements. There is sufficient scope to see Psalms and Wisdom literature separately here, and this is what Clements has done and what we will do. We should also note that we restrict our concerns to the canonical OT literature. For example, the late extracanonical works, such as *Wisdom of Solomon and *Sirach, could also be drawn in for the considerations of Wisdom literature, as is often done (so, e.g., Murphy 2002; Clifford). If one were to move even a bit further, but without going as far as the NT, wisdom also features in the intertestamental literature (see, e.g., Benne-ma) and the Qumran documents (see, e.g., Jeff-eries). However, many of the issues stated here probably can be more or less extended by analogy to the later works, although to do so perhaps would run the risk of making a great oversimplification.

1.1. Psalms. An elementary comment to start with regarding Psalms is that in the precritical time the Psalm titles were seen to refer to authorship. However, it can quickly be pointed out that the Hebrew in the superscription contains the preposition lē, which can be translated in a number of different ways and can mean, for example, “dedicated to” instead of “by.” Thus, a title such as tēpillā lēmōšeh ’is-hā’elōhim in Psalm 90 could simply mean “A Hymn Dedicated to Moses, Man of God.” It has also been pointed out that the titles are likely to have been added to the psalms only later, even though it is not certain when this took place (for further discussion, see Craigie, 31-35).

Here, then, we of course would ask the question of when the psalms themselves were composed. From the titles, except perhaps for Psalm 90, it is clear that by attribution they belong to the time of David and later. As criticism started to exert itself on the materials, estimates varied from the period of the first temple to Maccabean times (see Clements, 77). Typically, clues would be sought from the relation of the references in each psalm to what was known about Israel’s history otherwise in order to establish the time when the psalm was composed. Here, of course, the understanding of the history of Israel was based on Wellhausenian (see Wellhausen) reconstruction of that history, founded on the JEDP hypothesis, where J and E were early monarchic, D was Josianic, and P was exilic and postexilic, and on Wellhausen’s theory that Israel’s *worship developed from simple as attested by JE, to complex as attested by P, with a mid-point as attested by D. Each psalm could be plotted along this continuum, of course incorporating any other information that was known about this history within such a framework. It is worth mentioning here that, though challenged recently, the Wellhausenian framework is still by and large influencing the manner in which the historical background for the psalms is being sought.

In many ways, a decisive development in Psalm studies was brought by H. Gunkel in the beginning of the twentieth century. Gunkel classified the material in the psalms into various forms (Gattungen), such as the *hymn, the community *laments, individual laments, songs of *thanksgiving and royal psalms (for a summary, see Clements, 80-81). Looking at the psalms and, for that matter, biblical literature itself based on a classification of such forms or genres is a practice that has been developed further by later scholars and has proved very useful (see Form Criticism). At its best, such analysis alerts readers to the question of what kind of literature one is dealing with and thus facilitates better understanding of the biblical texts. As for the psalms, once Gunkel had suggested the differing forms, the next question would naturally be what kind of occasion would have produced the differing psalms that attested such forms, and how and in what occasions the psalms would have been used afterwards.

From here, the focus of attention shifted to the idea that the psalms provided clues that at least some of them were used in the Israelite cult (see Cult, Worship: Psalms). In this the work of S. Mowinckel was revolutionary for OT scholarship (for a summary, see Clements, 83-86). For Mowinckel, the psalms were used in Israel’s worship, even the individual laments. Then, of course, it would be necessary to think about the exact cultic setting of each psalm. This would then lead into a reconstruction of the cult from the clues provided in the psalms. Here, insights from the already developed discipline of Assyriology also were drawn in. It was surmised that Israel had an equivalent of the Akitu (New Year’s) festival, which is well attested in the cuneiform literature from Assyria and Babylonia (for a recent treatment of the festival, see Bidmead). Mowinckel reconstructed an autumnal New Year’s festival in Israel based on the Assyro-Babylonian parallels and on evidence in the biblical material that would support a corresponding festival in Israel. Much work was done subsequently on this topic, and even though later scholarship eventually became more cautious about the existence of such a festival in Israel, the matter illustrates how historical reconstruction was and can be done from the psalms. Although there has been scepticism about the exact details, the approach of interpreting the psalms from the standpoint of the cult continues, and rightly so in my view.

On a related note, since the discovery and decipherment of the Late Bronze Age cuneiform alphabetic tablets from Ras Shamra (Ugarit) in the Syrian coast in the mid-twentieth century, scholarship has, after noticing a number of similarities with Ugaritic and Israelite poetry in both form and content, rightly taken this material into account for understanding the Israelite religious outlook (for a summary, see Craigie, 48-56; more generally, see Smith). To this may be added any insights that archaeological finds from the ancient Levant and any other parallels from adjacent cultures of the ancient Near East might be able to offer about Israelite religion. The main concern, as with any historical study, is to use all available material, Israelite and beyond, responsibly in order to reconstruct possible settings for the psalms. When evaluating various possibilities, we must keep in mind that only the logical consistency of the reconstructions can be tested, as we cannot travel to the past to observe. Also, there is no guarantee that only one logically consistent reconstruction is possible (see Pitkänen); and, as for the evidence, no archaeological remains of the first temple have even been found to help make a correlation between the psalms and that temple. In other words, it is likely that no single approach and viewpoint will be sufficient, and we should instead expect a variety of them.

In many ways, Gunkel and Mowinckel stand above others for modern studies of Psalms, as these two scholars have laid the foundations for later study. After them, and in addition to what has been mentioned above, two new related developments in the study of psalms should be noted. First, recently much emphasis has been placed on the development of the Psalter as a collection (see Nogalski, in Ballard and Tucker, 37-54). Again, the primary historical question here has been how and when the psalms started to be grouped together, and how and when such groupings started to form larger collections, then books, and finally the whole Psalter. Numerous theories have been presented, but none has captured the agreement of all scholars. Perhaps the problem is unsolvable. Second, and relating to the formation of the collection, is the matter of how the Psalter itself functions as a single entity, and beyond that, as part of the larger canon*. In this, issues such as developing themes, link words and so forth are studied across the whole of the Psalter and even beyond (see deClaissé-Walford, in Ballard and Tucker, 93-110). This recent development of focusing on the final form of the text and its interconnectedness was boosted especially by the canonical approach started by B. Childs in the 1970s. It should be noted that even though canonical approaches concentrate on the final form of the texts as part of the canon, they do not necessarily ignore historical criticism as such. A canonical approach can bring helpful insights for interpreting the psalms, and in this area the work of scholars such as J. C. McCann and J. A. Sanders should also be highlighted.

1.2. Wisdom Literature. The first issue here is the question of authorship. As we noted above, the attributions of books, where any exist, generally are not regarded by modern interpreters as indications of authorship. Typically, the book of Job is dated to the latter part of the monarchical period or thereafter (see Hartley, 18), even if the description of Job, the main character, hints toward the patriarchal time as the literary setting of the events. In general, the book is taken as more of a story, even a play (for a summary, see Hartley, 37-38; on Job as drama, see Shelton). As for Ecclesiastes, though the book at first sight seems to refer to *Solomon, even if he is not directly named (see, e.g., Eccles 1:1, 12, 16), most, including the majority of conservative scholars, see the description as an imaginary narrative construction (see Longman 1998, 2-8). With Proverbs, the book itself indicates that it is a collection (cf. Prov 1:1; 10:1; 25:1; 30:1), and the title "The Proverbs of Solomon, Son of David, King of Israel" can simply be seen as ascribing ownership and ultimate derivation of the concept of wisdom in the monarchical period and beyond to Solomon, the king famous for his wisdom. Also, in any case, as we will note below, wisdom existed in the ancient Near East from much earlier times, with documents available from Sumer and Egypt from the late third and the second millennia BC (see COS). In any case, wisdom seems to be a universal phenomenon and probably as old as humankind, so Solomon would be a transmitter and promoter of wisdom in addition to perhaps producing some of his own material. Otherwise, even if the attributions do not reflect actual authorship, the dating of the wisdom materials as such is an important concern as part of trying to make sense of the message of each composition or any parts thereof.

Having made these preliminary comments about authorship, we note with Clements (100) that early historical critics, including Wellhausen, paid less attention to Wisdom literature because it did not impinge on the JEDP hypothesis and the accompanying issues. This probably is due to the fact that, granted the genre interlinkages described above, Wisdom literature is characterized by a kind of otherness and timelessness in comparison to the rest of the OT documents. However, in the spirit of the evolutionary nature of the theories of Israel's historical development by the then-contemporary scholarship, it was soon suggested that wisdom was a late phenomenon in Israel (see Clements, 100-101). Against this general backdrop, two important developments can be traced at the beginning of the twentieth century to Gunkel. Gunkel suggested a particular class of men who were associated with wisdom and its promotion. Also, Gunkel recognized the international character of wisdom, and others after him developed parallels from Egypt and Babylon (see Clements, 101-2; for an overview of ancient Near Eastern parallels, see Clifford, 23-41; Smothers, in Ballard and Tucker, 167-80). These two important issues of wisdom schools (see Sages, Schools, Education) and the international character of wisdom have continued to the present day (cf. Crenshaw, in Ballard and Tucker, 215-27), and although the idea of evolutionary development has recently been challenged many times over, its legacy of tending to see material as late still hangs over OT scholarship and thus the study of Wisdom literature as well. (This, of course, does not deny that a good amount of material in the OT is late whatever the case. Also, Gunkel did argue that the Wisdom literature had an earlier oral stage [see Clements, 101-2].) As one might guess, in general terms, with lateness may come Greek parallels to the literature (see Clements, 108) and, where possible, Persian ones, even though comparisons with Persian settings are complicated by a relative dearth of contemporary Persian material (see Crenshaw, in Ballard and Tucker, 226). Aramaic features in any of the literature are also generally seen as indications of lateness, even though it is also true that there are references to the Arameans in Assyrian documents from the late second millennium onward (see ABD 1.345-46), and in general there was a lot of cultural interaction in the ancient Near East from very early times, attested by linguistic features such as loanwords (e.g., foreign loanwords in Egyptian in the second millennium).

Once the possible existence of wisdom schools was established, one could start asking questions of how they came into being, what was their remit, how did they relate to the court and to society as a whole, how they developed through the centuries, and so on. These questions have been addressed over the past century; however, no consensus has formed on the answers (see Crenshaw, in Ballard and Tucker, 215-27). Some even deny the existence of such schools, or at least point out that there is no direct evidence in the OT itself, even if the scribal schools in, say, ancient Sumer are well known and used as an analogy to deduce that a similar situation may have existed in Israel (see Whybray, in Dell and Barker, 12-15). But here we may also note that folk wisdom exists everywhere, so a lot of the material may have or even likely originated in this way, in whatever manner it may then have been collected to form the wisdom books now in the canon. The way that Proverbs and, for that matter, any other book within the corpus of the Wisdom literature took shape is an issue on which much ink has been and likely will be spilled (see Murphy 1998). Especially, if there are any stylistic differences or other apparent features attesting unevenness, inconsistencies or separateness of thought, one could attempt to isolate material attesting such features into separate sources and then try to determine a separate setting for each source and trace how these were collected together and edited, in line with an approach more familiar in the context of pentateuchal criticism. At the same time, one could take a different literary approach and explain at least some features in the text that could be taken to indicate sources as having some other reason for their formation that maintains the unity of the text. Or, one could take a canonical approach, perhaps broadly along the lines of the movement initiated by Childs, and, just as with such a canonical approach in relation to Psalms or any other OT literature, look at Wisdom literature as it stands in its final form in the canon even if it was a result of an amalgamation of sources. Be that as it may, it makes sense that, for example, just as with modern sayings such as “Let sleeping dogs lie” and “Don’t count your chickens before they hatch,” it is likely that proverbs in ancient Israel were floating around on their own and could be brought together only by collecting and presenting them in a single document.

As was hinted above, any consideration of historical settings naturally has a diachronic aspect. As Israel’s history moved on, so did its institutions and social structures, whether or not one takes a general Wellhausenian view of development from simple to complex. In this context, and whatever one’s view of the general dating of Wisdom literature, one may immediately inquire as to what extent each part of the historical literature represents a particular historical time and setting. In particular, in view of the quite different outlooks of Job, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, perhaps such differences are not due simply to authorial idiosyncrasies but rather could be anchored further into a Zeitgeist of their time. Thus, for example, one might think that it is possible to make historical conclusions based on the fact that Proverbs seems to be fairly optimistic in its outlook whereas Job is questioning and Ecclesiastes rather pessimistic. (This assumes that one can give a crude categorization of the characteristics of these books, an issue that of course has been discussed and debated extensively in academic literature in relation to each book.) And, it is probably fair to say, that it is often thought that as such, Job and Ecclesiastes present correctives to the positive and, in the eyes of many, sometimes even simplistic outlook of Proverbs (see Murphy 2002, 34, 55). However, even if one could independently establish a firm relative dating based on, say, linguistic grounds—for example, the language of Ecclesiastes is often seen to attest late features (see Longman 1998, 11–15)—one may still come back to the question of whether the differences in outlook nevertheless result from differences in the outlooks of the authors as individuals and from a general diversity in Israelite wisdom tradition.

In any case, any reconstruction of Israelite society and its possible historical developments in relation to Wisdom literature proceeds in two directions. On the one hand, one may try to reconstruct any such structures based on the material of the Wisdom literature itself. On the other hand, one may postulate certain structures based on other Israelite literature and on what is known from archaeology and known similar practices in the ancient Near East, and then see how the Israelite Wisdom literature fits into the picture. In practice, both approaches interact with each other, utilizing insights from each other and at the same time trying to see how any possible discrepancies might be resolved. The overall process is complex and proceeds based on the work of individual scholars and their scholarly communities. The accumulation of knowledge and reconstructions in this academic field, as with OT studies in general, is not always a linear process and can even take some side-tracks and diverse views that may not always be seen as progress in light of later reflection. In general, however, it is probably fair to say that academic study has made some significant achievements in accumulating relevant knowledge and insights over the last two centuries or so of modern study as regards the historical setting and background of the Wisdom literature and, for that matter, other ancient Israelite literature (for two classic sociological analyses of how progress is made in sciences, see Kuhn, Feyerabend).

2. Song of Songs, Esther, Ruth, Lamentations.

These books are, in a sense, “the rest of it” from a canonical perspective and are somewhat hard to look at together from the standpoint of historical criticism. At the same time, it is hard to do justice to them individually in the space of a short article such as this. Therefore, I will mainly draw out some general themes and apply them to these books. The literary setting of Ruth is explicitly premonarchic, Lamentations is clearly about the destruction of Jerusalem and the Babylonian exile, and Esther is about events in the Persian period. As for Song of Songs, the superscription indicates that it is a “song of songs” to Solomon. Here the superscriptive lê is the same as that for a number of psalms, and therefore, even from the perspective of a straightforward reading of the Hebrew, it may simply be a dedication and need not be taken as a sign of authorship. At the same time, the song makes reference to a king, which would suggest the monarchy as a setting, even though one might plausibly conclude that such references could be created even after the exile when the monarchy ceased to exist.

From the perspective of genre, both Ruth and Esther may perhaps be characterized generally as a kind of historical *novella (see Hubbard, 47; Berlin 2001, xvii). It would probably be correct to say that their genre is, broadly speaking, similar to the Pentateuch and the Historical Books proper. Thus, they can basically be looked into just as any other historical material. However, Ruth and Esther are much shorter than the main Historical Books and do not describe anything on which the main contours of Israel's history hinges. Esther relates the background to the Jewish feast of *Purim, and Ruth narrates the story about the ancestress of David. The information in the books is useful and helpful, but arguably it could be left out without causing any major problems for understanding the history of Israel or the main features of its life. As one might guess, every detail in Ruth and Esther has been subjected to critical scrutiny as regards their historical accuracy, with varying opinions about the matter, even though most would not see more than a historical nucleus in Esther (for some of the issues and problems on Esther, see Levenson, 23-27; for some positive appropriation about the book's historicity, see Baldwin, 16-24). Song of Songs is clearly poetry and can be compared with other Hebrew poetry—for example, the psalms (see Longman 2001, 19, 89, 91). Little direct historical information can probably be gained from Song of Songs, save any general Israelite thinking or customs that it might reflect (see Longman 2001, 19). Lamentations is also poetry, and its specific genre has parallels with lamentations from the ancient Near East, most notably ancient Sumer (see Berlin 2002, 26-30). As such, there is a timeless character to it, even though it clearly expresses the feelings of the poet in the face of an unimaginably terrible catastrophe for him—the conquest of Jerusalem by the Babylonians and its aftermath.

As with any book in the OT, the date of writing has been a topic of discussion for Song of Songs, Esther, Ruth and Lamentations. Apart from the usual questions about sources, redaction and distance of sources, redaction and final form from the events that the books portray, the book of Ruth perhaps could be said to have some distinctiveness in the discussion that relates to it. Here the issue is that although the events portrayed date to the premonarchical period, many commentators would like to date the book to the postexilic period (see Hubbard, 24-26; for a positive appropriation and a date in the early monarchic period, see Campbell); in any case, the book is often seen to have been written, as R. L. Hubbard (37) summarizes it, to “promote the interests of David and his dynasty.” Also, Lamentations perhaps could be equated with the prophetic books in some respect from the perspective of dating, with an idea, as with the prophets, of the possibility or likelihood of an initial version of the book with subsequent redaction to add concerns of a later author or community (see Renkema, 52-53), even though most scholars today see the book essentially as a work that follows closely after the events described (see Miller, 11-12). Esther is, in any case, late and is thus unlikely to capture any controversy even for the most conservative readers as regards the date of its writing. All this said, dating considerations are not always as important as might seem at first, as any early material purporting to be historical might nevertheless not be all that reliable, and any later material might be a result of sources transmitted reliably over a long period of time, as is demonstrated by parallels elsewhere in the ancient Near East (e.g., transmission of Sumerian laments from the early second millennium to late first millennium BC [see Hallo, 224-28]).

3. Conclusion.

After a tour of this diverse collection, we may perhaps say, among other things, that it has illustrated a variegated set of methods and approaches that relate to historical criticism of these literary documents. Perhaps the most prominent that we could list are source, form and redaction criticism, comparison of texts, ancient Near Eastern parallels, linguistic features, and possible societal and cultic settings and structures. On balance, many of these, such as source and redaction criticism, are methods that have been most prominently applied to the Pentateuch and the Historical Books, and some, such as reconstructing wisdom schools and cultic settings of the psalms, are fairly specific to their respective corpus. As regards future research, it is hard to foresee at the moment the probability and extent of any major changes in how the historical issues are approached, but undoubtedly some new perspectives will be brought forward.

See also EDITORIAL CRITICISM; FORM CRITI-

CISM; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; SOLOMON; WISDOM AND HISTORY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. C. Allen, Psalms 101-150 (WBC 21; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); J. Baldwin, Esther (TOTC; Leicester: Inter-Varsity Press, 1984); H. W. Ballard Jr., and W. D. Tucker Jr., eds., An Introduction to Wisdom Literature and the Psalms: Festschrift Marvin E. Tate (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 2000); C. Bennis, "The Strands of Wisdom Tradition in Intertestamental Judaism: Origins, Developments and Characteristics," TynBul 52 (2001) 61-82; A. Berlin, Esther (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2001); idem, Lamentations (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); J. Bidmead, The Akitu Festival: Religious Continuity and Royal Legitimation in Mesopotamia (GD 2; Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press, 2002); E. F. Campbell Jr., Ruth (AB 7; New York: Doubleday, 1975); B. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (London: SCM, 1979); R. E. Clements, One Hundred Years of Old Testament Interpretation (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1976); R. J. Clifford, The Wisdom Literature (Nashville: Abingdon, 1998); P. C. Craigie, Psalms 1-50 (WBC 19; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); K. J. Dell and M. Barker, eds., Wisdom: The Collected Articles of Norman Whybray (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2005); P. K. Feyrabend, Against Method (3rd ed.; London and New York: Verso, 1993); H. Gunkel, Einleitung in die Psalmen: Die Gattungen der religiösen Lyrik Israels, completed by J. Begrich (4th ed.; HKAT; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1985 [1928-1933]); ET, Introduction to Psalms: The Genres of the Religious Lyric of Israel, completed by J. Begrich (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998); W. W. Hallo, Origins: The Ancient Near Eastern Background of Some Modern Western Institutions (SHCANE 6; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996); J. Hartley, The Book of Job (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); R. L. Hubbard Jr., The Book of Ruth (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); D. F. Jefferies, Wisdom at Qumran: A Form-Critical Analysis of the Admonitions in 4Q Instruction (GD 3; Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press, 2002); T. S. Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962); J. D. Levenson, Esther (OTL; London: SCM, 1997); T. Longman III, Literary Approaches to Biblical Interpretation (Leicester: Apollos, 1989); idem, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); J. C. McCann,

A Theological Introduction to the Book of Psalms: The Psalms as Torah (Nashville: Abingdon, 1993); C. W. Miller, "The Book of Lamentations in Recent Research," CBR 1 (2002) 9-29; S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004 [1962]); original, Psalmstudien (6 vols.; Kristiania: J. Dybwad, 1921-1924); R. E. Murphy, Proverbs (WBC 22; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998); idem, The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature (3rd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); P. Pitkänen, Central Sanctuary and Centralization of Worship in Ancient Israel: From the Settlement to the Building of Solomon's Temple (2nd ed.; GD 4; Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press, 2004); J. Renkema, Lamentations (HCOT; Leuven: Peeters, 1998); J. A. Sanders, From Sacred Story to Sacred Text: Canon as Paradigm (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); P. Shelton, "Making a Drama Out of a Crisis? A Consideration of the Book of Job as a Drama," JSOT 83 (1999) 69-82; M. S. Smith, Untold Stories: The Bible and Ugaritic Studies in the Twentieth Century (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2001); M. E. Tate, Psalms 51-100 (WBC 20; Dallas: Word, 1990); J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israel (6th ed.; Berlin: Reimer, 1905 [1878]); ET, Prolegomena to the History of Israel (Edinburgh: A & C Black, 1885).
P. Pitkänen

HISTORICAL ALLUSIONS. See WISDOM AND HISTORY.

HISTORY. See HISTORICAL CRITICISM; WISDOM AND HISTORY.

HONOR AND SHAME

Honor refers to the experience of being esteemed by one's group or other social entities on the basis of embodying that which is deemed desirable, virtuous and socially productive. Shame refers, generally, to the opposite experience of being devalued and belittled on the basis of failing to measure up to or transgressing the same. Concern for one's honor, and for the honor of one's nation, is well attested in the wisdom and poetic texts of the OT and is evidenced in a variety of ways. Individual characters engage in the push and pull of challenges and counterchallenges, trying to gain precedence over one another. The desirability of honor and the undesirability of social disapproval are assumed as a "given" in ethical advice and liturgical petition. Several texts elevate especially the importance of honoring God through observance of the covenant stipulations. *Women risk their reputation to secure an appropriate husband, and they strain against the socially imposed constraints on their expressions of sexual desire. Of special interest is the way in which several of these texts are critical, or at least cautious, about the relative value of the quest for honor and the propriety of several of the means by which honor is attained and protected, and the ways in which the texts challenge stereotypes of the “honor-sensitive Mediterranean person,” especially in regard to the behavior of honorable women.

1. Honor, Shame and the Social Reinforcement of Group Values
2. Psalms and Lamentations
3. Proverbs and Ecclesiastes
4. Honor Challenges in Esther and Job
5. Song of Songs, Ruth and the Honorable Woman
6. Conclusion

1. Honor, Shame and the Social Reinforcement of Group Values.

The interest in honor and shame throughout the OT is amply attested by the incidence of vocabulary pertinent to this realm of human experience (Bechtel, 54-55; Domeris, 94-96; Laniak, 17-23) and corresponds to the widespread acknowledgment of honor and shame as important values in traditional cultures, especially those found around the Mediterranean basin. In these cultures a sense of “belonging” to and being valued by the group is an important component of a stable identity. Individuals are socialized from birth to be concerned about the opinion of significant others (Bechtel, 55). As a result, “the group is capable of exerting great pressure on people, in order to control their behavior” (Bechtel, 51). Honor comes from the affirmation of one’s worth by one’s peers and society, awarded on the basis of the individual’s ability to embody the virtues and attributes that his or her society values. Some of these attributes are ascribed by virtue of one’s birth; others are attained as one pursues behaviors and embodies values esteemed by the group (Malina and Neyrey, 28-29). The particular behaviors that are deemed honorable or censurable are specific to each social group, but honor remains an abiding concern. Where a person fails to embody the virtues that are deemed appropriate for him or her to embody, the group responds by shaming the individual or subgroup, withdrawing acceptance and esteem as a means of pressuring the individual to return to the behaviors valued by the group and as a disincentive to others against following the example of deviants.

This model has been sufficiently rehearsed in greater detail elsewhere, as have substantial criticisms and emendations cautioning against, for example, the imposition of an essentially modern anthropological construction grounded in observation of particular contemporary Mediterranean groups upon the data of ancient texts stemming from other groups and another time (Bechtel; deSilva 1995; 2000a; 2000b; 2002; Domeris; Laniak, 26-32; Malina and Neyrey) (see DOTHB, Honor and Shame). Rather than rehearse that material, in this article I will attempt to display what particular texts have to say about the ways in which honor and shame represent concerns of the society represented by the author (and/or characters, in narratives) and how discourse about honor and disgrace functions rhetorically in these texts.

2. Psalms and Lamentations.

The psalms, in many ways the pulse of the prayer and *worship life of ancient Israel, early Judaism and the early church, throb with expressions evidencing concern for the preservation of honor (whether God’s, the individual’s or the nation’s) and the averting of disgrace. Many of the psalms also serve a didactic function, holding up paradigms of honorable behaviors, orientations and commitments for the emulation of those who recite or hear these texts. *Lamentations provides an extended poetical reflection on the experience of national disgrace. Its use of the language of honor and shame is thus very closely related to the use of the same in individual and national laments responding to the experience of contempt or degradation in some form and calling for vindication.

2.1. Psalms. The book of *Psalms is especially rich in the language and conceptual framework of honor and shame. The didactic function of many psalms has often been noted. When this function is combined with the public recitation of the same psalms, we find these texts functioning very much as specimens of epideictic oratory, celebrating honorable patterns of life and behavior, holding these esteemed patterns up before the collective community to be internalized. In Psalm 1 it is the person who walks in line with the Torah, rather than joining with those who think lightly of covenant faithfulness, who is held up as ʾašrē, “blessed” or “favored” (Ps 1:1-3), occupying the position that we all would wish for ourselves (on the function of ma-carisms—statements identifying those who are blessed—in an honor culture, see Hanson). Similarly, Psalm 15 outlines a variety of behaviors that lead to the privilege of being graced with a place in God’s tent (Ps 15:1), creating a paradigm that is thus commended to the hearers as worthy of imitation. Interestingly, this involves not only the performance of virtuous behaviors, such as truthful speech, just dealing and fair lending, but also the avoidance of behaviors such as slandering or reproaching one’s neighbor. It also entails honoring those who walk in line with the Torah (who “fear the Lord”) and despising those who forsake the law* (Ps 15:4), thus being a reliable part of the social mechanism for reinforcing group values (see also Ps 19:7-11; 24:3-5; 32:1-2; 101; 112; 119:1-8; 133).

The psalms also bear abundant witness to an individual’s or nation’s experience of being shamed and praying for reversal, and thus indirectly to the fact that the avoidance of disgrace and the safeguarding of honor are noteworthy concerns of the communities that produced and used these texts. The psalmists affirm that righteous conduct (walking in line with the covenant) should lead to the secure enjoyment of honor and the other goods of life (Ps 34:5, 8-9; 37:18-19; 127:5). The psalmists pray that they will not be put to shame by their enemies, a request often coupled with the claim that they are counting on God to help them (Ps 25:2; see also Ps 25:20; 31:17; 38:16). Disgrace is deemed inappropriate for “those who wait for” or “trust in” God; rather, it is for those who break faith with the covenant and with their neighbors in the covenant (Ps 25:3), who often pervert the social reinforcement of covenant loyalty by seeking to shame the Torah-observant instead of honoring them (Ps 31:17b-18 [see Bechtel, 71]). It is also appropriate for those who worship idols rather than making the God of Israel their confidence (Ps 97:7).

Experience, however, often runs counter to the expectations of one’s moral universe. Despite their innocence, the psalmists encounter taunts from their enemies, including wagging of the head, sneering and verbal abuse (Bechtel [72] lists these as “informal shaming sanctions”), the latter often targeting the psalmists’ confidence in God (Ps 22:6-8; 35:15-16; 41:5; 42:10; 69:10-12, 19-20). Whether the psalmists profess uprightness of conduct (Ps 7:5) or pray for God’s forgiveness so that they may not fall into disgrace and become “the scorn of the fool” (Ps 39:8), their commitment to continue steadfast in the observance of Torah and in the conviction that God will secure the honor of those who are loyal to God’s covenant remains the basis for their prayer and confidence (Ps 119:31, 51, 80).

The same confidence undergirds the psalmists’ prayers for dramatic reversal, asking that disgrace and shame befall their enemies (Ps 6:10; 35:4, 26; 40:14-15; 70:2-3; 71:13, 24; 109:29), who are also among the scoffers who do not keep covenant, and that they be put in their proper place below the righteous petitioner (Ps 27:6; 71:21, 24). Indeed, the shaming of the one seems to correspond to the vindication or ascendancy of the other, supporting the view of honor as a “limited good” in the ancient social economy (Laniak, 170-71). Rather than seek to save face through “countershaming” their enemies personally, however, they commit their cause to God (Bechtel, 71). The enemies’ shame is complete when God obliterates even the remembrance of their “name” (Ps 9:5-6; 109:13, 15).

This scenario plays out at the national level as well. On the one hand, the tradition leads the psalmists to expect that Israel, or the Davidic king (whose honor God himself establishes [Ps 21:5; 45:7; 110:1]), should experience exaltation over enemies (Ps 72:9-11), rather than being brought low before them (in Ps 89:19, 24, 27, explicitly on the basis of God’s own promise), and enjoy a lasting remembrance or “name” (Ps 45:17; 72:17). However, the nation does experience humiliation from enemies and subjection to disgrace (Ps 79:4; 89:41, 45). This can be interpreted as God’s action (Ps 44:9, 13-16), no doubt understood within the framework of the covenant blessings and curses, in which case the psalmist might even affirm that God’s people have not, in fact, been disloyal and that God should act to restore them (Ps 44:17-26). The psalmists will express the wish, rather, that the nation’s enemies be put to shame in a great reversal of present circumstances (Ps 129:5).

It comes as no surprise that God’s honor is a major focal point of the psalms, since many of them are explicitly acts of praise, giving honor to God for some combination of character traits and beneficent actions on behalf of the psalmist personally or of the people of God collectively and throughout history. The psalms praise God for these actions and traits: acts of creation, which are an ongoing testimony to God's majesty (Ps 8; 19:1; 24:1-2; 95:3-5; 148); deliverance of the psalmist from his enemies and from disgrace or danger (Pss 9; 18; 30; 34; 118); power to deliver as "the Lord of armies" (Ps 24:7-10; 47); might, majesty and character in general (Pss 29; 100; 145; 150); many mighty deeds on behalf of God's people throughout history (often focusing on some combination of the acts of creation, exodus, giving of the covenant, conquest and the establishment of Jerusalem) and in the present time (Pss 33; 66; 98; 105; 107; 111; 135; 136; 146; 147); bestowal of benefits (Ps 103:1-2; 116:12-19); reigning justly over the cosmos that God has made, including forthcoming judgments (Ps 96:10, 13; 97:1; 98:9; 99:1-5); exaltation over idols or "other" gods (Ps 95:3; 96:3-5; 97:7; 135:5-21).

In this economy of receiving God's gifts and help and returning praise in witness to God's generous character and timely benefits, psalmists use the promise that they will augment recognition of God's honor through their praise and testimony as an incentive to God to act on their behalf. Rescuing the psalmist or granting his petition is in God's own interests in terms of the manifestation of God's honor in the world (see Ps 9:14; 22:21-22; 35:17-19, 27-28; 69:29b-30; 71:14, 16, 18, 23-24; 79:13; 106:47), including among foreigners who worship other gods (Ps 18:49; see also Ps 96:3, 10). In a depiction of the view from the other side, the psalmist portrays God as saying, "Call on me. . . I will deliver you, and you shall glorify me" (Ps 50:15). Occasionally, the psalmist characterizes his life as one that is full of praise, a reminder to God, as it were, that the psalmist already actively promotes God's honor (Ps 71:6, 8). The implication is, again, that it would be in the best interests of the advancement of God's reputation for God to act to preserve such a person's honor and life, all the more so as the psalmist has proven to be a noble client who returns thanks and praise to his divine benefactor. The death of the psalmist would in fact diminish God's praise and the recognition of God's honor in the world: "Will the dust praise you? Will it tell of your faithfulness?"

(Ps 30:9; see also Ps 88:10-12; 115:17). Many of the psalms can be read as attempts to "make good" on promises made to God in anticipation of deliverance (see esp. Pss 9; 18; 30; 34; 103:1-2; 116:12-19; 118), as the psalmist calls together an audience and calls attention to God's beneficent deeds (Ps 66:16), increasing "reverence" for and "trust" in God (Ps 40:3). Through the ever-widening circles of praise of God's beneficiaries it is hoped that one day all the nations will acknowledge the supreme honor of the God of Israel, worker of wonderful deeds, and the only God (Ps 86:9-10).

God's honor is also presented as being in jeopardy when the honor or safety of the person who has been visibly aligned with God is endangered, not just because the psalmist may be unavailable to praise God in the future, but because those who disregard God will use the downfall of the pious person as a proof of God's weakness or nonexistence. Thus the psalmist can pray for vindication or deliverance "for your name's sake" (Ps 143:11). In vindicating the psalmist, God secures God's own jeopardized reputation before those who look at the psalmist's distress and taunt him, "Where is your God now?" (Ps 42:10). On rare occasion the psalmist can identify his own experience of being dishonored with the dishonor shown God in his community, which is offered as an incentive to God to vindicate both in one fell swoop (Ps 69:7-9; 89:50-51). There is also the danger of dishonor/disgrace befalling those who, being righteous themselves, are associated with the psalmist and bear witness to his disgrace. Here is another incentive to God, from a consideration of the wider honor of God's faithful ones, to act on behalf of the psalmist (Ps 69:6).

Similar dynamics hold true in regard to the fortunes of the nation of Israel, the corporate body of those who are associated with God's name. God's honor is revealed to the nations, who inappropriately give honor to other gods, when Israel is delivered from trouble or is ascendant and its enemies are disgraced (Ps 83:16-18; 98:1-3, esp. 98:2b; 102:13, 15; 115:1-2). Israel's experience of God's blessing results in God's way being "known upon earth, [God's] saving power among all nations" (Ps 67:1-2). This conviction concerning the linkage between God's honor and Israel's standing becomes a source of confidence and trust (Ps 46:10-11).

Conversely, the declining fortune or humiliation of Israel before other nations threatens to call into question God's strength vis-à-vis the gods of the nations. This put God in something of a bind when the requirements of justice necessitated that God punish Israel's disobedience through exile and national calamity (Glatt-Gilad, 65-66). So, again, the psalmists try to rally God to action on behalf of Israel, restoring its honor, by appealing to God to vindicate his own reputation, which is now challenged and slandered by the ascendant nations (Ps 74:10, 18, 22; 79:9-10, 12; 115:1-2). God must respond to the challenges against God's own honor leveled by the nations who have assaulted God's servants and holy temple (Ps 79:1, 10b). Because God is the God of glory, reliance on God and one's connection with God remain the best assurance of one's own honor—over riches, military allies and military power (Ps 20:7-8; 49:5-6, 16-20; 73:20).

The greater power of the psalms is not their testimony to the honor challenges of the various psalmists and the ways in which they sought vindication from God, but rather the effect that they would have upon generations of communities of worshipers who spoke these words again and again in worship and made them "their own," conforming their practices and expectations to those of the psalmists themselves and becoming more like the "honorable person" defined and personified in the psalms, and like that person who is so aligned with God's honor (by honoring God and representing God to the world through his or her obedient conduct) that they can expect God's intervention when their own honor is endangered. The ongoing recitation of the psalms in private and public worship among Jews and, later, Christians continuously keeps alive in those communities these definitions of honor, expectations concerning the relationship of piety and honor, and the dynamics born of the conviction that God's honor and the honor of God's people are intertwined, and no doubt it contributes significantly to the ongoing manifestation of the same in later literature.

2.2. Lamentations. Lamentations gives the reader a close-up view of the experience of shame that accompanies national defeat and disgrace, particularly the experience of conquest (including, here, deportation). Jerusalem's loss of honor is highlighted in the opening of Lamentations (Olyan, 216). The city that once enjoyed the honor of a princess is now diminished to the status of a forced laborer (Lam 1:1 [the NRSV's "vassal" does not capture the degradation of the Heb mas]). The former majesty and glorious stature of Jerusalem is gone (Lam 1:6; 3:18). Those who formerly respected the city "now despise her, for they have seen her nakedness" (Lam 1:8). The public exposure of private parts is a typical metaphor for shameful exposure of a city's weakness, grounded in the actual human experience of humiliation in being put on display while naked, whence the practice of leading off the foremost citizens of a conquered city naked and bound, demoralizing them, erasing their former status, and enacting the new, relative status between victors and conquered people (Bechtel, 63-67).

The city is exposed to vicious taunting by (foreign) passers-by and the nation's enemies (Lam 2:15-16; 3:14, 61, 63), who gloat over the city's degradation. Those who ought to have been honored (elites, elders) are especially targeted by the enemy for shaming as a symbol of the degradation of Jerusalem as a whole (Lam 4:16; 5:12). The "national disgrace" is described in greater detail in Lamentations 5:1-14. Jerusalem has gone from being self-sufficient and independent to having to depend on others for bread, water and firewood—indeed, buying back their own resources from their overlords or replenishing what cannot be found in the war zone from the supply of neighboring nations. Low-level Babylonian bureaucrats are now lords over Jerusalem in place of native nobility. Women are vulnerable to sexual assault at the hands of the occupation force.

This political reversal of fortune is interpreted as God's humiliating Jerusalem on account of God's anger, God's response to the provocations of Jerusalem's inhabitants (Lam 2:1; see also Lam 3:45). The people challenged God's honor through their disregard of God's commandments, thus enacting contempt for God (and ingratitude toward their perpetual benefactor); as a result, God has successfully sought satisfaction of God's honor in a staggering riposte. In a sense, however, this relieves some of the cognitive tension of the experience of national defeat. If Jerusalem has been humiliated by God rather than by Nebuchadnezzar, then the basic relationships that define Jerusalem's existence (e.g., as God's chosen city/people, those with whom, out of all peoples of the earth, God is in covenant) and world construction (national defeat does not mean the defeat of Jerusalem's God by Babylon's gods but rather represents God's punishment of God's own disobedient people) are preserved.

3. Proverbs and Ecclesiastes.

Honor discourse is strongly evidenced in Wisdom literature, chiefly as a motive for the avoidance of certain behaviors deemed to lead to disgrace and for the pursuit of others that lead to honor. It is also here, however, that we find the most direct criticism of contemporary practices related to honor—for example, the response of rebuffing, for the sake of “saving face,” some criticism or rebuke that could lead one to follow the way of Torah more closely. *Ecclesiastes, not surprisingly, subjects the entire enterprise of honor-seeking to critical scrutiny along with his enumeration of other “vanities.”

3.1. Proverbs. The book of *Proverbs promotes the pursuit of wisdom, that combination of piety and practical savvy that leads to advantage in one's dealings with God and human beings. Many individual proverbs employ sanctions of honor and dishonor (i.e., the promise of being honored or the threat of falling into disgrace) to urge pursuit or avoidance of particular behaviors.

Honor is offered as an incentive for loyalty and faithfulness in dealings with other people (Prov 3:3-4), exhibiting “good sense” (Prov 12:8), pursuing justice and generosity (Prov 21:21), showing diligence and responsibility in one's sphere of duty (Prov 17:2; 27:18), being slow to quarrel or engage in strife (Prov 20:3), and always keeping in view God's superior honor and the need to honor God in all one's dealings (Prov 22:4). The person who does such things enjoys not only honor in this life but also a lasting, praiseworthy remembrance after death (Prov 10:7). Conversely, the threat of being shamed confronts the person who engages in deceitful speech (Prov 13:5), who responds before having heard and understood (Prov 18:13), and who “triangulates” rather than taking up an argument directly with the person involved (Prov 25:9-10). Proverbs 6:30-33 presents an illuminating contrast: shame sanctions are not leveled by the society reflected herein against the thief who steals only to feed himself, though legal sanctions exist to punish the thief who is caught (Prov 6:30-31); however, strong shame sanctions are leveled against the adulterer (Prov

6:32-33; see also Prov 5:8-9), perhaps in the absence of effective legal sanctions.

Throughout Proverbs the title fool is itself a term of reproach and disgrace, and thus the construction of the “fool” creates a paradigm for nonimitation throughout Proverbs, whereas the “wise person” presents a paradigm for emulation, insofar as one wishes to be included also under the honorable appellation wise, because the “wise person” is esteemed and the “fool” is despised (“The wise will inherit honor, but stubborn fools, disgrace” [Prov 3:35; cf. Prov 26:1; see Laniak, 23]). In addition to the “fool,” the “sinner” is also particularly held up as a model not to be emulated, and the author is keenly aware that the visible success that the less Torah-observant enjoy could be a strong incentive to follow their example (Prov 23:17; 24:1-2, 19). The “sinner,” who does not live in the “fear of the Lord,” often even receives praise on account of his or her attainment of desirable goods, which can be very misleading to other honor-seeking people (Prov 28:4). Such praise does not here reliably reinforce what is truly honorable, and “those who keep the law” must resist its pull. In this regard, it is questionable whether wisdom and *folly truly represent a different value system than honor and shame (contra Domeris) or constitute, rather, a culture-specific manifestation of honor and shame, defining who is esteemed and valued versus who is contemned and devalued in terms of the socially approved behaviors and virtues that each manifests or fails to manifest.

Concern for one's own honor, however, is secondary in Proverbs to the “fear of the Lord.” The repeated emphasis on the fear of the Lord “sets before the eyes of the wise person at all times the honor which is due God; ‘to fear’ in this phrase means to acknowledge the superior worth and power of the Lord, and thus to avoid provoking God's anger and desire for satisfaction through some deed which shows slight regard for God's requirements” (deSilva 1995, 72). God is the ultimate “significant other” before whose eyes one lives at all times, the one whose approval can be gained only by sincerity in righteous living (Prov 5:21; 15:3), and whose disapproval represents grave threat. Thus the tradents of Proverbs urge students to honor God with the appropriate tithes so that their harvests will enjoy God's favor (Prov 3:9-10), to avoid the deviousness in human relationships that shows contempt for God (Prov 14:2; see also Prov 8:13). In particular, those whose social status gives them little “weight” or esteem are to be treated honorably and justly (i.e., according to the commandments), for God’s honor is provoked by the person who fails to show love for neighbor, whether rich or poor (Prov 14:31; 17:5). If one encounters adverse circumstances as a result of not walking in line with the commandments, the wise person will respond by repenting, making amends and conforming more fully to God’s decrees rather than “despise the LORD’s discipline” (Prov 3:11-12), though the book of *Job (among other texts) illustrates that *suffering is not always the result of sin.

As the reflection of God’s requirements, respect for the Torah (i.e., observance of its statutes) is essential for honor, both for the individual (Prov 13:13) and for the nation (Prov 14:34). Similarly, and perhaps because instruction in Torah is vitally connected with the instruction received in the household, respect for the instruction of parents marks the honorable person (Prov 15:5; 23:22). The parent-child relationship seems to be especially hemmed in with shame sanctions, protecting parents from injury or insult from those they have benefited either directly (Prov 19:26; 30:17) or indirectly through the shameful actions of their progeny (Prov 10:5; 15:20; 28:7). Where such sanctions are observed, generations become sources of mutual honor to one another (Prov 17:6). Proverbs also exhibits the general elevation of honorable old age as the pinnacle of life to be esteemed by others, a trademark of traditional cultures, rather than as its waning and nadir (Prov 16:31).

Contrary to modern constructions of honor in Mediterranean societies (rightly, Domeris, 96), where humility has a negative value and aggressive self-promotion is presented as the (male) norm (Pitt-Rivers, 43), Proverbs cultivates humility as a core value rather than nurturing a boastful honor/shame culture (Prov 11:2; see also Ps 5:5; 18:27; 113:7-8; 138:6). The wise person exercises restraint in honor-seeking (Prov 25:27), avoids self-promoting speech and behaviors (Prov 25:6-7; 27:2; 30:32), and regards with caution the experience of being praised, seeing it as a test of character (Prov 27:21). However, it is not entirely the case that “humility takes priority over honour” (Domeris, 96), since Proverbs promotes humility (especially in regard to conformity to the group’s norms as embodied in Torah) as the path toward honor, thus making it valuable precisely because it leads to honor (Prov 15:33; 29:23).

A contemptuous attitude, haughtiness and scoffing (i.e., making light of something and thereby showing a lack of esteem) are traits that alienate a person from God and lead with certainty to a humiliating downfall (Prov 3:34; 8:13; 11:2; 16:5, 18; 18:12; 21:4, 24; see also Ps 10:4; 18:27; 94:2, 4). This stance of scoffing probably includes disregard for the ancestral tradition of Israel, resistance to submitting to Torah and to the instruction of parents, elders and the like. It is the antithesis of delighting in the law of the Lord and submitting to its authority as a pattern for living (as in Ps 1:1-3). Humility, as the antithesis to innovative self-direction, represents a virtue by means of which one finds favor with God and honor before people (Prov 3:34; 15:33; 18:12; 29:23).

Humility is especially required in the face of constructive criticism. The collection gives disproportionate attention to disarming the tendency to regard a rebuke as a verbal honor challenge to be rebuffed (Prov 5:11-12; 6:23; 9:7-8; 10:17; 12:1; 13:1, 18; 15:10, 32). According to the agonistic model of challenge and riposte (Malina and Neyrey), a reproof or word of correction could be viewed as a challenge to honor, evoking a response calculated to deflect the challenge and restore honor in the public eye. In the collection of Proverbs, however, this is only the response of the “scoffer” (Prov 9:7-8; 13:1), who would reject correction from Wisdom’s own lips (Prov 1:30). Since honor is essentially derived from obedience to God’s Torah, a rebuke from another person “calculated to bring one into closer conformity with the law becomes an opportunity for honor,” which is thereby preserved and augmented not by rebuffing a rebuke but rather by embracing it (deSilva 1995, 75). It becomes an opportunity truly to embody the group’s norms more fully and thus possess greater and more genuine honor.

By extension, the wise person neither retorts every insult nor engages every challenge to his or her honor (Prov 19:11). That is the strategy of the “fool” (Prov 12:16). Although “one of the most prevalent impulses for people who have been shamed is the need to take revenge for their humiliation,” thus to steal back their honor from the person who stole it in the first place (Bechtel, 50), the idea of offering a riposte or counterchallenge to every challenge—part of the paradigm of the “honor-sensitive Mediterranean person” developed in cultural anthropology—was not uniformly regarded as the best defense of one’s honor. Or, more precisely, the traditions of Proverbs favored the response of “no response” as the most effective way to deal with verbal assaults on one’s honor. Again contrary to the paradigm, Proverbs advises against returning injury for injury as a means of restoring one’s affronted honor in the public eye: “Do not say, ‘I will do to others as they have done to me; I will pay them back for what they have done’” (Prov 24:29). As a precursor to the Golden Rule, we thus find a progression in the literature of the Jewish culture out of a challenge-riposte system, where one’s actions can be provoked, to a posture of beneficence, acting generously toward others as a means of establishing one’s nobility and being “above” such challenges (see Mt 5:44-48; Rom 12:17, 21; 1 Pet 3:9).

Proverbs gives scant attention to the particular topic of women in regard to honor and shame when set against, for example, the later collection of wisdom sayings and instructions in Sirach* (see Sir 26:10-16; 42:9-12). A wife can be a source of honor or shame to her husband (Prov 11:4), though we are not told how. A woman who “hates virtue” falls into disgrace (Prov 11:16), but again, “virtue” is left rather unspecified. It might be a mistake to assume from later discussions of female “virtue” (i.e., those available in Sirach or in Greco-Roman ethicists) that these Proverbs have the woman’s sexual discretion primarily in view.

The collection has much more to say about the positive side of this equation, namely, how “a gracious woman gets honor” (Prov 11:16), particularly in the renowned description of the good wife in Proverbs 31:10-31. This wife exercises diligence and excellence in household management, providing for the needs of the household (including the neighborhood poor), preserving and extending the wealth and resources of the household and its productivity (e.g., in terms of increasing its arable land). Here, indeed, we do not find the stereotype of a woman “ruled by an acute sense of shame, . . . bounded by the confines of her domestic prison” (Domeris, 97). A woman’s circles of praise begin within her family (Prov 31:28-30) but extend to the public spaces presumably reserved for men: “Let her works praise her in the city gates” (Prov 31:31). This stands in stark contrast to the Greek sentiment that she is most honorable “of whom the least is said in public, whether of praise or of blame” (Thucydides The Peloponnesian War 2.45.2).

Taken as a whole, Proverbs presents further evidence against taking honor and shame to be the only, or even primary, concern of the circles that produced and read this Wisdom literature. Many of the proverbs rest on the contrast between wealth and want rather than renown and disgrace. Sometimes “a good name is to be chosen rather than great riches” (Prov 22:1), but on the other hand, it is “better to be despised and have a servant than to be self-important and lack food” (Prov 12:9). The latter proverb elevates sufficiency for one’s daily needs above (hollow?) pride (Domeris, 96). Purity and pollution sanctions are also at play (“abomination” is as potent a negative value as “shameful” [Prov 16:12; 17:15]), as are considerations of finding what is “pleasant” in life (e.g., Prov 17:1), as well as, quite frequently, considerations of what leads to a safe and secure enjoyment of life’s goods as opposed to danger (deSilva 1995, 69-70). In regard to the latter, Proverbs 14:35 provides an interesting example of the topic of safety actually functioning as the sanction for honorable behavior (making “safety” the primary value in that maxim). Although “honor” is prominent among the benefits of attaining wisdom, it stands squarely alongside all of life’s other goods (chiefly, sufficiency and security in a long life [Prov 3:13-16; 4:8-9; 8:18]). As Proverbs 25:27 cautions restraint in honor seeking, so too the rhetoric of Proverbs as a whole (i.e., the variety of topics employed to promote particular behaviors) cautions readers to exercise the same restraint when seeking for “honor” in the texts.

3.2. Ecclesiastes. Qohelet* is more directly critical of an overly acute interest in acquiring “honor” or seeking precedence as a driving force in life. He presents himself as a person who had played the honor game well, with the result that he “became great and surpassed all who were before me in Jerusalem.” He reports, however, that such claims to precedence over predecessors and contemporaries in terms of the attainment of greater wisdom and knowledge (Eccles 1:16) or greater possessions and visible displays of wealth and “weight” (Eccles 2:7) turned out to be “vanity” and “a chasing after wind” (Eccles 1:17; 2:11), labor without profit.

The highly contested goods of “wealth, possessions and honor” are vulnerable, not lasting. They may carry the promise of (or potential for) happiness, but not happiness itself. Thus, to seek them as one’s goal is to miss out on life—the enjoyment of the toil and the fruits at hand (Eccles 6:2). Moreover, “honor” is unreliable. It is often bestowed upon the wicked, who used their precedence to another’s hurt (Eccles 8:9-10), such that praise and censure are, again, not consistently granted in line with the values officially espoused by the tradition. Honor is not reliably manifested in social status: fools can be elevated to positions of honor, while the wealthy are abased (Eccles 10:6-7). And the promise of lasting fame also proves to be empty, for “even the remembrance of the dead is lost” (Eccles 9:5; see also Eccles 4:15-16; 9:15). When Qohelet recites the proverb “A good reputation is better than the finest luxuries” (Eccles 7:1), where “reputation” or “name” (šēm) refers to the reputation that survives after one’s death, he may be doing so to subtly challenge this view by means of a reductio ad absurdum (Seow, 234). If one’s reputation is really better than enjoying life, then “the day of death is better than the day of birth” (Eccles 7:2) (see Seow, 244). Although he advocates facing death as a means of coming to sober terms with what is worth pursuing in this life, he certainly does not advocate “living” for death and for the vapid fame that is supposed to confer a limited immortality.

The only positive note concerns the pleasure that he found in the toil itself, not the pleasure anticipated in the achievement of precedence (Eccles 2:10). From this he derives the maxim that will become the leitmotif of the whole work: People should “eat and drink, and find enjoyment in their toil” (Eccles 2:24; see also Eccles 3:12-13; 5:18; 8:15; 9:7-10), which is God’s gift (Eccles 2:24) and the “lot” of human beings (Eccles 3:22; 5:18), rather than waste life in the pursuit of the “loftier” goals that consume others, just as they previously consumed Qohelet. In light of the unreliability of grants of honor reflecting a person’s true character, the fleeting nature of honor and fame, and the hollowness of the attainment of such a vapid “good,” honoring God—living in the reverence/fear of God—is the only honor quest that is ultimately affirmed (Eccles 12:13), since God is the only Other who will reliably and unfailingly hold virtue and iniquity accountable (Eccles 12:14).

4. Honor Challenges in Esther and Job.

*Esther and Job relate encounters in which the push and pull of honor challenges and ripostes, the virulent vying for precedence, and visible and physical representations of honor status—all stereotypical feature of constructs of the “ancient Mediterranean person” (Pitt-Rivers; Malina and Neyrey)—are in fact strongly evidenced. Indeed, the honor challenge and riposte/counterchallenge can be seen to drive the plot of both works.

4.1. Esther. Esther is perhaps the most conventional of the “five scrolls” (see Megillot and Festivals) in terms of its display of honor-and-shame scripts, and the manifestation and observance of the hierarchy of honor is a consistent theme. The book opens with descriptions of a display by King *Ahasuerus of wealth and largesse in opulent, extended banquets (Esther 1:2-8), a public manifestation of his “weight” and power and honor (Laniak, 167) that reinforces his position at the top of the hierarchy of honor in the kingdom. An act of disobedience to the king by *Vashti—even though his command appears to have threatened to diminish her honor by bringing her out for public display rather than allowing her modestly to remain in the women’s chambers with the other female residents of the palace (Klein, 155)—threatens the hierarchy of honor within the household, “causing [all wives] to look with contempt on their husbands” (Esther 1:17). The resulting decree, for which the demotion and banishment of Vashti was to serve as a negative example, commands that “all women will give honor to their husbands, high and low alike” (Esther 1:20). No matter how humble a man might be, he should at least be able to count on being honored, and thus obeyed, by his own wife! Thus the “solution” to Vashti’s act of disobedience says far more than is required by the narrative plot, which only necessitates the removal of Vashti to make room for Esther. There is even a hierarchy within the harem, with Esther and her attendants finding favor with the eunuch in charge of the harem and being advanced “to the best place” (Esther 2:9).

The hierarchy that drives the plot forward, however, is the rigid hierarchy among courtiers, embodied in the extreme in the promotion of Haman and the command that all other courtiers do obeisance to Haman by bowing before him, physically representing their relative status upon each encounter (Esther 3:2). *Mordecai refuses to bow down to Haman, thus refusing to acknowledge the status that had been conferred upon Haman by the king, and this constitutes a challenge to Haman's honor. We are not given a reason for Mordecai's resistance other than the fact that Mordecai is a Jew (Esther 3:4). The cause might well be the ancient enmity between Jews and the Amalekites (Klein, 161), which is now rekindled in the action of the story that follows. (The highly theological Greek Esther [see Esther 5: Greek Versions], however, attributes it to Mordecai's piety: he would not bestow on any human being the honors that belong to God alone [Add Esth 13:8-17].) Haman perceives the challenge (Esther 3:5), but his plan for answering it exceeds all bounds. Securing Mordecai's demise alone would be "beneath him" (Esther 3:6). His estimation of the immensity of his honor is such that he believes that only genocide would constitute a sufficient riposte. Here, of course, Haman's sense of honor has crossed the line into the hubris that God opposes, and his downfall is from this point inevitable.

The challenge to Haman's honor is kept ever fresh in his eyes, and in the awareness of the readers, by the presence and behavior of Mordecai. Haman returns from being honored (as he supposes) by the queen's entertainment at a private dinner along with Ahasuerus, but the sight of Mordecai at the king's gate, refusing even to rise to acknowledge Haman, immediately causes him to forget the honors bestowed on him and to stew over not yet being avenged on Mordecai and his people (Esther 5:9-13). Haman's inner mortification is complete when he is selected by Ahasuerus to carry out for Mordecai's benefit the elaborate plan that Haman had devised for the king to show honor to a deserving courtier (thinking that this would be himself). Haman must go on foot, leading Mordecai on horseback and decked in the finest robes, drawing public attention with his own lips to the honor being bestowed on Mordecai (Esther 6:6-10) while he himself is being shamed before his rival (Klein, 167). Haman's wife recognizes this as the beginning of her husband's downfall (Esther 6:13), for instead of putting Mordecai in his place, as it were, he has personally enacted Mordecai's superior status to himself. Haman leaves the second banquet with Esther under quite different circumstances than the first: his face is covered (a shame ritual according to Laniak, 168; but note Klein, 169: "Haman's right to sight of forbidden [female] spaces is revoked"), and he is led to be hung out on the gallows that he constructed for Mordecai, there to be publicly displayed and disgraced (Esther 7:8-10). Later, the bodies of his ten sons would be hung up as well, completing the downfall and shaming of the whole household (Esther 9:13-14) (see Klein, 173).

Mordecai's star, on the other hand, continues to rise: he becomes an increasingly powerful person in the king's court and his fame spreads throughout all the provinces (Esther 9:4); he ends the story as "next in rank to King Ahasuerus," with his fame forever recorded "in the annals of the kings of Media and Persia" (Esther 10:2-3). All the honor that was lost by Haman is soaked up, as it were, by his rival Mordecai, confirming the way in which an agonistic culture such as the one displayed in Esther is also one in which honor is regarded as available only in limited quantities (indeed, the latter understanding almost necessitates the competitive orientation to the acquisition of honor).

4.2. Job. Although the cosmic powers and their testing of Job set the stage for the dialogue portions of the book, the speeches themselves are driven by an underlying series of honor challenges and ripostes between Job, his "friends" and the upstart Elihu. It is not just that Bildad, Eliphaz, and Zophar are poor pastoral counselors; they are taking advantage of Job's humiliation to "raise their own status and esteem by 'putting Job down' and treating him as an inferior" (Bechtel, 73). Job's "friends" use shaming to "break" Job (Bechtel, 73), to get him to abandon his position of *righteousness, and to admit that he needs to follow the instruction of his "friends" and confess and repent of the sins that brought him down to the disgraceful condition in which he finds himself (Job 11:3-6). Their attempts at "rehabilitation" are also attempts to gain precedence over Job by establishing themselves as his teachers.

Eliphaz rightly surmises that his speech will be perceived as a challenge that would provoke offense (Job 4:1). He challenges Job with not being able to live up to his own teaching (Job 4:2-5) and thus calls into question his right to have posed as a teacher all these years. He indirectly suggests that Job has been a "fool" (a senseless sinner), for his children have suffered the same fate as the fool's children, who "are crushed in the gate” (Job 5:3-4). He uses a familiar proverb to interpret Job’s sufferings as God’s “discipline,” calling Job to accept it, seek the needed correction of life, and so fall back in line with honorable behavior (Job 5:17; cf. Prov 3:11). Eliphaz concludes with a triumphal declaration that what he has already tested and found to be true, Job has yet to come to learn (and that, from Eliphaz’s lips [Job 5:27]).

It is no wonder that Job counterchallenges Eliphaz with a proverb: “Those who withhold kindness from a friend forsake the fear of the Almighty” (Job 6:14). He rejects Eliphaz’s rebuke as empty and invites him to try again with more substance next time (Job 6:24-26). Job must defend his status as a man learned in the wisdom of the Jewish tradition in the face of the implied rebukes concerning his lack of wisdom: “What you know, I also know; I am not inferior to you” (Job 13:2). In the push and shove over which person in the circle truly has the right to teach, Eliphaz will return the same defense: “What do you know that we do not know? What do you understand that is not clear to us?” (Job 15:9). None of the characters exhibits the humility before a rebuke that is commended so frequently in Proverbs!

Repeatedly, Job laments the assaults upon his honor that he endures in the speech of his “friends” (Job 12:4-5; 16:4, 20; 17:2, 6; 19:3, 5-6), which amounts simply to ongoing mocking (Job 21:3) on top of the degradation of which he is so intensely aware (Job 9:15; 19:9). He understands that they are engaging him in an attempt to secure their status over him, “magnifying” themselves against him (Job 19:5). This is behavior in which Job himself claims never to have engaged (Job 31:29). His interlocutors, in turn, regard his speech as insulting censure and respond accordingly (Job 20:3).

Job wistfully remembers the honor he used to be shown—notably, symbolized by his juniors withdrawing and the elders rising out of respect and, most of all, by people keeping silent in his presence, waiting for his counsel (Job 29:2-10, 21). His “friends,” no doubt, were formerly in that number. Now the situation is reversed. Job’s juniors and social inferiors mock him, taunt him, even spit at the sight of him (Job 30:1, 9-10). Job’s “honor is pursued as by the wind” (Job 30:15) now that he has suffered a reversal and his status appears to be “up for grabs,” to be absorbed by those who successfully challenge him while he is down. This shaming is all the more painful because it is offered by “people of lower social status who should have honored him simply because of his higher status” (Bechtel, 73-74) (Job 30:1). With the evidence of that status gone (progeny, wealth, physical health, strength), these honor vultures participated in inscribing a new, lower status upon him with their speech and physical affronts.

The reader is unprepared for the voice of the fifth speaker in this dialogue, who has not been hitherto introduced. Elihu’s silence up to this point, however, is a manifestation of the same respect-as-silence that Job remembered being shown to him (Job 29:21). Elihu waits to speak until his three elders are finished with their attempts (Job 32:4), but he also sees the failure of the older three friends as his opportunity to gain honor at their expense: “It is not the old that are wise. . . . See, I waited for your words, I listened for your wise sayings, while you searched out what to say” (Job 32:9, 11). Elihu makes explicit the “honor contest” inherent in the dialogue. There will be a winner and a loser in this debate. The one who ends up “teaching” the other establishes his precedence over the other (Job 33:31-33), and Elihu is confident that he will be the one who comes out on top, teaching Job wisdom (Job 33:33), besting the elder three counselors (Job 32:11-12, 15-16), and proving true his haughty claim to be “perfect in knowledge” (Job 36:4).

It is God who resolves this cacophonous clamor of challenges and counterchallenges. God himself puts Elihu in his place (Job 38:2), ironically demonstrating Elihu’s closing assertion that God “does not regard any who are wise in their own conceit” (Job 37:24). God also reproves the three counselors, putting them “in their place” once again below Job, on whose mediation they depend for their repentance (Job 42:7-9). But God must also put Job in his place for being willing to presume to put God on the defensive in his attempt to establish his own righteousness (and thus the injustice of his circumstances), the end of which is that Job too understands the humility that mortals must have before God (Job 42:5-6). Job shows God the same respect that princes used to show Job: “I lay my hand on my mouth” (Job 40:4).

5. Song of Songs, Ruth and the Honorable Woman.

Several texts besides Proverbs challenge the stereotypical view of female “shame” (in the positive sense of “modesty”), according to which “honorable” women refrain from all extramarital sexual encounters, remain more or less hidden from the public eye by staying within domestic spaces, and conduct themselves in a manner that shows them to be more concerned with maintaining their sexual purity than attracting a mate (see Marriage and Sex).

5.1. Song of Songs. The Shulammitte woman, the heroine of Song of Songs, strains against this stereotype (Bergant), though to what degree is a matter of some dispute. Song of Songs 3:1-4 presents the reader with the astounding scene of a woman looking for her lover in her bed and, not finding him, roaming the streets at night looking for him and leading him back to her mother’s bedchamber. In another scene, the woman’s lover comes to her chamber at night, provoking both anxiety and desire, and the language drips with sexual double-entendres (Song 5:2-6a). The lover mysteriously disappears by the time she unlatches her bedroom door to admit him, so she roams the streets (again) looking for him, exposing herself to risk and, in fact, this time being abused by the sentinels (Song 5:6b-7). Such behavior would run sensationally counter to the ancient construction of the “honorable” woman (see, e.g., deSilva 2000b), although this “ideal” is based on texts from the Greek and Roman periods. While we observe in Proverbs a far greater degree of engagement with the day-to-day life of the outside world, such engagement with the “night life”—behavior as fitting for a prostitute—is quite unprecedented among descriptions of “honorable” women.

The solution hinges in part on whether one regards the second scene (Song 5:2-7) as the report of the actual nocturnal activity of the woman and her lover (so Bergant, 28, 31) or as a dream, as the introductory sentence would suggest: “I slept, but my heart was awake” (Song 5:1). The latter seems the more likely, given the explicit introduction, the absence of any transitional mention of waking, and the nightmarish transition from rapturous fantasy to being chased and beaten by the sentinels. If this is the case, then Song of Songs does not furnish evidence of a setting in which a young maiden’s bedroom is really so easily accessible to a paramour at night, nor in which a woman’s amorous desire is really not limited by social expectations (contra Bergant, 28, 31). And if the second scene was but a dream, and nothing more, was she also dreaming the first time, when she was again “upon [her] bed at night” looking for her lover (Song 3:1)? The fact that in this scene the woman is able to lead her lover into her mother’s bedchamber (Song 3:4), while later she will lament that social pressures prevent her from doing this very thing (Song 8:1-2a), suggests that we have again a view into the sexual desire of the woman as it would wish to be expressed, not as it could be expressed in her setting.

Toward the close of Song of Songs one finds several important indications that the “rules” are not really “off” in the world of these lovers. First, the woman expresses a longing to transcend the restrictions of the culture around her, wishing that her lover was her brother so she could kiss him in public (and take him home with her!) without her being despised—that is, regarded as shameless and immodest (Song 8:1-3). This is more than a “reference to public opinion” that nevertheless does not limit the woman’s amorous activity (Bergant, 35); it is an admission that “public opinion” really does keep her from doing in the day what she dreams of doing at night.

Second, there is a band of brothers who speak about what they will do to reinforce their sister’s honor (Song 8:8-9): whether she proves to be a “wall” or a “door,” the brothers are going to be watching out for her virginity and the family honor. In regard to the issue of patriarchal concern with the chastity of women, it is noteworthy that such concern is so diminished here (Bergant, 36), being evidenced only in this passage, as opposed to what one finds in, for example, Sirach centuries later. The woman also indeed rejects her brothers’ assessment of her immaturity. They see her as not having blossomed (Song 8:8); she asserts that she is “full-figured” (Song 8:10) (Bergant, 28), though it is impossible to tell whose assessment is closer to the truth (“coming of age” is a complex matter). There is, however, little waking evidence to justify the claim that she “spurns the oversight of her brothers” (Bergant, 34). Her concluding declaration that she was, in fact, a “wall” (Song 8:10) may indicate that despite the fervor of her desire, she preserved her chastity until she was properly married.

Song of Songs gives eloquent expression to the difficulty of social norms and sanctions containing the power of sexual desire and love. In some passages significant boundaries appear to be crossed; in others significant boundaries are obstacles that the woman wishes could be surmounted, but cannot. Even in fantasy or in the world of dreams the crossing of boundaries leads to the suppression of socially disapproved female activity, embodied in the character of the watchmen who beat the woman. Perhaps it is safest to say that Song of Songs shows the interior, passionate life of a lover who wishes that she could live out in the open the desires that she feels burning within her, but who must, like all “honorable” women, learn instead to tame them and conform to the expectations of her society.

5.2. Ruth. In the book of *Ruth the values of honor and shame are not as prominent as in the other texts. Again, we see a woman who challenges both ancient ethical and modern anthropological constructs of the “modest, chaste woman.” She goes out by night, unescorted, in her most fetching outfit in order to lie down next to a man who is not her husband, uncovering, most likely, his genitals (Bechtel, 60; Phillips, 14), and then to suggest that they get married (Ruth 3:7-9). Here, it is in fact true that there is no word of reproach for Ruth’s behavior (Bergant, 34). Indeed, she receives high praise for her actions from *Boaz, who speaks of her loyalty and her good reputation in the village (Ruth 3:10-13). He takes precautions that no one see her leaving (Ruth 3:14), which would compromise her reputation (and perhaps his own), even as he had earlier that summer sought to protect Ruth from the experience of dishonor from the reproaches of his foremen (Ruth 2:15-16). The village women congratulate *Naomi after Ruth gives birth and express the wish that the child’s “name be renowned in Israel” (Ruth 4:14), a wish for lasting honor that comes true, for the child would be known forever as the grandfather of King *David (Ruth 4:17, 22; Mt 1:5-6; Luke 3:32).

In a provocative and persuasive article A. Phillips suggests that the following honor-shame scenarios are operative in the story of Ruth. Naomi uses deceit to spur her slow kinsman Boaz to “do the right thing.” By sending Ruth to him at night, after he has consumed adequate amounts of food and drink, Naomi makes Boaz think it possible that he has in fact slept with Ruth. Because he has had sufficient wine, he is not surprised that he cannot remember the details. But the evidence—a woman in whom he has been interested is lying at his exposed genitals—seems clear enough. His own honor is on the line. If he does nothing, and Ruth ends up pregnant, all fingers will be pointing to him, given the special attention and consideration that he has shown to Ruth all summer long. Further, if he jumps now to accept the responsibility of levirate marriage (see Kinsman-Redeemer and Levirate), and Ruth ends up pregnant suspiciously soon, all fingers will again be pointing to him. Boaz, therefore, also uses the strategy of deceit to save his own honor. He raises the heretofore unmentioned issue of property redemption to the unnamed next-of-kin, as if that were the primary issue, to throw the community off the scent. Of course, he expected this man to refuse the attractive offer of acquiring land when it was paired with the financially unattractive corollary of performing the duties of levirate marriage. So Boaz is able to save his honor and, indeed, augment it by nobly “doing the right thing” in line with an onerous prescription of Torah, and Naomi has achieved, against all odds, the preservation of her deceased husband’s “name” in Israel.

6. Conclusion.

Study of the use of “honor and shame” language in this literature raises many cautions concerning the overly enthusiastic application of models of honor and shame, whether drawn from modern cultural anthropology or even constructed on the basis of ancient texts. Although the social interaction known as the “challenge-riposte” is certainly evidenced in these texts (most notably in Esther and Job), it is also criticized as, in many instances, an inappropriate response to a rebuke from which the recipient ought rather to learn or at least not respond in kind (Proverbs). Although concern for the preservation of honor and avoidance of disgrace is passionately evidenced (Psalms and Proverbs, among others), honor and shame are by no means the only driving considerations in a person’s life, standing alongside many other “goods” worth pursuing and possessing (see esp. Proverbs and Ecclesiastes). Most strikingly, perhaps, these texts provide evidence that strongly cautions against the indiscriminate application of later stereotypes of female “shame” and proper female behavior (particularly, being limited to private spaces and embodying passivity in regard to the action of males or the male sphere). Modesty and preservation of sexual purity may not, in the end, be challenged by Song of Songs, but the image of the “honorable” woman keeping to the inside rooms of the house, remaining invisible in an allegedly male sphere, and passively awaiting male initiative is strongly challenged by the behavior of Ruth and of the “good wife” of Proverbs, whose industry and labor is known and celebrated in the places where men sit.

See also FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. M. Bechtel, “Shame as a Sanction of Social Control in Biblical Israel: Judicial, Political and Social Shaming,” JSOT 49 (1991) 47-76; D. Bergant, “‘My Beloved Is Mine and I Am His’ (Song 2:16): The Song of Songs and Honor and Shame,” Semeia 68 (1994) 23-40; D. A. deSilva, “Proverbs,” in Despising Shame: Honor Discourse and Community Maintenance in the Epistle to the Hebrews (SBLDS 152; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995) 69-77; idem, “Honor and Shame,” DNTB 518-22; idem, Honor, Patronage, Kinship, and Purity: Unlocking New Testament Culture (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000b); idem, “Honor and Shame,” DOTP 431-36; W. R. Domeris, “Shame and Honour in Proverbs: Wise Women and Foolish Men,” OTE 8 (1995) 86-102; T. Frymer-Kensky, “Virginité in the Bible,” in Gender and Law in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East, ed. V. H. Matthews, B. M. Levinson, and T. Frymer-Kensky (JSOTSup 262; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 79-96; D. A. Glatt-Gilad, “Yahweh’s Honor at Stake: A Divine Conundrum,” JSOT 98 (2002) 63-74; A. C. Hagedorn, “Honor and Shame,” DOTHB 497-501; K. C. Hanson, “How Honorable! How Shameful! A Cultural Analysis of Matthew’s Makarisms and Reproaches,” Semeia 68 (1996) 81-111; L. R. Klein, “Honor and Shame in Esther,” in A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susanna, ed. Athalya Brenner (FCB 7; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 149-75; T. Laniak, Shame and Honor in the Book of Esther (SBLDS 165; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1998); B. J. Malina and J. H. Neyrey, “Honor and Shame in Luke-Acts: Pivotal Values of the Mediterranean World,” in The Social World of Luke-Acts: Models for Interpretation, ed. J. H. Neyrey (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991) 25-66; S. M. Olyan, “Honor, Shame, and Covenant Relations in Ancient Israel and Its Environment,” JBL 115 (1996) 201-18; A. Phillips, “The Book of Ruth—Deception and Shame,” JJS 37 (1986) 1-17; J. Pitt-Rivers, “Honour and Social Status,” in Honour and Shame: The Values of Mediterranean Society, ed. John G. Peristiany (London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1965) 21-77; R. Ra-bichev, “The Mediterranean Concepts of Honour and Shame as Seen in the Depiction of the Biblical Women,” RT 3 (1996) 51-63; C. L. Seow, Ecclesiastes (AB 18C; New York: Doubleday, 1997).

D. A. deSilva

HOUSE. See ARCHITECTURE.

HUMANITY. See WISDOM THEOLOGY.

HYMNS

The hymn is a song of praise. Even though the hymn is not the most frequent type of psalm in the book of *Psalms, and even though the noun tēhillā (“song of praise”) occurs in the title of only one psalm (Ps 145), the fact that the ancients named the whole collection of psalms “Praises” (tēhillim) indicates the importance of the hymn for the theology of the book of Psalms (Collins). C. Westermann (1981) was the first to note that while the *lament is more frequent than the hymn, lamentation is more characteristic of the earlier portion of the Psalter, while praise dominates the end (note the recurring “Praise [halēlū] the LORD” at the beginning and end of each of Pss 146—150 and the eleven additional uses of the verb “praise” [hālāl] in Ps 150). This movement from lamentation to praise articulates the hope of the psalms, a hope that is captured by the language of Psalm 30:5: “Weeping may go on all night, but joy comes in the morning.” The hymn is the quintessential song of praise and captures the heart of Psalms: God’s glory is our destiny.

1. The Place of the Hymn
2. The Praise of the Hymn
3. The Structure of the Hymn
4. The Content of the Hymn
5. The Use of the Hymn

1. The Place of the Hymn.

Scholars agree that the book of Psalms contains three primary genres: the hymn, the lament, and the *thanksgiving psalm. W. Brueggemann has referred to these three as songs of orientation, disorientation and reorientation. By using these labels, Brueggemann articulates something fundamental about how the three primary genres relate to each other and how they relate to the ebb and flow of life.

Hymns were composed for times when all is well. They are songs for those trouble-free times in life, times when life is well ordered, well oriented. Life is not, however, always experienced as well ordered or well oriented. “Disorientation” better describes life at times. The laments were written for situations such as these. The time eventually comes, however, when one looks back at those troublesome days and says to God, “You have turned my mourning into joyful dancing. You have taken away my clothes of mourning and clothed me with joy” (Ps 30:11 NLT). The songs of thanksgiving were composed to express joy and gratitude to God for such restoration. Over time the memory of the troublesome days grows dim, life is well ordered once again, and the hymn is sung to celebrate the goodness of God in the goodness of life.

2. The Praise of the Hymn.

Although the praise of God is found in a number of genres, the hymn is the primary vehicle of praise in the book of Psalms (Merrill; see also Westermann 1981). The noun tēhillā (“praise”) occurs in the title only of Psalm 145, which is itself a hymn.

2.1. Praise as an Exclamation. The book of Psalms uses “Praise the LORD” on a limited basis as an exclamation. The Hebrew expression halēlū yāh (“praise the LORD”), from which the English exclamation “Hallelujah!” is derived, occurs twenty-three times in the book of Psalms and nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible. A number of modern translations rightly render this phrase as an exclamation rather than as a command/imperative (contra Merrill and the NIV; see ESV, NAB, NASB, NLT, NRSV). The exclamatory nature of halēlū yāh can be supported by two lines of argument. First, the phrase halēlū yāh is consistently used absolutely and only as an opening or closing expression (except in the case of Ps 135:3). This distinguishes halēlū yāh from an expression such as halēlūhū (“praise him”), which always has some sort of clause or phrase attached (see the multiple examples in Ps 150). Second, the LXX is consistent in not translating halēlū yāh but in transliterating it as allēlouia (Westermann, TLOT 1.371-76). Again, this distinguishes halēlū yāh from expressions such as halēlūhū, which the LXX regularly translates with the imperative aineite (“praise”). The LXX translates the exceptional Psalm 135:3 with the imperative aineite (“praise”), showing that it correctly understood this one instance as a command/imperative and not an exclamation.

2.2. Praise as a Command. Most of the time, however, the imperatives of hālal (“praise”) and its synonyms, bārak (“bless”), gādal (“magnify”), yādā (“give thanks”), kābēd (“glorify”) and sābah (“praise”), are commands and not exclamations. As commands, these imperatives require a response. The response looked for is not the use of the exclamation “Praise the Lord!” but is the acknowledging and confessing of God’s attributes and actions (Brueggemann; Clifford; Futato 2002). To praise is to acknowledge who God is and what God has done and, in so doing, to render honor and glory to God as the object of praise. Psalm 134:1-3 comes the closest to providing a definition of “praise” when *David says, “I will praise the LORD at all times. . . . Come, let us tell of the LORD’s greatness.” To praise the Lord is to tell of his greatness by reciting his attributes and actions. Psalm 103:1-8 is an example, where the psalmist praises (bārak) God by confessing God’s actions (forgives, heals, redeems, crowns, satisfies) and his attributes (compassionate, gracious, patient, loving).

3. The Structure of the Hymn.

The hymn typically falls into three sections (Estes). The hymn begins by inviting others in the community or beyond to join the psalmist in praising God. The central section delineates the praiseworthy character and actions of God and thereby provides the content or reasons or motivation for praising God. The hymn concludes on a positive note that is usually something like an affirmation of faith or an invitation to continue the praise and *worship of God forever. Psalm 117, the shortest in the Psalter, provides a clear and concise example.

- [1] Praise the LORD, all you nations.
Praise him, all you people of the earth.
- [2] For he loves us with unfailing love;
the LORD’s faithfulness endures forever.
- [3] Praise the LORD! (NLT)

4. The Content of the Hymn.

In a word, the content of the hymn is praise. This can be unpacked by examining how praise fills each of the three sections of the hymn.

4.1. The Invitation to Praise. The hymns ultimately invite the entire universe to praise the Lord. On the smallest scale, however, David, in Psalm 103:1-2, invites himself to praise the Lord.

Praise the LORD, I tell myself; with my whole heart, I will praise his holy name.
Praise the LORD, I tell myself, and never forget the good things he does for me. (NLT, 1st ed.)

Sometimes the psalmist broadens the invitation to include the priests and Levites, as Psalm 135:19b-20a.

O house of Aaron, praise the LORD;
O house of Levi, praise the LORD. (NIV)

Sometimes the invitation also goes to the entire congregation of Israel, as in Psalm 118:1-2.

Give thanks to the LORD, for is good!
His faithful love endures forever.
Let the congregation of Israel repeat:
“His faithful love endures forever.” (NLT, 1st ed.)

At other times the psalmist expands the invitation even further to include all the nations, as in Psalm 117:1.

Praise the LORD, all you nations.
Praise him, all you people of the earth. (NLT)

A few times, Psalm 29:1-2 being one (see also Ps 103:20-21), the psalmist transcends the earth to enlist the angels of heaven in the praise of God.

Give honor to the LORD, you angels; give honor to the LORD for his glory and strength. (NLT, 1st ed.)

In unmatched exuberance Psalm 148 calls the whole created realm to join the chorus. Psalm 148:1-6 invites the heavens and its countless hosts to praise the Lord: “Praise the LORD from the heavens” (Ps 148:1). Then Psalm 148:7-14 summons every part of the earth, animate and inanimate, to praise God, who has created and maintains the world: “Praise the LORD from the earth” (Ps 148:7). Psalm 148:13 captures the whole as well as any one verse can.

Let them all praise the name of the LORD.
For his name is very great;

his glory towers over the earth and heaven!
(NLT)

4.2. The Content of Praise. The central section of the hymn provides the content or reasons or motivation for praising God. Here the psalmist expresses the substance of praise by reciting God’s attributes and actions. This section typically takes up most of the space in the hymn and brings a variety of themes into focus. Psalmists often introduce these themes with the Hebrew word kî, which can be translated “for” or “because.” Recall Psalm 117 as an example: “Praise the LORD. . . . For [kî] great is his love toward us” (NIV).

Most of the hymns fall into one of three sub-genres: hymns of divine kingship (see Kingship Psalms), hymns of creation, or hymns of redemption (Coogan). The hymns of divine kingship celebrate the Lord’s rule over heaven and earth. One example is Psalm 29, which ends with this affirmation:

The LORD sits enthroned over the flood;
the LORD is enthroned as King forever.
The LORD gives strength to his people;
the LORD blesses his people with peace.
(Ps 29:10-11 NIV)

This psalm show that God’s kingship results in great blessing for his people.

4.2.1. Divine Kingship. Three hymns of divine kingship (Pss 93; 97; 99) begin with the acclamation yhwh mālāk, which is customarily translated either “the LORD is king” (NAB, NLT, NRSV, NJPS) or “the LORD reigns” (ESV, NASB, NIV, NKJV). Psalm 96:10 contains this phrase within the psalm, and Psalm 47:8 [MT 47:9] has a similar acclamation, mālāk ʾēlōhīm (“God reigns” or “God is king”). Since the days of S. Mowinckel the proper translation of this phrase has been debated. An alternate translation is “the LORD/God has become king.” J. Day has presented a compelling defense of this translation. The perfect form of the verb mālāk can be translated “became king” (1 Kings 16:23a), “reigned” (1 Kings 16:23b) or “has become king” (1 Sam 12:14; 2 Sam 15:10; 1 Kings 1:11, 13, 18; 2 Kings 9:13), but clear examples of “is king” are lacking in the Hebrew Bible. Contrary to common opinion, word order is irrelevant to this discussion, since the inceptive sense (“has become”) is found with the order subject/predicate and the order predicate/subject. Compare “But now Adonijah has become king [ʾădōniyyā mālāk]” (1 Kings 1:18) with “Have you not heard that Adonijah, the son of Haggith, has become king [mālāk ʾădōniyyāhû]. . . ?” (1 Kings 1:11). Moreover, the context of mālāk ʾēlōhīm in Psalm 47:8 [MT 47:9] provides the best evidence for the inceptive rendering. God has just ascended, having won a great victory (Ps 47:5), and has just taken his seat on his royal throne and begun to reign (Ps 47:8).

Although it is true that from one perspective God has always been king, it is equally true from another perspective that on specific occasions God “became king” in a new sense. G. Vos (342) says, “It will be remembered that the shout ‘Absalom is King’ was the shout of acclaim at his assumption of the kingship.” So even if we stay with the traditional translation “the LORD/God is king/reigns,” the parallels with the use of this phrase in reference to human kings indicates that this is an acclamation used at the inception of the king’s reign. In reference to the Lord becoming king, Vos goes on to say, “By this is meant a form of statement representing Jehovah as becoming, or revealing himself in the last crisis the victorious King of Israel” (324), and “The simple solution seems to lie in this that ‘kingship’ is in the O.T. more a concept of action than of status. Jehovah becomes King = Jehovah works acts of deliverance” (342 n. 33), and “The thought is not merely that Jehovah becomes King in order to save, but that through the salvation, as well as in other acts, He arrives at the acme of his royal splendor” (344) (For this same idea of God beginning to reign in the NT, see Rev 11:17, where English translations are agreed in translating the aorist ebasileusas with “begun to reign.”). There are two key actions through which the Lord “becomes king”: creation and redemption.

4.2.2. Creation. The quintessential hymn of creation is Psalm 104, which opens with a portrayal of God as the glorious king.

Let all that I am praise the LORD;
O LORD my God, how great [gādal] you are!
You are robed with honor and majesty;
you are dressed in a robe of light.
(Ps 104:1-2 NLT)

Just as we use the word “majesty” in association with royalty when we refer to a modern queen as “her Majesty,” the ancient Hebrews used the word “great” (gādōl) in association with royalty. Psalm 47:2 refers to God as “a great [gādōl] king.” In the same way, Psalm 95:3 refers to the Lord as “a great [gādōl] king.” In the context of the ancient world at large this expression would be better translated as “the Great King,” since it is almost a technical phrase used to refer to the king who reigns supreme over all other kings and kingdoms. This is why the full text of Psalm 95:3 reads,

For the Lord is a great God,
the great King above all gods. (NIV)

In saying that God is “great,” Psalm 104 shouts the praise of the King of kings and Lord of lords. This interpretation is confirmed by the word pair “honor and majesty” (hōd wēhādār). “Honor and majesty” are regularly associated with royalty in the book of Psalms. In Psalm 21:5 God dresses the human king with “splendor and majesty” (hōd wēhādār).

Your victory brings him [the human king] great honor, and you have clothed him with splendor and majesty [hōd wēhādār]. (NLT)

In the same way, the divine King is “robed with honor and majesty” in Psalm 104:1. The image is that of God dressed in the magnificent regalia of a reigning monarch. The point is that God’s creating and governing of the universe was and is the activity of a king.

4.2.3. Redemption. God also “becomes king” through acts of redemption. Psalm 47, for example, invites the nations to praise the Lord as the “great King over all the earth” (Ps 47:2). He is the God who has just “become king” (Ps 47:9), when he defeated the Canaanite kingdoms and granted the land to Israel (Ps 47:3-4).

Hymns of redemption celebrate “the mighty acts of the LORD,” what God has done not in primeval history but rather in Israel’s history.

Who can proclaim the mighty acts of the LORD
or fully declare his praise? (Ps 106:2 NIV)
We will not hide them from their children;
we will tell the next generation the praiseworthy deeds of the LORD,
his power, and the wonders he has done.
(Ps 78:4 NIV)

Give thanks to the LORD, call on his name; make known among the nations what he has done. (Ps 105:1 NIV)

The “mighty acts of the LORD” include his deliverance of Israel from Egypt (Ps 78:52; 105:26-27; 114:1-2), his dividing of the Red Sea (Ps 78:13; 106:8-11; 114:3-6), his giving of the law (Ps 78:5), his care in the wilderness (Ps 78:14-16; 105:39-42; 114:8) and his granting of the land (Ps 47:4; 78:55).

Psalm 136 combines the themes of creation and redemption. In this psalm God’s “great wonders (Ps 136:4) include his creation of the heavens (Ps 136:5-9) and his redemption of Israel from Egypt, through the wilderness, and to the promised land (Ps 136:10-22). As this and the foregoing examples show, the subcategories of hymns of divine kingship, creation and redemption are not rigid but rather are fluid and flexible (Logman).

4.3. The Conclusion of Praise. In keeping with the positive tone of the first two sections, the hymns come to a conclusion on an equally positive note. Quite frequently, the conclusion contains a repeated invitation to praise. Thus Psalm 103 ends,

Praise the LORD, you angels, you mighty ones who carry out his plans, listening for each of his commands.
Yes, praise the LORD, you armies of angels who serve him and do his will!
Praise the LORD, everything he has created, everything in all his kingdom.
Let all that I am praise the Lord.
(Ps 103:20-22 NLT)

The hymn may also come to a close with a strong affirmation of faith in the Lord, as is the case in Psalm 29, which affirms that the Lord rules over the world, and that this rule will result in great blessing for the Lord’s people.

The LORD rules over the floodwaters.
The LORD reigns as king forever.
The LORD gives his people strength.
The LORD blesses them with peace.
(Ps 29:10-11 NLT)

5. The Use of the Hymn.

Brueggemann has well argued that there were and are at least two ways in which the hymns functioned and function. One can be called “articulations of order,” and the other “affirmations of faith.”

5.1. Articulations of Order. Perhaps no text better captures the essence of the hymn as an articulation of a well-ordered life than does Psalm 16:5-6.

LORD, you have assigned me my portion and my cup;
you have made my lot secure.
The boundary lines have fallen for me in pleasant places;
surely I have a delightful inheritance. (NIV)

These are the words of someone who is experiencing life in all of its goodness. The life reflected in the hymn knows no trouble; it is a happy, blessed life. Fear and anxiety are nowhere to be found, because God in his faithfulness is maintaining the order in life that he intended from the very beginning. If Genesis 1 reveals anything about God’s intention for creation, it is that creation is to be experienced as well ordered. The rhythm of “and God said” and “God saw that it was good” and “there was evening and there was morning” underscores the orderliness and goodness intended by God for the world that he made. The hymn is thus fundamentally a creation psalm—that is, a psalm that knows the Creator to be reliable in maintaining a well-ordered world. “Creation here is not a theory about how the world came to be. . . . It is rather an affirmation that God’s faithfulness and goodness are experienced as generosity, continuity, and regularity” (Brueggemann, 26). The primary use of the hymn was and is to articulate our praise and gratitude to God for the good life that he has so generously granted to us.

5.2. Affirmations of Faith. Life, however, is not always experienced as well ordered and good, sometimes for known reasons and at other times for reasons unknown. Even the great poet who composed Psalm 104, the quintessential poetic articulation of a well-ordered world, was aware of this when he said, “But may sinners vanish from the earth and the wicked be no more” (Ps 104:35). He knew that the presence of “sinners” could disrupt the good order of life (Allen). So, what role can the hymns play in lives characterized by chaos and disorientation? Brueggemann argues that the hymn can also function as an affirmation of faith, as a “great evangelical nevertheless.” The hymn expresses the deep desire of the human heart for life as God intends. The human heart knows its origin, life in all of its abundance. The human heart knows the destiny that God desires for all, life in all of its abundance. The human heart longs to experience this life now and not only in the future. This is why the poet who wrote Psalm 27 said,

Yet I am confident that I will see the LORD’s goodness
while I am here in the land of the living.
(Ps 27:13 NLT)

The hymn can thus be used to express a profound hope that God will show up not in theory but rather in the concrete realities of life and bring order out of chaos. The hymn is an affirmation of faith that Jesus truly came to bring life in all of its abundance (John 10:10).

See also CULT, WORSHIP: PSALMS; FORM CRITICISM; LYRIC POETRY; MUSIC, SONG; PSALMS 1: BOOK OF; REFRAIN; RHYME.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. C. Allen, Psalms 101-150 (WBC 21; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); K. L. Barker, “Praise,” in Cracking Old Testament Codes: A Guide to Interpreting the Literary Genres of the Old Testament, ed. D. B. Sandy and R. L. Giese (Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 1995) 217-32; W. Brueggemann, The Message of the Psalms (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984); R. J. Clifford, Psalms 1-72

(AOTC; Nashville: Abingdon, 2002); J. J. Collins, Introduction to the Hebrew Bible (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2004); M. D. Coogan, The Old Testament: A Historical and Literary Introduction to the Hebrew Scriptures (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006); L. Coppes, “לָלַח,” TWOT 1.217-18; J. Day, Psalms (OTG; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995); D. J. Estes, Handbook on the Wisdom Books and Psalms (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2005); M. D. Futato, Transformed by Praise: The Purpose and Message of the Psalms (Phillipsburg, NJ: P & R Publishing, 2002); idem, Interpreting the Psalms: An Exegetical Handbook (HOTE; Grand Rapids: Kregel, 2007); E. S. Gerstenberger, Psalms (2 vols.; FOTL; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988-2001); H. Gunkel, The Psalms: A Form-Critical Introduction (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); J. H. Hutchinson, “The Psalms and Praise,” in Interpreting the Psalms: Issues and Approaches, ed. D. Firth and P. S. Johnston (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2005) 85-100; T. Longman III, How to Read the Psalms (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1988); E. H. Merrill, “לָלַח,” NIDOTTE 1.1035-37; S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel’s Worship (Nashville: Abingdon, 1962); H. Ringgren, “לָלַח,” TDOT 3.404-10; G. Vos, “The Eschatology of the Psalter,” in Pauline Eschatology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1953); C. Westermann, “לָלַח,” TLOT 1.371-76; idem, Praise and Lament in the Psalms (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981). M. D. Futato

I

ICONOGRAPHY. See IMAGERY; PSALMS 5: ICONOGRAPHY.

IMAGERY

The words imagery and image are notoriously slippery ones in the study of literature. When it comes to poetic theory, they occur in so many contexts that W. Mitchell (1993b, 556) believes that “it may well be impossible to provide any rational systematic account of their usage.” This is no counsel of despair, especially coming from Mitchell, a leading theorist of imagery (see Mitchell 1986; 1993a; 1994), as much as it is confirmation of the crucial importance and sheer ubiquity of imagery. A social psychologist has put it well: “We live on images” (Lifton, 3). And so does poetry. But much of the difficulty in interpreting poetry revolves precisely around understanding imagery (see Berlin 2004, 2102). The present article cannot adequately address such a large and essential topic; instead, it offers brief overviews of imagery in text and in art, the latter being an increasingly important arena for the study of the former (see Mitchell 1986; 1994). Thereafter, the article discusses the problem of correlating textual and artistic images and then offers a few examples of this type of image analysis and some concluding reflections on imagery and theology.

1. Imagery in Texts
2. Imagery in Art
3. Correlating Textual and Artistic Imagery
4. Case Studies in Text-Art Correlation
5. Conclusion: Imagery and Theology

1. Imagery in Texts.

To review adequately the study of imagery in texts would take volumes because imagery, as another term for figurative language, includes numerous devices such as metaphor, simile, allegory, *personification, apostrophe and a host of other figures of speech, not to mention still other topics (see Watson 2000, 270-73; J. Black, 51; Mitchell 1993b, 556). Since articles on specific images found in the OT appear elsewhere in this dictionary, this section treats three issues: (1) the importance of imagery, (2) how images work, and (3) interpreting imagery.

Before we proceed further, a working definition of image/imagery is in order. As Mitchell (1993b, 556-59) has noted, the terms image and imagery historically have been used in a wide variety of ways (cf. Friedman). Even so, a usable point of reference is provided by L. Ryken, J. Wilhoit and T. Longman (xiii) in a recent dictionary devoted to biblical imagery: “An image is any word that names a concrete thing (such as tree or house) or action (such as running or threshing). Any object or action that we can picture is an image.” This definition treats the image as a “verbal representation of a concrete (usually visual) object”; in this view, imagery is “seen as eliciting mental images in the reader, evoking a kind of secondary visual representation” (Mitchell 1993a, 553). Though other understandings of image/imagery are available, this “pictorial” or “visual” one is common (see Turco, 55; Oliver, 99; Watson 2001, 251). It should also be noted that Ryken, Wilhoit and Longman’s definition already indicates that imagery is both “a mode of apprehension” and “a rhetorical device” (Mitchell 1993b, 557; cf. Oliver, 107; Watson 2001, 255); furthermore, it combines elements of text (naming, describing) and art (image, picturing).

1.1. The Importance of Imagery to Poetics. Poetry traffics in images. They are “the glory, perhaps the essence of poetry” (Alonso Schökel, 95; cf. Berlin, NIB 4.311; 2004, 2101); imagery, in turn, is “the central topic of poetics” (Weiss, 140).

The poet William Carlos Williams is famous for saying, “No ideas [in poetry] but in things,” to which M. Oliver (19) added, “and . . . no things but in . . . the words representing them.” In point of fact, many of the words that poets use are not modifiers (adjectives, adverbs or phrases constructed with either) but rather tropes, figures, imagery (Turco, 55). Good poetry works (*poetics) not by listing “ideas” but rather by discussing ideas via “things” that are described with “words” that are imagistic (“A poem is an artifice of thought . . . and there is no thought except in symbols, in forms” [Turco, 68]).

Scripture operates similarly. As Ryken, Wilhoit and Longman (xiii) note, “The Bible is more than a book of ideas: it is also a book of images and motifs.” Nowhere is this truer than at those places where Scripture is, in fact, poetry, including not only Psalms but also major sections of the Wisdom literature and the Prophets. Although many of the images used in the Bible are derived from natural phenomena—in large part, probably, because Israel was a rural, non-industrial and far less urbanized society than our own—they can be highly sophisticated (Watson 2000, 270; Petersen and Richards, 51). This is due in part to the complexity of imagery, imagistic language and image analysis in the first place. Be that as it may, it is true that we miss much “of what the Bible contains if we do not see and understand the literal and symbolic meanings of the Bible’s images” (Ryken, Wilhoit and Longman, xiii).

1.2. How Images Work. As we already noted, imagery is a complex phenomenon and can be subdivided into a number of separate categories. Theories abound for understanding how images work and, correlatively, how best to interpret them. For now it can be noted that many scholars believe that imagery functions primarily as a means of comparison (see, e.g., Alonso Schökel, 99, 105-7, 114; Turco, 56-57). W. Watson (2000, 270-71) puts it this way: “The essence of imagery is the juxtaposition of two different levels of meaning” (cf. Watson 2001, 251); Oliver (92, 99) expresses it this way: “Imagery means, generally, the representation of one thing by another thing,” and poetic language in general is “the language of one thing compared to another thing.”

One will recognize similarities between these descriptions of imagery and the way metaphor functions if only because metaphor is a subset of imagery writ large (Alonso Schökel, 99, 108-9; Turco, 57, 61). Study of metaphor, in turn, can provide helpful insight into the interpretation of imagery as a whole (see 1.3 below). Similarities are also seen, however, between imagery as fundamentally comparison—with reference to metaphor especially, including both the like and the unlike (see Ricoeur)—and how some scholars have characterized the nature of Hebrew *parallelism (see Petersen and Richards, 52, 59; Berlin 1985; Alter). A. Berlin (1997, 27-28), for instance, has argued that parallelism itself is like metaphor (and thus imagery) and vice versa:

Parallelism juxtaposes lines that are, from a linguistic perspective, equivalent on one level while being different on another. Parallel lines contain grammatical and semantic equivalents but are rarely identical. They are the same and yet different; and it is the productive tension between the sameness and the difference that makes parallelism so effective . . . metaphor and parallelism are two sides of the same coin—counterparts of the same phenomenon in a different dimension. . . . We could say that parallelism operates in the linguistic dimension the way metaphor operates in the conceptual dimension. Parallelism juxtaposes verbal similarities and differences while metaphor juxtaposes non-verbal similarities and differences. It is through the coherent interpretation of both of these types of juxtapositions that meaning is achieved.

Sensitivity to juxtaposition and comparison, and interpreting them coherently, is thus crucial to an adequate understanding of imagery—a point to which we now turn. Before doing so, however, we should note that imagery is used, in no small way, for rhetorical purposes. To be sure, an image enlivens a text in a way that simple informational description does not (see Oliver, 94), but if the text is communicative, then the image is also rhetorical: it creates “an effect in the listener and affects him or her as well” (Turco, 67), at the very least by making demands of its interpreters or readers (Petersen and Richards, 60).

1.3. Interpreting Imagery. As a subset of imagistic language, metaphor is a useful arena in which to discuss interpretation. Like the study of imagery more broadly, the study of metaphor is a large topic of research (Ricouer; briefly, Strawn, 5-16). The old view, which in some ways goes back to Aristotle, is that metaphors simply substitute for the “real” object. As such, they are mostly ornamental and ultimately dispensable. More recent work on metaphors has demonstrated that they are far more than simple decorative devices; instead, they constitute deeply engrained forms of human cognition such that it is impossible either to think or to speak without them (Lakoff and Turner; Lakoff and Johnson; cf. Alonso Schökel, 100-101). Even scientific discourse cannot avoid the metaphorical (e.g., “black hole”), and our everyday speech is saturated with it. Consider, for example, the metaphor “Argument is war,” which lies behind statements such as “Your claims are indefensible,” “She demolished his point of view,” “He shot down all my arguments” and “You attacked every weak point in her talk” (Lakoff and Johnson, 4). Moreover, and as a result, metaphors are highly effective in communicating and therefore are rarely if ever used solely for ornamentation but rather for particular functions (see Watson 2001, 252) and to particular effect, especially because many things could not be said, or said as well, without the image/metaphor (see Weiss, 156).

The influential work on metaphor by M. Black (1962) is useful for biblical studies because it accounts for the different contexts between the one who uses a metaphor and the one who receives it. For ideal communication to take place, the receiver must share the user’s “sign-context” (the larger conceptual climate that forms and informs the meaning of the metaphor chosen—e.g., shared language, worldview, literary competence) to adequately understand the metaphor.

If the user and receiver are contemporaries but do not, for some reason, share the same sign-context, questions may be asked and clarification gained through subsequent communication. The situation is quite different and more problematic when the users are long-deceased authors and the metaphors are from ancient texts that attest to a very different sign-context than the modern world. This is the difficult situation facing the one analyzing biblical metaphors. Among other things, it means that a good deal of effort is required to comprehend the meaning of a metaphor in its original (user’s sign-) context. As Watson (2000, 270) states, “Particularly in verse, where it is used more intensely and more often, figurative language needs to be understood so that the meaning . . . can be grasped. . . . This entails some knowledge of the background to the Hebrew texts, especially the customs, religion and lifestyle and the geographic and historical setting of Israel and her neighbours.”

Watson’s point about Israel’s neighbors is important because “some [biblical] imagery derives from the mythology of neighbouring civilizations” (Watson 2000, 271). Pragmatically, this means that one must gain some sort of access to what ancient metaphors mean in their ancient settings—biblical, Israelite or otherwise—in no small part because images have histories, some of which can be and clearly are assumed by poets for their audiences (see Turco, 64; Kinzie, 172-73).

Ryken, Wilhoit and Longman (xiv) have stated that to interpret imagery adequately, one must experience the image “as literally and in as fully a sensory way as possible” and subsequently “be sensitive to the connotations or overtones of the image.” One must ask, in short, two questions of any image: “What is the literal picture?” and “What does this image evoke?” Both steps—meaning and evocation—necessitate at least some attention to the user’s sign-context if widely erring interpretation is to be avoided. (However, for appropriate cautions that such an approach is not foolproof, see J. Black, 56.)

How is access to the ancient sign-context gained? There are at least two ways. The first is careful work with textual instances of the image or metaphor in question. Ancient Near Eastern texts, like biblical ones, abound with imagery (see, e.g., Foster, xviii) such that one may study various occurrences of the image in question, both within Scripture and without. Note one example, from the Epic of Gilgamesh:

Like a lioness whose cubs are in a pitfall,
He [Gilgamesh] paced to and fro, back and forth. (Epic of Gilgamesh VIII, 60-61 [Foster, 61])

When psalmists cry out with language that is otherwise typically reserved for the vocalization of lions (e.g., the root šʾg in Ps 22:1 [MT 22:2]; 32:3; 38:8 [MT 38:9]), how is this to be understood? Perhaps Gilgamesh’s mournful pacing after Enkidu’s death sheds some light on the imagistic language utilized (see also Zech 11:3).

But meaning is not made solely in the textual realm, especially in antiquity, where literacy rates were most likely very low. So, the second crucial means of entry into ancient imagery and metaphor is artistic remains. This is a relatively new area of research, which is the subject of the next section. Both means of access, however—the textual and the artistic—help us to interpret imagery. As Ryken, Wilhoit and Longman (xiii) note, whereas some images are universal, or seemingly so, others are “unexpressive until we have been alerted to their significance,” and the meaning of still other images “is lost on modern readers unless they are initiated into what the motif meant in other places at other times.” The study of image/imagery in text and art is a crucial tool in that initiation.

2. Imagery in Art.

If imagery is a large topic in textual studies, the same is true for art. In fact, a case might be made that the “image-in-text” is dependent upon and generated by the “image-in-art,” even if that art is purely mental—the image in the mind. R. Arnheim, for instance, argued that all thinking is dependent on vision. We see things, and that is how we know things (cf. Ramachandran, 24-59; Mitchell 1994, 24). We know them, at least in part, by recreating and reconstructing them, seeing them in or with our mind’s eye, as it were. If Arnheim is right, even only partially, then attention to the image in art is imperative, not simply a curiosity. (For an interactionist perspective on images and texts, see Mitchell 1986; 1994.)

The wisdom of such an approach has only recently dawned on biblical scholars. The pioneering work of O. Keel in 1972 (ET, Keel 1997) was the first of its kind to explicitly and extensively investigate biblical literary images with reference to ancient Near Eastern artistic ones. Since that publication, Keel and his students and followers have engaged in wide-ranging research that has cast new and significant light on the Bible. Unfortunately, the method adopted by these scholars has not always been clearly articulated; this has made them vulnerable to attacks from textually myopic scholars who have skeptically asked questions such as “How does one know that an artistic image means this or that?”

In response, it might be said that textual images are certainly no less opaque than artistic ones. Moreover, artistic images, no less than textual ones, have histories (even “grammars”) of use that can be investigated as literary images are (see below). Before proceeding further, it must be reiterated that a comprehensive study of image-meaning in art exceeds the space allotted here. Even so, as a first step into this vast area, the classic and instructive work of E. Panofsky in 1939 (reprint, Panofsky 1972) can be considered, especially since it has proven foundational for subsequent thinking.

Panofsky identified three layers of meaning or content in an (artistic) image: (1) primary or natural subject matter, (2) secondary or conventional subject matter, (3) intrinsic meaning or content. As an example, he offered the “image” of meeting an acquaintance (the object) who thereupon removed his hat. The primary subject matter includes the change of visual details marked by the other person’s movement and how that movement is done (in good humor or bad, friendly or hostile). But realizing that this movement is a greeting at all depends on secondary subject matter, in this case the conventions that are particular to certain social situations, locales and persons. A larger nexus of action, context and interpretation affords the intrinsic meaning of the image. Panofsky (4-5 [italics added]) explains,

Besides constituting a natural event in space and time, besides naturally indicating moods or feelings, besides conveying a conventional greeting, the action of my acquaintance can reveal to an experienced observer all that goes to make up his “personality.” This personality is conditioned by his being a man of the twentieth century, by his national, social and educational background, by the previous history of his life and by his present surroundings, but it is also distinguished by an individual manner of viewing things and reacting to the world which, if rationalized, would have to be called a philosophy. In the isolated action of a polite greeting all these factors do not manifest themselves comprehensively, but nevertheless symptomatically. We could not construct a mental portrait of the man on the basis of this single action, but only by co-ordinating a large number of similar observations and by interpreting them in connection with our general information as to the gentlemen’s period, nationality, class, intellectual traditions and so forth. Yet all the qualities which this mental portrait would show explicitly are implicitly inherent in every single action, so that, conversely, every single action can be interpreted in the light of those qualities.

This three-step system is too neatly differentiated, as Panofsky himself acknowledged; in practice, the three operations “merge with each other into one organic and indivisible process” (Panofsky, 17). Even so, these steps are heuristic in thinking about interpretation of an image, which in his example is not literary or artistic but rather actual, real, performative. Table 1 summarizes Panofsky’s steps when applied to the study of artistic imagery proper.

Although scholars have appropriately refined, developed and critiqued Panofsky’s schema (see Mitchell 1994, esp. 25-34), his work remains useful. At least three items deserve mention here. First, Panofsky distinguished motifs from images. The latter are motifs with secondary or conventional meaning. This again demonstrates that images have histories and systems of “associated implications” (the characteristics typically connected with the image in question [see M. Black, 41]). Second, Panofsky distinguished between images and combinations of images; these latter are what he called stories or allegories. Iconography in the narrower sense was the identification of these images, stories and allegories; accurate iconographical analysis thus was dependent upon accurate identification of the motifs (Panofsky, 6-7). Third, Panofsky wished to reach a deeper iconographical interpretation or synthesis, what he called “iconology” proper, which is dependent on a correct analysis of the images, stories and allegories (Panofsky, 8). This deeper synthesis may reveal meanings unknown or unintended by the artist insofar as both the artist and the work are products of larger cultural milieus that are formative and operative (see Dikovitskaya, 1-2, 120; Mitchell 1993b, 558), even (and sometimes especially) on unconscious levels. This last observation has two very important implications for the study of imagery, each of which is best dealt with under the rubric of correlation.

3. Correlating Textual and Artistic Imagery.

As we noted previously, the study of ancient artistic imagery with reference to textual imagery is a relatively new development in biblical studies. Scholars have long studied artistic remains (iconography) of various sorts from ancient Israel/Palestine and the ancient Near East, but not always with reference to biblical imagery. J. LeMon has identified three types of iconographic analysis: iconographic-artistic, iconographic-historical and iconographic-biblical. Only the third is concerned with correlating artistic imagery with imagery from the Bible. Once again, Keel is a major pioneer on this point, but his work has spanned all three types (see, e.g., Keel and Uehlinger; Schroer and Keel). Since

Table 1. Panofsky’s Method of Image Analysis (Adapted and simplified from Panofsky, 14-15)

Interpretive Object	Interpretive Task	Interpretive Method	Interpretive Control
Primary or natural subject matter: the world of artistic motifs	Pre-iconographical description of motifs	Practical experience: familiarity with objects/motifs and events	History of style : insight into why objects and events were expressed by specific forms at certain times
Secondary or conventional subject matter: the world of images and image complexes (stories, allegories)	Iconographical analysis in the narrow sense	Knowledge of literary sources: familiarity with themes and concepts at work in an image	History of types : insight into why specific themes or concepts were expressed by objects and events at certain times
Intrinsic meaning or content: the world of “symbolical” values reflected/present in the work	Iconographical analysis in the deeper sense or, better, what might be called iconographical interpretation/synthesis (“iconology”)	“Synthetic intuition”: familiarity with tendencies of the human mind	History of cultural “symbols”: insight into why tendencies of the human mind were expressed by specific themes and concepts at certain times the iconographical-biblical type of text-art correlation is still in its infancy in biblical studies, methodological clarity is often lacking. Keel and others have provided significant insights, but the methodological question remains: How does one do it?

Returning to Panofsky, we could put the question(s) differently: How does one go about getting the correct interpretation of motifs, then of images and their complexes (stories, allegories), and then, finally, of the intrinsic meaning? For motifs, Panofsky (9) suggested that we rely mostly on practical experience. But this goes only so far when it comes to ancient images, about which our practical experience may be irrelevant or inaccurate—a point that Panofsky (9) admitted. So, practical experience must be controlled by the history of style—the study of the expression of objects and events in certain forms under various historical conditions (Panofsky, 11 [see Table 1 above]). But how is the history of style known? For Panofsky (11), the student of imagery must have “a familiarity with specific themes or concepts as transmitted through literary sources, whether acquired by purposeful reading or by oral tradition.”

This is the first practical result mentioned at the end of the preceeding section. To get at deeper iconographical meaning/content (i.e., Panofsky’s “iconology”), one needs as much purchase on the milieu as possible; literary sources are important, even necessary, tools in that task. “When it comes to representations of themes other than” those “which happen to be known to the average ‘educated person,’ all of us . . . must try to familiarize ourselves with what the authors of those representations had read or otherwise knew” (Panofsky, 11-12). So, even when studying artistic imagery, textual data are a necessity (see Mitchell 1986, 155).

But as important and indispensable as literary sources are, they cannot guarantee a correct iconographical analysis (Panofsky, 12). Knowledge from literary sources must be subjected to the history of artistic types (Panofsky, 13 [see Table 1 above]). Moreover, since it is unlikely that we would find a specific text to fit a complex iconographical tableau, “we need a mental faculty comparable to that of a diagnostician” (Panofsky, 14-15). But this intuition too must be chastened, somehow, by the history of cultural symptoms or symbols. Panofsky (16) explains,

The art-historian will have to check what he thinks is the intrinsic meaning of the work, or group of works, to which he devotes his attention, against what he thinks the intrinsic meaning of as many other documents of civilization historically related to that work or group of works, as he can master: of documents bearing witness to the political, poetical, religious, philosophical, and social tendencies of the personality, period or country under investigation. Needless to say that, conversely, the historian of political life, poetry, religion, philosophy, and social situation should make an analogous use of works of art. It is in the search for intrinsic meanings or content that the various humanistic disciplines meet on a common plane instead of serving as handmaidens to each other.

This is the second practical result: art, no less than text, is a window into the ancient world, including its religion, politics and the like, but, for our purposes, most importantly its poetry and thus its imagery (see Mitchell 1994, 20-21). In the memorable lines from J. Goethe (1.137), “Whoever the poet would understand, must go into the poet’s land” (my translation).

4. Case Studies in Text-Art Correlation.

And going into the poet’s land really does help one understand the poet(ry). Consider again Panofsky’s friend removing his hat. Such a greeting “is peculiar to the western world and is a residue of mediaeval chivalry. . . . Neither an Australian bushman nor an ancient Greek could be expected to realize that the lifting of a hat is . . . a sign of politeness” (Panofsky, 4).

Or consider Amos 1:2: “The LORD from Mount Zion roars [s’g] and from Jerusalem utters his voice. The pastures of the shepherds wither, and the top of Mount Carmel dries up” (my translation). The verb s’g typically is associated with lions (see, e.g., Judg 14:5; Isa 5:29; Jer 2:15; 51:38; Ezek 22:25; Hos 11:10; Amos 3:4, 8; Zeph 3:3; Ps 22:14; 104:21). A common modern notion of lion imagery associates them with bravery and courage, but that does not match up well with Amos. When one looks to ancient texts and artistic remains (see, e.g., figure 1), however, one sees that these correct the modern misinterpretations, showing that in the ancient world, lions were primary tropes of power and threat (see Strawn). Yahweh’s imagistic figuring as a lion in Amos is not because Yahweh is brave or courageous but rather because Yahweh is dangerous and terrifying. No wonder the earth shudders at the sound of the Divine Lion's roar (cf. Amos 3:8).

Figure 1. Late Bronze Age seal from Tell el-Far ah (S.) (Strawn 2005:382 fig. 3.12; Keel and Uehlinger 1998:83 illus. 100).

Or consider Psalm 42:1-2a (MT 42:2-3a): “As a deer longs for flowing streams, so my soul longs for you, O God. My soul thirsts for God, for the living God” (NRSV). There are ancient depictions of the drinking deer (see figure 2), but this particular poetic image is enlightening because the comparison formed by the metaphor of the psalmist and the deer creates a new relationship “such that their qualities become interchanged” (Berlin, NIB 4.311). The psalmist becomes deer-like, and the deer becomes human-like. Normally, one does not expect deer to “long” like humans do. But with poetry, all things are possible. Longing seems more characteristic of humans and thirsting for water more characteristic of deer, but the poetic image crisscrosses the two subjects, attributing aspects of the one to the other (Berlin, NIB 4.311). In the process God is also affected, imaged as refreshing water (cf. Ps 42:7[MT 42:8]), as necessary and vital as drink to a thirsty animal.

Numerous other examples could be offered (see, e.g., Foster, xviii). Certainly Ryken, Wilhoit and Longman (xv) are correct in saying that “the time is ripe for some bold new commentaries and dictionaries with pictorial accompaniment to make the . . . images come alive.” A place to start is with their dictionary, but also with the pioneering work of Keel, the multivol-ume compendium of images currently in production by Schroer and Keel (cf. also ANEP), and the groundbreaking study by W. Brown on psalmic metaphor and “iconic structures.”

5. Conclusion: Imagery and Theology.

In conclusion, we may observe that humans are not the only ones who live on images; evidently, God does too. This is true at the literary level where God, who is sui generis, must be portrayed and depicted by images and metaphors if God is to be apprehended by humans at all (see Berlin NIB, 4.312; Alonso Schökel, 128-38; for “God” metaphors, see Korpel; Gibson, 121-38). This is also true if Genesis 1:26-27 is to be believed, which locates God’s image precisely in the image of the human (see Mitchell 1986, 2). God’s image lives in the living image of human beings, who in turn live on images, including images of the living God.

Finally, this article has also tried to demonstrate that Scripture itself lives on images (see Ryken, Wilhoit and Longman, xiii. And although images reside in all kinds of literature, nowhere are they as dense and as significant as in poetry. Imagery may, then, in the final analysis, be poetry’s greatest contribution to theology (see Miller; Wilder 2001; cf. Berlin 2004, 2101-2). As S. Gillingham (278) puts it, “The language of theology needs the poetic medium for much of its expression, for poetry, with its power of allusion, reminds us of the more hidden and mysterious truths which theology seeks to express. . . . Perhaps to learn the art of reading biblical poetry is but a precursor to learning the art of 'doing' theology at all" (cf. Berlin 2004, 2101). Clearly, understanding imagery is a crucial part of both arts.

Figure 2. Mid-eighth century seal; unprovenanced, allegedly from Hebron (Keel and Uehlinger 1998:185 illus. 200b; Brown 2002:149 fig. 16).

See also ANIMAL IMAGERY; ARCHITECTURAL IMAGERY; CREATION IMAGERY; FLORAL IMAGERY; IMPRISONMENT IMAGERY; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; PROTECTION IMAGERY; PSALMS 5: ICONOGRAPHY; SALVATION AND DELIVERANCE IMAGERY; WARFARE IMAGERY; ZION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. Alonso Schökel, A Manual of Hebrew Poetics (SubBi 11; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 2000); R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York: Basic Books, 1985); R. Arnheim, Visual Thinking (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1969); A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985); idem, "On Reading Biblical Poetry: The Role of Metaphor," in Congress Volume: Cambridge 1995, ed. J. A. Emerton (VTSup 66; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 25-36; idem, "Reading Biblical Poetry," in The Jewish Study Bible, ed. A. Berlin and M. Z. Brettler (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004) 2097-2104; idem, "Introduction to Hebrew Poetry," NIB 4.301-15; J. Black, Reading Sumerian Poetry (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1998); M. Black, Models and Metaphors: Studies in Language and Philosophy (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1962); W. P. Brown, Seeing the Psalms: A Theology of Metaphor (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); M. Dikovitskaya, Visual Culture: The Study of the Visual after the Cultural Turn (Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2005); B. R. Foster, ed., The Epic of Gilgamesh: A New Translation, Analogues, Criticism (New York: W. W. Norton, 2001); N. Friedman, "Imagery," in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993) 559-66; J. C. L. Gibson, Language and Imagery in the Old Testament (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1998); S. E. Gillingham, The Poems and Psalms of the Hebrew Bible (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994); J. W. Goethe, West-östlicher Divan, ed. H. Birus (2 vols.; Bibliothek deutscher Klassiker 113; Frankfurt: Deutscher Klassiker Verlag, 1994); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms, (repr., Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997 [1972]); O. Keel and C. Uehlinger, Gods, Goddesses, and Images of God in Ancient Israel, (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); M. Kinzie, A Poet's Guide to Poetry (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999);

M. C. A. Korpel, A Rift in the Clouds: Ugaritic and Hebrew Descriptions of the Divine (UBL 8; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, 1990); G. Lakoff and M. Johnson, Metaphors We Live By (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003); G. Lakoff and M. Turner, More Than Cool Reason: A Field Guide to Poetic Metaphor (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989); J. M. LeMon, "The Iconography of Yahweh's Winged Form in the Psalms" (Ph.D. diss., Emory University, 2007); R. J. Lifton, The Broken Connection: On Death and the Continuity of Life (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1979); P. D. Miller, "The Theological Significance of Biblical Poetry," in Language, Theology, and the Bible: Essays in Honor of James Barr, ed. J. Barton and S. E. Balentine (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994) 213-30; W. J. T. Mitchell, Iconology: Image, Text, Ideology (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986); idem, "Iconology," in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993a) 552-54; idem, "Image," in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993b) 556-59; idem, Picture Theory: Essays on Verbal and Visual Representation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994); M. Oliver, A Poetry Handbook (San Diego: Harcourt Brace, 1994); E. Panofsky, Studies in Iconology: Humanistic Themes in the Art of the Renaissance (Icon Editions; Boulder, CO: Westview, 1972 [1939]); D. L. Petersen and K. H. Richards, Interpreting Hebrew Poetry (GBS; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); V. S. Ramachandran, A Brief Tour of Human Consciousness: From Imposter Poodles to Purple Numbers (New York: Pi Press, 2004); P. Ricoeur, The Rule of Metaphor: Multi-Disciplinary Studies of the Creation of Meaning in Language (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1977); L. Ryken, J. C. Wilhoit and T. Longman III, eds., Dictionary of Biblical Imagery (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1998); S. Schroer and O. Keel, Die Ikonographie Palästinas/Israels und der Alte Orient: Eine Religionsgeschichte in Bildern (4 vols. projected, 1 in print; Fribourg: Academic Press, 2005-); B. A. Strawn, What Is Stronger Than a Lion? Leonine Image and Metaphor in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East (OBO 212; Fribourg: Academic Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005); L. Turco, The Book of Forms: A Handbook of Poetics (3d ed.; Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 2000); W. G. E. Watson, "Hebrew Poetry,” in Text in Context: Essays by Members of the Society for Old Testament Study, ed. A. D. H. Mayes (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000) 253-85; idem, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (2d ed.; JSOTSup 26; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); M. Weiss, The Bible from Within: The Method of Total Interpretation (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1984); A. N. Wilder, Theopoetic: Theology and the Religious Imagination (Lima, OH: Academic Renewal Press, 2001 [1976]).

B. A. Strawn

IMPRECATION

Imprecation pertains to cursing or uttering a curse (i.e., malediction) (Lat imprecatus). Most simply, curse may be contrasted with blessing. If blessing “consists of a wish for someone to receive the things considered good in life: land, numerous progeny, sufficient food, clothing, etc.,” then curse “is the wish that someone be deprived of these same things” (Crawford, 25; cf. 231; see Stuart, 1218). Numerous examples of malediction or cursing are known from the ancient world and the OT. After an overview of this material, including a discussion of how curses are thought to have worked in antiquity, the present article takes up what is probably the most difficult issue regarding imprecation: the appropriation or contemporary use(fulness) of the imprecatory psalms.

1. Imprecation in the Ancient World
2. How Curses Functioned in Antiquity
3. Imprecation in the Old Testament
4. Appropriating Imprecation: The Case of the Imprecatory Psalms

1. Imprecation in the Ancient World.

1.1. Definitions. Curses are not the same as vows or oaths (see Cartledge, 15-16; Mercer 1912, 1), though the latter are typically promises with curses attached, the curses being the unfortunate results facing those who violated their oaths (Crawford, 109; Brichto, 24-25). In this sense, oaths are self-imprecations (Leick). Curses may appear without oaths, of course, but oaths involve curses. Since the oath is “indirectly referred to and its existence taken for granted in literature of various classes” (Mercer 1912, 1), imprecation is a far-flung phenomenon beyond curse-speech proper. It is not solely an Israelite issue (nor simply an OT one [see 4 below]). According to Leick (217), the most frequent imprecation in the ancient Near East “was that the offender should be without issue and die without leaving a name.”

1.2. Attestations. Given the wide range of imprecation in antiquity, a healthy variety of curses are found in ancient Near Eastern literatures. These include, for example, (1) execration texts—objects/texts inscribed with the names of enemies that were subsequently and symbolically destroyed (COS 1.32:50-52; ANET, 328-29); (2) treaty texts, where the curses specify punishments that face disobedient vassals (COS 2.82:213-17; 2.127-29:329-32; ANET, 533-34; Walton, 69); (3) magical and mythical texts (Crawford, 25, 207); and (4) inscriptions of various sorts (often royal) from different locales (COS 2.21:124-26; 2.30-32:147-152; ANET, 653-55; Walton, 65). Indeed, curse formulas are usually found on objects such as monuments, sarcophagi, boundary stones, tombs, treaties and the like, where they typically deter desecration (Keim, 17; for examples, see COS 2.54-57:180-83; 2.135:364-68; Dobbs-Allsopp et al., 126-28, 150-51, 507-10; Gevirtz 1961; Crawford, 97-229). These objects were “thus supernaturally ‘insured’ against theft, breakage, vandalism, and usurpation” (Leick, 217).

The supernatural part of this insurance derives from the fact that the gods were explicitly invoked in these imprecations, thus sanctioning or ensuring the curse (cf. 1 Sam 17:43; see Keim, 17; Leick). Mention of the gods strengthened the force of the statement such that the binding force of an oath or a curse “depended chiefly upon the power and reputation of the divine being invoked” (Mercer 1912, 31-32).

In Babylonia and Assyria, malediction was used in legal and religious ceremonies “of great occasion” but also in the life of everyday people (Mercer 1915, 309). On the one hand, the latter point might be taken as demonstrating that the relationship between the ancients and their gods was of a quite personal sort (Mercer 1912, 32); on the other hand, it makes clear that curses were an “important symbolic tool for ordering human relationships and assuring the proper conduct of social and religious life . . . [and were] crucial for the proper maintenance of social life in the ancient Near East” (Keim, 138). Imprecation, then, at least to some degree, is a primary way ancient societies policed themselves. S. Mercer (1915, 309) put it this way: malediction “seemed to have served almost the same purpose as Common Law does among modern people, for it acted as a restraint, corrective, and stimulant to better deeds.”

2. How Curses Functioned in Antiquity.

Among other things, the widespread use of imprecation raises questions regarding how it was thought to function in the ancient mind. Two major issues have occupied scholars, which ultimately are related: (1) the role of the gods in imprecations and (2) whether or not the curse is self-efficacious—that is, if, once uttered, it has a life and power of its own to self-fulfill.

2.1. The Role of the Gods. As we have already noted, the gods are everywhere mentioned in maledictory contexts. In a survey of Iron Age inscriptions, Crawford (132-33) concluded that nearly every one invoked deities by name (the only certain exception is the Ahiram sarcophagus [COS 2.55:181]). None of these texts, then, “are vague magical imprecations, rather they are dependent for their fulfillment upon the power of the deities mentioned” (Crawford, 208). This comment reflects and anticipates the debate outlined in the next section. Before turning to that discussion, however, we should note that, among other things, the role played by the gods in cursing demonstrates that imprecation was “reserved for serious issues which were ultimately beyond the retribution of authorities” (Leick, 217 [cf. Mendenhall, 72, 79; see 4 below]).

2.2. The Power of the Curse. Scholarship on imprecation, which often was undertaken by researchers concerned with the role and function of cursing in the OT and ancient Israel, has varied widely over the past hundred years. We might begin with J. Pedersen (1914; 1959, 1.99-181; 2.411-52), who connected the curse to the vitality of a person’s nepeš (“life” or “soul” [see Keim, 23; Crawford, 17]). This “soul power” makes the curse into something of a magical substance—effective, almost “alive,” once uttered. Pedersen’s position was followed and developed, with differences, by scholars such as J. Hempel, S. Mowinckel (1961; 1962, 1.236-37) and S. Blank (esp. 82, 95). In a careful monograph published in 1963, however, H. Brichto (210, 215) refuted this “magical interpretation” of curse-speech, at least with regard to the OT: “The biblical text nowhere bears out the identification of every misfortune as an independent, automatic Ding-an-sich instrumentality, executing a putative imprecation on the part of the Deity. . . . Traces of magical thought in the Bible are one thing, the assumption that the operation of curses is magical and independent of the Deity is quite another. . . . In brief, it is the conclusion here that the evidence for magical concepts underlying the biblical phenomenon of curse (and of blessing) has been grossly overvalued.”

2.3. The Gods as the Power(s) of the Curse. Brichto’s conclusion is predicated on the fact that the gods—or in the case of the OT, Yahweh—are so often explicitly mentioned or implicitly present in imprecation scenarios. Hence, if the curse has irreversible efficacy, that derives from the divine realm (see Leick). Pragmatically, however, it seems likely that one could be freed from an oath if circumstances so required/permitted, and so, in some cases at least, curses were not irreversible (Mercer 1912, 32-33).

The typical and expected presence of deities in maledictory contexts could even explain differences in curse formulae. S. Gevirtz (1959), for example, drew a contrast between East Semitic curses, with their explicit invocations of the gods, and West Semitic (especially biblical) examples, which often prefer passive constructions (often with ’ārūr [“cursed”]). Along the lines of Pedersen and others, Gevirtz took this as evidence that in the West words of imprecation were considered effective within themselves (see Keim, 24). But such a conclusion is neither necessary nor forgone. Lack of explicit reference to deities in certain Western (and biblical) contexts could simply be the result of tabooistic avoidance of the (names of the) gods—a phenomena that is still very much a part of common parlance (cf. “goodbye” from “God be with ye”; or “G-d” or “Ha-Shem” for the divine name; or, more to the point, “Gosh darn” for “God damn”).

In the OT, at least, it seems clear that imprecation derives its power solely from God. Three passages, Genesis 27; 32:22-32; and Numbers 22—24, are well-known for possibly attesting to the self-effective power of the word (whether curse or blessing [see Wehmeier]). Such an interpretation can be refuted, however, for each of these passages (e.g., on the Balaam accounts, see Brichto, 208-9; Gordon, 492; more generally, Thiselton; Keim). Even in Genesis 27 it is ultimately Yahweh who determined which son would receive the blessing (Crawford, 25)—a point already made in the prebirth oracle to Rebekah (Gen 25:23). “In the OT, it is Yahweh in every case concerning Israel who determines when blessing or curse will take place” (Crawford, 25 [cf. Brichto, 218]). In fact, the pervasive presence and action of God may explain the passive constructions that Gevirtz worried about. Brichto (213), for example, believed that this syntax was the result of monotheistic theology: “A society which recognized but a single source of power could use passival constructions in its imprecations (and prayers), without there being any question as to the agent who rewards and punishes, vindicates and condemns” (cf., on 1 Sam 11:7, Brichto, 214). That being said, it must be admitted that curses where Yahweh is explicitly invoked by name remain rather rare (for the Bible, see Josh 6:26; 1 Sam 26:19; for inscriptions, see Dobbs-Allsopp et al., 575-76; cf. 126-32, 150-51, 507-10; Crawford, 101, 133, 223).

3. Imprecation in the Old Testament.

As is to be expected, the OT contains imprecations that are related to, if not in fact derived from, those found elsewhere in the ancient Near East. This is no small point, especially for those who struggle with the notion of curse residing in Scripture (see 4 below). It is simply this: malediction was a speech-form in the ancient world. It is present in Scripture because Israel (and the Bible) lived in and was a part of that ancient world and its many speech-forms and other cultural aspects. Although certain curses appear to have been off-limits (see Ex 21:17; Lev 20:9; cf. Deut 27:16), “in such cases it was the object of the curse that made it wrong rather than the process; pronouncing harm on the innocent was forbidden; pronouncing harm on the evil was appropriate” (Stuart, 1218 [italics added]).

3.1. Imprecation Outside Wisdom Books, Poetry and the Writings. Outside the special purview of this dictionary (wisdom, poetry, writings), imprecation is found in three primary locales: (1) sanctions for covenantal disobedience (e.g., Lev 26:14-39; Deut 27:11-26; 28:15-68; 30:17-19), (2) prophetic contexts of judgment, and (3) places where individuals declare oaths, which typically involve curses (see 1.1 above). The first two locales can include numerous curse subtypes (Stuart delineates twenty-seven of them), such as the futility curse (Sutherland; Hillers), all of which can be summarized as having to do with “defeat, disease, desolation, deprivation, deportation, and death” (Stuart, 1218). The third locale again indicates that imprecation is more widespread than sometimes thought. Once again, even when it is not explicit, it seems to be the case that prayers for good fortune or imprecations for the opposite “are addressed to the Deity”

(Brichto, 218), the notion of divine involvement being one that Israel shared with its neighbors (Gordon, 492). It would seem, however, that such invocations were never done lightly. Brichto (216) argues that “imprecation is resorted to only when a failure of human resources is acknowledged or anticipated,” and that the third commandment may very well be “a prohibition of the use of the name YHWH in unjustifiable imprecations.”

3.2. Imprecation in Wisdom Books, Poetry and the Writings Outside the Psalms. If one brackets oath-taking (e.g., Ruth 1:17), full-blown imprecations outside the Psalter are relatively rare in the wisdom, poetry and writings of the OT. Job utters self-imprecations, including futility curses (Job 31, esp. Job 31:5-8, 16-22, 38-40), and famously curses the day he was born (Job 3:1-26). Personified Wisdom, sounding very much like a prophet, pronounces a futility curse in Proverbs 1:28: “Then they will call upon me, but I will not answer; they will seek me diligently, but will not find me” (NRSV). And personified Zion utters an imprecation on her enemies in Lamentations 1:21-22: “They heard how I was groaning, with no one to comfort me. All my enemies heard of my trouble; they are glad that you have done it. Bring on the day you have announced, and let them be as I am. Let all their evil doing come before you; and deal with them as you have dealt with me because of all my transgressions; for my groans are many and my heart is faint” (NRSV).

Each of these examples, not to mention others, deserves study and discussion; each has a particular function and meaning in its context. With reference to Lamentations 1, for instance, F. Dobbs-Allsopp (73) writes, “The curse serves as a proxy for the community’s inability to resist the enemy actively, and as such the poet once again effectively inculcates a compassionate disposition within his readers.” Without question, however, it is the imprecatory psalms that are the most (in)famous example of imprecation in the OT. In the final section here they are taken up by means of the question of the ongoing usefulness (or lack thereof) of malediction.

4. Appropriating Imprecation: The Case of the Imprecatory Psalms.

A number of psalms could be identified as imprecatory. A minimum listing would include Psalms 58; 79; 83; 94; 109; 137, but other psalms or portions of psalms could be mentioned (e.g., Ps 5:5-6, 9-10; 12:3-4). This holds true even for the beloved Psalm 139, which ends in a blood-thirsty curse of the wicked, demonstrating the truth that one cannot simply censor imprecation (or judgment) as if that would take care of the problem. As C. S. Lewis (22) wrote, “The bad parts will not ‘come away clean’; they may . . . be intertwined with the most exquisite things.” This is certainly the case with Psalm 137:1-6 and Psalm 139:1-18, both of which are well-known and well-loved texts of the Psalter that have often made their way into worship, hymnody or lectionaries, but without their imprecatory sections (Ps 137:7-9; 139:19-24). This type of surgery destroys the literary integrity of the compositions. Psalm 137, for example, is heading to vv. 7-9 right from the start; it is not as if the imprecation is an afterthought tacked on to an otherwise beautiful composition (see Miller 2004). Even so, how should we understand violent speech like this in the midst of beautiful prayers to God? Can it be appropriated somehow, or must it be rejected out of hand and without question in light of texts such as Luke 6:28 and Romans 12:14?

Space limitations preclude a full discussion, but the following eight points deserve careful consideration:

(1) One should remember the mechanics of imprecation and the role of the gods therein (see 2 above). “Merely expressing negative wishes had little force. . . . No curse could have effect without Yahweh’s superintendence” (Stuart, 1218). “For a curse to be effective it had to have divine authority and to be properly directed” (Gordon, 492). Undeserved curses would not “stick” (see Prov 26:2), and unwarranted curses could backfire on the one who uttered them (see Ps 109:17-20 [see Gordon, 492; and cf. the third commandment]). These points should give one pause when reading Psalm 137. To be sure, v. 7 explicitly calls the Lord to act against Edom, but the constructions in vv. 8-9 are curiously impersonal (“Happy is the one who . . .”). Perhaps the poet knows that Yahweh should not be invoked so directly in an imprecation such as this one; perhaps the sentiment in vv. 8-9 is “merely expressing negative wishes” that thus had little effective force but nevertheless were of benefit to the psalmist (see the third, fourth and fifth points below).

(2) The imprecatory psalms are not alone. As we noted earlier, malediction is a widespread phenomenon in the ancient world and in the OT. In Christian circles it is crucial to point out that cursing is also found in the NT, even in the mouth of Jesus (Mk 11:12-14, 20-25; Mt 21:18-22; [see Brueggemann, 80]), as well as in the mouths of the martyrs under the heavenly altar in Revelation, who ask the Lord to avenge their blood with haste (Rev 6:10 [see the third point below]). Interestingly enough, the Oxford English Dictionary gives an early example of the word “damn” from John Wycliffe’s 1382 translation of John 8:10. As if these examples were not enough to make the point, it should also be observed that the LXX translates the so-called annihilation formula, whereby people are cut off or forcibly removed from the community (usually Heb krt or hrm [e.g., Ex 31:14]), with the term anathema (ἀνάθεμα). This is noteworthy because Paul uses anathema in 1 Corinthians 16:22 and Galatians 1:8-9 to similar effect. Even more pointedly, anathema is often said against heretics in later Christian creeds and councils (first attested in the council of Elvira [AD 306]). Imprecation is thus not an “Old Testament problem.” Said differently, imprecation may be a problem for many Christians, but if so, it is a thoroughly biblical and thoroughly Christian problem (see Colman, 9-10, 21-22). It must be thought through as such.

(3) As E. Zenger (1996) and others (e.g., Firth, 142) have shown, the cry for vengeance that is so striking in the imprecatory psalms is, in reality, a cry for justice. Psalm 79 makes this point well, but so does Revelation 6:10. In Scripture, justice is never a wrong; instead, it is a supreme value. One should recall at this point that the lex talionis was actually a way of insuring that punishments were just, that they exactly fit the crime, no more, no less (note the verbs in Ps 137:8; see also Firth, 142). In an extensive study of the root nqm (“avenge, take vengeance”) in the Bible and beyond, G. Mendenhall (77) argued that this word had to do with the exercise of God’s sovereignty; vengeance was never a matter of personal vendetta or “private self-help” (cf. Firth, 141). In fact, actions of self-help “constitute a claim to an imperium on the part of the individual which is incompatible with and actually rebellious against the Imperium of Yahweh” (Mendenhall, 84; cf. 95, 98 [similarly, Firth]). One way this is seen in the imprecatory psalms is that the psalmist’s enemies are portrayed as the enemies of God (Miller 1986, 151; Bonhoeffer, 56-60; Davis, 27; Colman, 5, 10-11). Psalm 137, for instance, does not speak of injustices perpetrated against the psalmist—at least not against the psalmist alone—but rather of injustices done to Jerusalem/Zion, the city of God (Ps 137:1, 3, 5-7; cf. Pss 46; 48; 76; 84). In this way, the cry for vengeance is a cry for help, constituting hope for exiles, as well as for “the poor, the brokenhearted, the captives, and the grief-stricken” (Mendenhall, 100 [cf. Miller 1986, 151; Thompson, 68-70; Colman, 12]). In brief, imprecation arises not simply from anger and rage but rather from the complex mixture of those feelings as well as, more deeply, those of grief and sadness, despite and in spite of the rage and anger.

(4) In the case of the imprecatory psalms, the issue is one of violent speech (prayer), not violent acts (see Miller 1986, 153; Brueggemann, 66-67). It is, as P. Miller (2004, 200) notes, “at one and the same time to let it go and to hold it back”—letting the anger and rage go from the one who prays to God, who hears all prayers, and holding it back, preventing the rage and brutality from going public. “It is not now a part of our dealing with our neighbor-enemy. It is a part of our life with God” (Miller, 2004). It is far better to pray vengeful thoughts than take vengeful action. Vengeance is left in God’s hands (Deut 32:35; Rom 12:19; Heb 10:30), not our own (Miller 1986, 153; 2004, 201; cf. Firth, 141; Brueggemann, 70; Crawford, 22). In this way, imprecatory prayer may end up being prayer for our enemies, though certainly in much different fashion than we expected (Davis, 27-28). God’s body, evidently, can absorb violence that our enemies’ bodies cannot.

(5) The inclusion of curse in prayers to God indicates the full range of emotional honesty and candor that is a hallmark not only of the psalms but also of OT faith writ large (Miller 1986, 150). There is something of psychological wholeness and integrity at work in the imprecatory psalms as opposed to dishonesty, splitting off and denial. To be sure, it is probably the case that prayer is the only acceptable place where such thoughts may be entertained or uttered (Miller 1986, 151; 2004, 200); and yet, if and when they are, such prayer can be good, even beneficial, for the soul of the one who prays (Davis, 24-26; cf. 8-9). As W. Brueggemann (64-65) notes, the real problem with vengeance “is not that vengeance is there in the Psalms, but that it is here in our midst,” “in the human heart and the human community” (cf. James 3:9). If we lose the imprecatory psalms, we lose a way to “hold our anger in good faith” and “an opportunity to bring our own anger into the context of our relationship with God . . . for our spiritual growth” and healing (Davis, 24-26). The latter do not come through cover-up and denial.

(6) Imprecation can be educative. Even if we have not faced the kind of injustice that produces such prayers, the imprecatory psalms can provide a window onto another’s world. We ourselves may not feel such emotion (at the moment), but others do and have (note that Psalm 137 was used as a song by African American slaves). These psalms, then, can instruct our compassion (see Davis, 20) as well as give us words and strategies of containment and coping regarding what to do (and pray) if and when we face similarly dire circumstances.

(7) There is a venerable exegetical tradition that appropriates imprecation by redefining the cursed enemies as more acceptable “targets.” The NT sets an example by using Babylon as a cipher or metaphor for all that stands opposed to God (see Miles). This metaphorical Babylon comes to disastrous ruin in Revelation 16:19 (see also Rev 14:8; 18:2, 21). Perhaps, then, the Babylon of Psalm 137 could be similarly ciphered or “metaphorized.” The revisioning of the enemies by Lewis (136) is worth quoting in full:

I know things in the inner world which are like babies; the infantile beginnings of small indulgences, small resentments, which may one day become dipsomania or settled hatred, but which woo us and wheedle us with special pleadings and seem so tiny, so helpless that in resisting them we feel we are being cruel to animals. They begin whimpering to us “I don’t ask much, but,” or “I had at least hoped,” or “you owe yourself some consideration.” Against all such pretty infants (the dears have such winning ways) the advice of the Psalm [137] is the best. Knock the little bastards’ brains out. And “blessed” is he who can, for it’s easier said than done.

(8) Finally, one could appropriate the imprecatory psalms by following the advice of E. Davis (28), rotating them 180 degrees, so they are no longer pointing at our enemies but rather at us, and then asking the difficult question “Are there people in the world who would pray such things against me?” This is a sobering thought, and it might well result in a change of our ethic vis-à-vis our enemies, a change that could even lead to praying for them, blessing not cursing them, and turning the other cheek (Mt 5:39-41; Lk 6:28; Rom 12:14), until one day curse will be altogether obsolete and our enemies brought close (cf. Rev 22:3; Ps 83:16; see Colman, 13, 27-28).

These eight considerations are not fool-proof (see Crenshaw, 65-68). If we must beware of a simple-minded notion that God has no enemies (Miller 1986, 151; Brueggemann, 72-73), then we must also beware of appropriating the opposite perspective too easily, trusting ourselves too quickly that we can know and accurately identify God’s enemies (Miller 1986, 151; Thompson, 68-70; Colman, 11-12). Thoughtful exegetes through Christian history have known this, even if they, in human weakness, often failed to achieve it (for a good example of both, see Colman, esp. 11-12, 26). As J. Thompson (70) observes, “The history of Christian anti-Jewish exegesis—along with other variations that have come and gone, by which the enemies of God or Christ are identified among our contemporaries—ought to stand as an object lesson of what not to do with the Psalms. . . . In recovering the imprecatory psalms, we must be skeptical of our ability to know for certain who our real enemies are, when it’s enough to know that God is our ally.”

Some have thus located God’s vengeance and God’s allegiance as experienced in the imprecatory psalms in Christ and the cross (see Bonhoeffer, 56-60; Hays, 53-55; cf. Miller 1986, 152; Thompson, 68-70). That may or may not solve all the difficulties, and it will not satisfy all interpreters. Nevertheless, the considerations listed above are sufficient to indicate that there is a way beyond the psalms of vengeance, “but it is a way through them and not around them. And that is so because of what in fact goes on with us. Willy-nilly, we are vengeful creatures. . . . In taking this route through them, we take the route God ‘himself’ has gone” (Brueggemann, 80-81).

See also DESTRUCTION; HONOR AND SHAME; LAMENT, PSALMS OF; RETRIBUTION; WARFARE IMAGERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. H. Blank, “The Curse,

Blasphemy, the Spell, and the Oath,” HUCA 23 (1950-1951) 73-95; D. Bonhoeffer, Psalms: The Prayer Book of the Bible (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1970); H. C. Brichto, The Problem of “Curse” in the Hebrew Bible (SBLMS 13; Philadelphia: Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis, 1963); W. Brueggemann, Praying the Psalms: Engaging Scripture and the Life of the Spirit (2nd ed.; Eugene, OR: Cascade, 2007); T. W. Cartledge, Vows in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East (JSOTSup 147; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1992); B. Colman, Imprecation against the Enemies of God, Lawful and a Duty: As It Was Deliver’d in a Sermon at the Lecture in Boston, before His Excellency and the General Court, March 20th, 1707 (Boston: B. Green for N. Boone, 1707); T. C. Crawford, Blessing and Curse in Syro-Palestinian Inscriptions of the Iron Age (AUS 7/120; New York: Peter Lang, 1992); J. L. Crenshaw, The Psalms: An Introduction (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); E. F. Davis, Getting Involved with God: Rediscovering the Old Testament (Cambridge, MA: Cowley, 2001); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Lamentations (IBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp et al., Hebrew Inscriptions: Texts from the Biblical Period of the Monarchy with Concordance (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2005); D. G. Firth, Surrendering Retribution in the Psalms: Responses to Violence in the Individual Complaints (PBM; Milton Keynes: Paternoster, 2005); S. Gevirtz, “Curse Motifs in the Old Testament and in the Ancient Near East” (Ph.D. diss., University of Chicago, 1959); idem, “West-Semitic Curses and the Problem of the Origins of Hebrew Law,” VT 11 (1961) 137-58; R. P. Gordon, “Curse, Malediction,” NIDOTTE 4.491-93; C. B. Hays, “How Shall We Sing? Psalm 137 in Historical and Canonical Context,” HBT 27 (2005) 35-55; J. Hempel, “Die israelitischen Anschauungen von Segen und Fluch im Lichte altorientalischer Parallelen,” ZDMG 79 (1925) 20-110; D. R. Hillers, Treaty-Curses and the Old Testament Prophets (BibOr 16; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1964); P. A. Keim, “When Sanctions Fail: The Social Function of Curse in Ancient Israel” (Ph.D. diss., Harvard University, 1992); G. Leick, “Oaths and Curses,” DANE 217; C. S. Lewis, Reflections on the Psalms (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1958); G. E. Mendenhall, “The ‘Vengeance’ of Yahweh,” in The Tenth Generation: The Origins of the Biblical Tradition (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973) 69-104; S. A. B. Mercer, The Oath in Babylonian and Assyrian Lit- erature (Paris: P. Guethner, 1912); idem, "The Malediction in Cuneiform Inscriptions," JAOS 34 (1915) 282-309; C. A. Miles, "'Singing the Songs of Zion' and Other Sermons from the Margins of the Canon," Koinonia 6 (1994) 151-73; P. D. Miller, Interpreting the Psalms (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); idem, "The Hermeneutics of Imprecation," in The Way of the Lord: Essays in Old Testament Theology (FAT 39; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004) 193-202; S. Mowinckel, Psalmstudien V: Segen und Fluch in Israels Kult und Psalmdichtung (Amsterdam: P. Schippers, 1961 [1923]); idem, The Psalms in Israel's Worship (2 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1962); J. Pederesen, Der Eid bei den Semiten: In seinem Verhältnis zu verwandten Erscheinungen sowie die Stellung des Eides im Islam (SGKIO 3; Strasburg: K. J. Trübner, 1914); idem, Israel: Its Life and Culture (2nd ed.; 4 vols. in 2; London: Oxford University Press, 1959); D. Stuart, "Curse," ABD 1.1218-19; K. Q. Sutherland, "The Futility Curse in the Old Testament" (Ph.D. diss., Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1982); A. C. Thiselton, "The Supposed Power of Words in the Biblical Writings," JTS 25 (1974) 283-99; J. L. Thompson, Reading the Bible with the Dead: What You Can Learn from the History of Exegesis That You Can't Learn from Exegesis Alone (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007) 49-70; J. H. Walton, Ancient Near Eastern Thought and the Old Testament: Introducing the Conceptual World of the Hebrew Bible (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2006); G. Wehmeier, "Deliverance and Blessing in the Old and New Testaments," IJT 20 (1971) 30-42; E. Zenger, A God of Vengeance? Understanding the Psalms of Divine Wrath (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1996).

B. A. Strawn

IMPRISONMENT IMAGERY

Imagery of imprisonment in the books of wisdom, poetry and writings is used to evoke a variety of responses, from sympathy for those who are prisoners, to an awareness that incarceration may be an appropriate state for some. Other portions of the Bible preserve narrative descriptions of a variety of incarcerations, such as those of Jeremiah (Jer 32–33; 39), the prophet Hanani (2 Chron 16:10) and Joseph (Gen 39–41), with Joseph's becoming the object of attention in the book of *Psalms (Ps 105:17-21). In the books of wisdom, poetry and writings, however, there is a greater emphasis upon employing prison imagery in general for purposes of instruction or for personal catharsis. Unlike the narrative portions of the Bible that present the fact of imprisonment, the writings are more expansive in describing its dismal features and their affect upon those who are imprisoned: "In dark places he has made me dwell, like those who have long been dead; he has walled me in so that I cannot go out; he has made my chain heavy. . . . He has blocked my ways with hewn stone" (Lam 3:6-9 NASB).

1. Cultural Context
2. God and Imprisonment
3. Kingship and Imprisonment
4. Imprisonment as an Image of Death
5. Imprisonment Imagery and Sin
6. Prison as Prelude
7. Imprisonment Imagery and Self-Discipline

1. Cultural Context.

Prisons in the ancient Near East are, paradoxically, a well-established fact about which little is known. In accord with the fact that prisons are not mentioned as a punishment in the legal material of the Pentateuch—a phenomenon true also of all other law collections from the ancient Near East—the consensus is that prisons generally were not punitive but rather were essentially places of temporary confinement for accused individuals awaiting trial (cf. Lev 24:12; Num 15:34; 1 Kings 22:27) or for convicted offenders or debtors who had to be detained pending the execution of their sentence or payment of their debt (Westbrook 221, 714, 967). Prisoners are poetically juxtaposed with those destined to die (Ps 79:11; 102:20), a perspective that may underscore the primary function of incarceration as temporary detention for a penalty that will be administered later.

The features of prison life that surface as characteristic in the writings are attested in extra-biblical literature (Civil) and include darkness (Lam 3:6 [prisoners are associated with those who cannot see in Ps 146:7-8; cf. Is 42:7]), bronze or iron fetters (Ps 105:18; 149:8; Lam 3:7), confining stone walls (Lam 3:7, 9), and human laments and groans (Ps 79:11; 102:20). Specific parts of the body that are restrained include the feet and perhaps the neck (Ps 105:18). So striking is the imprisonment imagery in the book of Psalms that L. Delekat argued that those psalms in which the psalmist is hounded by people who wish to kill him stem from the experience of individuals seeking asylum in the cities of refuge, where an individual could be confined for protection against personal vengeance by anyone related to the offended party (Ex 21:13; Num 35:9-34; Deut 19:1-3; Josh 20:1-9). Such deprivation of freedom of movement for those who have committed no crime is unattested elsewhere in the ancient Near East, although the royal harem provides a further example of another such institution (Esther 2:3-15; cf. 2 Sam 20:3).

2. God and Imprisonment.

When the rebellious cosmic Sea appeared, God incarcerated it behind bolted doors (Job 38:8-11; cf. Job 26:10; Prov 8:27, 29), a barrier that may include the clouds that at God's behest allow some water to escape (Job 26:8; cf. Gen 1:6-8; 7:11; 8:2). Allusions to other larger-than-life incarcerations of supernatural rebels, this time among the stars, appear in the same chapter where God asks rhetorically if *Job has the ability to put the Sea behind bars: "Can you bind the chains of the Pleiades, or loose the cords of Orion?" (Job 38:31 NASB; cf. Is 14:12-15). Some humans who sense that God is mistreating them can complain of what they see as their similar imprisonment by God: "Am I the sea, or the sea monster, that you imprison me?" (Job 7:12).

As one who is capable of imprisoning the most powerful forces in the cosmos, and being sovereign over all areas of *life, God appears in these texts as the one who is primarily responsible for *suffering and tragedy. God therefore appears either as a jailer or as a monarch whose prerogative it is to incarcerate whomever he will (see Lam 3:6-9, quoted above). But this also means that God is the one who can set free. Thus, when God is portrayed as remedying the ills of human existence (e.g., children without parents, wives who have lost their husbands, individuals without families), among these ills are included prisoners whom God brings out of their confinement (Ps 68:5-6). Such forced confinement can be reminiscent of the Israelite experience in Egypt when Israel served the state as forced labor: the same verb (Hiphil of yš') that describes the exodus (Ps 105:37, 43; 136:11) is used also to describe God's bringing out to freedom those who are prisoners (Ps 142:7), a phenomenon deliberately juxtaposed with the exodus (Ps 68:6-7). Those who are forcibly removed from human contact by incarceration, so that their groans, laments and cries for help find a limited audience, appeal to God in particular as the only real source of assistance (Ps 79:11; 88:1, 8; 102:19-20).

3. Kingship and Imprisonment.

When empires extended their authority over neighboring kingdoms in the ancient Near East, those populations who resisted could be treated as prisoners. This same imagery was applied to the extension of the kingdom of God to other nations that do not willingly submit to the God of Israel: Israelites were portrayed as those who have a responsibility "to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron" (Ps 149:8). Non-Israelite nations may perceive the dominion of God's kingdom and his Davidic king as a confining reality, a prison from which they wish to free themselves when they exclaim, "Let us tear their fetters apart, and cast away their cords from us" (Ps 2:3 NASB).

Imprisonment as a function, indeed duty, of kingship implied that the king had ultimate control over prisoners. The king could delegate this authority, as Pharaoh did with Joseph, a prisoner subsequently freed who was in turn himself given the power "to imprison [Pharaoh's] princes at will" (Ps 105:22 NASB). In the same way that the king could imprison with impunity, he could similarly grant prisoners their freedom. Royal largesse could prompt the release of prisoners when a king came to the throne (e.g., 2 Kings 25:27) or on other special occasions. This notion may be in view when *Ahasuerus celebrated the coronation of his new queen, *Esther, and "made a release to the provinces" (Esther 2:18 KJV). A psalmist recollects that Pharaoh had released Joseph from his imprisonment (Ps 105:20), without noting that Joseph was ever exonerated of the trumped-up charges that led to his imprisonment in the first place. Such amnesty was entirely within the king's authority (Sasson 99-100) and may lie behind the imagery of psalmists who affirm that Yahweh, as the ultimate sovereign, is able to deliver them from their metaphorical or literal bonds (see 2 above).

4. Imprisonment as an Image of Death.

Pits were apparently a characteristic feature of prisons (Gen 40:15; Is 24:22; Jer 38:6). The place to which the dead go is generally portrayed as a dark (Ps 88:6, 12) pit (Ps 28:1; 30:3, 9; 88:4, 6; Prov 1:12), a place to which the wicked go prematurely as a consequence of their evil deeds

(Ps 9:17; 28:1-3), separated from family and friends (Ps 88:8, 18), a place where one is forgotten (Ps 88:5, 12) and from which one's voice no longer falls on listening ears (Ps 30:9). This is imagery that reflects a prison experience, particularly when one hears the psalmist describe his experience at the doorstep of Sheol: "I am shut up and cannot go out" (Ps 88:8). If imprisonment was not primarily a punitive experience but rather a place of confinement pending judgment, then the imagery is even more appropriate when applied to Sheol as a place to which all go, both righteous and unrighteous, and allows for further development in Judaism and Christianity of postmortem perceptions of judgment.

5. Imprisonment Imagery and Sin.

The imagery of imprisonment may portray sin and its consequences: a person's own sins play the role of an arresting officer ("His own iniquities will capture the wicked" [Prov 5:22]) or the binding ropes that immobilize the prisoner ("He will be held with the cords of his sin" [Prov 5:22]). Sinners can expect to find a fate associated with imprisonment in some fashion (Eccles 7:26). The imagery of imprisonment also describes a man deceived by a woman who exploits him for her own purposes. Such a woman plays the role of an arresting officer who seizes the man, her heart being the "snares and nets" that capture him, and her hands being the "chains" that keep him confined once he is captured (Eccles 7:26).

6. Prison as Prelude.

Imprisonment need not be the last word in a person's life, as the psalmist underscores when he retells the story of Joseph with further details not found in the Genesis account (Ps 105:17-21). In fact, Joseph's experience indicates that prison could even be a prelude to an even greater social rank than one had before, for he who was a prisoner became a lord able "to imprison princes" (Ps 105:20-22). Similarly, in Ecclesiastes 4:13-14 prison is not an irrevocable sentence, an assumption that underlies this account of a poor but wise youth who is released from prison to become king—a scenario reminiscent of, but probably not a reference to, the story of Joseph in Egypt. One point of this story in *Ecclesiastes is to establish two social extremes where prison is seen as the complete antithesis of the pinnacle of social life, kingship. Because the writer of Ecclesiastes contrasts a wise, incarcerated youth with an aged king who is no longer able to heed advice (note that Pharaoh was eager to take good advice from Joseph in contrast to this king), there may even be a suggestion that prison is a place where one is forced to learn some very hard lessons. This would be in accord with the fact that other forms of discipline (e.g., Prov 22:15; 23:13-14; 29:15) are pedagogic as well as punitive in Wisdom literature.

This is the posture that Elihu takes when he reminds Job that incarceration can instruct morally bankrupt individuals. In particular, God is the one who is responsible for confining prisoners, so that those who are bound with fetters (literal or figurative) have the choice of learning from the consequences of their activity and, if they reform, can be set free (Job 36:8-13). When Joseph leaves prison life behind and is given the authority to imprison even the most senior Egyptian officials, this special authority is pictured by the psalmist as a way by which Joseph could instruct Egyptians: "that [Joseph] might teach his elders wisdom" (Ps 105:22). Release from prison results when God decides that it is time or that his purposes have been achieved (Ps 105:19-20).

7. Imprisonment Imagery and Self-Discipline.

Parts of one's body can be metaphorically treated as prisoners who must be immobilized when they jeopardize one's life or do not cooperate with God's wishes. One treats the mouth and tongue as prisoners under guard, restraining them from doing the damage that they would otherwise be free to do (Ps 34:13; 39:1; Prov 13:3). One may even request that God be the jailer in such situations (Ps 141:3). Because desires should not be allowed to roam freely, the language of confinement graphically dramatizes emotional and volitional discipline (Prov 4:23). The notion of the body as a prison for the soul is not present in the Hebrew Bible, but it is not unheard of to witness individuals venting their frustration in seeing life itself as a prison. A desire for death (Job 3:11-23) can include the view that it is God who has made life too confining (Job 3:23).

See also WARFARE IMAGERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Barmash, Homicide in the Biblical World (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005); M. Civil, "On Mesopotamian Jails and Their Lady Warden," in The Tablet and the Scroll: Near Eastern Studies in Honor of William W. Hallo, ed. M. E. Cohen, D. C. Snell and D. B. Weisberg (Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1993) 72-78; L. Delekat, Asylie und Schutzorakel am Zionheiligtum: Eine Untersuchung zu den privaten Feindpsalmen (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1967); M. Foucault, Discipline and Punish: The Birth of the Prison (New York: Vintage Books, 1995; original, Surveiller et punir: Naissance de la prison [Paris: Gallimard, 1975]); J. A. Hoyles, Punishment in the Bible (London: Epworth, 1986); C. S. Lewis, "The Humanitarian Theory of Punishment," in God in the Dock, ed. W. Hooper (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970) 287-94; J. Sasson, ed., The Treatment of Criminals in the Ancient Near East (Leiden: E. J. Brill 1977); R. Westbrook, ed., A History of Ancient Near Eastern Law (HO 72; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003). S. Meier

INCLUSIO

Hebrew poetry features pervasive repetition. Often the repetition is not exact, but the following occurrences of a word, phrase or poetic line echo its first statement. *Parallelism, one of the most commonly occurring ornaments of Hebrew poetry, is a well-known form of repetition where the second colon repeats yet progresses the thought of the first colon. Parallelism, with its repetition and progression, occurs not only on the semantic level but also on the grammatical and perhaps even the phonological level. Parallelism describes the repetition that exists within a poetic line. Hebrew poems also exhibit repetitions beyond the line. The *refrain is one such example, where a line or part of a line is repeated at various points within the poem. The inclusio is similar to the refrain except that it occurs only twice—at the beginning and at the end of a poetic unit—with the unit being either a stanza or the whole poem. In short, an inclusio is a repeated phrase or whole line that stands at the beginning and end of a poetic unit. Some scholars use the term inclusio to include repetition of a mere word or even a similar root at or near the beginning of the poem or unit of a poem, but this extends the concept too far.

1. Terminology
2. Function
3. Examples
4. Conclusion

1. Terminology.

As is often the case with terminology in Hebrew poetics, the same phenomenon can have more than one name in the scholarly literature. Inclusio is the most common term used, but envelope structure or envelope figure is also found. The latter is the term used by R. G. Moulton (56-58), whom W. G. E. Watson credits with having identified the device in Hebrew poetry (Watson, 282). All three terms point to the function of this device as described in the next section. In classical rhetoric, the same feature is called epanadiplosis (so Moulton, 44).

2. Function.

The function of inclusio is obvious and straightforward. The inclusio delimits a poetic unit, providing a strong sense of beginning and closure. Thus the term inclusio indicates that everything that is found between the two occurrences is "included" in the unit. The two related terms that use "envelope" (structure/figure) give us an interesting metaphor. The poetic device of an inclusio delimits a text just like an envelope delimits a text by containing it. By framing the poem or part therein, the device evokes a sense of coherence to the text. In addition to the function of delimitation, the content of the inclusio may point to an important theme of the poem or section of text.

3. Examples.

3.1. Full-Line Inclusio. The following examples are not exhaustive but illustrative. The device is mostly associated with poetry, but at least in one clear case (*Ecclesiastes), it is found in prose as well. The presence of inclusio is most definite when the repetition involves the whole line. We will begin with a look at such examples.

3.1.1. Psalm 8. This is a majestic poem that praises God for his work of creation, including the wonderful status he has bestowed on his human creatures. The poem begins and ends with an expression of awe that extols God's greatness:

YHWH, our Lord,
how resplendent is your name
in all the earth! (Ps 8:1, 9)

This inclusio opens and closes the poem and provides the mood throughout. As J. Goldingay (160) puts it, "The repetition of the opening praise underlines the positive wonder and ensures that the worshippers close their praise with thoughts of God, not themselves."

3.1.2. Psalm 103. This psalm opens and closes with a self-admonition to praise God:

Praise YHWH, O my soul;
all my inmost being,
praise his holy name. (Ps 103:1, 22)

Thus, here, besides providing closure, the refrain applies the teaching about God's gracious acts that is found in the body of the psalm. Reflection on God's work leads to thanksgiving and worship. Psalm 104 begins and ends with a similar, but shorter, self-admonition ("Praise YHWH, O my soul," Ps 104:1, 35), but the final statement is followed by one more "Praise YHWH," though in the Septuagint this final phrase is found at the beginning of Psalm 105 (Allen 28). If this textual tradition is correct, then Psalm 105 would have a simple inclusio provided by the opening and closing "Praise YHWH" (similarly Ps 106; also Ps 113).

3.1.3. Psalm 118. This psalm has a military setting and thanks God for rescue from the hand of enemies (Ps 118:5-18). It is a liturgical psalm. A priest presumably calls on Israel, its priests and all the people who fear YHWH to praise him. The opening and closing verses provide an inclusio that summarizes this call to worship:

Give thanks to the LORD, for he is good;
his love endures forever. (Ps 118:1, 29)

3.1.4. Psalms 146–150. These psalms appear to be placed intentionally at the end of the book to provide a doxological conclusion to the psalter. They call on Israel to praise YHWH. Not surprisingly then each psalm begins and ends with the exhortation to "Praise YHWH" (Ps 146:1, 10; 147:1, 20; 148:1, 14; 149:1, 9; 150:1, 6).

3.1.5. Ecclesiastes. Ecclesiastes demonstrates that an inclusio can operate in a prose context. Indeed, there are no literary devices that are exclusive to poetry, though they may find a heightened and intensified use in poetry. After the superscription (Eccles 1:1), the *frame narrator represents the Teacher's (*Qohelet's) thinking with the characteristic phrase: "‘Completely meaningless,’ Qohelet said, ‘Everything is meaningless.’" Qohelet's reflective *autobiography is found in Ecclesiastes 1:12–12:7. When the frame narrator picks up the narrative again in Ecclesiastes 12:8, he begins with a repetition of Ecclesiastes 1:2. The effect of the repetition is that it leaves the reader in no doubt as to Qohelet's ultimate conclusion that the search for meaning in the world "under the sun" is meaningless. This inclusio and its importance for describing the message of the book of Ecclesiastes is recognized by many interpreters today (Longman, Anderson, Bartholomew).

3.2. Partial-Repetition Inclusio. The above examples are clear and obvious because they appear at the beginning and end of poems and are complete repetitions. The following are perhaps not so clear because they involve more or less repetition. Not all scholars or readers will agree with every other reader's identifications. Sometimes repetitions are incidental and not an intentional echo back to the beginning of a unit. Watson (284), for instance, will suggest an inclusio not only where there is only a single word repetition but also if there are different words derived from a common root. If these are instances of inclusio, they provide a weak sense of closure (i.e., "wicked" in Ps 1:1, 6; "good" in Ps 73:1, 28).

Even so, it does seem fair to recognize instances of inclusio that fall short of full, long repetitions. The following are examples.

3.2.1. Psalm 21 and 29. Psalm 21 is a *kingship psalm that praises the Lord for heeding prayer and granting the king victory and life. God's strength is therefore a major theme in the poem, and the repeated phrase "in your [God's] strength" in the first and last verses (Ps 21:1, 13) seems intentional.

The same might be said for Psalm 29, a hymn that exalts in the "voice of YHWH." The opening line calls on worshippers to ascribe "strength" (‘ōz) to YHWH (Ps 29:10), while the final line calls on God to grant "strength" to his people (Ps 29:11).

3.2.2. Proverbs 1:2-7. The preamble to the book of Proverbs follows the opening verse, which is a superscription. The preamble describes the purpose of the book that follows and then concludes with a statement of the underlying theme of the book (Prov 1:7). The first colon of the purpose statement declares that the "proverbs of Solomon" are "for gaining wisdom [hokmā] and discipline [mūsār]." It does not appear accidental that the climactic thematic statement ends by saying "fools despise wisdom [hokmā] and discipline [mūsār]" (Prov 1:7). The inclusio delimits the preamble and points to a major theme.

3.2.3. Song of Songs 2:8-17. The genre and structure of the Song of Songs is debated. Is it a collection of love poems or a drama? Whatever the answer, the specific outline of the book is difficult to describe, a fact that accounts for the wide variation of outlines among scholars. Song of Songs 2:8-17 appears to constitute a particular unit, defined in part by a partial inclusio provided by the picture of the lover as a gazelle that gambols on the mountains (Song 2:8-9, 17).

4. Conclusion.

The above examples are only illustrative and not exhaustive. Close readers will notice other instances of full and partial repetitions, and it will help them sense units as well as detect major themes.

See also PARALLELISM; POETICS; TERMINOLOGY OF; REFRAIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. C. Allen, Psalms 101-150 (WBC; Dallas: Thomas Nelson, 2002); W. H. U. Anderson, "The Poetic Incusio of Qoheleth in Relation to 1,2 and 12,8," SJOT 12 (1998) 203-13; C. Bartholomew, Ecclesiastes (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, forthcoming); J. Goldingay, Psalms: Psalms 1—41 (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, 2006); M. Kessler, "Inclusio in the Hebrew Bible," Semitics 6 (1978) 44-49; T. Longman III, Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); R. G. Moulton, The Literary Study of the Bible (London, 1896); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (2d ed.; T & T Clark, 2005). T. Longman III

INNERBIBLICAL EXEGESIS. See INTERTEXTUALITY.

INTERNATIONAL WISDOM. See LEMUEL AND AGUR; PROVERBS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND.

INTERTEXTUALITY

The word intertextuality, broadly defined, refers to the meaningful set of relationships that can be identified between various biblical and extra-biblical texts. The term is also used for methods of interpretation that attempt to go beyond simply tracing a writer's use of earlier sources. Intertextual studies turn attention to ways that later generations of writers and readers interpret and comment on the literary tradition. Some scholars speak of a shift of focus toward the mutual interaction that takes place when texts from the same or different times are read together. In this light, studies of "the Old Testament in the New" show that canonical reading enriches interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures as it informs a biblical theology of both Testaments.

It is a basic rule of interpretation that context determines meaning, and so in OT Scripture it is the interrelation of parts to the whole that makes meaning and enhances persuasive effect. For example, the meaning of *"fear of the LORD" (Prov 1:7) grows as it is used throughout the book of *Proverbs, especially at the conclusion of the introductory lectures (Prov 9:10) and the conclusion of the entire book (Prov 31:30). Moreover, references to the fear of God at significant points in *Job (Job 28:28), *Ecclesiastes (Eccles 12:13) and certain psalms (Ps 19:9; 34:11; 111:10) point to a wisdom theme. While we may or may not be able to discern whether such common use was meant to point to other texts, what is new in many intertextual studies is the intention to read them together as part of a canonical collection.

1. Theories and Approaches
2. Intertextuality within the Writings
3. Method: Critiques and Proposals

1. Theories and Approaches.

Although there is much debate and some agreement on what is meant by an intertextual approach to biblical interpretation, most of this work can be described in terms of three areas of interest and the related questions that give direction to the method: (1) innerbiblical exegesis; (2) dialogical literary theory; (3) the rhetoric of biblical theology (see Koptak).

1.1. Innerbiblical Exegesis. One area of research examines the use of older Scriptures set in new literary contexts to address new historical situations. Set within the story of *David bringing the ark to Jerusalem to institute *worship there, the song of praise in 1 Chronicles 16:8-36 is constructed from excerpts of three canonical psalms: Psalm 105:1-15, all of Psalm 96 except vv. 10b, 13b, and the first and last two verses of Psalm 106. The new text does not carry over those psalms' references to judgment on Israel and the nations. Instead, the new composite psalm moves in ever widening circles of praise, encompassing Israel (1 Chron 16:8-22), the nations (1 Chron 16:23-30) and all creation

(1 Chron 16:31-34). The new psalm adds “Say also” to introduce the quotation of Psalm 106:47-48 in 1 Chronicles 16:35, inviting its first readers to make the ensuing prayer their own. Exiles could trace this movement of confident praise and then pray in response, “Save us, O God of our salvation, and gather and rescue us from among the nations, that we may give thanks to your holy name, and glory in your praise.”

So also, the dedicatory prayer by *Solomon in 2 Chronicles 6:40-42 does not include the conclusion of the source text (1 Kings 8:50-53) but rather inserts a new conclusion fashioned from excerpts of Psalm 132 (vv. 8, 9, 10, 1). The short new psalm puts more attention on the temple and people than on the Davidic king, reversing the message of the original psalm. Thus the Chronicler created two new psalms from the canonical psalms, selecting, deleting and reassembling, all to support the message of renewal promised to a repentant people (Klein).

First to use the term innerbiblical exegesis was N. Sarna, in a study of the interpretive variations introduced to the covenant with David in Psalm 89:29-37 (as compared with its narrative source in 2 Sam 7:14-17; cf. 1 Chron 17:3-15). Based on Sarna's work, today there is general agreement on the literary unity of the psalm as an expansion of older core components. The poetry moves between heaven and earth, symbolically linking the divine orders of creation with the Davidic throne, God's representative of order in human affairs. Twelve key words or phrases join the *hymn of Psalm 89:1-18 with the oracle of Psalm 89:19-37, particularly the concluding word of the hymn, “our king,” highlighting what is also central to the oracle. Sarna called this the stamp of a single creative editor-psalmist who composed the lament of Psalm 89:38-51 and joined together the components that make up Psalm 89 (see Sarna, 29-33).

Sarna thought that this account of the psalm's composition also explained the variations from the earlier prose oracle. First, the psalm has no word about David's desire to build the temple, thus turning attention to the psalmist's present crisis. Second, 2 Samuel 7:10 promises respite to people of Israel, but because that peace ended with David's reign, the psalmist narrowed it to David personally (Ps 89:22-23). Third, whereas in 2 Samuel 7:14 and 1 Chronicles 17:13 we have “son,” Psalm 89:26-27 uses “firstborn,” thus limiting the father-son relationship to David and not his offspring. Fourth, the punishment for sin threatened to the immediate son of David (2 Sam 7:14) was transferred to the entire Davidic dynasty (Ps 89:30). Finally, the psalmist uses bērit and šāb^c in regard to the swearing of a covenant (Ps 89:3, 34-35, 39, 49 [MT 89:4, 35-36, 40, 50]), terms that are not found in the narrative oracle but do appear in David's last words (2 Sam 23:5) and in a psalm commemorating him (Ps 132:11). In this way, Psalm 89 draws attention to the contrast between the earlier promise to the Davidic dynasty and the then present reality of defeat. Whereas previous scholarship had simply tried to establish which of the texts was later and dependent on the other, Sarna argued that the variations were an interpretation, “a pattern of deliberate and original exegesis on the part of the psalmist, who has adapted an ancient oracle to a new situation.” Sarna identified that situation as the Aramean-Israelite invasion of Judea in 735-734 BC and the movement to depose Ahaz and replace him with a non-Davidic king (see Sarna, 39-46).

Claiming that interpretation is basic to the work of religious leaders, M. Fishbane added that one can find within the Hebrew Bible the same processes of interpretation that carried over into the writing of the NT and rabbinic Midrash, although each used it in a different way. Fishbane defined traditum as the authoritative content, and traditio as the complex process of transmission, the reason why the content of the traditum is as varied as it is. Revisiting Sarna's work, he spoke of Psalm 89's “transformative exegesis” that brings a sense of closure to prophetic oracles. The nature of the original oracle in 2 Samuel 7 is ambiguous, but that helped keep it alive, even among David's successors (1 Kings 5:5 [MT 5:19]; 8:19-20), and that ambiguity allowed for reshaping of details to address a new historical situation. The psalmist not only reminds the LORD “You spoke” but then actually quotes the LORD's words back to him with modification, applying the vision to the entire Davidic dynasty (see Fishbane 1985, 465-67, 533-35).

Fishbane (2000) recognized that the “intertextuality” of later rabbinic midrash viewed all of Scripture as a coherent whole, and so any part potentially could comment on another. However, his and other studies of innerbiblical interpretation are primarily diachronic in their focus on authors and editors. Buchanan (3) summarizes the approach well: “It makes a great deal of difference in the meaning of a document when it is known to be a literature about a literature."

1.2. Literary Theories. Whereas innerbiblical approaches tend to be grounded in the assumptions and methods of *historical criticism, another group of interpreters draws from developments in literary theory. It was a cultural critic, J. Kristeva, who coined the term intertextuality. Her innovations drew inspiration from the anthropological studies of C. Lévi-Strauss and the literary criticism of M. Bakhtin. The former described the mosaic-like design of ancient and "primitive" myths with the term bricolage, the work of piecing together a collage of art, mythology or worldview. Here Kristeva found a way to challenge the then-current view that literary texts were autonomous works of individuals and therefore to be valued for their originality. Instead, she argued, if communicators borrow and reuse ideas and their expressions, any work could be understood as part of a network of reference.

Kristeva spoke of a literary work as a "mosaic of quotations; any text is the absorption and transformation of another" (Kristeva, 37). Inspired by Bakhtin's dialogical view of language and literature, she turned her attention from the linguistic unit of the sign to the relation of one sign to another. Words, Bakhtin had observed, live not in dictionaries but in people's mouths. Those words are typically spoken in response or answer to what has gone before. In reaction to structuralist text-centered theory, Kristeva stressed the importance of writers as both creators and respondents, purposefully using citation and reference to achieve persuasive ends (see Clayton and Rothstein; Tanner, 6-10).

Whereas innerbiblical interpretation works within the boundaries of the biblical *canon, the very nature of dialogic theory expands the notion of text to include anything that can be "read," thus revealing an endless network of potential connections with interpretive works of art, music and theater. For some, the dialogic approach implies that there is always more that can be said, leaving interpretation incomplete, tentative and de-centered (Beal). Yet relation to other texts and attention to the multivoiced nature of Scripture need not rule out authorial intention and divine authorship (Phillips, 244).

The dialogic approach in particular offers another starting point for intertextual research within the biblical canon. It assumes that a text enters an environment of varied and even competing speech acts, and that its part in the dialogue is reflected in the text itself as a response. Audiences of readers and hearers also engage texts as active respondents. Therefore, interpreters can do more than identify connections with earlier texts and parse the reuse of well-known words and their associations; they can also explain the function of that reuse, shedding light on its persuasive purpose (Bakhtin; Tull 1999, 166-67). So, for example, the outcry in *Lamentations over the fate of Jerusalem, that "she has no comforter" (Lam 1:2, cf. Lam 1:9, 16, 17, 21), can be read alongside the Lord's answer in Isaiah, "I, I am your comforter" (Is 51:12), the prophet here using what may have been familiar words to declare a new beginning (Tull 2000, 178).

Such interpretive moves need not establish a direct historical relation to a text or the intention to do so by its writers and transmitters. They do look for connections that readers acquainted with the larger body of the canon might make, approaching criticism from a slightly different angle than one that traces reuse, changes and revisions.

So one might look not only at modifications of the promise to David in Psalm 89, but also at dialogical relationships with other psalms and Scriptures. One way to do so is to examine the use of key words both within and outside the psalm. For example, as Sarna noted, the term hesed appears in Psalm 89:14, 19, 24, 33, 49 (MT 89:15, 20, 25, 34, 50), linking the Lord's faithfulness with the Davidic covenant and becoming the basis for petition. David is spoken of in Psalm 89:20 as one whom God has "anointed," and that word gives force to the psalmist's charge that the Lord has forsaken this covenant and abandoned the king and people (Ps 89:38-39, 50-51).

Key terms and imagery from Psalm 89 also appear in Psalm 90. A plea for the end of God's punishment argues that life is already too short (Ps 90:10, cf. Ps 89:45), using the words "anger," "fury" and "face" (Ps 90:7-8, 11; cf. Ps 89:46) and the question "How long?" (Ps 90:13; cf. Ps 89:46). The petition made by "your servants" (Ps 90:13, 16; cf. Ps 89:50) makes appeal to the Lord's steadfast love and faithfulness (Ps 90:14; cf. Ps 89:49; see also Ps 89:14, 19, 24, 33). Both laments use images of eternity to recount God's faithfulness, the ancient creation and its orders serving as a sign (Ps 90:1-2; cf. 89:1-14). A lament is made in the hope that God will not reject forever, yet the possibility always exists.

Thus, an examination of verbal links shows that the crisis of Psalm 89—the defeat of the king and apparent failure of the Davidic covenant—is answered by the lament and hopeful confidence in the prayer of Psalm 90. The discovery of terms shared by these neighboring psalms indicates an intention, either by arrangement or composition, to bring the two together in conversation, the petitions of both working together to present an extended sense of lament and, with the addition of the prayers of Psalm 90:13-17, a stronger statement of hope. God, who has been a refuge in every generation, has always been God (Ps 90:1-2). Therefore it is likely that this God will turn in mercy to those who call out to him. If there is sin in the people (as there is in all of humanity [Ps 90:3-12]), God can be petitioned to turn and be gracious (Ps 90:13-17).

Another line of research makes further connection with the biblical narrative. The superscription of Psalm 90, “A Prayer of Moses, the Man of God” (Ps 90:1), was mostly ignored by critical scholars of a previous generation because it appeared to be a later addition not found in early manuscripts. Taking a dialogic view, Tanner finds there a clue of “simultaneous activation of two texts.” It has long been recognized that Psalm 90:13 draws its prayer “Turn, O LORD!” and “turn/repent” from Exodus 32:12, and that the wording “man of God” (Ps 90:1) in the superscription also appears as an introduction to prayer in Deuteronomy 33:1, the only use in the entire Pentateuch. But Tanner views the mention of Moses as a “marker,” not so much a source as an evocation of another text, wherein the reading of both is mutually enriched by the interaction. So, for example, read against the background of the wilderness wanderings, “You have been our dwelling place” (Ps 90:1) points to God’s protection and provision of the children of Israel. The conclusion asks God to “establish the work of our hands,” echoing the vocabulary of Exodus 15:17, an earlier poetic reference to God’s rule and care for his people. Within this framework the psalm’s plea for relief from long-lasting judgment finds its answer in the story of the wilderness generation and God’s long-suffering patience with a rebellious people. “Consumed by your anger” (Ps 90:7) points back to God’s response to the golden calf (Ex 32:10; cf. Ex 33:3). The connection to the larger narrative enhances reading of the links. It is only Moses in the entire Hebrew Bible who urges God to “turn” or repent (Ps 90:13; Ex 32:12) and so God does (Ex 32:12). The earlier story inspires the hope of the psalmist’s prayer (see Tanner, 90-91).

Finally, research into the canonical shape of the Psalter has shown that the book is composed as a series of psalm pairs and larger groups, ordered within a fivefold structure that may reflect Israel’s story of kingdom, conquest and hope for restoration. Interpreters have observed that in Psalm 90, Moses’ “answer” to the monarchy’s failure leads Israel back to the foundational covenant of Sinai. In this view, the confidence in kingship (Pss 1—72) is modified in light of exile (Pss 73—89), the psalms that follow reminding Israel that the Lord is king (see Kingship Psalms), was refuge before the monarchy, and will be the same even when the monarchy is gone (Wilson 1985; 1986).

Some have described the dialogic approach as having a more synchronic focus, although historical issues of composition and shaping are still at play. Admittedly, there is the possibility of fanciful readings that distort the meaning of text and co-text, but this consideration of the reader’s role in making connections and formulating a biblical theology makes an important contribution to preaching and teaching.

1.3. Biblical Theology and Rhetoric. The previous intertextual reading that brought Psalm 89 and Psalm 90 together with the story of Israel’s deliverance points toward a third emphasis: the insistence that the Scriptures of Israel be interpreted theologically as canon. The preservation of these books by Jews and Christians (including the earlier work of editing and ordering) is itself testimony that they are of more than historical interest: believers may find there a word of God for contemporary living. The canonical approach brings together a concern for a biblical theology of both Testaments with interest in the rhetorical strategies that invite responses of praise, obedience and trust.

*Rhetorical criticism examines the structure and stylistic techniques of the Bible as a record of an engagement between ancient speakers, discourse and audiences. A rhetorical approach will also look closely at the way a text is shaped as persuasive communication to later generations of readers (Cunningham). Biblical theology is primarily concerned with the function of Scripture as witness to “the God of Israel, who raised Jesus from the dead.” Each Testament preserves its distinct witness in mutual engagement. The two tasks for the Christian reader are to interpret the OT per se and in novo receptum, as received in the NT (Seitz, 3-12).

Relationships within the Hebrew and Christian canon can be identified. Interpreters have recognized the relationship between the prophecies of Isaiah and the *lament psalms, particularly the shared vocabulary “everlasting covenant” and “steadfast love for David” in Isaiah 55:3-5 and Psalm 89:33-35. Some have argued that the royal promises were thereby transferred away from David and to the people in the Isaiah text. Others have come to question this view on canonical grounds, arguing that the promises became a “paradigmatic illustration” for the nations coming to the people (Isa 53:4-5).

A comparison of the canonical shape of the books of *Psalms and Isaiah shows that references to David and/or the monarchy come early in both books but are not as pronounced in the latter parts (Pss 90—150; Isa 40—66). Still, although the promise fades, it does not vanish. The prayer of Moses turns the focus on the sin of the people, not the failure of covenant to David. Isaiah 55:3 calls on that faithful covenant to David as the basis for a new promise to the people. The covenant with David is not revoked but rather becomes the paradigm for a new work of God for Israel. So the kingship of God, sounded throughout the psalms that follow Psalm 90 (Ps 93:1; 95:3; 96:10; 97:1; 98:6; 99:4), is also sounded throughout Deutero-Isaiah (Is 40:10; 41:21; 43:15; 44:6). If at root the question of Israel’s laments, particularly that of Psalm 89, is whether the Lord is really king of heaven and earth, it is answered decisively and without change or cancellation of the promise made to David (Seitz, 150-67).

If the question of the Davidic monarchy can be left open, then not only can Isaiah 55:1-5 be read intertextually as a divine answer to Psalm 89, but also the question can remain open with a future orientation, even pointing to a *messiah. Three allusions in Revelation 1:5 identify Jesus the Christ as the answer to the question posed in Psalm 89: Christ is faithful (or enduring) witness (cf. Ps 89:37), firstborn (Ps 89:27a) and ruler over kings of the earth (Ps 89:27b) (see Heim). The covenant with David is not abandoned but rather renewed, and it will be made manifest in Christ’s return. Although there is no early Christian citation of Ps 89:49-50, there are numerous NT citations in which Christ takes the Davidic laments as his own or they are attributed to him (Hays). A reading of Revelation 1:5 in light of Psalms and Isaiah presents a strong statement of Christ the king and his call to mission.

2. Intertextuality Within the Writings.

The threefold division of the Hebrew Scriptures as Torah, Prophets and Writings allows for a related canonical question: How is the collection known as the Writings itself a response to the crisis of the end of monarchy and exile, a response to texts that have gone before? Such questions will attend to both the canonically shaped content of the Writings and the needs and dynamics of the community that it addresses. Seen in this light, the various books of the Writings themselves present a variety of possible responses to the crisis of exile, all based in some way on the story of Israel attaining canonical authority as Torah and Prophets.

One proposal envisions the varied genres of the Writings (hymns and laments, wisdom writings, Diaspora stories of heroines, plus the visions of Daniel and historical narrative of Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah [not treated in this volume]) as proposals toward what it means to be the people of God after the fall of temple and throne. As strategies for living in a new situation, they offer instruction and inspiration for education, worship and building community (Morgan). Therefore, a brief sketch of intertextual links between the books of the Writings and the OT and NT Scriptures follows.

2.1. Psalms and Lamentations. Psalms of lament, praise, confession and wisdom reflection gave voice to individual and communal relationship with God as centered in Israel’s worship. Worship looks back on God’s work of salvation with praise and cries out when it appears to be absent. The need for cultic organization may have been important to exiles, particularly in the shift from temple worship to houses of prayer. Worship also provided a source of identity and means of survival, integrating the past, present and future of Israel in song and prayer (Morgan 42-44).

Many of the psalms do contain references to Torah (Pss 1; 119) (see Law), and the prophets' story of the monarchy is reflected in royal psalms and messianic themes (Litwak). Some psalms resemble the literature of wisdom, particularly in questions concerning the prosperity of the wicked (Pss 37; 49). The fivefold structure of the book of Lamentations may reflect the similar structures of Torah and the Psalter, while imagery and phrases shared with Job and lament psalms highlight the mercy of God to righteous and repentant alike (Lam 3:22-24). Such lament is featured center stage at Jesus' crucifixion (Koptak). However, the NT does not remember Job's lament, but only his patience. Job is cited only in the book of James as a model of endurance (James 5:11) and of right speaking and living (see James 3:1-18; cf. Job 9:14-21; 27:1-6; 29:1-17) (see Richardson).

2.2. Wisdom. Living life well as a reflection of creation's order is one concern of the wisdom writings of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Job. Later writings such as *Sirach explicitly link wisdom with the Torah, but the emphasis on passing instruction from one generation to the next is found in Proverbs and Deuteronomy. A call to learn wisdom's ways concludes the book of Ecclesiastes (Eccles 12:9-14) and the prophet Hosea (Hos 14:9). Although the wisdom writings make no direct reference to Torah and Prophets (see Wisdom and Prophecy), the books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and *Song of Songs are set in historical relationship with Israel by association with Solomon. Reading of these books ought not be dehistoricized but rather can be canonically linked to Israel's story (Sheppards).

Readers of the canon in later generations may bring together the opposing perspectives of Isaiah 43:19 ("I make something new") with Ecclesiastes 1:9 ("Nothing new exists under the sun"), examining the way each speaks to the topic of knowledge. *Qohelet helps readers recognize the limits of human knowledge, itself a step forward in wisdom. We do not know if earlier days are better than later days (Eccles 7:10-12), but Isaiah 41:22 claims that good observation of history does produce insight into the Lord's ways: he announces what will come, and it comes. Historical lessons are not enough, however, and a new creation is needed, both in the vision that the suffering servant mediates and a re-creation of the people (Talstra). Wisdom teaching sets a pattern for Jesus, the sage "greater than Solomon" (Witherington), and NT Christology builds on the personified figure of wisdom (see Personification).

2.3. Storytellers for Diaspora Living. *Ruth and *Esther in very different ways depict a heroine's ability to overcome adversity. Both are foreigners to the people among whom they dwell, but the book of Ruth presents an inclusive picture of Israel that receives Ruth, while the book of Esther assumes the need for strong boundaries of national identity as a means to survive in a hostile environment of exile. Common to both is the inescapable sense of divine guidance and aid, everywhere present yet hidden—as the ancient rabbis put it, "gloved." Without divine intervention or prophetic vision, Israel's two concerns for care of the stranger and deliverance from oppression are sustained and held in tension.

The frequent reference to Ruth's Moabite heritage can direct the reader to Moab's origin in the union between Lot and his older daughter (Gen 19:37). This intertextual "marker" links two stories of women facing destitution and the end of their family line, but there is also a contrast. The later story has a happy outcome as Ruth is proved righteous and the question of David's foreign ancestry is put to rest (cf. Deut 23:3, see Nielsen, 20-22). A more obvious marker is the reference that *Naomi makes to Tamar, another woman who acted to insure the future of her wedded family's line. Both Tamar and Ruth appear in the genealogy of Jesus (Matt 1:1-6).

3. Method: Critiques and Proposals.

There is much overlap in the approaches surveyed above, even though they are guided by different sets of questions. Common to each is the search for common vocabulary, images and themes and a shift in focus from identifying sources to looking more closely at the actual theological/rhetorical use. Discussion of methodological issues will continue to include the conscious and unconscious role of authors(s) and editors, as well as the role of later readers in making connections. There will most likely be pressure for greater precision in use of terminology.

But identifying possible connections alone does not make a case for relationship, and various attempts have had their critics. Some claim that larger narrative patterns make intentional links more likely than word links (Noble); others maintain that the idea of canon as an authoritative body of texts sets limits on the multiplicity of meanings and preserves authorial intention (Childs). One proposed solution distinguishes the synchronic study of intertextuality from the diachronic study of allusion and influence. The latter looks at authors and texts, tracing the use and influence of earlier texts; the former looks at the way readers make associations with other texts and an even wider range of "utterances" in their cultural environment (Sommer; Clayton and Rothstein). A similar approach combines Tannen's study of framing-in-discourse with Hollander's theory of echo, thus renewing focus on writers (Litwak). Reader-oriented critics answer that the distinction between allusion and exegesis is too hard to maintain. They recommend another distinction between exegesis as application or actualization of an earlier text, and exegesis as giving new meaning to an earlier text (Weyde). In this way, interpreters can try to honor authorial intention and the possibility of dialogue with later intertexts.

In sum, we begin with the twofold recognition that no text is written without some relation to others, nor is any text read independently of other texts: "No text comes into being or is read as an isolated unit" (Nielsen, 17-18). Therefore, interpretation can and should attempt to trace the marks of intention left in the text, even though the results are often uncertain. But because writing produces a mosaic of references, both conscious and unconscious, texts have their own integrity, "a delicate balance of dependence and independence"; and, because texts are read in particular contexts, intertextuality must attend to readers who respond to both (Phillips, 234).

One helpful proposal distinguishes separate phases in intertextual reading. A first phase tries to identify an author's intentions by means of markers that point to the intertexts by which readers can understand those intentions. A second phase considers the editorial work that can be observed in the formation of the canons of Judaism and Christianity (see Editorial Criticism). Although it is much more difficult, if not impossible, to decide whether these intertextual references are intended (or by whom), the reader's work of drawing connections within the canon is brought into play. Finally, a third phase identifies intertexts that are clearly of a later date and acknowledges the role of a reader in making a connection with postbiblical works of interpretation, including art, music and the interpreter's autobiography (Nielsen). Although the last phase names as intertext what others would simply call an interpretation, it does highlight the dialogical processes at work in the act of reading. At its best, intertextual reading draws its method from the relationships presented by the texts themselves. Perhaps this is its greatest contribution to the effort to hear the message of the OT and the NT as Christian Scripture.

See also EDITORIAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. M. Bakhtin, The Dialogic Imagination, ed. M. Holquist (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1981); T. K. Beal, "Intertextuality," in Handbook of Postmodern Biblical Interpretation, ed. A. K. M. Adam (Saint Louis: Chalice Press, 2000) 128-30; G. W. Buchanan, Introduction to Intertextuality (Lewiston, NY: Mellen Biblical Press, 1994); J. H. Charlesworth, "Intertextuality: Isaiah 40:3 and the serek ha-yahad," in The Quest for Context and Meaning: Studies in Biblical Intertextuality in Honor of James A. Sanders, ed. C. A. Evans and S. Talmon (BIS 28; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 197-224; B. S. Childs, "Critique of Recent Intertextual Canonical Interpretation," ZAW 115 (2003) 173-84; J. Clayton and E. Rothstein, "Figures in the Corpus: Theories of Influence and Intertextuality," in Influence and Intertextuality in Literary History, ed. J. Clayton and E. Rothstein (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991) 3-36; D. S. Cunningham, "Rhetoric," in Handbook of Postmodern Biblical Interpretation, ed. A. K. M. Adam (Saint Louis: Chalice Press, 2000) 220-26; M. Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985); idem, "Types of Biblical Intertextuality," in Congress Volume: Oslo 1998, ed. A. Lemaire and M. Saebø (VTSup 80; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 39-44; R. B. Hays, "Christ Prays the Psalms: Israel's Psalter as Matrix of Early Christology," in The Conversion of the Imagination: Paul as Interpreter of Israel's Scripture (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005) 101-18; K. M. Heim, "The (God-) Forsaken King of Psalm 89: A Historical and Intertextual Inquiry," in King and Messiah in Israel and the Ancient Near East: Proceedings of the Oxford Old Testament Seminar, ed. J. Day (JSOTSup 270; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 297-322; R. W. Klein, "Psalms in Chronicles," in CurTM 32 (2005) 264-

- 75; P. E. Koptak, "Intertextuality," in Dictionary for the Theological Interpretation of the Bible, ed. K. J. Vanhoozer (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2005) 332-34; J. Kristeva, "Word, Dialogue and Novel," in The Kristeva Reader, ed. T. Moi (New York: Columbia University Press) 34-61; K. D. Litwak, Echoes of Scripture in Luke-Acts: Telling the History of God's People Intertextually (JSNTSup 282; London: T & T Clark, 2005); R. Mason, "Inner-Biblical Exegesis," in A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, ed. R. J. Coggins and J. L. Houlden (London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990) 312-14; D. F. Morgan, Between Text and Community: The "Writings" in Canonical Interpretation (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); K. Nielsen, "Intertextuality and Hebrew Bible," in Congress Volume Oslo 1998, ed. A. Lemaire and M. Sæbø (VTSup 80; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 17-31; P. R. Noble, "Esau, Tamar, and Joseph: Criteria for Identifying Inner-Biblical Allusions," VT 52 (2002) 219-52; E. A. Phillips, "Serpent Intertexts: Tantalizing Twists in the Tales," BBR 10 (2000) 233-45; K. A. Richardson, "Job as Exemplar in the Epistle of James," in Hearing the Old Testament in the New Testament, ed. S. E. Porter (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006), 213-29; N. M. Sarna, "Psalm 89: A Study in Inner Biblical Exegesis," in Biblical and Other Studies, ed. A. Altmann, (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1963), 29-46; C. R. Seitz, Word Without End: The Old Testament as Abiding Theological Witness (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); G. T. Sheppard, "Biblical Wisdom Literature at the End of the Modern Age," in Congress Volume: Oslo 1998, ed. A. Lemaire and M. Sæbø (VTSup 80; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 369-98; B. D. Sommer, A Prophet Reads Scripture: Allusion in Isaiah 40-66 (Contraversions; Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1998); E. Talstra, "Second Isaiah and Qohelet: Could One Get Them on Speaking Terms?" in The New Things: Eschatology in Old Testament Prophecy: Festschrift for Henk Leene, ed. F. Postma, K. Spronk, E. Talstra (ACEBT 3; Maastricht: Shaker, 2002) 225-36; B. L. Tanner, The Book of Psalms through the Lens of Intertextuality (SBL 26; New York: Peter Lang, 2001); P. K. Tull, "Rhetorical Criticism and Intertextuality," in To Each Its Own Meaning: Biblical Criticisms and Their Applications, ed. S. L. McKenzie and S. R. Haynes (rev. ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999) 156-79; idem, "The Rhetoric of Recollection," in Congress Volume: Oslo 1998, ed. A. Lemaire and M. Sæbø (VTSup 80; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 71-79; K. W. Weyde, "Inner Biblical Interepretation: Methodological Reflections on the Relationship between Texts in the Hebrew Bible," SEÅ 70 (2005) 287-300; G. H. Wilson, The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (SBLDS 76; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985); idem, "The Use of Royal Psalms at the 'Seams' of the Hebrew Psalter," JSOT 35 (1986) 84-94; B. Witherington, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994).

P. E. Koptak

J

JOB 1: BOOK OF

The place of the book of Job within the Wisdom literature is firmly secured by its themes, content and style. Its literary quality and compelling characters have made it one of the most sublime masterpieces of ancient literature. Yet for all that, it is a book often misunderstood, resulting in the all-too-common belief that it falls short of its goal—thus Bernard Shaw’s quip: “If I complain that I am suffering unjustly, it is no answer to say, ‘Can you make a hippopotamus?’” (Baker, 17). This cynicism might be appropriate if the book’s goal were to give an explanation for human *suffering (as is assumed by existentialist Archibald MacLeish in his play J.B., which is based on the book of Job and won a Pulitzer Prize). Though many have assumed that the purpose of the book is to explain human suffering (observed by Dumbrell, 91), I will propose here that its goal is to guide the reader concerning how to think about God in the face of suffering.

1. Structure and Genre
2. Rhetorical Strategy
3. Message
4. Unity and Composition
5. Date and Context

1. Structure and Genre.

1.1. Structure. A number of views have been proposed regarding the structure of the book, but they focus mainly on the roles of Job 3 and Job 28–31. The question concerning Job 3 is whether it serves as a transition from the narrative frame to the dialogue or as the beginning of the dialogue (see Frame Narrative). The question concerning Job 28–31 revolves around the identification of the speaker in Job 28. On the latter, N. C. Habel (1985, 391) summarizes the diversity of opinions: “Job 28 is a brilliant but embarrassing poem for many commentators. It has been viewed as an erratic intrusion, an inspired intermezzo, a superfluous prelude, and an orthodox afterthought.” Most commentators today consider Job’s last speech in the dialogue section to end with Job 27 (e.g., Dhorme, Gordis, Tur-Sinai, Driver-Gray, Hartley, Andersen, Westermann, Rowley, Pope, Habel, Smick). In this scenario Job 28 is usually viewed as the narrator’s wisdom *hymn serving as interlude (if not judged simply extraneous or secondarily intrusive), and Job 29–31 is a separate discourse by Job. This modern consensus, against the older traditions that Job’s last speech included Job 28 and then continued through Job 31, finds support both structurally (since Job’s discourse in Job 29–31 could then be seen as part of a discourse section along with discourses by Elihu and Yahweh) and in terms of content (since the wisdom hymn comes to conclusions that do not reflect Job’s thinking as it is represented in his speeches either before or after the hymn [see Habel 1985, 392]). I therefore agree with J. F. A. Sawyer’s (255) comparison of Job 28 to the chorus of a Greek tragedy that “looks back to the inadequacy of wisdom as portrayed in the first part of the book and forward to the Yahweh speeches on divine wisdom in the second” (this comparison did not originate with Sawyer [see the variations summarized in Pope, xxx-xxxi], nor does it accept any of the other comparisons to Greek tragedy that have been promulgated). I agree with the commonly proposed structure for the book in Table 1 (in Table 1 a “cycle” involves a sequence of alternating speeches by a number of speakers, while a “series” consists of a number of speeches by the same person).

1.2. Genre: Job as Literature. Above all, Job is a wisdom book of literary complexity, philosophical sophistication, and theological insight and

Table 1. Structure of Job

Narrative Frame: Job 1—3
	Prologue: Heaven and Earth	1—2
	Job's Opening Lament	3
	Cycle One: Job 4—14
	Eliphaz	4—5
	Job	6—7
	Bildad	8
	Job	9—10
	Zophar	11
	Job	12—14
	Cycle Two: Job 15—21
	Eliphaz	15
	Job	16—17
	Bildad	18
	Job	19
	Zophar	20
	Job	21
	Cycle Three: Job 22—27
	Eliphaz	22
	Job	23—24
	Bildad	25
	Job	26—27
Interlude: Wisdom Hymn: Job 28
	Series One: Job 29—31
	Job: Reminiscences	29
	Job: Affliction	30
	Job: Oath of Innocence	31
	Series Two: Job 32—37
	Elihu: Introduction and Theory	32—33
	Elihu: Verdict on Job	34
	Elihu: Offense of Job	35
	Elihu: Summary	36—37
	Series Three: Job 38—41
	Yahweh: Maintaining Roles/Functions in Cosmic Order	38—39
	Yahweh: Harnessing Threats to Cosmic Order	40:6—41:34
Narrative Frame: Job 42
	Job's Closing Statements	(40:3-5) 42:1-6
	Epilogue: Heaven and Earth	42:7-17

innovation. No piece of wisdom known from the ancient Near East offers a similar aggregation of the genre classes as is shown by Job. There are other works that feature a sufferer who believes himself to be innocent. Other works exist that use to some extent a dialogue format (as found in the first half of Job) or wisdom discourses (as found in the second half of Job). But the combination of narrative frame, dialogue sequence and discourse sequence is not found elsewhere. Job additionally includes lament (Job 3), wisdom psalm (Job 28) and theophanic speech (Job 38-41) among the types of literature that it weaves into the larger whole (Fyall, 23-24).

1.2.1. Ancient Near Eastern Context. A comparative study of Job in its ancient Near Eastern environment is provided in a separate article (see Job 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background), so here only a few comments vis-à-vis genre are needed. The most productive comparison can be made to other pieces of literature that feature the motif of a pious sufferer (Mattingly). These include the Sumerian Man and His God (COS 1.179) and the Akkadian Dialogue between a Man and His God (COS 1.151), Poem of the Righteous Sufferer (COS 1.153), Babylonian Theodicy (COS 1.154) and Dialogue of Pessimism (COS 1.155). But these are either dialogues or monologues (not a combination), and they focus on the question of why suffering is experienced by those who are conscientiously observant regarding every religious obligation that they know. Unlike the book of Job, these works truly do try to offer explanations of human suffering, and the typical answers are either that there was an offense that they were unaware of (conveying that human offense is universal, even if some offenses could never be recognized as such) or that deity is inscrutable. Not only are these more simplistic than Job in literary form, but also they seek to penetrate the human dilemma rather than the nature of deity. In both form and substance the book of Job begins where the ancient Near Eastern literature finishes.

1.2.2. Wisdom Literature. On the basis of its themes and literary characteristics, the book of Job can be classified as belonging in the larger category known as Wisdom literature.

1.2.2.1. Themes. The telltale themes include the questions concerning human suffering, the examination of the *retribution principle, the focus on creation, and the exploration and application of proverbial sayings to situations in life. The prominent place given to the thoughts and sayings of *sages and the attention paid to traditional teaching reflect the wisdom essence of the book

1.2.2.2. Dialogue and Discourse. Nearly ninety percent of the book is comprised of dialogue or discourse. These are not offered as transcripts preserved from the speeches given at an historic symposium. They proceed from the imagination of the philosopher, not the dictation taken by a stenographer. They are highly literary creations, not records of casual conversation. This is expected in Wisdom literature, and these speeches are no different in that regard from the speeches of *Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly (Prov 8—9).

1.3. Genre: Job as History. Although Wisdom literature can at times include a narrative segment, no example exists in the ancient world of a wisdom book that has been demonstrated to have a historical event as its foundation. That is not to say that historical figures cannot at times be among the characters of the narrative segment. For example, in the Egyptian Instructions literature the pharaohs who are involved in giving or receiving instruction can at times be identified independently in historical records (Amenemhet, Merikare, Ptahhotep). In West Semitic literature most would not hesitate to see a character such as Ahiqar as a historical figure. The Assyrian kings whom he serves are known, and the piece offers description of historical events, although none can be independently verified.

If a historical figure is to be used productively in the narrative frame of Wisdom literature, it is logical to conclude that some generally recognized quality or experience of the figure qualifies him for such a role. For example, the famed Egyptian sage Harjedef, son of Pharaoh Khufu, has a reputation that associates him naturally with wisdom contexts. One could therefore conclude that if Job were to be identified as an historical figure, at least the major outline of his experiences would also find a foundation in history or at least in tradition. Even the possibility of a historical foundation, however, should not lead us to think of this book as a historical book or to look for historical verification of all of its details. It is Wisdom literature, and as such, it has the latitude to freely develop its themes.

None of the foregoing discussion proves that Job is a historical figure, for Wisdom literature can also easily invent characters to represent its protagonists. For example, individuals such as Any or Dua-Khety, both of whom have wisdom pieces attached to their names (respectively, the Instructions of Any, and the so-called Satire on the Trades), may well be fictional. They are portrayed as lower officials and set in realistic settings (known places and, with Any, a known ruler, Ahmose). Even in these cases, however, the characters need not be fictional, and it would be impossible to prove that they were.

That the book of Job places Job in historically known places (e.g., Uz), makes reference to historical parties (however slight—e.g., Sabeans, Chaldeans [Job 1:15, 17]), and reputes him to be a well-known sage suggests that the wisdom piece is based on the life and experiences of a historical person. As in the case of the other wisdom pieces, however, the genre typically operates by means of an author building a wisdom piece around the recognized character. The literature thus retains its status as Wisdom literature, in which we would not go looking for historical verification throughout the various levels of the work. This foundation certainly could be sufficient to account for the references to Job outside of the book (Ezek 14:14, 20; James 5:11) as an actual individual whose experiences have become legendary and taken their place in the traditions of the ancient world. The remainder of the book, including the court scene in heaven, may be better considered as being the literary construct of the wisdom writer, formulated to refocus the discussion in a way that will lead to his innovative resolution of the issues.

2. Rhetorical Strategy.

The rhetorical strategy of the book provides the foundation for identifying its argument and for discussing its unity. The goal of *rhetorical criticism is to identify the function of each major section and the contribution that the rhetorical strategy makes to the whole. As it is unfolded, it also leads to the message of the book—the answers that it offers regarding God's policies in this world and a proposed approach toward dealing with suffering.

2.1. The Scene in Heaven. The scene in heaven serves a number of important functions in setting up the issues in the book. The first point that it makes clearly is that Job is indeed innocent of wrongdoing (Greenberg 1995b, 328; contra Brenner). This immediately eliminates the usual answers offered in the ancient Near East, which contended either that there really was an offense that the sufferer was unaware of or that God is simply inscrutable. This cleans the slate of tradition to make room for new explanations. A second point is that by acclaiming Job's *righteousness from the beginning, it is made clear that Job is not on trial. This feature allows the book to focus on God's policy regarding how the righteous are treated. Notice that in the process the book thus tackles the more difficult side of the retribution equation; that is, it is much easier to discuss why the wicked prosper. Finally, the scene in heaven shows that despite the instrumentation of the adversary, God both initiated the discussion and approved the course of action (cf. Job 42:11; see Weiss, 37). This again avoids the easy solution that insulates God by inserting an independently wicked intermediary power. The book would be toothless without this introduction. It would be reduced to philosophical speculation unable to rise above its contemporaries.

2.2. The Role of the Adversary. Christian readers readily identify the adversary as a known character whose profile is provided by the NT. But we cannot be so hasty. "Satan" here is a function, not a personal name (see Satan). This is particularly important here, for this śāṭān is portrayed neither as an independently volitional being nor as diabolical. He is among the "sons of God," the members of the heavenly council (see Divine Council), and he operates only as a subordinate. By permitting this adversary's course of action, God is allowing Job's case to stand as a test case for his policies. One can hardly label this adversary as an embodiment of evil when he simply expresses doubt concerning God's policies, a doubt that God has prompted through his observations concerning Job (Ragaz, in Glatzer, 129).

The role of the adversary is to provide the most important twist in the challenge against God's policies. Any human can contend that it is not a good policy for God to allow righteous people to suffer. This, of course, is Job's challenge. What is an innovation to this discussion is the contention of the adversary that it is not a good policy for God to bring prosperity to righteous people. When the adversary asks the rhetorical question of whether Job serves God for nothing, he in effect questions whether there is such a thing as disinterested righteousness. If righteousness is routinely rewarded, will not people behave righteously just to get the reward? And if that is so, is there really such a thing as true righteousness? Does not the policy of rewarding the righteous actually inhibit true righteousness by turning presumed and even potentially righteous people into ethical mercenaries? One could only answer such questions by taking away the prosperity of someone presumed righteous—the more righteous, the surer the test. The challenge then targets a policy (attributed to God) that is formulated as a principle of retribution: the righteous will prosper and the wicked will suffer. In this way the adversary provides one side of the challenge to God's policy (it is counterproductive for God to prosper righteous people), while Job provides the other side (it is unjust for God to allow righteous people to suffer).

2.3. The Role of Three Friends. All four friends serve as archetypes for the traditional thinking current in the ancient Near East, but Elihu is separated from the other three for a reason. Together, the three main friends function as archetypes that represent the revered wisdom of the ancient Near East at large. In contrast, we would propose that Elihu, with his Hebrew name, serves as an archetype for the contemporary, more recent (therefore, younger) thinking that was current in Israel.

The three friends, like Job himself, believe that Job is on trial, and so they promote the standard perspective and solutions that were the hallmarks of ancient wisdom (contra Albertz [245-46], who see the friends as representing Israelite traditional thinking, but supported in general by Gruber [92], who sees the friends as representative of human or Gentile wisdom, and stated outright by Mattingly [333]). Consider this ancient catalogue of symptoms and the assessment offered (for text information and bibliography, see Abusch, 85):

If a man has experienced something untoward and he does not know how it happened to him, he has continually suffered losses: losses of barley and silver, losses of male and female slaves, cattle, horses, and sheep; dogs, pigs and servants dying off altogether; he has heart-break time and again; he constantly gives orders, but no one complies, calls but no one answers; the curse of numerous people; when lying in his bed he is repeatedly apprehensive, he contracts paresis, he is filled with anger against god and king until his epileptic fit, his limbs are hanging down, from time to time he is apprehensive, he does not sleep day or night, he often sees terrifying dreams, he often gets paresis, his appetite for bread and beer is diminished, he forgets the word he spoke: that man has the wrath of the god and/or the goddess on him; his god and his goddess are angry with him.

In the ancient world different courses of action could serve as standard procedure for someone in Job's plight. One method entailed discovery divination to try to gain information concerning either the nature of the offense or, more often, what the deity wanted. A second approach involved incantations to exorcise the source of the evil. One corpus of literature that illustrates such incantations is found in the apotropaic rituals labeled namburbi. Third, appeasement could be sought by means of exhaustive lists of offenses to which one confesses, such as those found in the šurpu rituals. The latter is most evident in the approach recommended by Job's friends. It was unimportant in this procedure whether Job had actually committed the crimes or whether he was aware of any offenses. Though Eliphaz offers a catalog of Job's sins (Job 22:5-9), it is only hypothetical and suggestive. The friends have no knowledge of any specific offenses of which they can accuse Job. Yet, in accordance with the demands of the retribution principle, they are convinced that he is guilty, and it is on that basis that they urge his response to God. Specifically, they advise him in the first round in general terms to make his plea before God (Job 5:8; 8:5) and put away sin (Job 11:13). They offer no advice in the second round. In the third round Eliphaz makes a lengthy plea for Job to submit to God and return to him (Job 22:21-30). A most telling element is that each of them makes it clear that the principle goal is for Job to regain his favor, status and prosperity (Job 8:5-7; 11:14-20; 22:21-30). Far from representing disinterested righteousness, this promotes a heavily motivated righteousness. In this way, the friends can be seen as those who are advancing the case that the adversary has asserted. Job, in contrast, shows throughout that he is concerned not with restored prosperity (Job 9:21) but rather with clearing up the matter and restoring his reputation as a man who is righteous before God. He wants to contend with God because he has nothing to confess before God (Job 10:7; 13:19, 23; 23:11-12).

Additional evidence that the friends' advice can be understood in appeasement terms is found in Job's responses, particularly his final word to them in Job 27:1-6. He refuses to admit that they are right, and the integrity that he maintains is that he will not simply offer a blanket, blind confession with the hopes that he will appease God's inexplicable wrath and be restored to prosperity. Had he done so in response to the friends' advice, he would have proven that the adversary was right—that he was interested only in his benefits rather than being characterized by true, disinterested righteousness. For all of this to work effectively in the book it is important that Job himself be as ignorant of the scene in heaven as his friends are. If he knows what is truly at stake, the impact of his response would be nullified. Therefore, like his friends, he must believe that he is on trial, and he does. Whatever doubts he harbors and whatever accusations he hurls against the Almighty, as inappropriate and inaccurate as they may be, what is important for the book is that he retains the integrity of believing that righteousness is more important than reward.

2.4. The Role of Wisdom: The Interlude (Job 28). With Job's final refusal to follow the friends' advice in Job 27:1-6, the friends' role is over, as is the role of the adversary whom they represent. Job, who is the prime witness for the defense (of God's policies) rather than the defendant (as he assumed), has demonstrated that his righteousness is truly disinterested. The answers of the friends have been rejected as superficial in that they have misrepresented God (Job 42:7-8) by suggesting that he has only to be appeased for some indiscernible and possibly irrational anger (Mattingly, 332). The adversary need not be mentioned, for he shares in this indictment because the friends were the advocates of his case. The wisdom interlude (Job 28) serves the function of indicating that even though we have heard from the best that the sages of the ancient world had to offer (for discussion of the social location of the friends, see Albertz), we have not yet heard true wisdom. It closes the dialogue section of the book with the promise that there is more to offer (Dumbrell, 92) and so points the direction toward the denouement that is to be first hinted at by the creative position forged by Elihu, then brought to fruition in the dramatic and revolutionary perspective offered in the speech of Yahweh (Geller, 174).

2.5. The Role of Job's Discourse. Job's three speeches in the discourse section serve an important function as the book proceeds. The reminiscences in Job 29 indicate clearly that what he misses is not the wealth and not even the honor, though both are mentioned in passing. Instead, he focuses on his lost opportunities to do justice, showing that he continues to value righteousness above reward. It may also hint at an implication that he knows how to use power to bring about justice. If he is making such a claim, he is eventually disabused of this delusional conceit by Yahweh's challenge. The theme of justice is continued in Job 30 as he recounts the resulting proliferation of injustice, of which he has now become a victim. The climax of Job's discourses is found in Job 31 as he attempts to turn God's silence, which has been serving as evidence of his guilt, to his advantage. By pronouncing his extended oath of innocence, he has challenged God in such a way that silence would vindicate him. After all, if he has sworn falsely, it is God's obligation to strike him down. If God does not do so, that lack of response stands as Job's exoneration.

2.6. The Role of Elihu. The challenge represented in Job's ostensibly pretentious oath of innocence has created tension in the book (will lightning crackle through the air in response to Job's arrogance?). Elihu's speeches hold the tension in suspense but likewise offer a response to it. This last, desperate resort by Job could easily be interpreted as self-righteousness, and Elihu treats it as such.

As previously suggested, Elihu could be seen as representative of Israelite thinking, suggested by his Hebrew name and his status as newcomer, if by nothing else. In this regard, his newcomer status is reflected in his devaluation of tradition and elevation of revelation (Albertz, 252). Further reason to consider him a suitable representative of Israel is that he is more protective of God's justice than any of the other characters. In that regard, it is important to note that he does not simply rehash the arguments already presented by the other friends. He is more theologically creative as he redefines concepts to try to arrive at a practical synthesis. In fact, he could be considered one of the first true "theologians" (Ehrenberg, in Glatzer, 93-94). He expands the retribution principle so that it not only describes the remedial consequences of past actions (reward for righteousness, punishment or suffering for wickedness) but also now allows that suffering may be disciplinary and thereby preventative as it functions to restrain someone from following an unacceptable course of action. With this redefinition he is now no longer obligated to identify past sins of Job's that would be sufficient to explain the severity of the punishment experienced in his dramatic fall. Instead, he only has to recognize the self-righteousness that Job has demonstrated, so excessive that even God's justice is called into question to defend himself. In Elihu's view, it is this response to suffering that provides the explanation, not only for the suffering itself but also for the extent of it. This is far more intricate and nuanced than the friends' simple invocation of the retribution principle. It also puts Elihu in position to actually pin a specific accusation on Job that can be sustained. In this role, he may well see himself as the arbitrator that Job has been requesting throughout the book (Habel 1984). Finally, it should be noticed that Elihu does not buy into the strategy of appeasement, and so he differs from the other friends. His view is more sophisticated than the general ancient Near Eastern one represented by the other friends, but still it is tied too closely to the retribution principle.

2.7. The Nature of Theophany. As Job's friends failed to offer the expected comfort, Yahweh's speeches fail to offer the expected solution. The *theophany has seemed so obtuse to some that it stands as a classic example of obfuscation—changing the subject to avoid the issue, distracting the questioner and inspiring terror all at once. This is a misunderstanding of the very real contribution that the book, through Yahweh's speeches, makes to the discussion, for although Yahweh does not offer the expected solution, what he does offer is, in the end, more honest, more satisfying, more helpful. It is true that Yahweh's speeches from the whirlwind neither explains Job's suffering, defends his own justice, enters into the courtroom for the confrontation that Job requested nor responds to Job's oath of innocence. Instead, the speeches of Yahweh suggest that the entire issue has been misdirected and there can be no right answers when the wrong questions are being asked (on the book's message, see 3 below).

The focus of the theophany is on God's wisdom, not his justice. The initial speech (Job 38:1—39:30) deals with God's wisdom in maintaining order in the cosmos. The questions that identify all the things that Job is incapable of doing carry the implication that they catalogue some of what God does pertaining to roles and functions in the world. These serve as demonstrations of God's wisdom because order is at the heart of wisdom. So, for example, Job 38:4-38 concerns cosmic geography (vv. 4-11, its delimitation; vv. 12-15, its exploitation in doing justice; vv. 16-18, its exploration; vv. 19-24, access to it; vv. 25-38, manipulation of it) and God's maintenance of order in these realms.

At the conclusion of God's first speech Job is ready to confess his lack of wisdom—he has no understanding of the intricate workings of the cosmos and is incapable of maintaining order. But there is more. God's response is to issue a further challenge to Job, now concerning not Job's understanding of the established order but rather his ability to respond to and harness threats to cosmic order. This is the topic of the second speech (Job 40:15—41:34) (based on the conclusion that Behemoth and Leviathan here are not zoological species past or present but rather cosmic creatures [Dumbrell, 94-95; Fyall associates Behemoth with Ugaritic Mot, and Leviathan with Satan]). This task is construed not as doing justice but rather as withholding the forces of disorder. Again this is testimony to God's wisdom and power.

2.8. The Role of the Postscript. Several important elements are addressed in the postscript. Obviously, it is not intended to tie up all the loose ends. It is worthy of notice that Job does not repent of any sin that may have been presumed to be the cause of his suffering. Instead, he repents of the accusations that he has cast against God and of his doubts concerning God (Rowley, in Glatzer, 125). This is an indication that the book is more interested in one's view of God than in one's understanding of the causes of suffering. Job never learns of the opening scene in the heavenly court, and he is given no explanation for his suffering. At the same time, however, he indicates that he is satisfied with the information that he does receive—enough so to renounce his self-defense and claims of God's injustice (Clines, xxxix). Job's friends are indicted for their flawed view of God, whereas Job's view of God as one who responds to rightteousness and does not need to be appeased is vindicated. Finally, and significantly, God restores Job's prosperity. This does not erase the pain of the initial losses, but it makes an important statement: in the aftermath of this test of God's policies, they remain the same. God will continue to bring prosperity to the righteous because it has been demonstrated that doing so does not inhibit the development of true righteousness.

3. Message.

The book has been described as one big lawsuit (TDOT 13.476), with God as plaintiff and Job as the accused, and so it may seem to the characters in the book. But as I have suggested, the author rises above this standard formula to offer the reader a different perspective with greater prospects for progress, whereby God is the accused and Job the unwitting witness for the defense.

3.1. The Indictment. In the heavenly scene (Job 1—2) Job is charged with nothing except perhaps questionable motives. His righteousness is affirmed as a given from the beginning, and neither God nor the accuser suggests that Job's behavior is anything short of righteous. The charges are made by the adversary and by Job against God, and it is his policies that are on trial. It would appear that God loses whichever way he goes, for there is no middle ground from which to redeem his policies.

3.2. The "Courtroom." The courtroom that becomes the setting for the drama is philosophical rather than physical—framed by the retribution principle. This setting juxtaposes three claims: (1) God is just; (2) Job is righteous; (3) the retribution principle is true. When the book opens, these three are givens, accepted by all as true. As the book takes shape, however, it becomes logically impossible to maintain all three claims. If we think of the courtroom as a triangle with one of these claims in each corner, we will see that each of the parties makes a choice to defend one corner (see Figure 1). From that vantage point one of the remaining two corners will be accepted, but the third must be forfeited (Tsevat).

The three friends defend the traditional affirmations represented in the retribution principle. They affirm the principle throughout their speeches in many different ways. From that defensive position they also adopt the traditional conviction that God is just. Consequently, they can only forfeit Job's righteousness, deducing that it has been compromised, though they lack any real knowledge of offense. Given the parameters of the philosophy and the presuppositions that tradition declares, their logic is infallible.

Figure 1. The Triangle of Claims

Job is adamant in his insistence that he has remained as righteous as he ever was. This is not a conclusion born of deduction; rather, it represents his true self-knowledge. Sudden change of fortunes, such as he has experienced, would indicate dramatic failures that represented a significant departure from previous behavior. If his prior behavior had been rewarded, and therefore considered worthy, then there should be no change in his situation, for there has been no variation in his conduct. After he chooses which corner to defend, his vision is too limited to renounce the retribution principle, for he can imagine no viable alternative. But as he affirms its truth, he is left in the unenviable and uncomfortable position of questioning the justice of God (see Job 40:8).

The fourth friend, Elihu (Job 32—37), positions himself firmly in the corner of God's justice. As he adopts this posture, he engages in a philosophical sleight of hand by which he can avoid discarding either the retribution principle or Job's righteousness. As explained in the discussion of the rhetorical strategy, Elihu redefines the parameters, first expanding the retribution principle and then questioning Job's righteousness on the basis of the revised definition. All three human parties (friends, Job, Elihu) accept the triangle as the basis for the discussion and the foundation from which answers must be found. We should also note that it is this setting that is the basis for the indictment against God, since both the accuser and Job assume that God's policy is accurately represented by the retribution principle and on that basis they have pressed their charges.

3.3. The Trial. Two possible responses by Job could result in God's losing the case. The quickest response, and perhaps not contrary to human nature, would have been for Job to succumb to his wife's advice: "Curse God and die." If Job had fallen to that temptation, it would have indicated that only the rewards made life worth living. It would have demonstrated that righteousness did not have a central place in Job's thinking. The second way that God could have lost the case would have been realized if Job had been persuaded by the appeals of his friends and adopted the strategy of appeasement. If Job listened to either his wife or his friends, the adversary would have been declared the victor, and it would have to be concluded that there really was no such thing as disinterested righteousness, thus calling into question the legitimacy of God's policy of rewarding the righteous.

Answering Job's charges against God is more complex. God would lose this part of the case if the retribution principle were allowed to stand unaltered or unnuanced, and given that foundation, he was unable to offer an explanation for the suffering of the righteous in general, and Job in particular. The book makes no attempt to offer the explanation but instead undertakes the task of reformulating the foundation.

The idea that reformulation was an option to be considered first becomes evident in the nuancing commenced by Elihu. Since Job thinks that he is on trial, he is thinking about winning, whereas since it is God's policies that are truly on trial, Job is actually pursuing options that will mean that God loses. God loses if he attempts to explain Job's suffering and cannot adequately do so, and this is precisely the type of explanation that Job is pressing for as he tries to force God into court or manipulate him by oath (Job 31). Of course, another way Job can win the case that he thinks he is involved in (concerning his own righteousness) is if God admits, on the basis of the retribution principle system, that he had acted unjustly and, in effect, apologizes. In this way, Job wins (the retribution principle stands and Job's righteousness is affirmed), but he wins at a terrible cost: God loses not only the case but also his dignity. He is no longer a God worth serving. Three options are theoretically open to God: (1) give an explanation for righteous suffering, specifically Job's (and thus uphold the retribution principle); (2) admit that Job did not deserve the suffering (and uphold the retribution principle even as he admitted his failure to enforce it); (3) dismantle the retribution principle.

3.4. The Parties and the Case for the Prosecution. These have already been identified. The adversary is one plaintiff, and his case is represented by his team of prosecutors, the three friends. Job has adopted the posture of a second plaintiff in a sort of countersuit to God's allegedly spurious actions against him.

3.5. The Parties and the Case for the Defense. Job, believing that he was on trial, continually requested an advocate to undertake his defense. In the absence of such, he was attempting to press his case in his own defense and feeling inadequate to do so. But since he was not on trial, he needed no such defense. In the real trial, God's defense team has no spokesman. Elihu may be viewed as assuming the role (since he champions the justice of God), but he does not understand the nature of the case. He tries to vouchsafe a victory for God by offering an explanation of Job's suffering by means of adjusting rather than dismantling the retribution principle. Elihu is under the impression that Job is on trial, and he mounts an impressive and irrefutable (because unfalsifiable) accusation against Job, but to no avail. The retribution principle, however manipulated, is incapable of providing the answer.

When Yahweh finally speaks, he does not do so in his own defense. At that stage he has already won the first part of his case (against the adversary) on the strength of his lone witness, Job, who has refused to give up his integrity. Job has served in the role of witness even though he is one of God's prosecutors. In God's response (Job 38–41) the retribution principle system is shown to be simplistic and is dismantled (Dumbrell, 98; Greenberg 1995b, 329). If we go back to the triangle as representing the philosophical courtroom, we could say that God insists on a change of venue—a new setting in which the trial is to be conducted. He discards the triangle as an adequate setting for the discussion. God's wisdom, the direction indicated in the wisdom hymn in Job 28, is a more suitable arena for the discussion of suffering than is God's justice.

Yet it was God's justice, or at least the justice of his policies, that presumably was under investigation. The problem is that for God's justice in running the world to be assessed, someone must have all the information that is involved in God's running of the world (Job 40:8-14; 41:11). God does not try to defend his justice in his discourses, because, as becomes clear, no one is in a position to assess his justice.

3.6. The Verdict. Job demonstrated that his righteousness was not simply a pursuit of blessing and prosperity. Consequently, the adversary's charge against God's policy of blessing righteous people was shown to be false. God demonstrated that his wisdom surpasses the simple equations of the retribution principle, and that the operation of the cosmos is based on wisdom rather than on the premise of the retribution principle. Consequently, Job's charge of injustice, itself premised on the retribution principle, was also shown to be false. God's policies thus were vindicated, and he showed his renewed commitment to them by again heaping blessing on Job.

But how is this not a reiteration of the retribution principle? The difference is that in this new view the retribution principle is not of a system that is the foundation of world order and operation. It does not represent a guarantee or a mechanical cause/effect process. It is God's delight to prosper those who are faithful to him, and it is God's commitment to punish wickedness. That is the nature of God. But this cannot be reduced to a formula (Dumbrell, 102). God has created the natural world and maintains it day by day. But that does not mean that the natural world is endowed with the attributes of God. Rain can be used by God to enforce justice, but the rain is not just (Job 38:25-27). In this way the book refutes the idea of a moral order in the natural world (Kaufmann, in Glatzer, 66). God administers the world in wisdom, and from his sovereign wisdom justice results. We may be lacking sufficient information to be able to affirm that God's justice is being carried out day by day. We do have enough, however, to affirm that he is wise. If we believe that he is wise, then there is good reason to believe that he is just.

If this interpretation is accurate, then the book of Job argues pointedly against the theodicy philosophies in the ancient world and represents an Israelite modification. This modification, rather than offering a revised theodicy, seeks to reinterpret the justice of God from something that may be debated to something that is a given. In Yahweh's speech it is not his justice that is defended, it is his wisdom.

We have already noted that Job receives no explanation concerning the cause of his suffering, and so we might infer that neither should we expect such explanations for our suffering or for anyone else's. A focus on justice demands explanation of cause and gazes at the past, whereas a focus on wisdom needs only to understand that God in his wisdom has a purpose as it fixes one's gaze on the future. In John 9 when the disciples raise the question about the man born blind, Jesus likewise turns their attention from cause to purpose: "Neither this man nor his parents sinned . . . but this happened so that the work of God might be displayed in his life." Job's friends had considered suffering to be punitive; Elihu had considered it disciplinary; Jesus, following the lead of the book of Job, considers it beyond explanation yet capable of being turned to spiritual profit if it leads to knowledge of God and fellowship with him. This is not a theological or intellectual solution—it is a spiritual insight (Rowley, in Glatzer, 126-28).

It is of interest to note, in conclusion, that the book of Job goes on record to affirm that there is indeed such a thing as the innocent suffering (Hartley, 47; Rowley, in Glatzer, 125), and the NT confirms that assessment. In the end, the book is less interested in why there is innocent suffering than in what is the proper way to think about God when we live in such a world. What satisfied Job in the end was not that he now understood suffering better but rather that he knew God better. As H. H. Rowley (in Glatzer, 125-26) puts it,

In his prosperity he thought that he had known God. Now he realizes that compared with his former knowledge his present knowledge is as the joy of seeing compared with a mere rumor. All his past experience of God was as nothing compared with the experience he had now found. He therefore no longer cries out to be delivered from his suffering. He rests in God even in his pain.

4. Unity and Composition.

Sawyer (253) makes the important observation that the inclusion of a variety of materials in a book is typical of the OT and of Wisdom literature and cannot be taken as prima facie evidence of haphazard redaction. He notes the difference between considering whether the same hand penned each section of the book and considering the extent to which each section is integral to the book. Ancient Near Eastern literature shows a similar propensity to include some variety of materials in a single piece, though not to the same extent as does the OT. For example, there are numerous examples of dispute literature that includes cosmological sections (e.g., Disputation between Ewe and Wheat [COS 1.180], Disputation between Bird and Fish [COS 1.182], Disputation between Summer and Winter [COS 1.183]).

The history of literary criticism of the book of Job has featured many challenges to the literary integrity of the book (see the somewhat cynical summary in Baker, 17-18). A common view of the compositional history of the book sees the narrative frame as having existed independently (as poetic epics [see Sarna]), to be later enlarged with the dialogues and discourses. Furthermore, a general consensus exists that the wisdom hymn in Job 28 and the Elihu speeches in Job 32–37 were later insertions into the book. Some have doubted the originality of the Yahweh speeches, and all have noticed the absence of Zophar's last speech and the abbreviated nature of Bildad's last speech and inferred some corruption in transmission. Some have offered suggestions that Zophar's speech is still there, perhaps in the latter part of Job 27, or even in Job 28.

These views show the common inclination toward atomization in what can at times be presumptuous reconstruction of the history of composition. Recent trends show a greater disposition toward evaluating the final form of the book for its rhetorical coherency, and on this count Job scores well. Given the above analysis of the rhetorical strategy of the book, the Elihu speeches play a pivotal role in the book by offering a more sophisticated view of the retribution principle. The scene in heaven is absolutely essential because only by means of that section is the shift signaled that God's policies are on trial, not Job. Without the scene in heaven, the perception of all of the characters in the book that Job is on trial would also be the only perception available to the reader. It is the scene in heaven that identifies that the real question about Job's suffering does not concern Job's behavior. The real question concerns how God runs the world. The wisdom hymn in Job 28 is essential for the transition from the dialogue section to the discourse section. As we noted in the rhetorical analysis above, it is also essential to indicate the transition from dealing with the adversary's accusation to dealing with Job's much more difficult challenge to God's policies. At every turn the book penetrates the surface issues and the superficial answers to formulate innovative approaches to the age-old question. Regardless of what literary critics can determine or believe that they can determine about the stages of composition and differences in style, the book in its current form coheres magnificently as it builds a sophisticated response to the question of what form faith in the midst of suffering should take.

5. Date and Context.

Some propose a date for the book based on the premise that it offers a metaphor for exilic or postexilic Israel, and we should consider briefly the plausibility of this view. It appears in a variety of permutations, but consider as one example the reasoning expressed by R. Albertz (252), who does not so much attempt to defend the view as to explain how his interpretation would be worked out within this perspective: "It is clear that the purpose of the Book of Job is to provide an increasingly theological foundation for sapiential knowledge. This probably relates to the need to offer the pious segment of the Jewish aristocracy a clear orientation during the period of social crisis in the early postexilic period."

The reluctance of some to proceed in this direction can be summarized in the disappointment evident in the lament of J. J. M. Roberts (111) that for interpreters who go this direction, their "predilection for history reduces Job to a mere cipher for Israel, and his theological problem becomes the problem of understanding Israel's national experience."

On a number of counts this view can be refuted, but I will mention just two. First, it would be difficult to portray Israel in these periods as righteous with no idea of anything that the nation had done wrong. The book would serve very poorly as metaphor if the basic ingredients in the metaphor had no relation to reality. Second, there are no allusions to national calamity (de Moor, 227). To proceed in this direction, then, one is working entirely within the realm of speculation, if not allegory.

As we turn to other options, we need to face the paradox that although the characters are, for the most part, non-Israelite, the book is framed within an Israelite cognitive environment. Therefore, although the plot may well be placed in an early second millennium BC context, the composition of the book must derive from a later period. We will look at each of these issues in turn.

5.1. Setting for the Events. It is common to hear that the chronological setting for the narrative frame is as early as the patriarchal period or even earlier. The actual evidence for this conclusion, however, is slight.

- Wealth measured by cattle and flocks
- Patriarch serving as priest for the family
- Longevity (Job's 140-year lifespan)
- No reference to covenant, Torah, exodus, etc.
- Roving Sabaeen and Chaldean tribesmen
- Job 42:11 refers to qēšitā, a unit of money known elsewhere only in Genesis 33:19; Joshua 24:32 (both referring to money paid to the Shechemites for land)

Most of these, however, can be explained by the non-Israelite setting. Job's longevity is striking, but also it could simply be exceptional. The Chaldeans' early history is too little known (they first appear in the first millennium BC), and the Sabaeans are not identified with confidence, though as a North Arabian tribe they are more at home in the first millennium BC as well. The unit of money is obscure. None of these provide very convincing evidence, though little circumstantial evidence from the content would offer support of a later setting for the events either. This position is usually maintained by traditional scholars, though it should be noted that J. C. de Moor makes a case for identification of Job with Ayyabu, known from the fourteenth-century BC Amarna texts in the Late Bronze period (de Moor, 242-57).

5.2. Israelite Features. Although unquestionably there are numerous points of contact between Job and Ugaritic language and literature (de Moor), the claim that the book contains more of the religion of Canaan than the monotheism of Israel (so de Moor, 239) cannot be sustained in light of a number of uniquely Israelite perspectives. With regard to date, the appearance of strictly Israelite features would argue for composition of the book in a period at least post-Sinai (and more likely monarchical), for only then would there be a religious cognitive environment distinctly identifiable as Israelite that can be observed in the book:

- Job's friends attempt to defend the justice of God. Generally in the ancient Near East the gods were considered to be interested in social justice, people prayed to them for justice, and the king was expected to establish justice. But the gods themselves were not necessarily considered just, nor was there any attempt to defend their justice. Furthermore, suffering was not as intimately tied to divine justice (see Retribution). Thus this compelling sense that God's justice must be defended is distinctly Israelite.
- Job denies paying homage to the sun or moon, indicating that to do so would be an act of unfaithfulness to God (Job 31:26-28). In the ancient Near East faithfulness to one god above others was not an issue. Only in Israel would homage to celestial deities be considered an offense (Roberts, 113).
- The view of God shows a distinctly Israelite perspective. Even though appeasement is on the table for consideration, the friends never suggest a ritual remedy, which would have been the norm in the ancient Near East (for moral/ethical remedy, see Job 8:6; 11:13-15; for righteousness/blamelessness as criterion, see Job 22:3). Furthermore, in the book of Job God has no needs (Job 22:3) that have to be met by worshippers. This perspective is extremely difficult to document outside of Israel.
- The fact that the appeasement route suggested by the friends is rejected as unsuitable is yet another indication that an Israelite perspective is reflected in the book. Though the Israelites occasionally resort to appeasement, orthodox Israelite theology considered it to presuppose a flawed view of God.

It is interesting that the Israelite view maintained in the book is one that is fully in line with the unsyncretized view that characterized the classical prophets, the Deuteronomist(s) (however identified) and the priestly literature (whenever dated). The book is a product of a fully orthodox perspective at least on these counts.

In conclusion, we should note that early in the second millennium BC a change is evident in how the Mesopotamian texts dealt with the problem of suffering. Previously, one's misfortune was accounted as having angered one's personal god. Increasingly, however, a shift occurred in which the misfortune was not due to one's own offense but rather came about because a third party (e.g., a witch) had provoked the personal god against the individual (thus turning the individual into victim rather than offender). T. Abusch (103-4) suggests that this shift may represent an attempt to solve a theological problem—that is, offering a reason for the god's anger that does not seek for a reason in the behavior of the individual but rather is based on accusations made against that individual by a third party. In the book of Job we see a twist (at several points) to this way of thinking. The third party is not a human practitioner of the occult, but is one of the heavenly council; the personal deity is not aroused to anger, but agrees to a test; and the accusation is not made against the individual, but against the policies of the deity. This is a new level of third-party involvement that fits within an Israelite context, in which witchcraft had no legitimate role in the profile of theology. It is interesting that the friends represent the prior way of Mesopotamian thinking—the personal god is angry—while the narrative frame provides a modified “third party” approach. The friends themselves never hint at the possibility that a third party with power had influenced the situation. This information would lend support to an early date in terms of the presuppositions of the friends, but it might suggest a later date for the third-party involvement, however much diversity the application of it shows. This is interesting in that it is a reversal of the usual suggestion that the narrative frame is original and the dialogue was provided later. Consequently, all of the variety of information available does not offer a clear indication for the dating of either the events or of the book, but here we looked at factors not generally considered in previous treatments that should be part of any future discussion.

See also JOB 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACK-

GROUND; JOB 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; JOB 4: PERSON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: F. I. Andersen, Job (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1976); D. J. A. Clines, Job 1-20 (WBC 17; Dallas: Word, 1989); N. C. Habel, The Book of Job (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1985); J. E. Hartley, The Book of Job (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); M. Pope, Job (3rd ed.; AB 15; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1973); Studies: T. Abusch, “Witchcraft and the Anger of the Personal God,” in Mesopotamian Magic: Textual, Historical, and Interpretative Perspectives, ed. T. Abusch and K. van der Toorn (AMD 1; Groningen: Styx Publications, 1999); R. Albertz, “The Sage and Pious Wisdom in the Book of Job: The Friends’ Perspective,” in The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. J. G. Gammie and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1990) 243-62; J. A. Baker, “The Book of Job: Unity and Meaning,” in Studia Biblica 1978, ed. E. A. Livingstone (JSOTSup 11; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1979) 17-26; A. Brenner, “Job the Pious? The Characterization of Job in the Narrative Framework of the Book,” in The Poetical Books: A Sheffield Reader, ed. D. J. A. Clines (BibSem 41; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997) 298-313; J. C. de Moor, “Ugarit and the Origin of Job,” in Ugarit and the Bible: Proceedings of the International Symposium on Ugarit and the Bible, Manchester, September 1992, ed. G. J. Brooke, A. H. W. Curtis, and J. F. Healey (UBL 11; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, 1994) 225-58; W. J. Dumbrell, “The Purpose of the Book of Job,” in The Way of Wisdom: Essays in Honor of Bruce K. Waltke, ed. J. I. Packer and S. K. Soderlund (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2000) 91-105; R. S. Fyall, Now My Eyes Have Seen You: Images of Creation and Evil in the Book of Job (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002); S. A. Geller, “‘Where Is Wisdom?’: A Literary Study of Job 28 in Its Settings,” in Judaic Perspectives on Ancient Israel, ed. J. Neusner, B. Levine and E. Freerichs (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987) 155-88; N. Glatzer, ed., The Dimensions of Job: Study and Selected Readings (New York: Schocken, 1969); M. Greenberg, “Job,” in Studies in the Bible and Jewish Thought (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1995a) 335-60; idem, “Reflections on Job’s Theology,” in Studies in the Bible and Jewish Thought (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1995b) 327-34; M. I. Gruber, “Human and Divine Wisdom in the Book of Job,” in Boundaries of the Ancient Near Eastern World: A Tribute to

Cyrus H. Gordon, ed. M. Lubetski, C. Gottlieb and S. Keller (JSOTSup 273; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 88-102; N. C. Habbel, "The Role of Elihu in the Design of the Book of Job," in In the Shelter of Elyon: Essays on Ancient Palestinian Life and Literature in Honour of G. W. Ahlström, ed. W. B. Barrick and J. R. Spencer (JSOTSup 31; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984) 81-98; G. L. Mattingly, "The Pious Sufferer: Mesopotamia's Traditional Theodicy and Job's Counselors," in The Bible in the Light of Cuneiform Literature, ed. W. W. Hallo, B. W. Jones and G. L. Mattingly (ScrCon 3; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1990) 305-48; E. W. Nicholson, "The Limits of Theodicy as a Theme of the Book of Job," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon, H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 71-82; J. J. M. Roberts, "Job and the Israelite Religious Tradition," in The Bible and the Ancient Near East (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2002) 110-16; N. Sarna, "Epic Substratum in the Prose of Job," JBL 76 (1957) 13-25; J. F. A. Sawyer, "The Authorship and Structure of the Book of Job," in Studia Biblica 1978, ed. E. A. Livingstone (JSOTSup 11; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1979) 253-57; M. Tsevat, "The Meaning of the Book of Job," in The Meaning of the Book of Job and Other Biblical Studies (New York: KTAV, 1980) 1-38; M. Weiss, The Story of Job's Beginning (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1983); C. Westermann, The Structure of the Book of Job (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); R. B. Zuck, ed., Sitting with Job: Selected Studies on the Book of Job (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992).
J. H. Walton

JOB 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND

Among the wisdom texts of the ancient Middle East the book of Job is an impressive work of erudition. In creating a complex composition that addresses the problem of inexplicable *suffering—the most troubling dimension of human experience—its author drew on a host of genres from the cult, the legal tradition and the wisdom tradition. Furthermore, this author's work, as is characteristic of several works from the wisdom tradition, has an international perspective. The dialogue is set either in Syria or Edom. Edom, famous for its sages (Jer 49:7; Obad 8), is prominent as the home of Eliphaz, the lead comforter, and possibly of the main character, Job. Other peoples and places mentioned include Sabaeans, Chaldeans, Tema, Sheba, Cush and Ophir. This poet displays a breadth of knowledge in the wide range of topics found in the speeches—for example, mining (Job 28:1-11), travel of merchants across the desert (Job 6:18-20), a variety of traps (Job 18:8-10), precious metals (Job 22:21-25; 28:1-2), prized jewels and glassware (Job 28:16-19), constellations (Job 9:9; 38:31-32), animal portraits (Job 38:39—39:30), the ideal prototype human (Job 15:7-8) and a sage's report of a revelatory vision (Job 4:12-16). The animal portraits show an interest in scientific categorization such as is attested in documents from Egypt and Mesopotamia. The author of Job was truly an international sage. Thus it is not surprising that documents from Mesopotamia and Egypt that treat the issues of inexplicable suffering and social turmoil offer a variety of parallels in theme, imagery and structure to the book of Job.

1. Mesopotamian Texts
2. Egyptian Texts
3. Conclusion

1. Mesopotamian Texts.

Six texts from Mesopotamia will be considered here. Three are hymns of praise to god for a remarkable recovery from a debilitating illness: the Sumerian Man and His God and two Akkadian texts, A Sufferer's Salvation and I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom. A fourth text, A Dialogue between a Man and His God, poorly preserved, belongs to this category but differs structurally. Two Akkadian texts use a dialogue format to probe situations that contradict the traditional wisdom teaching on rewards and punishments. In The Babylonian Theodicy a sufferer and a friend discuss the challenges to traditional wisdom that arise from the sufferer's experience. There is also The Obliging Slave, a humorous satire in which a well-to-do master despairs of finding any meaningful activity in this life.

1.2. Hymns of Praise. Some hymns of praise were composed as a liturgical response for recovery from a life-threatening illness (Weinfeld). The recovered person begins and ends the hymn with elaborate praise of his personal god. At the center the supplicant enumerates in detail the ailments from which he was delivered. These texts encouraged ancient Babylonians beset with hardships for no apparent reason to appeal to the god(s) by affirming that the god(s) provide deliverance.

1.2.1. Man and His God (COS 1.179:573-75). The oldest known work in this category, possibly composed around the beginning of the second millennium BC, is the Sumerian poem of some 140 lines entitled Man and His God. An upright young man opens and closes a hymn with exhortations always to exalt one's god. At the core of the poem for some ninety-one lines (28-119), the devotee describes in detail the dreadful illness that he endured even though he was unaware of having committed any specific offense to account for his affliction.

This person, who was severely afflicted, lamented the added suffering caused by the hostility of those with whom he had worked:

My herdsman maltreats me, who am not hostile (toward him),
My companion says not a true word to me,
My friend renders my words, truthfully spoken, a lie. (36-38)

Not only deeply troubled by his friends' deceiving him, he was especially distressed that they were informing others that his word was a lie (28-29). Their accusations troubled him so deeply that he even accused his god with failing to stop their deceitfulness (37-38). Similarly for Job, a most agonizing aspect of his trial was the fact that God had made his body testify against the truthfulness of his assertions of innocence (Job 16:8). In other words, Job's emaciated body served as irrefutable testimony to his guilt.

Heavy suffering caused this Sumerian to weep bitterly (71). Out of anguish he petitioned his god earnestly for the recovery of strength (98-99). Troubled, he went on to ask,

How long will you not care for me, will you not look after me? (100)

Although he wanted to honor his god and take the right course, his god did not permit him to do so (101-102). He then acknowledged the truth of the wisdom maxim that never had a sinless child been born (104). This saying was strongly affirmed by Job's counselors (e.g., Job 4:17-21; 11:12). By quoting it, the Sumerian sought to move his god to disclose his sins so that he could make confession at the city gate (114-116). In fact, this man's contrite response to affliction is the way that Job's three comforters wanted him to behave, but he resolutely refused their counsel and affirmed his innocence. Job did not claim that he was sinless but rather that he had never done any wrong that warranted such horrific suffering. The Sumerian's god, assuaged by his devotee's pleas, removed his afflictions, restored his joy, and set a benevolent spirit as his guardian (120-132).

This hymn encourages the devout beset by suffering to lament vigorously and seek god continually, for they will find restoration. However, the Sumerian sufferer never raised the question of divine justice, a major theme of the book of Job. As he lamented, he pondered about several causes for his illness: the decrees of fate (42); Asag, a demon bringing headaches and illness (74); the abandonment of his god (100); and his own sinfulness (104-106), but he did not settle on any one of these as the cause. Clearly, then, this ancient Sumerian understanding of human suffering is opposite to the position presented in the book of Job.

1.2.2. A Sufferer's Salvation (COS 1.152:486). Two Akkadian texts follow a similar structure. Whether or not they were influenced by the preceding Sumerian text, they belong to a common literary tradition. The first, A Sufferer's Salvation (RS 25.460), a text from Ugarit written in Akkadian, is usually dated to the end of the fourteenth century BC (Lambert). This fact serves as evidence that literary pieces treating the theme of the just sufferer were present on Canaanite soil at an early date, thereby adding weight to the possibility that the author of Job was influenced by a wide and varied literary tradition on this subject.

The beginning of this Akkadian text is missing. When the extant text begins, a sufferer, befuddled by his fate, describes how he turned to magicians, soothsayers and augurs for insight into his deplorable condition. However, all means of contacting the spirit world had been shut off (1'-8'). As a result, he had no way of finding out either the cause of his illness or a cure. He was in such a sorry condition that his family had gathered to observe a wake for him (9'-12'). The sufferer then details his many ailments: lack of appetite, insomnia, troubling thoughts. The grateful sufferer renders enthusiastic praise to Marduk, describing this god in antithetical terms (34'-39'):

[He it] is, Marduk, I entreat(?) him,

I entreat(?) him,
[He it] was who smote me, then was merciful to me. (33'-34')
...
He dashed me down, then grabbed me (as I fell). (36')

Although the text breaks off, the speaker apparently enumerated the way Marduk brought healing to each part of his devastated body.

1.2.3. The Poem of the Righteous Sufferer (COS 1.153:486-92). The famous Akkadian text on this theme is The Poem of the Righteous Sufferer, also known as The Babylonian Job or by its opening line, I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom (Ludlul bēl nēmeqi). The author, a highly learned person, skillfully employed a variety of poetic devices, including alliteration, inclusio, a variety of parallel patterns, and allusion, to compose one of the finest literary documents from ancient Mesopotamia (Foster). The advanced, complex structure of this text attests that its author drew on and advanced a rich literary tradition. Its ancient popularity is attested by the several copies that have been found in several locations from Nineveh to Babylon and by an ancient commentary on it.

A Babylonian sufferer named Subshi-meshre-Shakkan delivered a long monologue of over four hundred lines, opening and closing with a hymn of praise to Marduk, the main god of the Babylonians. At the outset he vividly lauded Marduk's power to bless and to afflict:

I will praise the lord of wisdom, solicitous
god,
[Fur]ious in the night, growing in the day:
Marduk! lord of wisdom, solicitous god
(1.1-3)
...
Whose anger is like a raging tempest,
But whose breeze is sweet as the breath of morn. (1.5-6)
...
His scourge is barbed and punctures the body. (1.21)

Marduk makes humans bear the consequences of their sins, but he also dispels guilt. Here the sufferer affirmed that his goal in composing this text was to encourage people by informing them of Marduk's anger and his kindness:

I, who touched bottom like a fish, will proclaim his anger,
He quickly granted me favor, as if reviving
the dead.
I will teach the people that his kindness is nigh,
May his favorable thought take away their [guilt?]. (1.39-42)

Subshi-meshre-Shakkan went on to complain in detail about the horrific sufferings that befell him when Marduk unexpectedly turned against him. All members of the community, the king, his family, and his god and goddess abandoned him. Those who spoke well of him were punished, while those who defamed him advanced. Everywhere he went people gawked at him as though he were an enemy. His former slaves, male and female, defamed him in public. Others added to his losses. Officials blocked water for irrigation from reaching his fields and took away his prerogatives in the community. Courtiers plotted to do him harm and to gain his wealth:

They parceled my possessions among the riffraff,
The sources of my watercourses they blocked with muck,
They chased the harvest song from my fields,
They left my community deathly still, like that of a (ravaged) foe. (1.100-104)

No one stood up as his helper. Job also mourned his isolation from all, from servants to family members (Job 19:13-19). As part of his avowal of innocence (Job 30), Job bitterly complained that the lowest members of society, those so low that he would not even let their fathers accompany the dogs that watched his flocks, made him their mocking song (Job 30:1-15). However, Job never accused anybody of taking his goods or seeking to do him harm.

In his complaint Subshi-meshre-Shakkan detailed the ailments that troubled his body:

By day sighing, by night lamentation,
Monthly, trepidation, despair the year.
I moaned like a dove all my days,
Like a singer, I moan out my dirge.
My eyes endure(?) constant crying,
My cheeks scald from tears, as if eroded(?).
My face is darkened from the apprehensions of my heart,

Terror and panic have jaundiced my face.
The wellsprings of my heart quaked for unremitting anxiety. (1.105-113)

In several of his speeches Job likewise expressed details of his physical suffering—for example, he said,

I have sewed sackcloth over my skin, and buried my brow in the dust.
My face is red with weeping,
dark shadows ring my eyes.
(Job 16:15-16 NIV)

At the end of the first tablet Subshi-meshre-Shakkan expressed the hope that his fortune would change:

Surely in daylight good will come upon me!
The new moon will appear, the sun will shine! (1.119-120)

Nevertheless, in the next tablet he continued to describe his suffering in detail, showing that his hope had not been immediately realized. He specifically complained that his sufferings had continued for over a year. By contrast, in the book of Job there are virtually no indicators as to how long Job suffered.

Though not entertaining the question of *theodicy in any depth, this Babylonian acknowledged that his losses troubled his understanding of god:

I wish I knew that these things were pleasing to a god!
What seems good to one's self could be an offense to a god,
...
Who could learn the reasoning of the gods
in heaven? (2.33-36)

His expression of self-doubt about what a god valued hindered his pursuing a divine explanation for his affliction. Since Job had a stronger sense of the character of divine justice (see Job 29), he was deeply distraught by God's apparent hostility and persistent silence. However, he challenged that hostility. In seeking to hold God accountable, Job longed for an umpire, a friend, or a *kinsman-redeemer, one who would assist him in achieving reconciliation with God. Beyond Job's own quest, the book itself seeks explanations for unjust suffering in the context of belief in one just God.

Subshi-meshre-Shakkan believed that his fate was such as befell those who had been unfaithful in observing times of prayer and holy days. To contest his apparent infidelity, he recalled that during his prosperity he had been mindful of observing all cultic customs. The character of his self-justification contrasts with Job's declarations of innocence. Subshi-meshre-Shakkan grounded his uprightness on observance of ritual acts, whereas Job grounded his innocence on the moral integrity of his attitudes. Even though at the outset Job is depicted as such a conscientious worshiper that he periodically made sacrifices to atone for any possible curse against God made by his children in their thoughts (Job 1:5), in the dialogue he never recounted any acts of ritual observance in defense of his innocence (see Job 29—31). Rather, Job centered his integrity on the honor he had in the community, his concern for the weak, and the closeness of God in his life.

Affliction reduced Subshi-meshre-Shakkan to constant weeping. His prayers were powerless. Because Marduk had abandoned him, he was convinced that demons tormented his body:

[They (i.e., a spirit and a she-demon) struck
my he|jad, they closed around my pate,
[My features] were gloomy, my eyes ran a flood,
They wrenched my muscles, made my neck limp. (2.59-61)

...
They churned up my bowels, they tw[isted]
my entrails(?),
Coughing and hacking infected my lungs,
They infected(?) my limbs, made my flesh
pasty,
My lofty stature they toppled like a wall.
(2.65-69)

...
A demon has clothed himself in my body for a garment,
Drowsiness smothers me like a net. (2.71-72)
...
Numbness has spread over my whole body.
(2.75)

...
Signs of death have shrouded my face! (2:81)

To find relief, he turned to diviners and exor-cists. But the diviners offered no insight, and the exorcists were unable to drive out these evil spirits. Although there is an enigmatic *Satan, who was Job's adversary in the heavenly counsel, Job never entertained thoughts of demons as the cause of his affliction. Nor did he search out diviners to help discover the cause of his ill fate.

As Subshi-meshre-Shakkan continued to lament, he devoted over sixty lines to detailing his various ailments. In the following words the depth of his humiliation is clearly visible:

I spent the night in my dung like an ox,
I wallowed in my excrement like a sheep.
(2.101-104)

Since he had been confined to bed, his family abandoned any hope of his recovery. So they prepared his grave and performed funeral rites for him.

At the depth of despair, Subshi-meshre-Shakkan suddenly experienced a complete reversal in his fate. In a nightmarish dream he dimly perceived a stately young man clothed in glorious apparel. This visitor told him that a lady had sent him. The lady's words are lost, for the text is broken here. In a second dream he saw one identified as a purifier. That one informed him that he, a citizen of Nippur, had come to perform purification rites on his behalf. While pouring water over Subshi-meshre-Shakkan, he recited an incantation. In a third dream the sufferer beheld a dazzling woman clothed in splendor. She proclaimed release to the sufferer. Then he saw a bearded exorcist, carrying a favorable sign, who had been empowered by Marduk to bring deliverance.

As Subshi-meshre-Shakkan awoke, a serpent that brings healing slithered by, and he recovered immediately. Marduk, having been appeased, accepted Subshi-meshre-Shakkan's prayers and caused his offenses to be borne away by the wind (3.60). It is curious that although Subshi-meshre-Shakkan was unaware of having done any wrong, he expressly stated that his offenses were removed at the time of his healing. By contrast, God never accused Job of any wrongdoing, but only of darkening counsel (Job 38:2). Job withdrew his lament (Job 42:6), but he made no confession of sin. Furthermore, the text never says that God forgave Job any offense.

Subshi-meshre-Shakkan praised Marduk for bringing him full restoration, recounting in detail the return of strength to the various parts of his body (1¹-14¹). He also mentioned that he survived the river ordeal; unfortunately, more is not known about this ordeal, since the text is fragmented. Subshi-meshre-Shakkan might have sought thereby to prove his worthiness for acceptance back into the community. He then made a procession through the thirteen gates in Esagila, the magnificent temple of Marduk in Babylon. Possibly this was a ritual leading to full reintegration into society. At each gate he received a blessing that corresponded to the gate's name—for example, "Gate of Prosperity," "Gate of Splendid Wonderment," "Gate of Release from Guilt." Arriving inside the temple, he worshiped his god and presented offerings in abundance, causing the gods and spirits to glow with pleasure. Here the text ends, according to Lambert. However, there is a fragment that recounts how the citizens of Babylon, upon seeing that Marduk had restored Subshi-meshre-Shakkan's life, broke out in exuberant praise of their god. Lambert places this fragment before the river ordeal, but Foster places it at the conclusion. In either case, two major purposes of this text are to render high praise to Marduk and to extend hope of recovery for those beset with dreadful illnesses.

Hymnic lines also have an important place in the book of Job. In the first and third cycles of the dialogue Job and the comforters cited hymnic lines. In Job 9:5-13 Job described the absolute power of God over nature and cosmic foes. In Job 12:14-25 he sang of God's power to unsettle the social order. Another time he lamented God's distance (Job 23:8-9, 13-14). The friends praised God's majesty and greatness in hymnic lines, such as the doxology spoken by Eliphaz (Job 5:9-16; cf. Job 11:7-11; 22:12; 25:2-6). Elihu recounted God's glorious power manifested in a mighty storm (Job 36:24—37:13). At the end of the book the Yahweh speeches are essentially a hymn of praise to God's wonders in creating and governing the world.

A few key contrasts between The Poem of the Righteous Sufferer and the book of Job highlight the unique approach to suffering taken in the book of Job. The view of the main god is vastly different. In the Babylonian hymn Marduk is distant and unpredictable, blessing or afflicting at will, whereas Yahweh let his servant Job be afflicted out of high confidence in his ability to maintain his integrity amidst terrible sufferings. At the time of restoration Yahweh did not send an emissary to bring about Job's healing. Instead, he appeared and spoke with his servant about the nature of the created order as he sought to lead Job back to a reconciled relationship. In taking this approach, he treated his follower as an astute thinking person whom he could engage in meaningful conversation about his governance of the universe. Two other marked contrasts are the lack of details given to Job's recovery and the lack of emphasis on Job's reestablishment in society. In fact, in the account of Job it is not even explicitly stated that God healed Job. Rather, the conclusion focuses on the reconciliation of the various parties: Job and God, the friends and God, Job and the friends, and Job and his relatives. Amazingly, in light of the prominence given to honoring god in these Mesopotamia texts, there is no report of Job's rendering praise to God. Clearly, the emphasis in Job's story lies on communion with God, not on performance of rituals.

1.2.4. Dialogue Between a Man and His God (COS 1.151:485). The oldest Akkadian text on this subject, dated to the seventeenth century BC, is entitled "Dialogue between a Man and His God." Its structure—speeches by different parties set in a narrative framework—distinguishes it from the preceding texts (see Frame Narrative). Even though large blocks of the text are missing, dialogue does not appear to be an accurate descriptor, for the speeches augment the prose material rather than serving as a response to another's argument.

The text opens with a description of a miserable young man who continually implored his god like a friend (i). While recounting his afflictions, he asserted that he was unaware of having done any wrong (ii). Convinced, however, that retribution produced his ill fate, he acknowledged that even though his god had been kind to him, he had blasphemed the god (iv). Thus he understood his plight to be a revelation of an evil deed, thereby tarnishing his reputation.

After a large break in the text the sufferer recounted the coming of an emissary (viii). That messenger anointed him with oil, gave him food, and ordered his health to return (vii), speaking a powerful word of hope:

Your disease is under control, . . .
the years and days you were filled with misery are over. (viii.1-2)

The emissary added that if survival had not been the destiny of this sufferer, the illness would have taken his life. He exhorted him to remember his god to the end of time (viii.9-10). Next, his personal god delivered a speech telling his devotee that he was to have the confidence that he would live a long life (ix.4). This god promised to provide guardians to protect him and assured him that his strength would return, enabling him to farm his fields again with vigor. The god then exhorted him to feed the hungry from his prospering (ix.6). He was to show compassion with confidence, for "the gate of life and well-being [would be] open" to him (ix.9). These instructions to show benevolence for the deprived based on the assurance of future prosperity are remarkable.

Of the texts from Mesopotamia, only in this one does the personal god, somewhat like Yahweh in the book of Job, directly address the supplicant. Nevertheless, there are significant contrasts in the approaches of the two deities. Whereas the Babylonian god gave his supplicant a variety of instructions and the promise of a blissful future, Yahweh only indirectly asked Job to intercede for the three comforters. He did not give Job any assurance of future prosperity, nor did he exhort Job to carry out deeds of kindness to the weak. This omission indicates that God was confident that Job would continue to live by the highest moral standards (see Job 29; 31). These contrasts underscore the central concern of the book of Job, which is Job's ongoing relationship with God regardless of whether he was prospering or suffering.

1.3. Two Dialogues. Next to be considered are two Mesopotamian texts composed in dialogue format. This format promotes critical reflection and opens up new avenues for thinking about traditional beliefs. It allows a troubled person to search for answers to situations that appear to contradict deeply held beliefs. Although the dialogues in these texts take place between only two parties and the speeches are short, these texts or similar ones surely stood in the lineage of works that influenced the author of Job to develop the expansive format of three interlocutors in debate with the protagonist plus several long speeches from two additional figures.

1.3.1. The Babylonian Theodicy (COS 1.154:492-95). In The Babylonian Theodicy (c. 1000 BC) a sufferer and a friend probe aspects of the issue of unjust suffering that challenge the accepted premise that the established order promotes justice. The work has twenty-seven stanzas, each one having eleven lines that begin with the same syllable. The lines are arranged as an *acrostic to produce the sentence “I am Saggil-kinam-ubbib, an exorcist, an adorant of god and king.” The author’s name, Saggil-kinam-ubbib, means “May Esagila [Marduk’s temple] declare the righteous pure.” This sufferer sets forth his own situation as an example of thwarted retribution that challenges the traditional teaching that the upright receive honor while the corrupt receive dishonor. He, the youngest child, having been suddenly orphaned, has had to endure many hardships. An unnamed friend supports the sufferer’s search and also diligently defends the perspective of traditional wisdom.

A remarkable trait of this Babylonian dialogue is the polite way that the sufferer and the friend address each other throughout. The sufferer describes his friend as one who really cares for him, and he addresses him with many adulations, such as,

Your mind is a wellspring of depth
unplumbed,
The upsurging swell of the ocean that brooks
no inadequacy. (24)
...
Your reasoning is a cool breeze, a breath of fresh air for mankind. (67)

The friend likewise answers the sufferer in commendatory style:

O date palm, wealth-giving tree, my precious brother,
Perfect in all wisdom, O gem of wis[dom].
(57)

Their politeness stands in sharp contrast to the caustic exchanges between Job and his three interlocutors as they accuse each other of speaking hot, empty words. Bildad says to Job, “Your words are a blustering wind” (Job 8:2). Eliphaz retorts, “Would the wise answer with empty notions or fill their bellies with the hot east wind? Would they argue with useless words, with speeches that have no value?” (Job 15: 2-3). Job likewise castigates the friends, “Will your long-winded speeches never end? What ails you that you keep on arguing?” (Job 16:3). In the climate of the Middle East there is a vast difference between a cool, refreshing breeze from the north and the harsh, hot winds that blow off the eastern desert, causing tempers to shorten as temperatures rise. Although the parties’ “theodicies” are generally cordial, a couple of times they respond in a testy, accusing manner. For example, the friend says,

O just, knowledgeable one, your logic is perverse,
You have cast off justice, you have scorned
divine design.
In your emotional state you have an urge to disregard divine ordinances. (78-80)

These words belong to the friend’s response to the sufferer’s doubting the certainty of retribution in all situations. Another time he says,

Adept scholar, master of erudition,
You blaspheme in the anguish of your thoughts. (254-255)

In his tale of woe the sufferer, though very weak, complains that food has become so tasteless that he has no appetite even for beer, which might afford him some relief. He underscores the injustice of his situation by intimating it is lower than that of the onager and the lion, animals that have full stomachs even though they have not presented any offerings to appease a deity (v). The friend’s answer is that since the sufferer is only a child, how could he know the purpose of the gods, which is too remote for humans? He further defends traditional belief by stressing that an ill fate awaits these creatures: a piercing arrow awaits the onager, and a pit the lion (vi).

The sufferer discounts this argument with the observation that those unmindful of god prosper. A rich parvenu struts his wealth without making any effort to honor the mother goddess with gifts yet faces no ill consequences. By contrast, even though this sufferer has faithfully sought his god, he now carries a yoke of servitude devoid of profit. Reduced to poverty, he is considered lower than a fool (vii). The friend, in response, charges the sufferer with skewed logic, disregarding divine ordinances. This exchange does have similarities to that between Job and his friends. In the second cycle of the dialogue (Job 15–21) the friends challenged Job’s claim that his suffering was unjust by painting vivid portraits of the assured fate of the wicked. Job countered by detailing scenarios of the wicked who were happy and prosperous (Job 21). He particularly challenged the escape clause frequently cited in defense of retribution that maintained that although a wicked person might escape punishment during his life, his children bear the full brunt of the harm that he has done (Job 21:19). In fact, Job argued that a person's fate has little to do with one's devotion (Job 21:22-26).

Another argument of the Babylonian sufferer is that an upright person experiences good, but only partially (xxiii). He supports this position by describing a person with four children: whereas the meager employment of three of them brings the father dishonor, the success of one brings him honor. After judging this illustration to be blasphemy, the friend counters with the claim that the gods compensate with a great reward a righteous person who experiences something bad (xxiv):

The cow's first calf is inferior,
Her subsequent offspring is twice as big.
The first child is born a weakling,
The second is called a capable warrior.
(260-264)

Not persuaded, the sufferer enumerates a variety of inequities in society, such as villains becoming rich while the honest are rejected (xxv). He had already lamented the inversion of roles that sometimes takes place in society—for example, a king's son is reduced to wearing rags while a son of a destitute person wears fine clothes (xvii). The friend answers with the ancient Mesopotamian belief that in making humans, the gods gave them perverted speech. Earlier he had argued that any apparent exceptions to just retribution are short lived, noting that a deadly weapon pursues the ungodly swindler (xxii). Therefore, he exhorts his companion to realize that if he seeks after the gods, he will regain in a moment what he had lost in a year (xxii). This instruction echoes the friends' elaborate promises of blessing if Job repented (especially in Job 22:21-30). The Babylonian sufferer concludes by asking the friend to be considerate of his troubles and by praying that his god and goddess might show him mercy (xxvii). The ending is abrupt; apparently, it is to be assumed that the gods answered the sufferer's petition and restored his health.

This Babylonian text defends the precept that the inherent moral order rewards good and punishes evil even though that order does not work precisely in every case. Exceptions to just rewards are only apparent, for the divine purpose is too remote for humans to know. Humans should expect suffering and hardship because they were made with an inclination to perverted words and thoughts. Another answer to incomprehensible suffering is that the wicked who prosper soon experience a contemptible fate. By contrast, Job's story teaches that there are cases of grave suffering caused by a reason that lies outside the behavior or character of the sufferer.

1.3.2. The Dialogue of Pessimism (COS 1.155:495-96). In a humorous Babylonian satire known as The Dialogue of Pessimism or The Obliging Slave, a rich master, deep in despair at finding any meaning in life, converses with his trusted servant about engaging in a variety of activities that might provide him significant pleasure, such as readying his chariot to go for a ride, building a house, or loving a woman. Each time, his valet lauds the pleasure that the contemplated activity offers and encourages his master to pursue that activity. Immediately the master changes his mind, asserting that he will not do what he had just contemplated. At once the servant concurs with his master, pointing out the downside of the spurned activity. Here is an example of their exchange in regard to the master's proposal to make a sacrifice to his personal deity:

"Slave, oblige me again!"
"Here, master! Here!"
"Get a move on and get water for my hands and give it to me so that I can make a sacrifice to my personal god!"
"Make a sacrifice, master, make a sacrifice! A man who makes a sacrifice to his personal god will be content. On trust he is making loan upon loan."
"No way, slave. I will not make a sacrifice to my personal god."
"Don't do it, master, don't do it. Can you teach your personal god to run after you like a dog? He'll just demand of you rites, a votive statue, and many other things."
(53-61)

At the climax of these exchanges the master asks the servant, "Now, then, what is good?" (60).

The servant brazenly proposes that their necks should be broken. The master counters by saying that he will kill the servant first. The servant retorts that should the master do so, he would not be able to survive for even three days—that is, without his servant's help. The extant text stops here. Whether or not this was the original conclusion is unknown.

This text discounts the belief that a human finds meaning either in devotion to a god or the insights of the wise. Consequently, it endorses suicide as an honorable option for the despondent. At the outset Job earnestly wished that God had taken his life even before he was born (Job 3:2-13), but Job never contemplated taking his own life. In his much speaking Job freely disclosed the great agitation that his afflictions caused, but after his first two speeches he steadily moved away from complete despair of life to centering his efforts on finding a resolution to his gloomy condition. He came to place the highest value on a life of personal integrity and on communion with God.

This Babylonian text also illustrates the use of irony and satire in probing the issue of life's meaning. Irony is found throughout the book of Job along with small touches of satire. In a brilliant example of satire Job contemplated the possibility of demonstrating his innocence by performing an ordeal of purification, but he quickly abandoned that thought when he imagined that God would only turn the ordeal inside out by dunking him into a cesspool, thereby making him look not only silly but even more guilty (Job 9:30-31). Satire and irony serve to break through the walls of traditional thought and open up new avenues for viewing difficult issues.

From another perspective this Babylonian text, somewhat like *Ecclesiastes, finds that there are no activities in which humans delight that offer sufficient meaning to keep a depressed person from pursuing suicide (for additional discussion on the topic of suicide, see 2.1 below).

2. Egyptian Texts.

Several Egyptian texts have literary techniques, imagery and concepts comparable to portions of the book of Job. Five texts will be considered here. The first to be considered is A Dispute over Suicide, an account of a man who longs for death as an escape from the hardships of life, since a review of this text complements the preceding discussion about suicide. Next to be treated are three tirades against social disorder, The Admonitions of Ipuwer, The Complaints of Khakheperre-sonb and The Prophecies of Neferti, a genre that the Egyptians prized. The fifth text for consideration is The Protests of the Eloquent Peasant.

2.1. A Dispute over Suicide (COS 3.146:321-25).

A Dispute over Suicide, also called The Dispute of a Man and His Ba, employs a dialogue format to present a person's deep self-reflection on the value of suicide as an escape from depression fed by a corrupt, unresponsive society. In this text a despondent person expresses his troubled thoughts about the worthlessness of life to his ba, the personality that stands over against him. Interpretation of this text is unfortunately hindered by several factors: the loss of the text's beginning, numerous gaps throughout, and obscure language. These factors have led to wide variety in English translations.

The protagonist, weary and disillusioned with life, seeks to persuade his external personality, his ba, to support his longing for death. Ba is often translated "soul," but the Egyptian concept is far more dynamic than what is conveyed by this English term. The ba is a person's life force housed in, but not confined to, the body. Having its own will, it may depart for a time; after a while it longs to return to its physical abode. This characteristic corresponds to the ba's being represented in hieroglyphs as a bird with a human head. At death, the ba wandered about, preferring to return to its bodily home at night. This belief about the ba was a factor in the practice of mummification: the preservation of a corpse was as lifelike as possible so that the ba could recognize its original home.

In order to find bliss in the afterlife this troubled man needs to win his ba's consent to his taking his own life. His ba responds by trying to dissuade him by noting the heartbreak that befalls the dead and by recounting two parables that illustrate the value of life. The master counters with four poems on four subjects, one recited after the other. Each poem prizes death over life. In the first poem the master depicts how woeful his reputation is by comparing it to the worst smells:

Lo, my name reeks,
Lo, more than carrion smell

On summer days of burning sky. (87-88)
 ...
 Lo, my name reeks,
 Lo, more than fishermen smell,
 More than the marsh-pools where they fish.
 (94-95) [trans. M. Lichtheim 1975]

In the second poem he laments his loneliness, which is virtually incurable because people are so corrupt and self-serving. In the third poem he paints the value of death in several forceful metaphors:

Like the fragrance of myrrh,
 Like sitting under sail on a breezy day. (134)
 ...
 Like the fragrance of lotus,
 Like sitting on the shore of drunkenness.
 (136)

In the fourth poem he glorifies life in the next world:

Truly, he who is yonder will be a living god,
 Punishing the evildoer's crime. (143-144)
 ...
 Truly, he who is yonder will be a wise man,
 Not barred from appealing to Re when he speaks. (146-147)

The man's arguments move the ba to declare that it will stay with its master when he dies.

There are ties between this Egyptian text and the book of Job. Both of these ancient writers used the genre of monologue to present a person's self-reflection. The Egyptian sage uses this genre in the four poems, and the Joban poet casts Job's initial lament in this form (Job 3) as well as the opening of his first response in the dialogue (Job 6:2-13). By contrast, the rest of Job's speeches in the dialogue (Job 5—27) are addressed to specific parties. Another point of contact with the book of Job is the protagonist's intense longing for death as an escape from grave affliction and isolation. At the outset Job too longed for death, wishing that he had been stillborn and gone straight to Sheol, for there the laborer no longer has to listen to the shouts of a taskmaster or feel the whip of the crew chief (Job 3:18). Realizing that this was an impossible wish, he expressed that his longing for death was as great as the longing of those who risk all in search of gold (Job 3:20-22). As he continued to speak, Job moved away from idealizing life in Sheol to wanting to be brought back to life should God be pleased to hide him for awhile in the grave (Job 14:13-15). Job's agitated, frank lamenting turned his desire from longing for death to proving his innocence so that he might continue to live. By contrast, this Egyptian came to the position that death was welcomed as an escape from loneliness and shame. A primary reason that Job did not contemplate suicide as an avenue of escape from suffering was his view of God. In fact, by the end of the dialogue Job became so confident of his innocence that he swore by God, the giver of life, that he would not compromise his integrity by confessing some contrived wrongdoing so that God might extend his life (Job 27:2-4). In contrast to the Egyptian who yielded to despair at life, Job came to prize a full life, which he believed would return upon his vindication.

2.2. Tirades on Social Chaos. Some Egyptian texts belonging to the genre of wisdom instruction may be more specifically classified as tirades against social disorder. Here a brief outline of Egyptian history from the third millennium BC through the middle of the first millennium BC is useful as an aid in understanding the social motivation underlying these texts. Throughout most of its long history of two and a half millennia, a strong Egypt was ruled by a sovereign pharaoh. But during two periods, known as intermediate periods, rule shifted from a pharaoh to two or three barons of dominant nomes (districts) who vied for control. Thus, ancient Egyptian history is divided into five periods: the Old Kingdom, the First Intermediate Period, the Middle Kingdom, the Second Intermediate Period, the New Kingdom. On the discovery of The Admonitions of Ipuwer in the last century, scholars interpreted this text as a first-hand description of the social turmoil of the First Intermediate Period. Currently this interpretation is under serious challenge. Recent scholars have observed that texts such as this one are verbose, filled with stylized expressions and repetitions that lack any reference to specific times, places and people. Some, such as Lichtheim, argue that scribes wrote these texts during a time of prosperity in order to promote a political agenda. In addition, increased understanding of the First Intermediate Period has shown that during that era Egyptian social order was stable because two dominant monarchs, even though they vied for rule, maintained order. In addition, the evidence is conclusive that two of these texts, The Complaints of Khakheperre-sonb and The Prophecies of Neferti, were composed in the Middle Kingdom, long after the First Intermediate Period.

2.2.1. The Admonitions of Ipuwer (COS 1.42:93-98). The Admonitions of Ipuwer, from either the First Intermediate Period or the late Middle Kingdom, consists of six tirades about disturbed conditions in society. Many scholars conjecture that originally a narrative framework similar to that of the book of Job provided a setting for these speeches. In the first three poems Ipuwer vividly describes the crumbling of social order: servants refuse to do their tasks; gangs dominate the countryside; plowing has ceased in the fields; the cultivated land is giving way to the desert; Asiatics flood the land; women fail to conceive; secure writings of the court are stolen and made public; the writings of scribes are destroyed; laws are thrown out of government buildings and trampled by the rabble; small and great wish that they were dead; some abandon themselves to be consumed by crocodiles; children are killed by being hurled against a wall.

A dominant motif in these texts is the inversion of the social order. As Ipuwer says,

Indeed, poor men have become owners of wealth,
He who could not make for himself sandals owns riches. (2.4-5)
...
Indeed, the noblemen are in mourning and the poor man is full of joy. (2:7)
...
The robber is a possessor of riches and [the rich man has become (?)] a plunderer.
(2.9)
...
Indeed, the great council chamber is a public resort,
Beggars come and go in the Great Houses.
(6.12)

Ipuwer was particularly distressed at the complete disregard for the dead; mummification and proper burial were premiere concerns of the nobles. In that day even the deceased who had tombs were laid on high ground, and the art of embalming was becoming lost.

In the fifth poem, on a more positive note, Ipuwer enjoined the people to destroy the enemy and to remember to perform their standard activities. In doing those activities—for example, bathing those who were ill, fumigating with incense, presenting offerings at the temple, observing regulations—they would give structure to the chaotic situation. Nevertheless, Ipuwer was so bold as to criticize Re, the supreme god, and to charge Pharaoh with not executing the authority of his office:

Authority, Knowledge and Truth are with you,
Yet confusion is what you set throughout the land,
And the noise of tumult.
Behold, one fights against another,
For men obey what you have commanded.
If three men travel on the road,
They are found to be only two,
For the many kill the few. (12.11-15)

Unfortunately, the Egyptian language in this section is very difficult to interpret. Some scholars take this passage as a criticism of Re, while others find it to be a description of an ideal pharaoh who would restore order and glory to Egypt. In the sixth poem Ipuwer described the joy and beauty of a stable order, a picture of the good times ahead. Overall, this sage, in contrast to the concerns of Job, emphasizes social stability rather than moral justice.

2.2.2. The Complaints of Khakheperre-sonb (COS 1.44:104-6). Another text belonging to the category of social complaint is The Complaints of Khakheperre-sonb. It was composed in the Middle Kingdom, likely during the reign of Sesostri II. This text is simpler and more personal than the other two in this category. Khakheperre-sonb does not appear to have a compelling political agenda, for he speaks to his own heart about his anguish at the unsettled conditions in society.

Lacking a prose frame, the text begins with these words: “The collection of words, the gathering of maxims . . . by the priest of Heliopolis, the . . . Khakheperre-sonb called Ankhu.” Troubled by the decaying conditions in society, he enters into an apology for speaking:

I empty my belly of that which is in it,
In loosing all that I have said (before);
For what has been said is repetition.
(Recto 3)

...
 One who has spoken should not speak,
 But one should speak who has something to say. (Recto 5)
 ...
 It is hard to keep silent about it. (Recto 13)

This introduction recalls Elihu's apology for taking the floor after Job's three comforters had turned silent, thereby conceding that Job had proven his innocence. Elihu defended his speaking:

I am full of words,
 and the spirit within me compels me;
 inside I am like bottled-up wine,
 ...
 I must speak and find relief;
 I must open my lips and reply.
 (Job 32:18-20 NIV)

Desiring to compose a new message free from trite expressions, Khakheperre-sonb describes changes that have produced appalling hardships and chaos in society:

Right is cast outside,
 Wrong is in the council hall;
 The plans of the gods are violated,
 Their ordinances neglected,
 The land is in turmoil,
 Mourning is in everyplace. (Recto 11)

The relaxing of moral constraints encourages all to act crookedly. The resulting gloomy conditions in society grieve Khakheperre-sonb, compelling him to vent his feelings and describe what is going on in order to counter the silence of the greedy populace.

The Egyptian text ends abruptly. It is unclear whether or not there was an additional tablet. Some scholars maintain that the text must have been longer, arguing that this short complaint is insufficient to account for this sage's appearance in official lists.

2.2.3. The Prophecies of Neferti (COS 1.45:106-10). A more complex text in the category of social complaint is The Prophecies of Neferti. The text itself locates these prophecies in the court of Snefru, a strong, prosperous pharaoh of the Fourth Dynasty, the Old Kingdom. One day that pharaoh asked the premier lector-priest and sage of Bastet, who had a reputation for eloquent speech, to entertain him about the future. The priest painted a picture of grave natural and social disturbances that would befall the nation. There would be low Niles, leading to years of poor harvests. Fish pools would dry up. Asiatics—foreigners from the area of Canaan and Syria—would migrate into the land, driving Egyptians from harvesting the fields in the delta region and taking cattle from the plow. Egyptian society would be demoralized. People would be unconcerned if a person nearby became a victim of crime. Family members would not support each other:

A man sits with his back turned,
 While one man kills another.
 I show you a son as an enemy,
 A brother as a foe,
 A man killing his (own) father.
 Every mouth is full of "love me,"

Everything good has disappeared. (44-46)

He moved into a description of an upside down social order:

I show you a lord in worries, the stranger satisfied.
 He who has never filled up for himself is now empty. (47-48)
 ...
 I show you the land in turmoil,
 The weak of arm is (now) the possessor of an arm,
 One salutes him who (formerly) saluted.

I show you the lowly as superior. (54-55)

Abruptly, Neferti began to proclaim the redemption that would come to Egypt:

Then a king will come from the south,
 Imeny [Ameny], the justified, is his name,
 A son is he of a woman of the land of Nubia,
 A child is he of Upper Egypt.
 He will take the white crown,
 He will wear the red crown. (58-60)
 ...
 Rejoice, O people of his time,
 The son of man will make his name forever and ever. (62)

The new pharaoh would restore order. He would kill troublesome foreigners, Asiatics and Libyans and bar Asiatics from getting into Egypt. That Pharaoh was Amenemhet, the founder of the Twelfth Dynasty, Middle Kingdom. Mention of this Pharaoh by name leads scholars to classify this text as a political apology for the inauguration of a new dynasty and to assign its composition to that Pharaoh's reign. If that is the case, this text must have been composed in the early days of his reign—that is, before a coup instigated by his own guards and members of the harem, as described in “The Instruction of Amenemhet,” turned him into a passive, solitary figure.

Similar to the central theme in these three tirades against social disorder are Job's harangues at injustices in society. His harshest criticism of God's wanton disregard of justice comes in Job 9:22b-24 (NIV):

[God] destroys both the blameless and the wicked.
When a scourge brings sudden death,
he mocks the despair of the innocent.
When a land falls into the hands of
the wicked,
he blindfolds its judges.
If it is not he, then who is it?

No wonder God accused Job of darkening counsel (Job 38:2). In a longer piece Job recounted in detail God's robbing officials of their power and position, resulting in social upheavals without any discernible rectitude (Job 12:14-25). In Job 24:1-17 he vividly pictured the strenuous efforts that the weak and the poor must make in order to survive the arrows of cruel, demanding overlords compounded by hostile forces of nature and magnified by their being prey to hardened criminals. Thus Job shares with these Egyptian sages a longing for the rectification of these harsh social injustices.

2.3. The Protests of the Eloquent Peasant (COS 1.43:98-104). The Protests of the Eloquent Peasant comes from the Middle Kingdom, the first half of the second millennium BC. Structurally, this text, like the book of Job, has a prose prologue and an epilogue that envelop a series of speeches. A minor difference is that the speeches of the peasant are a mixture of poetry and prose. The key point of comparison, however, is that the protagonist in both works challenged the administration of justice at the highest level through a sequence of eloquent speeches: a peasant before a high Egyptian official, and Job before the Israelite God. Interestingly, each plaintiff is cast as a foreigner: an Asiatic peasant in Egypt, and Job, either a Syrian or an Edomite.

In this Egyptian text an Asiatic peasant named Khu-n-Anup was traveling through the delta on his way to Herakleopolis to sell his goods and buy food for his family because hard economic conditions in Canaan threatened their existence. His journey bought him to the property of Nemty-nakht. There the path between the dike and the cultivated fields became very narrow. On seeing the Asiatic approach, Nemty-nakht coveted the goods on his donkeys. To obstruct Khu-n-Anup's travels, he placed a cloth, probably a personal garment, across the path and then ordered Khu-n-Anup not to step on the cloth (the ancients believed that any abuse of one's personal garment shamed its owner and might also cast a spell on the owner). Given that the bank of the dike was steep, Khu-n-Anup decided to pass by carefully stepping through the field. While Nemty-nakht was objecting to this plan, one of Khu-n-Anup's donkeys devoured a clump of barley. Nemty-nakht angrily declared that he would take the donkey and use it to tread out grain in compensation for the offense. Khu-n-Anup replied that the penalty was too high for the small amount of barley consumed. He offered to buy back his donkey for the value of the barley; otherwise he would take his case to the high steward Rensi, an official known for punishing robbers. Outraged, Nemty-nakht severely beat the Asiatic and seized all his donkeys. For ten days the peasant appealed to him for redress, but without success. So he traveled south to Herakleopolis to appeal his case before Rensi. Before taking on this case, Rensi consulted other magistrates. They advised him to have the offender compensate the peasant; by implication they were telling the judge not to disturb the bureaucratic system for a mere peasant. But Rensi decided to hear the case. However, he remained silent throughout the hearings.

In his first petition before Rensi, Khu-n-Anup commended the judge:

If you embark on a lake of justice
May you sail on it with fair breeze. (B1 55-56)
...
You are father to the orphan.

Husband to the widow. (B1 63)

...

Leader free from covetousness,
A great man free from baseness,
Destroyer of falsehood,
Creator of justice. (B1 66-68)

As seen in these words and in the book of Job (e.g., Job 4:3-5; 29:15-17; 31:13-23), caring for the weak and helping the bereaved served as key evidence that a person was just. Khu-n-Anup concluded this speech with a plea for the judge to decide his case rightly and remove his grief.

After hearing this speech, Rensi informed Pharaoh Nebkaure of the peasant's case and of his great eloquence. Pharaoh, relishing the opportunity to hear such powerful rhetoric, instructed Rensi to detain the peasant for several days without rendering judgment, in order to keep him talking. A court recorder was to transcribe his speeches so that Pharaoh would have an opportunity to hear them. Realizing that usually an Asiatic who was traveling in Egypt was facing duress at home, Pharaoh showed compassion by instructing Rensi to send supplies to the peasant's wife without letting the detainee know. Rensi also supplied daily rations to Khu-n-Anup through a friend. Thus, both in this account and in Job's ordeal the highest official, out of confidence in the protagonist, even though it was unknown to that person, took a major step of benevolence on the sufferer's behalf: Pharaoh provided for Khu-n-Anup's family while he was detained, and God prevented Satan from taking Job's life.

According to plan, Khu-n-Anup returned on each of the following eight days and delivered eloquent pleas. Instead of presenting his own case, the peasant centered on the need for justice to be restored throughout the government's bureaucracy by punishing evildoers and protecting the weak.

At first he addressed the steward politely. But as time lapsed, his rhetoric became more inflammatory, though he employed both commendation and accusation to move the steward to uphold justice:

Punish the robber and protect the miserable.
Be not flood against the pleader!
(B1 143-144)

He lauded the eternal value of upholding justice:

When good is good, it is really good.
For justice is for eternity;
It enters the Necropolis with its doer.
(B1 307-309)

On the other hand, he accused the steward of being a hindrance to justice:

Behold, you are an officer who steals,
A mayor who accepts (bribes). (B1 192)

With these words, Khu-n-Anup warned the steward that he would be held accountable in the afterlife for any injustice in regard to this case.

In the fourth petition the peasant sought to win over the magistrate by describing the unsettled nature of society, a society in which a person of low class could not successfully defend one's own right. Such a charge undercut the magistrate's honor as an administrator and judge committed to justice.

Goodness is destroyed, none adhere to it.
Throwing falsehood's back to the ground
(has also perished). (B1 197-198)

...

As a result "gone" is working by night, travel
by day,
and letting a man defend his own right.
(B1 201-202)

Troubled by the steward's persistent silence, Khu-n-Anup pled urgently for him to speak. In the ninth petition he declared that since Rensi had not listened to him, he would appeal to Anibus (the oracle). Job likewise was deeply troubled by God's silence; that silence prodded him to swear a bold oath of innocence (Job 29-31) in an effort to compel God to speak. However, in contrast to a peasant who became increasingly distraught over not winning justice from a high Egyptian official, Job became more confident that in time God would render justice in his case (see Job 23).

After Khu-n-Anup delivered his petition, the high steward had two guards return him to the court. Fearful of punishment, the peasant was surprised to hear his words read from a new papyrus scroll. The scroll was presented to the delighted Pharaoh. Renši then settled the peasant's complaint by awarding him the property of Nemty-nakht.

This story advocates a proactive execution of justice by high officials in place of prescribing small acts of conciliation design to maintain an entrenched, corrupt bureaucracy. As the peasant argued, justice (ma'at) (see Maat) was not always congruent with the established order and thus at times must be aggressively advocated and personally established. Job too went against conventional wisdom by refusing to relinquish confidence in his own innocence as he pursued his complaint against God. Clearly, in both texts high value is placed on eloquent speeches as an avenue for achieving social change and theological insight. In both narratives the plaintiffs persevered until a high official took steps to restore justice on behalf of each of them.

3. Conclusion.

As a result of the comparisons made with these texts from Mesopotamia and Egypt, the uniqueness of the book of Job stands out vividly. It is impossible to determine whether the author of Job was directly influenced by one or more of the texts. Nevertheless, the numerous parallels between these texts and the book of Job attest that the author of Job was the recipient of a long literary tradition that reflected on the inexplicable suffering and disruptions in the social and natural orders. In these texts is found the thinking of sages who sought to provide various paradigms for understanding troubling situations that seemed to refute belief in a moral order of just rewards and punishments. In probing these issues, the Joban poet broke ancient literary boundaries by increasing the dialogue partners of the protagonist to five. Yet he skillfully captured the full pathos of the hero's complaints, such as is found in the Mesopotamian hymns of praise for deliverance from affliction, and set them in the context of an intense debate about traditional teachings of retribution. At the same time, he captured Job's great anxiety about his standing with God with the same emotional force as found in those texts in which the protagonist despairs of life. Uniting all these elements in a single work that also offers new perspective on traditional thinking of retribution was a stroke of brilliance.

The book of Job makes a more incisive criticism of traditional beliefs about rewards and punishments than is found in any of the other texts considered. A major difference in Job's stance from that of the other protagonists is that Job never yielded to the heavy pressure of making a contrived confession of sin in order to escape his suffering. As a result, his story now serves as the model of a human who can bear terrible suffering without compromising convictions or honor. Furthermore, his persevering stance supports God's confidence in humans to worship him free from selfish motivations.

In addition, the monotheistic orientation of the book of Job teaches that the one God, unlike the gods of a polytheistic system, is not subject to a controlling impersonal force—fate (Buccellati). Consequently, it denies a variety of beliefs found in these Middle Eastern texts. It rejects the precept that the gods made humans crooked, and it affirms that humans can retain personal integrity even during unjust circumstances. Furthermore, the book of Job does not attribute illness to demons. Thus diviners and exorcists are not sources for relief. The only resolution for such severe affliction is communication with God.

Above all, Job's story establishes the principle that a person's experience of enigmatic suffering or hardship is not to be automatically interpreted as a reproach on one's character. The devout continue to find this teaching very liberating, for Job's story frees them from an oversensitive conscience and gives them confidence with God amidst trials. No longer do believers have to doubt their character or acceptance by God every time they are beset by a misfortune of great magnitude. Nevertheless, the book of Job is in agreement with the view stated in several of these Middle Eastern texts that the ways of the divine world are often hidden from humans.

See also JOB 1: BOOK OF; WISDOM SOURCES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Albertson, "Job and Ancient Near Eastern Wisdom Literature," in More Essays on the Comparative Method, ed. W. Hallo, J. C. Moyer and L. G. Perdue (ScrCon 2; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1983) 213-30; J. Bottéro, Mesopotamia: Writing, Reasoning, and the Gods (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992); G. Buccellati, "Wisdom and Not: The Case of Mesopotamia," JAOS 101 (1981) 35-47; B. R. Foster, Before the Muses: An Anthology of Akkadian Literature (2 vols.; Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1993); J. Gray, "The Book of Job in the Context of Near Eastern Literature,” ZAW 82 (1970) 251-69; G. E. Kadish, “British Museum Writing Board 5645: The Complaints of Kha-Kheper-R?,” JEA 59 (1973) 77-90; S. N. Kramer, “‘Man and His God: A Sumerian Variation on the ‘Job’ Motif,” SVT 3 (1969) 170-82; W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1975); M. Lichtheim, Ancient Egyptian Literature: A Book of Readings (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1975); G. L. Mattingly, “The Pious Sufferer: Mesopotamia’s Traditional and Job’s Counselors,” in The Bible in the Light of Cuneiform Literature, ed. W. Hallo, B. W. Jones and G. L. Mattingly (ScrCon 3; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1990) 305-48; C. A. Newsom, “Critical Curiosity: Genre and Moral Imagination in the Wisdom Dialogue,” in The Book of Job: A Contest of Moral Imagination (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003) 72-89; B. G. Ockinga, “The Burden of Kha’kheperre’sonbu,” JEA 69 (1983) 88-95; H. Preuss, “Jahwes Antwort an Hiob und die sogenannte Hiobliteratur des alten vorderen Orients,” in Beiträge zur alttestamentlichen Theologie: Festschrift für Walther Zimmerli zum 70. Geburtstag, ed. H. Donner, R. Hanhart and R. Smend (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1977) 323-43; J. J. M. Roberts, “Job and the Israelite Religious Tradition,” ZAW 89 (1977) 107-14; N. Shupak, “A New Source for the Study of the Judiciary and Law of Ancient Egypt: ‘The Tale of the Eloquent Peasant,’” JNES 51 (1992) 1-18; E. A. Speiser, “The Case of the Obliging Servant,” JCS 8 (1954) 98-105; W. von Soden, “Das Fragen nach der Gerechtigkeit Gottes im Alten Orient,” MDOG 96 (1965) 41-59; M. Weinfeld, “Job and Its Mesopotamian Parallels—A Typological Analysis,” in Text and Context: Old Testament and Semitic Studies for F. C. Fensham, ed. W. Claassen (JSOTSup 48; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988) 217-26.

J. E. Hartley

JOB 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

Traditional interpretations of the book of Job center primarily upon this question: What kind of a person was Job? Was Job a righteous Gentile who patiently endured tragedy upon tragedy with unstinting faith? Or was Job a heathen who challenged God’s moral authority and questioned, even blasphemed, divine justice? This wide divergence of opinion stems from tensions within the biblical text itself. The prose framework of the book—prologue (Job 1:1–2:13) and epilogue (Job 42:7-17)—consists of a narrative concerning Job’s undeserved tragedies and final restoration. The poetic body of the work contains dialogues between Job and his friends (Job 3:1–31:40) and between Job and God (Job 38:1–42:6).

In the *frame narrative we encounter an explicitly pious Job. From the opening verse of the book the narrator emphatically insists that Job is above reproach (Job 1:1). Even more, God himself on two occasions affirms the opinion of the narrator concerning Job’s righteousness (Job 1:8; 2:3-4). Yet in the poetic body of the text we encounter a Job who appears to many interpreters, particularly later rabbinic interpreters, to be defiant, self-righteous and blasphemous. Job seeks ways to initiate a trial in which he would be able to vindicate himself before God and perhaps receive from God an acknowledgment of God’s mistreatment (Job 9:2-35; 13:13-28; 16:18-22; 19:23-27; 23:1-7; 31:35-37).

Not only this, but also Job parodies the Scriptures themselves in fairly shocking ways. In Job 7:17-18 he makes sport of the exalted language of Psalm 8:4, “What are human beings that you are mindful of them?” (NRSV). To the psalmist, these words signify the glorious status that humans enjoy before God. For Job, the words imply that God is unduly fixated upon him in order to bring him into anguish. Job pleads for God to look away for a while so that he can experience some solace: “Will you not look away from me for a while, let me alone until I swallow my spittle?” (Job 7:19 NRSV).

The interpreter of the biblical text must decide which Job trumps the other. Either the claims concerning Job’s righteousness found in the narrative structure of the book are emphasized and Job’s apparent blasphemies are explained away or Job’s impious self-defense found in the poetic body of the text bears interpretive weight so that, in spite of what the frame narrative appears to say, Job has been a sinner all along. What one encounters in traditional interpretations of the book flows from the presuppositions and emphases that each interpreter brings to the text. Although the more pious Job ignited the interpretive imagination more often than not, examples abound, especially among those who interpreted the original Hebrew, that portray the darker side of Job. This view of “Job the blasphemer” became especially predominant in later rabbinic and medieval Jewish interpretation partly as a response to the ubiquitous Christian usurpation of Job as the pious and patient Idumean saint who bore witness to the coming Christ.

1. Job in Scripture
2. Job in Pre-Rabbinic Interpretation
3. Job in Rabbinic Literature
4. Job in Patristic Literature
5. Job in Medieval Literature
6. Job and the Reformers

1. Job in Scripture.

Job's name appears in two biblical passages outside the book itself. Thus, interpretation of the book begins within the biblical *canon. In Ezekiel 14:12-14 Job is aligned with those whose righteousness is commendable. However, in accordance with Ezekiel's general theological perspective, their virtue, great as it was, could not be credited to the account of others in their generation. For Ezekiel, the blessedness of righteousness or the curse of sin cannot be passed on from one generation to another: "The person who sins shall die . . . the righteousness of the righteous shall be his own" (Ezek 18:20 NRSV).

In James 5:7-11 Job comes into the Christian tradition as an example of one whose patience and endurance in adversity ought to be emulated. The Greek term translated "patience" (hypomonē) more precisely means "endurance" or "persistence." Job is hardly patient, but he is persistent. Job also learns that the compassionate mercy of God wins out in the end for those who endure (James 5:11). This passage becomes especially important in the Christian tradition, which consistently finds in Job a saintly moral exemplar.

2. Job in Pre-Rabbinic Interpretation.

2.1. Job in the Septuagint. The LXX provides a glimpse into the earliest postbiblical interpretation of Job. Intense academic disagreement concerning the translational methods and agenda of the Job translator complicate our understanding of how the LXX translator of Job interpreted the book. In the opinion of the majority of scholars the Greek translator of Job rendered the text into a Greek version that transforms the Job of the poetic sections from bombastic doubter into pious and persevering sufferer. This is done by toning down the angry questions that Job poses to God into more palatable affirma-tions of faith (see Gerleman; Gard). "The translator had not taken the trouble, or had been unable to grasp the thoughts of the Hebrew poet in their whole depth and many faceted richness. . . . The most violent outbursts on the part of Job, where he sees in God a demonic enemy, and where he denies the whole moral order of the world, have been modified in the LXX in several places" (Gerleman, 53).

This opinion has been vigorously rejected by H. Orlinsky in a series of studies in which he contended that the differences between the Greek Job and its Hebrew parent are not due to a broad theological bias but are simply the result of translation technique and concern for good Greek style. Most divergences are due to a Hebrew text differing from the present one (the Masoretic Text) or to the character of the translator's style. This position is followed by H. Heatter, who calls the translation style of the Greek Job "anaphoric"—that is, an adaptation of the language of a particular passage from some other part of the LXX, typically from the book of Job itself (Heatter, 6).

Orlinsky's work has done much to bring clarity to the subject, but many remain unconvinced and continue to find evidence of a translational bias that seeks to blunt the blasphemies of the Hebrew Job. The process of sanctifying Job is performed not only in the Greek translation but also in the Hebrew textual transmission. The Masoretes, who fixed the standard vocalization of the Hebrew Bible, through a very minor alternation in orthography, transform the written Hebrew text of Job 13:15 from the gloomy and hopeless "He may well slay me; I may have no hope" (NJPS) to a hopeful affirmation to be read in synagogue: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him" (NJPS mg.). The Greek translator garbles the Hebrew completely yet retains Job's piety: "Though the Mighty One lay hand on me, since he has already begun, I will speak and plead before him." Job's counselors are even brought into line by the Greek translator. The Hebrew text has Eliphaz quite certain that Job will discover the justice of God in the end: "And you will know yourself" (Job 5:27). This implies that Job will discover what he has done wrong at some future time. The Greek translation protects Job's honor by adding "if you have done anything." Whereas the Hebrew Job skeptically claims that God wipes out the morally blameless along with the criminals (Job 9:22), the Job of the Greek says, "Anger destroys the great and the powerful."

E. E. Urbach (867) rejects Orlinsky's theory, claiming that Orlinsky either emends the passages that do not fit or explains them away as the result of a Hebrew text differing from the present one. For Urbach, the Greek rendering of Job 14:14 is a key example indicating a translational bias. Whereas the Hebrew Job appears agnostic concerning the corporeal resurrection of the body ("If a man dies, will he live again?"), the LXX Job has no doubt about life in the world to come ("If a man dies, he will live again!"). In an expansion of the Hebrew text of Job 42:17 the Greek version proclaims confidence of Job's participation in the final day of resurrection: "And it has been written concerning [Job] that he will be raised up again with those whom the Lord resurrects." This is in line with the spirit of this Greek translation and is a chief example, for Urbach (867), of the translator's theological bias.

The conclusions of the study by D. Gard continue to have broad approval. First, the LXX translator of Job had a Hebrew parent text not dissimilar to the Masoretic Text of modern printed editions of the Hebrew Bible. Second, many of the deviations of the Greek from the Hebrew are indeed the result of a translation bias. The Greek Job avoids ideas that are theologically offensive, especially passages where humankind is insolent before God. The translator avoids overly anthropomorphic language for God and also tones down passages that describe the destructive forces of God, which may call into question the goodness of God's character (Gard, 92). In these ways the Greek translation of Job downplays the impiety and blasphemies of the Job of the poetic core of the book so that Job is portrayed as more saintly and faithful than the Hebrew Bible strictly allows. Since the LXX was the Bible of the church, Christian exegetes were not, for the most part, exposed to the greater impieties of Job's agnosticism. They interpreted accordingly, as we will see.

2.2. Testament of Job. The sanctification of Job is brought to perfection by the author of Testament of Job. Probably writing during the first century BC or AD, this Egyptian Jew clearly was familiar with the LXX version of Job (Spittler, 831). In addition, Testament of Job continues in the tradition of the addendum to the LXX that identifies Job with Jobab of Genesis 36 (T. Job 2:1). He also parallels the Job of midrash and identifies Job's second wife as Dinah (T. Job 1:6; cf. b. B. Bat. 15b; Gen. Rab. 57:4). He also bears many similarities with the Abraham of Jewish legend who autonomously discovered the true God of monotheism and abandoned idolatry as a youth (T. Job 2—4; cf. Num. Rab. 14:2; see Baskin 1983, 30).

Job's generous liberality as a host is vastly exaggerated (T. Job 9—11); his house is built with doors in every direction so travelers could enter with minimum hindrance (T. Job 9:4). A talmudic legend also bears witness to this tradition: "And why did Job make four doors to his house? So that the poor should not have the trouble of going round the entire house" (Abot R. Nat. 7:1). Job is also an iconoclast like the Abraham of Jewish legend who purges his area of idolatry, throws down idols, and closes idol temples (T. Job 2—5). His struggle is entirely against *Satan and not against God (T. Job 6—8). This Job suffers not because of a pact between God and Satan but because he has destroyed Satan's idol and has thus raised satanic ire. Yet, he had been forewarned that if he destroyed the idol, this action would bring upon him immeasurable *suffering (T. Job 4:5-6). Still, he believed that God would restore him in the end and would raise him up at the day of resurrection (T. Job 4:6-8).

The roles of Job and his interlocutors are completely interchanged; they are troubled by Job's present state and lament it bitterly. Job stands up to the temptation to doubt with the words "Shall I sin with my lips against the Lord? It shall surely not come to pass!" (T. Job 38:2). By the end, Job is thoroughly transformed into the very incarnation of righteousness and piety, as is evident in the eulogy in which he is called "the strength of the helpless, light of the blind, the father of the orphans. . . . Who then will not weep for the man of God?" (T. Job 53:1-4).

The primary message of Testament of Job is that of endurance or patience; Job is the hero of patience and is born to this end (T. Job 5:1). While on a dung heap, he invites his first wife, Sitis, to remain resolute in tragedy with him (T. Job 26:5). Job remained strong in patience no matter how Satan challenged him. Job could not be enticed away from his long-suffering to contempt (T. Job 20:1). Job, like the underdog wrestler, won the match "because he showed endurance and did not grow weary" (T. Job 27:4). Satan, in the end, is thoroughly defeated; he breaks into tears and leaves Job as if yielding to a greater wrestler (T. Job 27:3-9). “No more fitting summary of the hortatory intent of the testament could be quoted than 27:7: ‘Now then, my children, you also must be patient in everything that happens to you. For patience is better than anything’” (Spittler, 836).

3. Job in Rabbinic Literature.

The rabbinic understandings of the book of Job go down very different paths. This is, at least in part, a reflection of the fact that rabbinic interpretation starts with examination of the Hebrew text. The complexities of the Hebrew version of Job have been smoothed out, at least to some degree, by the translator of the LXX. Virtually all Christian interpretation until Jerome’s translation of the Hebrew Bible into Latin depended on the LXX translation. A difference of opinion on Job’s origins and character dates back to the Tannaitic period: some maintain that Job has no place in the world to come and others maintain the opposite (b. B. Bat. 15b). Yet initially, Job’s role in rabbinic interpretation was generally positive; Job was a quintessential example of a righteous Gentile who acknowledged and was accepted by God. We will begin by describing this understanding.

3.1. The Righteous Gentile. Although there are numerous Gentiles who acknowledge Israel’s God, Job dominates the biblical text in this regard because he occupies an entire canonical book. Nowhere does the biblical text claim that Job is an Israelite, and his mysterious origins from the land of Uz imply that he is not. It is a principle of rabbinic thought, based on the common descent of all humanity as described in the opening chapters of Genesis, that all persons have intrinsic worth and potential righteousness. This is particularly evident in the creed of Rabbi Akiba that all humanity, not only the Jews, are beloved of God as creatures made in the divine image (m. ’Abot 3:15). Even Gentiles were not lacking in legal resources to attain righteousness, since basic laws revealed to Adam and Noah—the Noachide covenant—are self-evident by human perception alone (Sipre Acharai Mot 13:10) and are sufficient, for Gentiles, to attain divine favor (b. Sanh. 56a; Gen. Rab. 16:16; 34:19).

The aforementioned disagreement concerning the moral nature of Job can be seen in the two opinions of Johanan ben Zakkai and Joshua ben Hurqanos (m. Soṭah 5:5). Joshua contends (based on Job 13:15 and 27:5) that Job served God out of love and Johanan that Job served God only out of fear (citing Job 1:8). Other rabbis also affirmed Job’s righteous status, claiming that Job’s generosity with the poor was a model for personal largesse. He provides an example of the principle that one should never gain honor at the cost of bringing dishonor to one’s fellows (b. Meg. 28a). Job is one of only seven Gentiles who could be called “prophet” (b. B. Bat. 15b). Job is lauded for his generosity by one tradition that understands Job 1:10 (“You have blessed the work of his hands”) to imply that whoever took the smallest coin from him was blessed (b. Pesah. 112a; b. B. Bat. 16a; and a similar tradition in b. Meg. 28a). Based on Job’s prayer for his unhelpful friends (Job 42:10), Job is exemplary as a person who has the generosity of spirit to pray for friends to receive the very things of which he himself has need. It was this virtue that eventuated in the reversal of Job’s fortunes toward the end of the story (b. B. Qam. 92a).

However, the positive assessment of Job came under increasing scrutiny and criticism as a result of the ubiquitous Christian approbation of Job as a precursor to Christ and a model of pre-Christian piety. This forced rabbinic interpretation to turn toward the darker sides of Job—his defiant self-defense and skepticism of divine beneficence—in order to counter Christian usurpation of their saint. It is to this more negative assessment that we now turn.

3.2. The Not-So-Righteous Gentile. Certain rabbinic texts are ambivalent about Job and portray him as something of an anomaly; he was righteous in one sense but not so righteous in another. In one fascinating interchange Rabbi Meir was asked by his teacher Elisha about Job 42:12, “The Lord blessed the latter days of Job more than his beginning” (NRSV). Rabbi Meir interpreted the passage to mean that the Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before. His teacher chided him for not understanding that the Hebrew could just as easily be translated thus: “The Lord blessed the latter end of Job because of the beginning”—that is, Job is blessed at the end only because of his righteous comportment before his trials began (b. Hag. 15a; y. Hag. 2:1, 77a-b; Eccl. Rab. 7:8, Ruth Rab. 6:4; b. Qidd. 39b). The point here is that God found it in his heart to forgive Job’s blasphemies and reward him at the end of his life only because of his previous righteousness before his trials began.

Rabbi Hanina understood Job to be the only righteous Gentile whom God deemed worthy of great reward. However, his rewards were temporal, not eternal. God rewarded him lavishly in this life, but his rewards were not to be enjoyed in the world to come (Gen. Rab. 57:4). In arguing about the quality of Job's virtue, rabbis disagree on the question of whether or not a Gentile could attain the world to come and its attendant righteousness. In one opinion, Job clearly believed that this present earthly world was all there was, since he cursed God when God brought upon him afflictions. Therefore, the Holy One doubled his wealth in this present world and expelled him from the world to come (b. B. Bat. 15b). Job ends up being something of a "best of a bad lot" whose constant complaining and questioning of God proved his inferiority to the Israelites and whose rich earthly rewards were enjoyed in this world only (Baskin 1983, 21).

Many rabbis claim that although Job provided hospitality toward strangers and the poor, he did so only passively because he only helped those who came to him. Job's passivity in this regard explains the tragedies that he undergoes and undercuts Job's case concerning his own righteousness ('Abot R. Nat. 7). Many midrashic exegetes could accept that Job was a righteous Gentile, but few could accept that he was more righteous than a father of Israel (Baskin 1983, 18). Rabbis often compared the motives of fear and love for divine service, using Abraham and Job as exemplars for each. The merit of serving God out of fear remains in effect for a thousand generations, but serving God out of love has merit for two thousand generations (b. Soṭah 31a). The comment in Job 1:1 that Job "feared God" was proof enough for many that Job served God out of fear alone. Once the rabbis establish that Job served God only out of fear, he loses much of his praise and honor. The problem with serving God out of fear is that it cannot stand the test of adversity (Baskin 1983, 19). The fact that Job contended with God when he was punished (Job 10:2 is cited) is proof that Job served God out of fear, not love (Midr. Ps. 26:2). Job is here recognized as a righteous Gentile, one who even is related by marriage to Israel, but he is inferior to descendants of Abraham and to proselytes (Baskin 1983, 18).

3.3. The Unrighteous Gentile. Many different opinions existed among the rabbis as to the date and location of Job's life. These differing opinions were brought about by the lack of specificity in the canonical book itself. Job was believed by some to have lived in Egypt during the period of Moses and, in fact, to have been (along with Jethro and Balaam) one of Pharaoh's advisors. The biblical text describes one of Pharaoh's advisors as "fearing the Lord" (Ex 9:20), which was understood as a subtle reference to Job, who is the only Gentile of whom the Scriptures say that he was a God-fearing man (Job 1:1) (y. Soṭah 20c). Although Job was a man who feared God among Pharaoh's counselors, his failure to voice his disapproval over Pharaoh's plan to drown the Israelite children explains Job's legendary sufferings (b. Soṭah 11a; b. Sanh. 106a; Exod. Rab. 27:3). In one tradition, Job is tossed by God to Satan in order to distract Satan long enough for Israel to pass through the Red Sea. Job 2:6 ("Behold he is now in your hands") is intended, according to this interpretation, to distract Satan long enough to provide escape for Israel from Egypt (Exod. Rab. 21:7; Gen. Rab. 57:4; y. Soṭah 20d). This is Job's punishment for his failure to advise Pharaoh against the genocide of Israelite children. Job has been transformed from a righteous Gentile into a despicable criminal.

3.4. The Righteous Israelite. This rabbinic opinion also contradicts the Christian understanding of Job as a Gentile precursor of Jesus without turning to Job's darker aspects: Job was not a Gentile at all, but rather was a righteous Israelite. Job is even believed by some to have been born circumcised. He is described as having been both "blameless and upright" (Job 1:1), and rabbis believed that the use of two adjectives together such as this was no redundancy but had special significance (Baskin 1983, 14). What could be more perfect than to be born circumcised ('Abot R. Nat. 2)? Being born circumcised has implications for the continuing Christian and Jewish polemics. Christians claimed that before Moses, just persons lived who did not observe the *law of Moses and who were uncircumcised. Rabbis countered that many righteous persons before Moses had been born circumcised and observed the law in all its details (Pesiq. Rab. 28:1, 5; Gen. Rab. 11:46; Num. Rab. 14:9). The claim that Job was born circumcised, and thus Israelite, makes him off-limits as a Gentile precursor to Jesus (Baskin 1983, 133). Rabbi Jochanan, the head of a bet midrash

(house of study) in Tiberias of the third century, who is generally believed to have had fairly substantive intellectual interaction with Origen, insisted on Job's Jewishness. Not only did Jochanan insist that Job was a Jew, but also he insisted that Job lived at the time of the return from Babylon (y. Sotah 20c). Here he may well be challenging Origen, who extols Job as a Gentile model of Christian patience and piety from the period between Jacob and Moses (Or. 30; Hom. Ezech. 4).

Not only did the rabbinic transformation of Job from Gentile into Jew play a role in their anti-Christian polemic, but also it allowed these interpreters to understand Job as a symbol of the sufferings of Israel (Baskin 1983, 25). Job's and Israel's sufferings underwent detailed comparison: both lost sons and daughters, both were robbed of silver and gold, both were cast upon a dung heap (Pesiq. Rab. 26:7). The intention of this comparison is clear: just as Job was comforted in his sufferings in the end, so also will be the case for suffering Israel. Israel's destiny is foreseen by the suffering and redemption of Job (Pesiq. Rab. 29-30).

It is clear from the foregoing survey that there is no rabbinic consensus on Job. However, the discussion becomes increasingly polemical in that it seeks to counter the Christian appropriation of Job. Yet Job remains an interpretive problem for the rabbis, due in part to their respect for the ambiguities latent in the Hebrew text itself on which they based their interpretations.

4. Job in Patristic Literature.

For numerous reasons that will become clear below, Job occupies an important place in the biblical interpretation of the church fathers. Job takes on several different interpretive roles. In comparison to rabbinic literature, the church fathers are of unified agreement: Job was an Idumean saint. Their opinion is shaped largely by the fact that their sacred texts had already been somewhat sanitized by the translator of the Old Greek translation and by the fact that the NT itself (James 5:11) has already understood Job this way. However, there are still many differing ways in which this Idumean saint can be understood, and many exegetical loads that the biblical text can bear. Several of these will be outlined here.

4.1. Exemplar of Patience and Hospitality. Following the lead of James 5, many Christian exegetes see Job as a quintessential model of patience in the midst of earthly trials. Thus, the Apostolic Constitutions demand that the believer accept without complaint any misfortunes, "knowing that reward will be given you by God, as it was given to Job and Lazarus" (Apos. Con. 8.8.7). In 1 Clement (c. 100) Job's humility and piety should be imitated by all the faithful (1 Clem. 17). He is placed in the company of Abraham and Moses and other prophets who herald the coming of Christ. Similarly, we are told by Tertullian that Job met every variety of violence of the devil yet was not drawn away from his reverence for God. Because of this, his thorough patience in spirit and flesh is an example and testimony given to us that we might not succumb either to damages of our worldly goods or to losses of those who are dearest, or even to bodily afflictions (Pat. 14).

Jerome is unique among the church fathers in that he was fully aware of the difficulties posed by the book of Job in Hebrew and of the differences between the narrative and poetic sections. Because many of these difficulties had been covered up by the LXX (and the Old Latin, which followed it), very few Christians understood the interpretive challenges that the Hebrew text presented. Jerome compares the Hebrew meaning of the biblical poetry to an eel: the more you squeeze it, the sooner it escapes (Preface to Job). Although Jerome does challenge many putative Christian beliefs about Job (his equivalence to Jobab, for instance), he admires Job's steadfastness in trial. He recognizes Job as not only a model of patience and hope in adversity (Comm. Eph. 3.5) but also as a prophet who foresaw the coming Christ and who comforted himself in his miseries with the hope of resurrection: "The Lord had not yet died, and the athlete of the Church saw his redeemer rising from the grave" (Jo. Hier. 30).

4.2. Precursor of Christ. Not only is Job a model of patience in the hope of eternal life, but also his strength in the face of overwhelming tragedy and humiliation and his final vindication prefigure, for many early Christian exegetes, the sufferings and glorification of the Christ. Zeno, the fourth-century bishop of Verona, established a lengthy list of parallels between the sufferings of Job and those of Jesus in his incarnation and passion (Tract. 11.15). Since Christianity sought to be a universal religion, the portrayal of saintly pagans became important Gentile witnesses to the incarnation of God in Christ. Just as the Jews had received their revelation of God in Moses and the prophets, so also the Gentiles were seen to have had prophets whose lives and message pointed the way to Jesus Christ. These Gentile prophets opened doors for all peoples to come to their true spiritual home in the church. The coming of God in Christ was not a revelation that discounted all previous divine revelations but rather was one that fulfilled them while it also superseded them. Job's role as an ancient Idumean saint of the pagan world is the ideal expression of righteousness in the sphere of "cosmic religion" (Daniélou, 87).

It was through this theological lens of prevenient grace that Job was interpreted; he provided proof that Christ had come to redeem not just the Jews but all humankind. Augustine approached Job, as was his wont, as an exegete who seeks to motivate piety and devotion to the church. Like many of his predecessors, he understood Job to be a model of both pious living and patience in suffering (Enarrat. Ps. 56:18; Symb. 10; Pat. 9; Tract. Ev. Jo. 41.9). Yet, Augustine's interest in Job as a Gentile and as a precursor to Christ stands out. In City of God he asks whether there were any outside the race of Israel who belonged to the heavenly city. Anyone who denies that this is possible can be refuted easily by the case of Job, who was neither a native to Israel nor a proselyte but rather an Idumean (clearly following the LXX in its Old Latin translation). Of Job, he says, "He was praised by divine oracle," and "no man of his time is put on a level with him as regards to justice and piety. . . . From this one case we might know that among other nations also there might be men pertaining to the spiritual Jerusalem who lived according to God and have pleased Him" (Civ. 18.47). From this, Augustine goes on to affirm that Job must have had some divine prescience of Christ's coming incarnation. Later he claimed that although Job lived before the law of Moses had been given, Job proves that in the hearts of the godly the eternal law had already been inscribed from which the written laws came to be copied (Serm. 31.2). Job did not need the written law, for he had personal access to God's law, which preexisted the Levitical priesthood.

4.3. Holy Ascetic. For Ambrose, Job bears a very different interpretive load than for any other patristic writer. Although Ambrose wrote no extended commentary on Job, his scattered comments on Job paint an image peculiar to Ambrose's theological agenda. Ambrose was a student of the Greek fathers and of Philo, yet he proceeded into new territory. His teachers had gone down hermeneutical paths that he had no desire to follow. He has no interest in Job as a righteous Gentile or a prophet to the nations, and he explicitly denies that Job is a type of Christ. The message of Job, to Ambrose, was one of the "insurmountable impediment of wealth to salvation, and the glorious spiritual treasure awaiting the steadfast sufferer" (Baskin 1981, 223). Job exemplifies the blessedness that comes through the endurance of earthly agonies with head unbowed: "What can we think of as more wretched than holy Job, either in the burning of his house, or the instantaneous death of his ten sons, or his bodily pains? Was he less blessed than if he had not endured these things whereby he really showed himself approved?" (Off. 2.5.20).

Ambrose links this biblical figure to the pagan virtue of fortitude, so that the pagan virtues exemplified by Pyrrus or Socrates assume a new Christian flavoring. Job exemplifies the spiritual reality of the fact that human beings may attain a life of blessedness only by overcoming bodily agony and by enduring corporeal tribulations with dignity. In the otherworldly philosophical perspective of Ambrose, where riches and bodily comforts impede salvation, the Job of Job 1 had been corrupted by wealth and was purged only by these trials of the soul. Through this interpretive lens, Ambrose justifies Job's denunciation of the day of his birth (Job 3:3)—a feature that strikes many interpreters as blasphemous—as a rejection of life in the flesh that emerges from his desire for eternal life with God (Baskin 1981, 228).

4.4. Model of Human Potentiality. Interpretation of the book of Job significantly shaped the debate that Augustine had with Pelagius and Julian of Ecclanum. Job was of particular theological interest to Pelagian exegetes as an example of a person who was righteous without divine grace. Pelagius laid the groundwork here, arguing in his Epistula ad Demetriadem that human nature is basically good because it was created by a good God: "What shall I say of the blessed Job, that most renowned athlete of God, whose wealth was snatched from him, whose estate utterly destroyed, whose sons and daughters died all together, and who, after all this, yet fought against the devil to the very end with his body? . . . What a man Job was! A man of the gospel before the gospel was known, a man of the apostles before their commands were uttered!" (PL 30.21-22 [Steinhauser, 303]).

Pelagius extends the notion of divine beneficence to include all creation—a good God can only create good things—such that all humanity can, apart from divine assistance, achieve perfection. Failure to do so is a choice not to manifest what is uniquely one's own nature. All humans are free to choose to do rightly. Job exemplifies a natural capacity that enables all humans to reform themselves even apart from divine succor.

Augustine responds simply by pointing out that Job calls himself a sinner and is clearly aware of his sin, which he humbly confesses (Steinhauser, 304-5). Augustine quotes Job (Job 14:17) as saying, "My misdeeds would be sealed up in a pouch, and you would cover over my guilt" (C. Jul. op. imp. 1.105). Even so, Augustine's comment on Job is spotty at best, for Job only served to weaken his general argument.

While Pelagius wrote commentary on Paul in response to Augustine, Julian realized that Romans was not as good a starting point as Job. Julian focused his biblical comment on Job, writing a full-fledged commentary, Expositio libri Iob. For Julian, Job is the quintessential holy human who, apart from heavenly assistance, successfully chose to avoid evil by the force of the human will alone (Steinhauser, 300). For this reason, Julian found in Job a showpiece for human perfectibility that disproves Augustine's notion of inherited sin. Julian extols Job and sees in him the goodness of all human nature: "The life of blessed Job is praised because in him the good of human nature may be known. As established by God even without the teaching of the written law, human nature shows that it can be sufficient in itself for repelling sins and pursuing all virtues" (Expositio libri Iob [Steinhauser, 307]). In Job we have a concrete example of a saint who was holy before the birth of Jesus or the giving of the law. "Perhaps Julian's approach may be summarized by his comment on Job 5:9, referring to God who does great and inscrutable things: 'Job recounts the riches of divine providence, which God lavishes upon all generations generally and properly to each and every generation'" (Steinhauser, 307).

The primary bone of contention between Augustine and the Pelagians ends up being this: Did Job sin? If he did not, then he exercised free will and manifests the fundamental goodness of human nature. As Julian argues, Job exemplifies the innate reason that empowers all human beings to determine and perform that which is good. If Job did indeed sin, as Augustine claims, then he does so only because his sinful humanity compares to that of all other humans (Steinhauser, 308).

5. Job in Medieval Literature.

5.1. Gregory the Great. Gregory the Great (d. 604) wrote an extended commentary on the book of Job called Moralia in Iob, which intended to explicate the book verse by verse on literal, spiritual and moral levels. However, he wrote not so much a detailed analysis of the text as a doctrinal exposition and exhortation to moral living. Gregory believes, like most other Christian exegetes, that Job was a Gentile who was intended by God to be an example for those who do not know God's laws and to confound the iniquity of those who are under the law (Moral. Preface 4). Gregory proclaims the sanctity of the pagan Job and offers him as a model not only of right living but also as one who commands the respect of people (Moral. Preface 5). For Gregory, three pagan saints are worthy of mention, each with a particular quality or characteristic unique to them: Abel for his innocence, Enoch for his integrity of morals, Job for his patience in the midst of life's trials (Moral. Preface 13). Job was stricken so that his great patience and fortitude might be made known to all, and the excellence of his merit might elevate the patience of others (Moral. Preface 12).

Gregory the Great follows Augustine in proclaiming that Job is not only a model of righteousness among the Gentiles but also one who prophesies to the coming Christ (Moral. Preface 5). Gregory interprets the Gentile origin of Job as follows: "It is not without cause that the life of a just pagan is set before us as a model side by side with the life of the Israelites. Our Savior, coming for the redemption of Jews and gentiles, willed also to be foretold by the voices of the Jews and gentiles" (Moral. Preface, 5). Job's patience in his time of trial made him not only an exemplar of virtue but also a prophet of the coming Christ, whose suffering and vindication he prefigured and foretold. "Christ in this comparison is mankind itself reduced to the nakedness of its tragic condition, of which Job was its most perfect prefiguration" (Daniélou, 99).

5.2. Moses Maimonides. Both Moses Maimonides and Thomas Aquinas, the two greatest medieval Aristotelians, found Job to be of great value in the explication of their philosophical theology. Maimonides devoted two chapters to Job in his famous Guide of the Perplexed. He uses his exegesis of Job not only as a platform to expound his philosophical views but also to bring coherence to the book itself. For his solution to the problems that other interpreters found in Job, Maimonides offers his opinion that Job is praised as a righteous individual in the initial chapters but is actually deeply flawed. Job 1:1 praises his moral virtue, but this is a cue to the thoughtful reader that this is the only form of virtue that Job has attained. Job, at the start, has yet to perfect in himself the higher virtues of intellectual perception (Eisen, 72).

Maimonides then is free to interpret the variances in the rest of the book as phases in Job's intellectual ascent and his final attainment of theoretical perfection. Job's angry outbursts at God prove that he lacks a complete understanding of God's ways. The fact that he mourns the loss of his health, wealth and children illustrates that Job, in his inchoate moral state, mistakenly believes that the possession of earthly benefits displays the smile of divine providence (a view that both he and Aristotle reject). Out of his disillusionment, and with divine aid, Job comes to understand (the Aristotelian conception) that divine providence determines not the course of individual lives but only the broader structures of natural law in created order.

This understanding, for Job, leads him to achieve intellectual perfection; physical and material goods bear no significance in comparison to the rewards that come in the contemplation of God. With this general understanding, Maimonides brings coherence to the book by harmonizing the prologue and the final chapters of the book. Job's angry questioning of God proves for Maimonides that Job himself, though perfectly just, remains unwise and in need of intellectual refinement, which his sufferings provide. Maimonides' curious goal here is to critique the shortcomings of his fellow Jews: they, like Job, though just, are in need of philosophical refinement that Aristotle, as mediated by Maimonides, can provide (Yaffee, 112).

5.3. Thomas Aquinas. Thomas Aquinas, Maimonides' Christian counterpart, composed a line-by-line commentary on Job that argues differently from his Jewish contemporary. First, for Aquinas, the story is literally true, while for Maimonides, appealing to some rabbinic authorities, the book is primarily parabolic. Second, for Aquinas, Job is perfectly wise from beginning to end, yet nevertheless he was blameworthy on different grounds (Yaffee, 112).

Aquinas's Job is the ideal student: perfectly wise yet somewhat unformed in practical matters. Although he can refute his antagonists intellectually, he reveals his own faults by the imprudent and misleading manner in which he communicates his wisdom. He even gives his friends the impression that he is blaspheming (Expositio 38.1.10-13). In speaking so impulsively, Job gives the false impression that he is prideful and that he actually doubts divine providence and justice (Expositio 42.1.1-5). Job's cursing the day of his birth reflects the human sadness that comes from the lower parts of the soul; the upper realms of Job's soul remained rationally convinced that "good must rightly be expected from his misfortunes" (Expositio 3.4.98-99 [Clines, 56]). While Job faces external challenges, and even intellectual challenges, internally he remained sure of God's just ways to the end. He thus is an exemplar of a pious soul remaining internally secure while outwardly shaken by personal and intellectual tragedy.

Job has been well instructed in the teachings of the church, but his imprudence has made him insensitive to the negative effects of the manner in which he communicates his teaching. Aquinas's interpretation challenges his readers to, like Job, consider the need for a reduction in the rancor and acerbity ubiquitous in doctrinal disputations. This moderation applies even to those who believe that their opinions reflect the religiously authorized view. In this way, "Aquinas's Job induces the student or professor of Christian wisdom, who is seen to be perfectly wise, to re-examine the practical limitations of the wisdom he professes—and so to communicate that wisdom in a more moderate or considerate way than his training may have suggested to him hitherto" (Yaffee, 118).

For Aquinas, the heart of the controversy between Job and his friends lies in the nature of human perception of cosmic order. Both Job and his interlocutors believed in divine providence and order, but Aquinas's Job, following Aristotle, has doubts about whether providence can be perceived in human events. There is no question that divine order and intentionality shine clearly for all who consider the natural world, but human affairs have no certain perceptible order. In Aquinas, Job's dialogue partners doubt the immortality of the soul, a doctrine that the Thomistic Job heartily affirms. Therefore, his comforters find themselves constrained to perceive the providential plan and purpose in all human affairs because there is no afterlife to right the wrongs of this life. Human history, for the comforters, must be justly ordered because it does not include the final judgment of immortal souls. Because Job believes in the immortality of all souls, he is not constrained to perceive order in all human affairs; the eternal future world will sort out all historical injustices (Schreiner, 133-34).

6. Job and the Reformers.

6.1. Martin Luther. Martin Luther, who never wrote a complete commentary on Job, everywhere reflects his understanding of Job as a paradigm for spiritual and psychic tension. Job is a pious saint, but at the same time he is a sinner and a doubter. Job plays an important role for Luther as a perfect representative of the paradox that exists between piety and guilt. Luther seeks to bring resolution to the paradox by asking, "How does Job handle this situation?" Importantly, Job does not deny knowledge of the conflict within but admits it openly. It is this open confession of one's sinfulness and lack of self-worth that underlies his very saintliness and piety (Clines, 60). Job has no confidence in his own merit. Luther's understanding of Job 9:28 plays a critical role here. The Vulgate (differently from the Hebrew) reads, "I fear all my works." This, for Luther, is an interpretive key to the book and an expression of Luther's anxiety concerning the dangers of self-justification. He quotes it over and over again.

"For Luther, Job is not someone who is almost perfect, or one who to some degree falls short of true piety; he is, through and through, a saint—who is at the same time also a sinner" (Clines, 61). Job, as a representative believer, even in his bitterness and despair, becomes a model for others to follow. Job's complaints against God are appropriate even for the just. Even his yearning to be dead is, figuratively, only a yearning to be free of human constraints of this world. Luther's Job, while a representative believer, illustrates the paradox that the saints are particularly conscious of their intractable wickedness and are ever liable to experience the wiles of Satan himself. Yet, in God's mysterious ways, even these temptations serve to prove God's broader purposes.

6.2. John Calvin. Calvin follows Thomas Aquinas in seeing in Job the story of the difficulty of perceiving providence in human affairs. Calvin's Job also insists on the doctrine of the resurrection and of the extension of certainty of divine justice to the last day. As with Aquinas, Job's comforters spoke many true things but were ultimately upbraided for restricting divine justice to human history; they misunderstood earthly events as divine retribution. Calvin, differently from Aquinas, explores more fully the issue of the incomprehensibility of providence and the nature of the hiddenness of God. For Calvin, tension has to be constantly maintained between God's visibility and invisibility; while the God of history must never recede into complete inscrutability, one must never fail to recognize the infinity of God in comparison to human finitude (Schreiner, 134-35).

Calvin's Job does, in the end, find grounds to trust in divine providence in spite of the disorderliness of human affairs. But the affirmation of the unity of God's essential nature binds together Calvin's broader exegesis of Job. One knows that God does not rule arbitrarily or capriciously because God's will remains morally unified and rationally consistent. Natural revelation demonstrates the power of God and his wise control over the cosmos. This contrasts to the mystifying nature of human affairs where the righteous do indeed suffer and the evil often appear blessed. In Calvin's exegesis, Job—as a result of the final whirlwind speeches—came to rightly perceive the difference between God's revelation in nature and in history as the juxtaposition of the comprehensibility and hiddenness of God (Schreiner, 140). "On the basis of the revelation present in nature, Job is to trust that despite appearances, God is still ordering human events with justice and wisdom" (Schreiner, 141). Job's challenge is that which faces all humanity: to lay hold to the promise made clear in creation (the “outskirts of God’s ways”) with the holy hope that no matter how chaotic human affairs may appear at present, created order points faithfully to the providential goodness of a God who will execute perfect justice on the last day.

See also FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; HERMENEUTICS; JOB 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. R. Baskin, “Job as Moral Exemplar in Ambrose,” VC 35.3 (1981) 222-31; idem, Pharaoh’s Counsellors: Job, Jethro, and Balaam in Rabbinic and Patristic Tradition (BJS 47; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1983); D. J. A. Clines, “Job and the Spirituality of the Reformation,” in The Bible, the Reformation and the Church: Essays in Honour of James Atkinson, ed. W. P. Stephens (JSNTSup 105; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 49-72; J. Daniélou, Holy Pagans of the Old Testament (Baltimore: Helicon Press, 1957); R. Eisen, The Book of Job in Medieval Jewish Philosophy (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004); J. A. Emerton, “Song of Songs as an ‘Answer’ to Cline’s Book of Job,” in Reading from Right to Left: Essays on the Hebrew Bible in Honour of David J. A. Clines, ed. J. C. Exum and H. G. M. Williamson (JSOTSup 373; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2003); D. Gard, The Exegetical Method of the Greek Translator of the Book of Job (JBLMS 8; Philadelphia: Society of Biblical Literature, 1952); G. Gerleman, Studies in the Septuagint, 1: Book of Job (LUÅ 43/2; Lund: Gleerup, 1946); H. Heater Jr., A Septuagint Translation Technique in the Book of Job (Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association, 1982); W. J. Houston, “Insights on Job 3, from a Medieval Commentary: Rabbi Samuel Ben Meir (Rashbam) on the Book of Job,” in Reading from Right to Left: Essays on the Hebrew Bible in Honour of David J. A. Clines, ed. J. C. Exum and H. G. M. Williamson (JSOTSup 373; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2003); J. C. de Moor, “‘Consolations of God’: Assessing Job’s Friends across a Cultural Abyss,” in Reading from Right to Left: Essays on the Hebrew Bible in Honour of David J. A. Clines, ed. J. C. Exum and H. G. M. Williamson (JSOTSup 373; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2003); H. Orlinsky, “Studies in the Septuagint of Job,” HUCA 28 (1957) 53-57; HUCA 29 (1958) 229-71; HUCA 30 (1959) 153-67; HUCA 32 (1961) 239-68; HUCA 33 (1962) 119-51; HUCA 35 (1964) 57-78; HUCA 36 (1965) 37-47; J. I. Pfeffer, Providence in the Book of Job: The Search for God’s Mind (Brighton: Sussex Academic Press, 2005);

M. H. Pope, Job (AB 15; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965); S. E. Schreiner, “‘Why Do the Wicked Live?’ Job and David in Calvin’s Sermons on Job,” in The Voice from the Whirlwind: Interpreting the Book of Job, ed. L. G. Perdue and W. C. Gilpin (Nashville: Abingdon, 1992) 129-43; R. P. Spittler, “Testament of Job,” OTP 1.829-68; K. Steinhauser, “Job Exegesis: The Pelagian Controversy,” in Augustine: Biblical Exegete, ed. F. Van Fletern and J. C. Schnaubelt (New York: Lang, 2001) 299-311; E. E. Urbach, The Sages: Their Concepts and Beliefs (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1987); N. Whybray, Job (Readings; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); M. D. Yaffee, “Providence in Medieval Aristotelianism,” in The Voice from the Whirlwind: Interpreting the Book of Job, ed. L. G. Perdue and W. C. Gilpin (Nashville: Abingdon, 1992) 111-28.

J. Allen

JOB 4: PERSON

The book of Job is named for its central character. Job is introduced in the first verse of the book (Job 1:1), and the last verse reports his death (Job 42:17). Outside of the book that bears his name, Job is named in only two other contexts in the Bible. In Ezekiel he is cited twice (Ezek 14:14, 20) as a paragon of righteousness, and in the NT James highlights his patience (Jas 5:11). Thus, most of what we know about Job the person comes from Job the book. There are no ancient extrabiblical references to him, and later descriptions of Job (including the references in Ezekiel and James) are more properly the subject of the history of interpretation (see Job 3: History of Interpretation).

1. Job’s Background
2. Job’s Character
3. Job’s Story
4. Was Job a Real Person?

1. Job’s Background.

Job is from Uz, almost certainly to be associated with the city of that name known to be outside of Israel in an area later known Edom. Although there is a slim possibility that this Uz is to be identified with the Uz in Genesis 10:23 and 1 Chronicles 1:17 associated with Aram, it is much more likely that this Uz is the one in Edom to the east of Israel (Gen 36:28; 1 Chron 1:42; Lam 4:21). After all, some of Job’s friends have names associated with an Edomite genealogy (see Eliphaz in Gen 36:10-11) and Edomite locations (Eliphaz the Temanite—Teman is a major Edomite center [Amos 1:12; Obad 9; Jer 49:7, 20; Ezek 25:13]). Furthermore, Edom is renowned for its wisdom (Jer 49:7).

Accordingly, Job is a Gentile, though he worships the true God, much as Melchizedek (Gen 14) and Jethro do. And as with these two other non-Hebrew worshipers of the true God, we do not know how Job came to know and worship him. Although Jethro is an exception, it may be easier to understand Job in the context of a pre-Abrahamic period before the narrowing of the covenant. Certainly the measurement of Job's wealth in terms of numbers of animals (Job 1:2-3) fits better with the (pre)patriarchal period as well. The setting of the story is thus early, although this conclusion says nothing about when the book was written (see Job 1: Book of).

Though Edomite, Job's name is understandable as Hebrew. We do not know much about ancient Edomite language, but what we do know demonstrates its linguistic similarity to *Hebrew. In any case, the names may be given in Hebrew for familiarity's sake. Though understandable as Hebrew or Edomite, the name Job (ʿiyyōb) is of uncertain meaning. It can be translated as an interrogative sentence, "Where is my father?" with "father" being a reference to God. On the other hand, the name has also been connected to a Hebrew verb that means "hate" or "be an enemy" (see Williams). The verb provides the base for the noun "enemy" (ʿōyēb), and if the association is correct, this may be explained by the fact that for a period Job becomes an enemy of God (see Job 13:24 where the verbal form yib is used in this way [so Weiss, 20]).

2. Job's Character.

Job's character is of the utmost importance to his story, and the book wastes no time in describing it. After learning that Job is from Uz, we are told that he is "innocent [tām] and virtuous [yāśār], fearing God and turning away from evil." This language is reminiscent of the description of the "wise" in the book of *Proverbs. The wise are innocent (Prov 2:7, 21; 11:3, 20; 13:6; 19:1; 20:7; 28:6, 10, 18; 29:10) and virtuous (Prov 1:3; 2:7, 21; 8:6, 9; 11:3, 6; 12:6; 14:11; 15:8; 16:13; 20:11; 21:2, 8; 23:16; 29:10). The sage also fears God (Prov 1:7; 9:10; but see also Prov 1:29; 2:5; 3:7; 8:13; 9:10; 10:27; 14:2, 26, 27; 15:16, 33; 16:6; 19:23; 22:4; 23:7; 24:21; 28:14; 29:25; 31:30). In Proverbs 1:7, and elsewhere, the fear of God (see Fear of the Lord) is coupled with turning from evil (most pointedly, Prov 3:7). In the prologue of the book of Job, Job's character not only is described by the narrator but also is affirmed by God himself (Job 1:8) and is never questioned, even by the Accuser. Thus, in the following sections, when the three friends and Elihu argue that Job's suffering is the result of his sin, we, the readers who have been privy to the dialogue between God and the Accuser, know they are wrong.

Furthermore, Job's piety is exemplary. He even offers sacrifices on behalf of his children just in case they "have sinned and cursed God in their hearts" (Job 1:5). He is careful in his relationship with God, which the narrator of Job finds admirable.

According to the book of Proverbs, such wisdom and godliness should be followed by material blessings, and the reader is not disappointed. The prologue describes Job's enormous wealth (Job 1:3) as well as his large family (Job 1:2). Thus, through a description of his character as well as his blessed life, the reader learns that Job is truly one of the godly wise.

3. Job's Story.

3.1. The Two Tests. Our description of Job thus far applies to him at the beginning of the book. He is godly, wise, pious and rich. He is the epitome of the *sage in Proverbs.

The plot complication begins with an accusation on the part of a figure known in Hebrew as haśśāṭān (Job 1:9-11). The exact identity of haśśāṭān is debated. Christian readers detect the proper name *"Satan" perhaps a bit too quickly here. If it is a proper name, why is the definite article (ha-) prefixed to it? Furthermore, what is the devil doing in heaven convincing God to meddle in the life of his faithful servant Job? The Hebrew root śāṭān means "accuse," thus haśśāṭān means "the Accuser." It appears that this figure is not the devil but rather is one of God's angels. Many questions remain as to why the Accuser takes the role of a prosecuting attorney against Job, but it does resolve the issue of Satan in heaven.

The Accuser in essence accuses Job of self-interested piety. In other words, Job is godly not because he loves God but rather because he loves the gifts of God, the large family, the wealth and his health. Take that away, and Job will turn against God.

At first, God grants the Accuser the right to afflict Job's environment, but not him personally. The consequences are horrible and come in four waves (Job 1:13-19). First, the Sabeans take his oxen and kill his servants. Second, fire comes from the sky (lightning?) and burns up the sheep and the servants watching them. Third, the Chaldeans come and take his camels and kill the servants. Finally, and most horribly, a strong wind blows down the house in which his children are feasting, and all of them are killed. In spite of this, Job demonstrates his disinterested piety by affirming his continued faith in God.

The Accuser, however, is not satisfied and responds to God's satisfaction at Job's behavior with "Skin for skin!" (Job 2:4), a proverb signifying that Job would not really be afflicted until his own health was compromised. God relented again, allowing the Accuser to cause Job physical suffering short of death. Job's affliction is legendary. Covered with painful boils and sitting on a dung heap, Job nonetheless maintained his integrity before God. "Job did not sin in what he said" (Job 2:10).

One might think that this would end the book of Job, but the final paragraph of the prose introduction suggests otherwise as three friends come to console him (Job 2:11-13). Their presence will introduce a second plot complication that will further the story in the chapters to come.

3.2. The Disputation. Job survives two excruciating tests of his piety. He sits in silence for seven days with his equally silent friends, Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar. Then he snaps. Job 3 records his anguished complaint about God. In many ways, his complaint is formally similar to the type of laments one finds in *Psalms (see Lament, Psalms of), but there are two crucial exceptions. First, the laments complain to God, whereas Job complains about God. Second, virtually every lament (Ps 88 is the exception) turns to God with prayer or confidence at the end, but Job does not express even a glimmer of hope.

In the final analysis, Job's complaint is closer to the grumbling tradition of the book of Numbers than to the laments of Psalms. The three friends cannot remain silent. Job's complaint energizes them to engage him in a debate.

Job blames God; the three friends blame Job. Both Job and his friends are united, though, in their affirmation of the principle of *retribution: "If people sin, they suffer. Therefore, if people suffer, they are sinners." Such reasoning leads the three friends to diagnose Job as a sinner who needs to repent to restore his relationship with God and regain his blessed life (Job 4:7-11; 11:13-20). Job, on the other hand, denies that he is a sinner, but since only sinners suffer, then God must be unjust (Job 9:21-24). Job wants an audience with God to set him straight (most dramatically, Job 31:35-40).

The debate on one level is about the nature and cure for Job's *suffering. The deeper issue, however, has to do with wisdom (Zerafa). Wisdom is the ability to navigate life. Wisdom helps a person avoid problems or at least get out of problems if they arise. Accordingly, it is not surprising that all four characters assert their own wisdom and denigrate the wisdom of their opponent (see Job 11:12; 12:1-3, 12; 13:12; 15:1-13).

The *disputation achieves no resolution. The three friends run out of arguments and energy and once again become silent. Job, in what appears to be a moment of clarity, powerfully affirms God's superior wisdom (Job 28 [see Lo]) before descending again to complaint, protestation of innocence, and a demand for an audience with God (Job 29-31).

3.3. God Disputes Job. Job will soon get his wish, but with different consequences than he anticipated. Before Yahweh speaks, though, the figure of Elihu asserts himself (Job 32-37). A full accounting of the book of Job would need to analyze this section of the book at some length. However, this article concerns the person of Job, and Elihu in fact has no substantial interaction with Job. Elihu is yet another claimant to wisdom. He represents those who believe that wisdom is connected not necessarily with age but rather with "the spirit in a man" (Job 32:8). Nevertheless, when he makes his case against Job, it is not significantly different from that presented by the three friends (Job 34:11, 25-27, 37). Accordingly, no one, including Job, bothers to respond to him. Job's final interaction is not with Elihu but rather with God himself.

Job had hoped for an audience with God during which he expected to set God straight: "I would give him an account of my every step; like a prince I would approach him" (Job 31:37). In Job 38:1, however, it is God who approaches Job, and this in the form of a whirlwind. God then proceeds to upbraid Job for his prideful assertions of wisdom. God relentlessly barrages Job with question after question, the effect of which is to render Job repentant then silent. Job is not wise; only God is wise.

3.4. Job's Restoration. The prose conclusion to the book (Job 42:7-17) presents the reader with an apparent enigma. Earlier Job had repented (Job 40:2-5; 42:1-5), and now God has restored his blessing. This scenario raises the question of whether the three friends were correct after all. They had argued that Job needed to repent to restore his blessings, and sure enough, that is what happens.

Or is it? Job had already proved, in the first two chapters of the book, that his piety was disinterested. At the end of the book, he was not repenting of the sin that led to his suffering. He was truly an innocent sufferer—at least during the test. However, as time went on, Job had grown increasingly impatient and insistent with God, even, as we have noted, accusing him of injustice. It was this attitude that led to his repentance. Job had “spoken of me [God] what is right,” thus becoming an intercessor in behalf of the three friends (Iwanski). The prologue of the book does not undermine the message of the book.

4. Was Job a Real Person?

The book of Job is our main source for knowledge of Job the person. He is not mentioned in any extrabiblical texts. The descriptions of Job in Ezekiel 14:14, 20 as righteous and in James 5:11 as patient (or, probably better, as persevering) are interpretive reflections on the book of Job and do not offer independent information about the man. Indeed, such characterizations are ideal and not nuanced descriptions of Job as we learn about him in the book of Job.

Before leaving the topic of Job as a person, we should ask the question of whether he is a real person or a fictional character. Did Job live and breathe in space and time, or was he a literary construct? This question raises the issue of the genre of the book of Job. Is Job a work of history and thus making historical claims, or is it a didactic text that creates a story in order to reflect on the existential issue of innocent human suffering?

The historical intentionality of Job is difficult to assess. The first lines of a text often are important for genre identification, since they set the tone for what follows. The first verse of Job is similar to the opening verses of Judges 17 and 1 Samuel 1, two passages with an arguable intention to communicate historical events. Some might argue that the reference to Job in Ezekiel 14 as an example of righteousness might support the idea that Job was a real person whose story was known broadly.

On the other hand, large parts of the book of Job are set in poetry, a literary vehicle that betrays artifice. Even if Job was a real person, we are getting something far from a transcript of an actual event. Poetry elevates the book from a specific historical event to a story with universal application. If the book of Job is a historical chronicle, it is also much more. It is wisdom that is to be applied to all who hear it.

In the final analysis, since there are no independent attestations to Job's existence, it is impossible to decide this question dogmatically either way. Indeed, whether or not one understands this book to be historical has little impact on its meaning. Job's story is not a part of redemptive history, where the actual events impact whether or not they have any saving effect. Rather, Job's story serves a didactic purpose. It teaches us that suffering is not always the result of personal sin. Job is the ideal, wise, righteous person, and yet he suffers, teaching those who read his story that they cannot judge the morality of people based on their success or suffering.

See also JOB 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. Iwanski, The Dynamics of Job's Intercession (AnBib 161; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 2006); A. Lo, Job 28 as Rhetoric: An Analysis of Job 28 in the Context of Job 22—31 (VTSup 97; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003); M. Weiss, The Story of Job's Beginning: Job 1—2, a Literary Analysis (Publications for the Perry Foundation for Biblical Research in the Hebrew University of Jerusalem; Jerusalem: Magnes, 1983); T. Williams, “yḥ,” NIDOTTE 1.365-71; P. Zerafa, The Wisdom of God in the Book of Job (SUSTU 8; Rome: Herder, 1978) T. Longman III

JUSTICE. See LAW; RIGHTEOUSNESS; THEODICY.

K

KINGSHIP. See CREATION IMAGERY; CULT, WORSHIP; PSALMS; MESSIAH; ROYAL COURT

KINGSHIP PSALMS

For many years the royal, or kingship, psalms have given rise to a great deal of debate. The foci of this debate have changed with the passage of time from discussion of the number of royal psalms to “sacral” and “sacerdotal” kingship, from “the Great Autumn Festival” to the meaning of the “Davidic” superscriptions. The Psalter is liberally laced with indications of kingship involvement, and although these royal themes are not always obvious, they are significant. The kingship background to the psalms is not as visible as praise or lament or *cult, but it is just as important to a right understanding of the theology of the Psalter. The Davidic king is not conspicuous, but there is a sense in which he subtly dominates the book of *Psalms.

1. Genre and the Kingship Psalms
2. Anonymous Kingship
3. Canonical Kingship
4. Continuing Kingship
5. Psalmic Kingship
6. Conclusions

1. Genre and the Kingship Psalms.

Until the 1990s the individual poems of the Psalter tended to be grouped according to their type, and one of H. Gunkel's genre categories was “royal psalms.” Gunkel (99) remarked, “The internal unity of [these] psalms stems from the fact that they are concerned entirely with kings.” This definition immediately sets some alarm bells ringing. First, this is not a genre classification at all; it is an association based on similarity of content rather than of form. Thus, royal psalms can vary in form between individual complaint songs and individual *thanksgiving songs as long as their focus is on kingship. Second, must a psalm be concerned “entirely” with kings for it to qualify as a royal psalm? Few psalms fit neatly within a single genre category, yet mixed psalms that are dominated by lament, for example, are still categorized as *lament psalms. Should the same discretion not be applied to kingship psalms?

Another potential weakness in Gunkel's definition of royal psalmody is that he focuses on royal nomenclature. He suggests that use of the words king and anointed, the name “David” and phrases such as “Yahweh's servant” indicate a kingship background. Although this clearly is a logical starting point for any discussion of monarchic psalms, it is questionable whether such naming categories are the only reliable indication of a royal setting. This dubiety is accentuated by the fact that two of the ten psalms that Gunkel highlights as royal (Pss 2; 20; 21; 28; 45; 72; 101; 110; 132; 144:1-11) lack any of these naming characteristics in the psalms themselves (Pss 101; 110). Intuitively, based on their content, Gunkel saw that Psalm 101 and Psalm 110 have a setting in kingship, yet neither of them meets his criteria for declaring them royal. The implications of this subconscious expansion in the royal category are significant, allowing for the possibility that there are in fact many more psalms scattered throughout the Psalter that draw upon kingship themes and ideals. Gunkel allows two anonymous “I” psalms with Davidic superscriptions to be seen as kingship psalms because of their royal content. This being the case, could there not be more such psalms, perhaps even many more?

2. Anonymous Kingship.

J. H. Eaton (1-26) picks up on this ambiguity in Gunkel's definition of the royal psalms and suggests that there are indeed many more psalms of this type in the Psalter. He argues that Gunkel's treatment of Psalm 101 and Psalm 110 should be applied to all of the anonymous "I" psalms, especially those that bear a Davidic superscription. He highlights several criteria that may indicate a royal background to many of the anonymous psalms. For example, the Chronicler associates *David with psalmody and the preparations for temple *worship, and Eaton suggests that we should understand the psalms' Davidic superscriptions in the light of this association; also, Israel's king had responsibilities with regard to public (temple) worship, where many of the psalms would have been used. Eaton goes on to highlight twenty-four characteristics found in the anonymous psalms of the Psalter that can reasonably be taken to indicate a royal background. For example, the psalmist's enemies are often foreign armies, or the deliverance of this individual has national repercussions, or Yahweh's honor is bound up with the fate of the psalmist. All of these indicators combine to indicate that the king is perhaps the most likely candidate to be the speaker in many of the anonymous psalms. So, when Eaton's theory is applied, a further fifty-four psalms can be added to Gunkel's original ten, thus giving the Psalter a decidedly more "royal" flavor.

3. Canonical Kingship.

The canonical approach to the Psalter further emphasizes the importance of kingship psalms. A canonical reading of the Psalter emphasizes the significance of the psalms that are placed at the beginning and end of its five "books." The argument of G. H. Wilson (85-94) that the seam psalms of Books I-III of the Psalter take on added editorial significance further accentuates the weight of the royal psalms within the book as a whole.

Wilson contends that through charting the progression in the kingship psalms that are placed at the seams of Books I-III, we see a "narrative" that traces the rise and fall of the Davidic monarchy. Psalm 2 describes the inauguration of the Davidic covenant, Psalm 72 reflects the transition of Davidic covenant to successive generations of Israelite kings, and Psalm 89 laments Yahweh's apparent rejection of the Davidic covenant. Questions have been raised about how well this narrative theory works in its detail—especially with regard to the canonical function of Psalm 2 and the suggestion that royal psalms play a less significant role in Books IV-V—but it is now broadly accepted that the kingship psalms have been placed at key junctures throughout the Psalter in order to emphasize royal themes as part of a postexilic, eschatological hope that a Davidic king would reign once again.

4. Continuing Kingship.

This eschatological hope in a restored Davidic kingship sheds some light on a fascinating question: Why are there any kingship psalms in the Psalter at all? The royal psalms originated in the realities of the Davidic monarchy, so why did the editors retain poems that celebrate enthronement ceremonies and royal weddings long after the monarchy ceased to exist?

Democratization and reinterpretation are the keys to understanding the continuing presence of kingship psalms in the Psalter. Apart from occasional superscriptions, the psalms are purposefully unspecific about their historical details and setting. The psalmist pleads his cause before God because of his enemies, but these enemies remain unidentified. Equally, the psalms celebrate great heights of joy, but again, the historical details of these testimonies are never laid out before the reader. This ahistoricity means that psalms are as broadly applicable as possible. The psalms express every emotion conceivable, and the whole point is that this expression of human emotion directed toward God is made available to be adapted to a wide variety of circumstances. The words may have originated on the lips of the king, but the principles are just as valid for the laborer who does not eat if he does not work. The circumstances differ, but the applicability of the spiritual truths of the psalms is the same for each. This is called democratization: the words written by a specific individual grounded in specific circumstances can be appropriated by all people in a wide variety of circumstances where the expression of the psalmist's thoughts and emotions reflect their own (see Miller 1986, 21-24).

Alongside the generalizing effects of democratization, another factor has led to the retention of kingship psalms in the Psalter: reinterpretation. Democratization has shrouded the "royalty" of some of the anonymous psalms; reinterpretation maintains the currency of the more obviously “royal” psalms. Psalm 2, for example, probably was recited at the coronation of each new Davidic king, so why retain such a psalm when there has been no king for many years? Psalm 2 retains its prominent place in the Psalter because its meaning for the covenant community has changed with their change of life setting. This process of reinterpretation seems to have occurred quite naturally throughout the history of the community of faith.

The focus of Psalm 2 on Yahweh’s universal rule through his king based in *Zion would have resonated most with Davidic/Solomonic readers when Israel was a (relatively) major player in the ancient Near East and their experience of human kingship was fairly positive. By way of contrast, later preexilic readers, who lived in a period when Judah was politically insignificant and whose experience of kingship was much more negative, would experience a strong degree of cognitive dissonance in the reading of this psalm. The theology of Psalm 2 would be far removed from the reality of their situation. This leads to a process of reinterpretation. If Psalm 2 is not fulfilled in the reality of present kingship, its fulfillment must lie elsewhere—perhaps in a future king of Israel? So a degree of eschatological expectation is added to the reading: “Yahweh reigns, by all means, but surely the king spoken of is not our king. This must be a king who is still to come.” This is true all the more for postexilic readers, for whom the king has become a very distant historical memory. Therefore, is it at all surprising that the early Christian community reread and understood Psalm 2 in the light of Jesus the *Messiah (Acts 4:24-28; 13:32-33)?

Such reinterpretation is inherent to psalmody, given the ahistoricity of the psalms. The psalms are designed to be appropriated in the way that is most relevant to the community of believers in their particular setting. So the kingship psalms are retained in the Psalter due to processes of democratization and reinterpretation: they point us to the ultimate Davidic king (reinterpretation), who is also the ultimate “everyman” (democratization).

5. Psalmic Kingship.

A theological problem remains, however: Why are the explicitly royal psalms so positive about kingship when much of the OT seems to be a great deal more critical of the office of king? It is often argued that Deuteronomy and its associated historical books are anti-kingship, although this overstates the case. Deuteronomy and the OT Historical Books favor kingship that is exercised in accordance with the kingship law (Deut 17:14-20); the problem was that Israel’s kings seldom, if ever, followed that paradigm. Hence, the view of kingship in the rest of the OT is often much more negative than the celebration of kingship found in Psalms.

In response, first, we should remember that psalms are occasional literature; that is, they are meant to teach us something about their given focus, but their intent is not to provide us with a complete picture. This is true of the royal psalms, which celebrate all that is (or can be) good about human kingship practiced alongside the rule of the Great King. They are positive because kingship can be a good thing, but they are not written as a thesis on the relative merits and demerits of kingship. Second, the Psalter is not unaware of the downside of human kingship. Psalm 89:38-52, for example, discusses Yahweh’s apparent rejection of the Davidic line, and the prophetic background to these events would be quite clear to readers of this psalm: the house of David fell because the kings of this noble line rejected Yahweh and his ways.

A third element should be borne in mind, however: the whole dynamic of contextual interpretation in the Psalter. Yes, the explicit royal psalms seem to have a very positive view of kingship, but how does their canonical context influence their interpretation? A contextual reading of all of the royal psalms is impossible within the scope of this article, but it does appear that the editors of the Psalter sought to direct their readers to a particular understanding of the future Davidic king by placing some of the kingship psalms in a very specific interpretative context. The Psalter’s editors direct our attention to a future king who goes beyond even the best examples of kingship found in Israel’s history, to one who will actually fulfill the ideal of kingship, Deuteronomy’s kingship law (Deut 17:14-20).

It is interesting that the first and most prominent of the royal psalms (Ps 2) is paired with a psalm that celebrates the tôrâ (“instruction”) of Yahweh (Ps 1). The themes of tôrâ (see Law) and kingship are linked in this introduction to the Psalter, which provides a paradigm for the interpretation of all that follows in the book. Interestingly, the next explicitly royal psalms in the Psalter (Pss 18; 20; 21) also revolve around a Torah psalm (Ps 19). This repeated link between tôrâ and kingship primes the reader's curiosity: Are tôrâ and kingship poems linked elsewhere in the Psalms? There is one more explicitly tôrâ-focused psalm in the book (Ps 119), and, perhaps not surprisingly, we discover that it is linked with Psalm 118, where, it is often argued, the king leads the people in an act of antiphonal worship. Why link the Psalter's three Torah psalms with kingship psalms?

The kingship law (Deut 17:14-20) inseparably links tôrâ and monarchy, indicating that, above all else, the king is meant to be the paradigmatic Israelite believer by internalizing Yahweh's tôrâ and allowing it to influence every aspect of his life and rule. Each of the historical kings of Israel failed in this task to a greater or lesser degree. So, yes, kingship is celebrated in Psalms 2; 18; 20; 21; 118, but their contextual reading directs our thoughts not toward the best examples of kingship (David or Josiah) but rather to the ideal of kingship. This coming king will be the one who finally keeps the kingship law; he will be the ultimate exemplar of tôrâ piety lived out in reality.

6. Conclusions.

There are two main implications to be drawn from these observations regarding the psalms and the king: one theological, one practical. First, on a theological level we are pointed toward a messianism in the Psalter that is subtler than is often portrayed. The expansion of the definition of royal psalms by Eaton leads us to a messianic king who is very deeply human, who experiences the same heights of joy and depths of despair as all humanity.

Second, we are presented with the image of the king as exemplar for the people—grounded in the tôrâ of Yahweh and entirely dependent on him. The king has such a prominent role in the Psalter because he fulfilled a representative function within the OT theocracy, representing God to the people and the people to God. The juxtaposition of royal and Torah psalms points the reader to the image of an individual rooted in the Torah (Ps 1:2-3) and a king dependent upon Yahweh (Ps 2:12). The anonymous individual in Psalm 1 is to be read as the king, and the king in Psalm 2 is to be understood as the unnamed individual. Psalm 1 “democratizes”

the royalty of Psalm 2, but at the same time Psalm 2 adds a royal flavor to the “everyman” inclusiveness of Psalm 1. The figures of king and anonymous believer merge. This ambiguity presents Christian readers with an example to follow. The true king has set an example for all who would follow him, basing his life in the tôrâ (Luke 4:16-21) and living his life in dependence upon his Father (John 5:30). Rereading the kingship psalms christologically, Christians see a picture of Jesus the King as their representative and example.

Seeing the significance of kingship in the Psalter gives us a fuller understanding of the humanity of our Messiah and a greater awareness of the piety that should typify our daily lives. The royal nature of the psalms is both obvious and subtle, but the implications of this kingship theme are significant.

See also EDITORIAL CRITICISM; FORM CRITICISM; MESSIAH; ROYAL COURT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. H. Eaton, Kingship and the Psalms (2nd ed.; SBT 32; London: SCM Press, 1986); J. A. Grant, The King as Exemplar: The Function of Deuteronomy's Kingship Law in the Shaping of the Book of Psalms (SBLAB 17; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2004); idem, “The Psalms and the King,” in Interpreting the Psalms: Issues and Approaches, ed. P. S. Johnston and D. G. Firth (Leicester: Apollos, 2005) 101-18; H. Gunkel, Introduction to the Psalms: The Genres of the Religious Lyric of Israel (MLBS; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998); J. L. Mays, The Lord Reigns: A Theological Handbook to the Psalms (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1994); J. C. McCann Jr., A Theological Introduction to the Books of Psalms: The Psalms as Torah (Nashville: Abingdon, 1993); idem, “The Book of Psalms,” NIB 4.641-1280; P. D. Miller, Interpreting the Psalms (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); idem, “Kingship, Torah Obedience and Prayer,” in Neue Wege der Psalmenforschung, ed. K. Seybold and E. Zenger (HBS 1; Freiburg: Herder, 1995) 127-42; G. H. Wilson, “The Use of Royal Psalms at the ‘Seams’ of the Hebrew Psalter,” JSOT 35 (1986) 85-94.

J. A. Grant

KINSHIP. See SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES.

KINSMAN-REDEEMER AND LEVIRATE

These are two Israelite customs by which a relative removes another relative from great difficulty. Their common goal is to repair family wholeness broken by the trouble, and both aim to continue a childless family line on its land through the *marriage of its widow to a relative. But several features distinguish the kinsman-redeemer from the levirate custom: it involves a close relative (e.g., uncle, cousin, other near kin), not a brother, and also it aims to relieve larger economic woes (e.g., mortgaged family land or kin in debt slavery). The limited biblical data denies us clarity as to how Israel understood their interrelationship, notwithstanding their common concern for preserving family lines.

1. The Levirate
2. The Kinsman-Redeemer

1. The Levirate.

This custom (cf. Lat levir, “brother-in-law”) obligates the oldest living brother to marry his brother’s childless widow in order to provide the deceased an heir to continue his family line (Deut 25:5-10; cf. Gen 38). It also authorizes a legal ceremony whereby the widow may shame her brother-in-law in public if he refuses to do so. Both texts accord the custom high importance, but as Weisberg notes, both also contrast male reluctance to comply (probably concern for clear paternity and property rights) with female advocacy (probably concern for widows’ security). Both texts paint uncooperative brothers negatively, but neither requires the custom, unless contextually “brother” in Deuteronomy 25 applies the duty to all Israel (Volgger).

1.1. The Book of Ruth. Echoes of the custom occur primarily in the book of *Ruth. It supports the argument by *Naomi that Ruth and Orpah go home because she is too old to birth them sons to marry (Ruth 1:11). It underlies the purpose that *Boaz voices for marriage to Ruth: “to maintain the dead man’s name” (Ruth 4:5 NRSV) so that “the name of the dead may not be cut off from his kindred” (Ruth 4:10 NRSV [cf. Deut 25:6]). On the other hand, despite its similarity to levirate terminology (Deut 25:7, 9), the Hebrew word yēbāmā (Ruth 1:15) is probably the general kinship term “sister-in-law” (cf. the LXX’s synnymphos [“co-bride”]; Lat cognata [“relative”]), since it describes Ruth’s relationship to Orpah (i.e., wife of her husband’s brother) rather than to Orpah’s husband (cf. Heb yābām [“brother-in-law”]).

1.2. Psalm 133. The phrase “brothers dwell together” (Ps 133:1) may refer to one of the conditions of the levirate (Deut 25:1): joint tenancy by male siblings on ancestral property. If so, the psalm originally promoted the practice to foster the prosperity and fertility that result only from caring stewardship of land over generations. But this interpretation hinges on reading the reference to oil on Aaron’s beard and collar (Ps 133:2) as a later addition (Ames, 904).

2. The Kinsman-Redeemer.

This custom (gē’ullā [“redemption”]; gō’ēl [“kinsman-redeemer”]) involves a circle of close relatives (gō’ālim [Ruth 2:20; cf. 1 Kings 16:11]) beyond the brother-in-law and concerns needs beyond the provision of an heir. Scattered texts afford it only brief glimpses and limited legal instruction. Local practices and ad hoc innovations probably account for the seeming irreconcilable differences between texts.

2.1. Background. Family *law (Lev 25) tasks the gō’ēl with restoring family wholeness from its members’ financial losses. He buys (or takes) back mortgaged ancestral land (Lev 25:25-28), relatives’ houses sold of necessity (Lev 25:29-31), and kin who sell themselves as slaves (Lev 25:47-49). As clan head, he receives restitution payments for deceased members (Num 5:8), and as gō’ēl haddām (“avenger of blood”), he avenges the murder of a relative by killing the killer or a member of his clan (Num 35:19; Deut 19:4-7; Josh 20:1-9; cf. 2 Sam 14:11).

2.2. The Book of Ruth. This lovely story is the only narrative context to feature the kinsman-redeemer as a central motif. The narrative is unique in showing Israelite redemption practices in action in a single case and locale. The limits of Israelite written law and reader ignorance of life “back there” best explain the book’s uncertain legal background. However, one may still gain a general sense of the rationale behind the proceedings.

2.2.1. The Debut (Ruth 2:20). It is Naomi who first mentions the kinsman-redeemer (gō’ēl) custom, calling Boaz “one of [lit., “from”] our kinsman-redeemers” (NIV [Heb miggō’ālēnū]). The plural form points to a small circle of close relatives responsible for caring for needy kin. Her comment interprets Boaz’s generosity that day as gracious family loyalty and a possible harbinger of further help. His later mention of a kinsman-redeemer nearer than himself (Ruth 3:12) and deference to the man’s rights as the closest living relative (Ruth 4:4) presume a continuum of closeness within the circle of redeemers. However, the specific “help” that the women may expect from the gōʿel remains unstated.

2.2.2. Ruth’s Marriage Proposal (Ruth 3:9). Ruth’s marriage proposal to Boaz makes the second reference to the custom. Naomi secretly dispatches Ruth at night to the threshing floor near Bethlehem to arrange a marriage (Ruth 3:1-5). Ruth is to dress nicely, lie down beside him, and receive his instructions. Naomi’s intent may only be that Boaz match Ruth with someone else, but Ruth proposes marriage to him rather than await his instructions (for the “cloak” metaphor, see Ezek 16:8). She grounds her proposal in the fact that Boaz is a gōʿel (Ruth 3:9)—the only biblical example of marriage to a widow based on gēʿullā. How should this be explained? Does she appeal to the gōʿel custom as a broad sense of duty to needy close family or as the application of known laws (e.g., Lev 25; Deut 25)? The broad view reads her proposal in light of Naomi’s instructions and comment in Ruth 2:20—that is, an appeal either to the spirit of the redeemer concept (Nielsen) or to Boaz’s moral sense of duty to family (Bush). The legal-background view cites the mention of the nearer kinsman’s prior rights (Ruth 3:12-13) to argue that some legal principle lies behind her appeal (Hubbard). Further, the contrast between the expectation of Boaz’s instructions (Ruth 3:4) and Ruth’s unexpected proposal to Boaz as a gōʿel (Ruth 3:9) seems significant. It may imply that Ruth’s action exceeds Naomi’s purpose by seeking a gōʿel marriage versus an ordinary one (and possibly the provision of a son). If so, it would highlight Ruth’s initiative as an admirable act of family loyalty toward Naomi (hesed), as Boaz later says (Ruth 3:10). But it is unlikely that the levirate plays any role here. Redemption terminology rules (root gʿl, not ybm), and Boaz is not a brother to Elimelech, nor is Ruth his sister-in-law.

2.2.3. Boaz, Naomi’s Land and Ruth (Ruth 4:1-12). The next morning at the city gate (Ruth 4:1-2), Boaz informs the other kinsman of Naomi’s wish to transfer a “portion” of Elimelech’s land (Ruth 4:3). Boaz asks him either to serve as kinsman-redeemer or to waive the right to Boaz, the gōʿel next in line (Ruth 4:4a). The focus on land, not Ruth, surprises the reader, since the story has said nothing about it. Further, here the gōʿel redeems land from the owner’s widow rather than from an outside mortgage holder (Lev 25:25-28). When the closer kinsman accepts the duty (Ruth 4:4b), Boaz introduces a levirate-like requirement: marriage to Ruth to perpetuate the name of her husband (Mahlon, not Elimelech [cf. Ruth 4:10]) on his ancestral land (Ruth 4:5). This marks the lone OT example where gēʿullā combines land and widow, but the author offers no explanation for Boaz’s stipulation. No matter, for the closer kinsman cedes to Boaz his prior redemption right (gēʿullā), explaining that to serve would damage his own inheritance (Ruth 4:6). Boaz formally exercises his new right, acquiring both land and widow (Ruth 4:9-10), and the town affirms the legality of the deal and blesses the couple (Ruth 4:11-12). Behind this simple scene, however, lurk several vexing legal questions.

2.2.3.1. Naomi’s “Sale.” When does (or did) the sale occur? In other words, is the gēʿullā here preemption (i.e., acquisition from a close relative [cf. Jer 32]) or redemption (i.e., reacquisition from a distant relative or nonrelative [cf. Lev 25])? The perfect verb mākrā (lit., “she sold”) in Ruth 4:3 might refer to a past sale, but most scholars and recent translations render it in the present (NRSV: “is selling”; NJPS: “must sell”). Though not problem free, this rendering fits the context better than its alternative. Boaz also uses a perfect of the Hebrew verb qnh (“buy, acquire”) both for what the kinsman or he is to do now (Ruth 4:5) and what he does at the end (Ruth 4:9-10). These “instantaneous perfects” express an action in the present, especially in solemn statements or legal transactions (cf. 2 Sam 19:30). Further, Boaz twice states that the transaction comes “from the hand of Naomi” and not from someone else (Ruth 4:5, 9). Thus, one need not assume (as some scholars do) that Elimelech “sold” the land before going to Moab, or that Naomi did so while there (contra Westbrook, 66-67).

Is this really a sale at all? Unlike typical sales (see Jer 32), here Naomi is absent from the scene, and no money changes hands. The payment may occur later off scene, but a better solution is to render the Hebrew mākrā as “she is surrendering possession of” (see Lipiński), and the root qnh as “acquire.” The OT attests both renderings in similar contexts, and the object “possession” is probably the land’s usufruct, not the land itself (Bush). Thus, the narrative treats the transfer of the gōʿel duty to Boaz (Ruth 4:3-

8) and his formal execution of it (Ruth 4:9-10). But what gives Naomi authority to sell the property? Several biblical examples show that women could control ancestral land. *Job gave both his daughters and sons inheritances (Job 42:15), and the law authorizes daughters of families without sons to inherit the family's lands (Num 26:33; 27:1-11; 36:1-12). In 2 Kings 8:1-6 a widow recently returned from foreign soil appeals to the king to regain her land. That he grants her appeal implies that she herself owned the land before she left, that someone had possessed it in her absence, and that neither her absence nor her gender annulled her right of ownership. The specific background of Ruth 4 is less clear (e.g., did Naomi inherit the land from Elimelech, or did it fall to her as his only survivor?), but the story assumes her right to transfer it. It also reports no objection to the idea from the kinsman or the witnesses.

Does Naomi's ownership of land conflict with her apparent poverty? That is, has Boaz maneuvered the other man through misinformation? Against this, one recalls that Naomi arrived just as the harvest began (Ruth 1:22b), so she had not sown the field. Were it fallow, she would have had no crop to harvest, or if someone else had sown it, the community probably would support that person's right to the fruit of that labor. It seems unlikely that Boaz could fool a small town such as Bethlehem with such an untrue claim.

2.2.3.2. Land Plus Widow: Ploy or Principle? What justifies the requirement that land and widow go together (Ruth 4:5), and why does it cause the closer kinsman to withdraw? A recent consensus avers that the levirate probably aims to ensure that the deceased has an heir to inherit his share of land. But Naomi's postmenopausal age (cf. Ruth 1:12) makes a levirate-like marriage impossible, so the kinsman need only exercise preemption of Elimelech's property (or so he thinks!). Two assumptions probably underlie the land/widow linkage in Ruth 4: a belief that land is inalienable (i.e., it must remain in family hands) and a social expectation (or custom) that close family (e.g., a gō'ēl) uphold that value (contra Kutsch, 371). By acquiring the field, the nearer kinsman does so and also profits financially from the land. His only "loss" might be the support of Naomi until her death. But why does the unexpected introduction of Ruth—a legal substitute for Naomi as her son Mahlon's widow (Ruth 4:10)—pose a problem for him? His stated reason is that such a marriage would harm his own inheritance (Ruth 4:6). Certainly, unlike Naomi, Ruth is young enough to produce an heir for Mahlon who would eventually claim the family's land. In Ruth 4:5, Beattie and Sasson support this view by reading the Ketib qānītū ("I will buy") rather than the Qere qānītā ("you will acquire"), but that reading has not found general acceptance, presumes a literal purchase, and is interpretively unnecessary. If the couple had other children (a possible but uncertain assumption), the larger family might do harm by forcing him to divide his inheritance among more children (i.e., into smaller parcels).

But if the case concerns acquisition not purchase (see above), financial motives play less of a role. Thus, more likely his hesitation simply hides his surprise or confusion at the new wrinkle, or perhaps his desire not to be bothered. Perhaps he also found marriage to a non-Israelite (note "Ruth the Moabite" [Ruth 4:5]) distasteful. Whatever the case, a consensus acknowledges Boaz's cleverness in maneuvering the proceedings to his liking. The sudden switch from Naomi/Elimelech (and potential profits) to Ruth/Mahlon (and levirate and potential problems) soured the man on the idea. Shrewdly, Boaz began with "a portion of Elimelech's property" (Ruth 4:3) and ends up with "everything" belonging to Elimelech and his two sons as well as Ruth (Ruth 4:9-10). The story remembers him for his great hesed or "family loyalty" (and as the great-grandfather of *David), while in Ruth 4:1 his reluctant kinsman remains nameless (pēlōnī 'almōnī ["Mr. So-and-So"]).

2.2.3.3. The Newborn. Ruth 4:14 is the only text to identify a newborn as a gō'ēl. Naomi's female friends praise Yahweh for providing her Obed, whom Israel will honor for raising Naomi's spirits and for caring for her in old age. The once "empty" Naomi (Ruth 1:21) now has a "son" at last (Ruth 4:17). This example extends the sweep of the kinsman-redeemer's the care of needy relatives into the past and the future. Obed not only perpetuates past family members but also provides for Naomi's own future.

2.3. Yahweh as Redeemer. Some poetical books describe Yahweh, protector of the weak and endangered, as a kinsman-redeemer. Proverbs 23:10-11 warns would-be violators of orphans' property rights that Yahweh is their gō'ēl (NJPS:

“a mighty Kinsman”), who will “plead their cause [rib] against you” in court (NRSV), and most certainly will win (cf. Deut 19:14; 27:17; Job 24:2; Prov 22:28; Jer 50:34)! In a broader sense, worshipers in Psalm 19:14 (MT 19:15) and Psalm 78:35 affirm him as their “redeemer” (gō’ēl) and “rock” (šūr), their ever reliable protector in danger. Combining g’l (“redeem, rescue”) and rib (“plead a [legal] cause”), Lamentations 3:58-59 seems to echo the motif of Yahweh as gō’ēl (i.e., legal defender). He “took up the cause” (rib) and “saved [the] life” (g’l) of an innocent victim of “the wrong” that Yahweh himself witnessed (cf. Ps 72:14 [the king]; 119:154 [Yahweh]). In Psalm 74:2 the language of the “the congregation . . . you acquired [qnh]” parallels “you redeemed [g’l] as the tribe of your inheritance [nahālā].” The recall of key verbs from Ruth 4 seems to apply the metaphor of Yahweh the redeemer in a new way: at the exodus Yahweh “acquired” through “redemption” not an individual relative but rather a whole tribe as his “inheritance” [njps: “your very own tribe”] for *worship on Mount *Zion (cf. Ex 15:13). Yahweh is to defend not only the poor and needy (Ps 74:21) but also his own cause (rib [Ps 74:22])—his own name defamed by his enemies who destroyed Zion (Ps 74:22; cf. Ps 74:10, 18). Another psalmist pleads with Yahweh to “redeem” him (Ps 69:18) from the public humiliation and scorn of a false accusation (Ps 69:4, 7-12).

2.4. Job 19:25. In this well-known text Job confidently affirms, “I know that my Redeemer [gō’ālī] lives, that at the last he will stand upon the earth” (NRSV). Since the context concerns a dispute with God over Job’s innocence, “my Redeemer” clearly invokes the kinsman-redeemer motif. Job claims that there is someone who, like a close relative, will finally (“at the end”) defend him (“stand” here means “to stand/speak as a witness in court”). However, the identity of that someone and whether the text locates the intervention before or after Job’s death remain matters of dispute. One common view identifies God as Job’s redeemer and says that his vindication follows his resurrection. That Yahweh bears the title “redeemer” elsewhere commends this view, especially since “living” is a prominent attribute of God (e.g., Ps 42:2; Is 37:17). Indeed, some argue that in view of Job’s mortality, a “living redeemer” can refer only to God. But “living” is a common expression not limited to God (e.g., Gen 8:21; Deut 31:27), and the idea of an earthly resurrection is rare in the OT (only Is 26:19; Dan 12:1-3). Also, elsewhere Job clearly affirms the finality of death (Job 7:9; 10:21) and denies the possibility of resurrection (Job 14:12).

An alternative view interprets the text to indicate that God will intervene, spare Job from death, and restore him to his former health and prosperity. Job 19 would offer his blunt plea: “Vindicate me now; otherwise, don’t bother” (Zink, 152). This view certainly fits the book’s ending (Job 42:7-17) and requires one to read Job 19:26 as severe *suffering rather than death. Job’s hope of emerging the better for his ordeal (“I shall come out like gold” [Job 23:10 NRSV]) might imply vindication in this life, but that Job’s suffering and outcry intensify in subsequent chapters casts doubt on this view. Another recent suggestion avers that God vindicates Job after death, but it also presumes a questionable disembodied awareness of that vindication by Job in death and has not won a following. Finally, recent scholars argue for a gō’ēl other than God as more consistent with the book’s contents and the gō’ēl metaphor. Job consistently pictures God as his main adversary (e.g., Job 13:3; 19:6; 31:35). Thus, in their view the book makes better sense if the redeemer defends Job against God rather than if God is both Job’s prosecutor and defense attorney. The assumption is that only a third party can properly defend Job against God at the heavenly court.

But who is this nondivine redeemer? N. C. Habel identifies him as a heavenly defense attorney—the heavenly “witness” (’ēd) who affirms Job’s innocence (Job 16:19; cf. Job 33:23; Zech 3:1-5) and counterpart to “the Accuser” (haśśātān [see Satan]) of the prologue (e.g., Job 1:6; 2:1). The OT often portrays God amid a council of heavenly beings, including “the Accuser” and a defender of God’s people (perhaps Michael [Dan 10:13, 21]), but elsewhere Job seems actually to deny such a possibility in his case (Job 5:1; 9:33). D. J. A. Clines also equates the gō’ēl with the heavenly “witness” (’ēd) and “advocate” (śāhēd) but contextually interprets them as personifications of Job’s outcry (Job 16:18-21) (so Ringgren). If so, rather than a person or heavenly being, the redeemer in Job 19 would be a *personification: Job’s protestation of innocence directed toward God even in death. Without friends and besieged by God (Job 19:6, 13-19), Job becomes his own gō’ēl

(the metaphor permits self-redemption), his words comprising his only defense. This view requires one to read Job 19:26-27 as a wish ("If only . . .") rather than an affirmation.

Whatever the case, one thing remains clear: in Job 19:25 Job affirms his confidence in a gō'el figure who will finally step in to establish his innocence in a decisive lawsuit. Ironically, in the end God does indeed vindicate Job, although no recognizable echoes of the gō'el motif sound in the book's closing scene (Job 42:7-17).

See also HONOR AND SHAME; RUTH 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. R. Ames, "Levirate Marriage," NIDOTTE 4.902-5; D. R. G. Beattie, "The Book of Ruth as Evidence for Israelite Legal Practice," VT 24 (1974) 251-67; idem, "Redemption in Ruth and Related Matters: A Response to Jack M. Sasson," JSOT 5 (1978a) 65-58; idem, "Ruth III," JSOT 5 (1978b) 39-48; F. W. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1996); D. J. A. Clines, Job 1-20 (WBC 17; Dallas: Word, 1989); E. W. Davies, "Inheritance Rights and the Hebrew Levirate Marriage: Part 1," VT 31 (1981a) 138-44; idem, "Inheritance Rights and the Hebrew Levirate Marriage: Part 2," VT 31 (1981b) 257-68; idem, "Ruth IV 5 and the Duties of the Gō'el," VT 33 (1983) 231-34; N. C. Habel, The Book of Job (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1985); V. P. Hamilton, "כֹּהֵן," NIDOTTE 2.392-93; R. L. Hubbard Jr., The Book of Ruth (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); idem, "The gō'el in Ancient Israel: The Theology of an Israelite Institution," BBR 1 (1991) 3-19; idem, "Redemption," NIDBT 716-20;

idem, "כֹּהֵן," NIDOTTE 1.789-94; J. E. Hartley, Job (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); R. Kessler, "Ich weiss, dass mein Erlöser lebet': Sozialgeschichtlicher Hintergrund und theologische Bedeutung der Löser-Vorstellung in Hiob 19,25," ZTK 89 (1992) 139-58; M. E. Kutsch, "כֹּהֵן," TDOT 5.367-73; A. LaCocque, Ruth (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2004); E. Lipiński, "כֹּהֵן," TDOT 8.291-96; J. A. Loader, "Of Barley, Bulls, and Levirate," in Studies in Deuteronomy: In Honour of C. J. Labuschagne on the Occasion of His 65th Birthday, ed. F. García Martínez et al. (VTSup 53; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994) 123-38; J. Morgenstern, "The Book of the Covenant, Part II," HUCA 7 (1930) 159-258; K. Nielsen, Ruth (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); H. Ringgren, "כֹּהֵן," TDOT 2.350-55; J. M. Sasson, Ruth: A New Translation with a Philological Commentary and a Formalist-Folklorist Interpretation (JHNES; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1979); T. Thompson and D. Thompson, "Some Legal Problems in the Book of Ruth," VT 18 (1968) 79-99; D. Volgger, "Dtn 25:5-10: Per Gesetz zur Ehe gezwungen?" BN 114-115 (2002) 173-88; D. E. Weisberg, "The Widow of Our Discontent: Levirate Marriage in the Bible and Ancient Israel," JSOT 28 (2004) 403-29; R. Westbrook, Property and Family in Israelite Law (JSOTSup 113; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991) 57-68, 69-89; J. K. Zink, "Impatient Job: An Interpretation of Job 19:25-27," JBL 84 (1965) 147-52.

R. L. Hubbard Jr.

KORAH, SONS OF. See ASAPH AND SONS OF KORAH.

L

LAMENT, PSALMS OF

A lament psalm (also called a psalm of complaint or petition or prayer) is a set poetic prayer aimed to present a need to God so that he may resolve it and further his praise. The corporate laments draw from a variety of national historical traditions and probably were sung at the central sanctuary in times of national crisis. The individual laments likely were intoned in more private, domestic services, and they reflect a simpler piety encapsulated in the phrase “my God.” As model prayers, they provide instruction for contemporary spirituality and theology.

1. Genre and Function
2. Individual Laments
3. Corporate Laments: Literary Motifs and Function
4. Traditions of the Individual and Corporate Laments
5. Social Settings of Individual and Corporate Laments
6. Significance for Spirituality and Theology
7. Limits of Lament Psalms and the Biblical Trajectory for Their Reinterpretation

1. Genre and Function.

1.1. What Is a Lament Psalm, and What Is Its Purpose? The psalms of lament form a genre, arguably the most appropriate category by which psalms should be studied (as distinct from topical, chronological or authorial categories). A genre is a shared pattern of communication, usually shaped in particular social contexts, that signals certain expectations of how a text or speech is to be interpreted and used.

The most recurrent and fundamental literary motifs of the lament psalm are lament and petition. Together they make clear that the central aim of this genre is to appeal to God for something. They endeavor to present the psalmist’s case or argument as to why God should intervene. The concluding vows of praise testify that obtaining something from God is not to be viewed as an end in itself. Another aim of lament psalms is to have something to praise God about. Praise should have the last word.

Although each psalm is unique in its own right, the form-critical analysis below should make clear that the individual laments generally follow an established literary pattern (see Form Criticism). They are not the free expressions of individual poets. We should also note that the persons and circumstances reflected in these psalms (who? what? where? when?) are generic or nonspecific. The speaking “I” or “we” is not identified, nor is the “they,” the enemies. Because these poems make a rich use of *imagery, it is difficult if not impossible to sort out what was originally literal and what was metaphorical. Psalm 35, for example, employs images drawn from various spheres and experiences in life: the battlefield (Ps 35:1-3), agriculture (Ps 35:5), slippery paths (Ps 35:6) and stumbling (Ps 35:15), hunting (Ps 35:7-8), social oppression (Ps 35:10, 20) and personal betrayal (Ps 35:11-16), the law court (Ps 35:11, 23-24), sickness (Ps 35:13) and *animals (Ps 35:17). When the petitioner in Psalm 13 prays, “Give light to my eyes” (Ps 13:3), did this originally denote a physical need, a psychological-emotional one or a spiritual one? Rather than being frustrated by this lack of specificity, we should recognize that this open-ended character of psalms is part of what has made them so popular among God’s people throughout the ages. This multivalent language contrasts with the lament by *David in 2 Samuel, which names Saul, Jonathan, the Philistines and the mountains of Gilboa (2 Sam 1:17-27). The individual laments, on the other hand, appear to have been composed to suit recurring, typical occasions—generic times of need—not the particular circumstances of a particular individual in a moment in history. Lament psalms thus present themselves as set prayers written for worshipers to use for typical distresses. Thus, as stated in this article's opening sentence, we may define a lament psalm as a set poetic prayer aimed to present a need to God so that he may resolve it and further his praise.

To use an analogy with the Episcopalian/Anglican Book of Common Prayer or Book of Alternative Services: while the *hymns and the "liturgies of temple entry" (see 2.1 below) found in the book of *Psalms belong to the regular liturgies in which all worshipers would participate (such as "Morning Prayer" or "The Holy Eucharist" or "The Great Vigil of Easter"), the individual and corporate laments would belong among the "Occasional Prayers," found at the back of the prayer book. The former would be sung at the regular services of the religious calendar; the latter would be sung at special occasions of need.

These observations have important implications. First, understanding lament psalms as set prayers written for worshipers to use for typical distresses helps us moderns come to terms with the many references to enemies and the dire situations portrayed in them. The psalms tend to speak in extremes. Since these model prayers are to be applicable to a wide variety of persons in a wide variety of circumstances, their language must be embracing rather than limiting. Thus, if psalms are to include the full spectrum of human experience, they must speak in the extremes. The Song of Hannah (1 Sam 2:1-10) uses language that is militaristic, universal and even cosmic, yet the specific occasion on which it is sung is simply the birth of a child. "My enemies" (1 Sam 2:1) applies here simply to the rival wife, not to life-threatening militants. In Psalm 127 the "arrows" that people may draw from their quiver to use against "their enemies in the gate" are simply the number of their children (Ps 127:5). Conflict in the psalms, even if military language is used, need not point to physical confrontation. References to enemies may simply be metaphorical imagery for the general notion of threat, whether external danger or psychological dread. A benefit of this line of interpretation is that the psalms become more applicable. One need not actually be on the brink of disaster to pray a psalm that "cries from the depths." The lament psalms use images that are applicable to a wide range of situations of distress.

In ancient Greek and modern Western cultures people are accustomed to refer to general, abstract notions. The ancient biblical poets, however, typically employed concrete images. Instead of speaking of evil, they spoke more tangibly of "the wicked (people)." To convey the notion of threat they spoke of "enemies." Thus, looking at these poems together provides a wider context for interpreting each psalm individually. It becomes clear that often they do not report the particular social circumstances that occasioned them (as in newspaper reportage), but they paint in familiar strokes scenes that evoke the general psychological and spiritual predicaments that worshipers may face (as in poetic verse). Because the psalms are highly allusive, the circumstances that may have originally occasioned them or the recurring situations for which they were originally composed are highly elusive.

Second, this interpretation helps us to understand how lament psalms relate to personal experience. We should not view a lament psalm as a composition that a psalmist wrote in direct response to his own personal need. Rather, lament psalms are models of prayer composed for the generic needs of God's people. In this respect, a lament psalm is not a mirror reflecting the composer's experience; rather, it provides worshipers a framework to interpret their own experiences and to guide their expressions of prayer. A psalm's development did not necessarily follow the author's changing mood, but it was clearly intended to lead the worshiper's experience. A lament psalm should be read not autobiographically but rather liturgically. We must be cautious, for example, when referring to a "change of mood" in some lament psalms. Instead of supposing, "The psalmist now feels like praising God," we should instead think, "The psalm leads worshipers to praise God."

The psalms were hammered out over generations of living with God. We moderns should not impose upon them our assumptions that individual, private experience is to be valued more highly than the experience of God reflected in a corporate identity. In fact, they are what generations of the believing community have found to be appropriate and effective ways of speaking to God. The worshiper who recites a psalm speaks not with a singular voice but rather with the voice of generations of God's people. This should give greater confidence when speaking to God. In addition, we are invited to read our own personal experience against the wider experience of the community and so see that our experiences are shared by others.

Similarly, the self-descriptions of the speaker as "righteous" or as a "servant" do not reflect the boasting of the composer; rather, they are character profiles to be adopted by worshipers if they wish a psalm to have its desired effect. Though it is not explicit, psalms do have these educative and behavior-modifying functions. In other words, if worshipers want the Lord to answer a given lament psalm, they will need to conform to its claims.

If the individual psalms of lament were composed for the generic needs of God's people, what are we to make of the phrase "a psalm of David" in the psalm superscriptions (see Psalms 4: Titles)? This question is particularly acute in those psalms whose superscriptions contain historical references (Pss 3; 7 [?]; 18; 30 [?]; 34; 51; 52; 54; 56; 57; 59; 60; 63; 142), most of which are individual laments. In short, the phrases "a psalm of David" (28x) and "of David, a psalm" (8x) are ambiguous in English and even more so in Hebrew. They probably denoted a Davidic or royal collection of psalms in the preexilic period, as distinct from the Levitical collections of "Asaph" and the "sons of Korah" (see Asaph and Sons of Korah). These phrases may have served to honor the chief patron of *worship at the Jerusalem sanctuary and as a kind of imprimatur or certification authorizing the psalms for official, public use.

Later, in the exilic and early postexilic periods, *scribes correlated these "Davidic psalms" with other sacred Scriptures, especially 1-2 Samuel, and added these historical cross-references, thus promoting the reading of these psalms as Davidic prayers. Support for this reconstruction is found in 1 Chronicles. The personal names and the technical musical terms mentioned in the psalm superscriptions are paralleled elsewhere, primarily in 1 Chronicles (esp. 1 Chron 15—16), a postexilic composition. For example, the singers Heman, Asaph and Ethan, mentioned in 1 Chronicles 15:19, are named in the superscriptions of Psalms 50; 73—83; 88; 89. And the musical terms mentioned in 1 Chronicles 15:20-21, "alamoth" (ʿālāmôt) and

"sheminith" (šēminīt), appear in the superscripts of Psalms 6; 12; 46. As 1 Chronicles presents David as an exemplar of piety (in contrast to the more historical portrayal of David in 1-2 Samuel) and the one who instituted the singing of psalms (1 Chron 16:7), so these "historical" superscriptions encourage reading these psalms as models of Davidic prayer in the midst of real crises. "David" in 1 Chronicles and the psalm superscriptions thus becomes a symbol of the godly individual before Yahweh. Although it certainly is possible that David authored some psalms, they were preserved not to give us insights into the historical David but rather to show us how to speak to God. (For further discussion on the fit of psalms having historical titles with the events of David narrated in 2 Samuel and elsewhere, see Broyles 1999, 26-31; Childs.)

1.2. Closer Scrutiny of the Genre: Lament, Complaint, Petition or Prayer? "Psalms of lament" is the label most often applied to this genre because the lament motif usually constitutes the psalm's largest section. "Lament" is often used interchangeably with "complaint." Some scholars, such as E. Gerstenberger, label them "psalms of petition," arguing that the goal of such psalms is not simply to bemoan a hardship but also to obtain something from God, a desire that is expressed most directly in the petition section. Both designations, however, suffer the drawback of labeling the genre in terms of one of its constituent motifs, thus exaggerating the importance of the motif and obscuring the value of the others (see the table in 2.1. below). In other words, they are simply subcategories or parts of the larger whole. These labels may also be misleading. A lament may be thought of as mourning an unchangeable crisis, as at a funeral. Labeling the genre as "petition" may give the impression that these psalms are simply a listing of requests to God, which they are not. In addition, the formal petition may not be the clearest expression of a psalm's goal; in some lament psalms the petition is completely absent (Ps 77), and in others the appeal is expressed most clearly by other motifs, such as the lament itself (Pss 88; 89). Perhaps the most appropriate label for the genre is "psalms of prayer" (tēpillâ). This is the term used by the psalms themselves (see Pss 17; 86; 102, and note their respective superscriptions). In the terminology of the Hebrew psalms, "prayer" is the literary form distinguished from

“praise” (tēhillā), which would include the form-critical categories of “hymn” and “thanksgiving” (tôdā). “Prayer psalm” also has the advantage that, like the label “praise psalm,” it makes clear who is the addressee (laments and petitions can be addressed to anyone). Nevertheless, for the sake of continuity and clarity, this article will remain with the more traditional label of “psalms of lament.”

Careful observation of the lament psalms reveals a distinction between lament and complaint. Nearly a third of the lament psalms contain a lament against God, most of them corporate laments (on this topic, see Broyles 1989). These “God-laments” complain about God’s disposition—his wrath, rejecting, forgetting, hiding his face (“Why, Yahweh, do you reject my soul? Why do you hide your face from me?” [Ps 88:14]). Or they complain about his (non)intervention, whether he is actively hostile (“You have exalted the right hand of his adversaries; you have given all his enemies cause for rejoicing” [Ps 89:42] or passively indifferent (“Why, Yahweh, do you stand afar off; why do you hide in times of trouble?” [Ps 10:1]). The lament psalms containing a God-lament differ not only by the addition of this motif but also by the very character of their appeal. In the lament psalms that lack a God-lament, God is a third party to the distress, and so he is approached as helper and savior. Where the praise of God occurs in these psalms, it appears in its own right as praise. These psalms we may call “psalms of plea.” But in the God-lament psalms God is held partly responsible for the distress, and so they also challenge him to restore his favor. Where the praise of God occurs in these psalms, it stands in stark contrast to the lamentable present and thus serves to remind him of the praiseworthy acts that he should renew in the present. We should thus reserve the label “psalms of complaint” for these psalms and not apply it to the lament psalms in general. We must also be careful to observe that the psalms do not make such accusations about God flip-pantly, since they are reserved for occasions where the distress is either unduly prolonged (e.g., “How long?”) or is something near death.

2. Individual Laments.

2.1. Literary Motifs. Lament psalms of the individual generally contain the following literary motifs (see Table 1). H. Gunkel (46) considers Psalm 13 to be “the model of a ‘lament of the in-

Table 1. Individual Lament

1. Address and introductory petition	“O Yahweh” (Ps 13:1a), “Be gracious to me and hear my prayer” (Ps 4:1c)
2. Lament
a. I	“How long must I put anxieties in my soul?” (Ps 13:2a)
b. you (God)	“How long . . . ? Will you forget me forever?” (Ps 13:1a-b)
c. they (foe)	“How long will my enemy be exalted over me?” (Ps 13:2b)
3. Confession of trust	“But I in your loyalty have trusted” (Ps 13:5a)
4. Petition
a. for favor	“Look, answer me” (Ps 13:3a)
b. for intervention	“Give light to my eyes” (Ps 13:3b)
c. motive	“lest my enemy say, ‘I have prevailed over him’” (Ps 13:4a)
5. Vow of praise	“I will sing to Yahweh” (Ps 13:6)
6. Thanksgiving in anticipation	“for he has acted on my behalf” (Ps 13:6)

dividual' . . . in which the individual components of the genre step forth most clearly."

(1) Usually the address is simply God's name ("Yahweh" or "God") or an epithet or title ("my God"). The introductory petition is of a very general nature, aimed at getting God's attention.

(2) The lament may be expressed with three possible grammatical subjects: the speaker, who laments the *suffering; God, who is charged with negligence or hostile action; the enemies, who either cause or exacerbate the affliction. The distress is usually described in such a way as to evoke a response from Yahweh. Generally, the "I-lament" should evoke his pity, the "God-lament" his sense of obligation to help, and the "foe-lament" his anger. Among the psalms of the individual, the I-lament is prominent in those psalms that may be associated with sickness (esp. Pss 38; 41; 88). Mention is also made of emotional turmoil. In the rest, the foe-lament dominates, since the enemies appear to be the primary cause of distress. The enemies' actions usually consist of verbal assaults, either taunting or framing the psalmist with false accusations, or of actual physical assaults, where they seek the psalmist's life. The God-laments tend to be brief and in the form of a rhetorical question (as noted in Ps 13 above). Psalm 88 is a notable exception; seven of its verses are a God-lament in a declarative form.

(3) The confession of trust may predicate an attribute or action about God ("God is/will . . ."), or it may simply declare the speaker's own trust in God ("I trust/hope . . ."), as in Psalm 31:3, 5a: "For you are my rock and my stronghold; for your name's sake you will lead me and guide me. . . . Into your hand I commit my spirit." The former is very similar to the praise of God expressed in hymnic psalms (e.g., Ps 71:19). At least twenty-seven of the roughly thirty-nine individual laments contain this motif. A few psalms consist solely of this motif in an expanded form and thus are called "psalms of trust" (Pss 11; 16; 23; 62; 63; 91).

(4) The petitions usually first seek God's attention and favor and then request his intervention, whether to save the speaker and/or punish the enemies. The motives, or "motifs to motivate God to intervene," supplement the petitions with reasons and arguments as to why God should act on the speaker's behalf.

(5) In the vow of praise the speaker promises to praise God, presumably at a public offering of a thanksgiving sacrifice, subsequent to the deliverance. It is more regularly a part of the individual laments than of corporate laments. According to C. Westermann (1980, 43; 1981, 59-61, 75-78), in the Babylonian psalms the vow of praise "almost always" concludes individual laments but never corporate laments. A vow of praise is evident in twenty-three of the roughly thirty-nine individual laments (Pss 7; 13; 22; 27; 35; 40 = 70 (jussive); 42—43 [counted as one psalm]; 54; 56; 57; 59; 61; 64; 69; 71; 86; 109; 140; 142).

(6) The psalm may close with thanksgiving, which is sung in anticipation of an answer.

A few individual laments contain an assurance of being heard, which acknowledges that God has received the request and thus that deliverance is forthcoming (e.g., Ps 6:8-10). Many scholars believe that after the worshiper had expressed lament and petition, he awaited God's reply from a priestly-prophetic "oracle of salvation." These words were not included perhaps because psalms normally contain only words for the worshiper, and it is also possible that it was considered inappropriate to prescribe words for divine oracles. Traces of "salvation oracles" are found in Psalm 12:5, which compares with Isaiah 33:10-13 (for the pioneering work on this, see Begrich). Other lament psalms contain exhortations (e.g., Ps 27:14; 31:23-24; 55:22), which distinctly point to a congregational setting for their performance. These are comparable to the testimonies offered in thanksgiving (tôdâ) psalms.

The interpreter must be sensitive to the distinctive use of each of these motifs in context. Labeling is not enough. The function of motifs may vary according to context. For example, in terms of their grammatical form, the confessions of trust are very similar to praise: a positive action is predicated of God. But we must discern if the principal function of a confession of trust is simply to affirm the praise of God in the midst of distress (so Ps 54:4) or to remind Yahweh that he has an obligation toward the psalmist (so Ps 22:9-10 in the context of Ps 22:1-10).

In view of the criteria noted above, the following psalms may be classified as individual laments: Psalms 3; 4; 6; 7; 13; 17; 22; 25; 27; 31; 35; 38; 39; 40 (at least vv. 11-17); 41; 42—43; 51; 54; 55; 56; 57; 59; 61; 64; 69; 70; 71; 77; 86; 88; 102; 109; 139; 140; 141; 142; 143. The Psalms of Ascent are a postexilic prayerbook unto themselves, and these generally shorter psalms do not conform as clearly to the standard form-critical models. Among these, Psalm 120 and Psalm 130 can be read as individual laments. According to this reckoning, there are thirty-nine individual laments (counting Pss 42–43 as one psalm). Some commentators consider Psalm 41 to be an individual thanksgiving. Some would add Psalm 63 among the individual laments, but its lack of petition indicates that it shares more in common with the psalms of trust (the expression of longing for God in the opening verses is best characterized as a confession of trust, not a lament). Psalm 139 also has been regarded as an individual thanksgiving and also as a mixture containing wisdom and/or hymnic elements.

Most commentators regard Psalms 5; 26; 28 as individual laments, and some regard Psalms 36; 52 similarly. However, none of these psalms contains a formal lament. They do have clauses where opponents are the grammatical subject, but they do not threaten the speaker directly, nor is there any reference to victims. In fact, they are not identified as the “enemy” (’ôyēb); instead they are described in the terminology typical of the “wicked” (rāšā’), focusing especially on their deceitful speech. They are opponents not because of their direct threat to the speaker but rather on the basis of their moral and religious valuation. Moreover, each of these psalms makes explicit mention of the temple and implies that the speaker is present there, in contrast to the individual laments listed above. They also contain hints that the speaking “I” is not a lone individual in a special need; rather, he is one who speaks on behalf of the general class of worshipers in the regular liturgy. And these psalms contain indications of judgment where there is a parting of the ways: the “righteous,” who may enter the temple, and the “wicked,” who may not and are to be punished. They actually echo Psalms 15 and 24, which are liturgies of temple entry. In brief, they appear to give voice to a liturgist who represents the congregation and who responds to the priestly temple instruction as found in Psalms 15; 24. In other words, they were composed not for lone individuals in special circumstances of need (e.g., false accusation) but rather for a congregation in the regular liturgies of the temple. The speaking “I” is probably a liturgist speaking on behalf of the individual worshipers (see Broyles 2004).

In some I-lament psalms there is a fine line between the individual and corporate body. It is not clear whether they were originally intended for lone individuals or for an individual who speaks on behalf of fellow worshipers. Some use “we” language (Ps 4:6; 40:3, 5; 59:11). Others contain exhortations (Ps 27:14; 31:23–24; 64:10 [possibly]) or testimony/instruction probably addressed to a group in attendance (Ps 25:8–10, 12–15; cf. Ps 25:22). And some individual laments reflect corporate concerns (Pss 57; 61), such as social unrest (Pss 59; 64).

Laments are not limited to the book of Psalms. Passages such as the following are comparable to individual laments: Jeremiah’s so-called confessions (Jer 11:18–20; 12:1–4; 15:15–18; 17:14–18; 18:19–23; 20:7–12 [also note Jer 8:18–9:1; 10:23–25]); Lamentations 3; Habakkuk 1:2–4; 1:12–2:1; the speeches of *Job (for an analysis of prose laments embedded in narrative, see Miller, 337–57).

2.2. Subgroups. The “psalms of the accused” (esp. Pss 7; 17) contain images of one who is falsely accused, seeks “refuge” or asylum, and implores God’s vindication. Elsewhere in the OT one thinks of the “cities of refuge” (Ex 21:12–14; Num 35:9–34; Deut 4:41–43; 19:1–13; Josh 20:1–9). Deuteronomy 17:8–13 speaks of legal cases too difficult for the local judges (cf. Deut 16:18). They are to be brought to the temple, so the priests and the judge in office can render the verdict. According to 1 Kings 8:31–32, a person who sins against a neighbor is to take up an oath (perhaps one like Ps 7:3–5) before the temple altar. Yahweh is then implored to pronounce judgment. Yahweh is “to declare wicked/guilty the wicked/guilty” and “bring his way upon his head,” and he is “to declare righteous/innocent the righteous/innocent” and “render to him according to his righteousness.”

There are also “psalms of sickness.” According to K. Seybold, there are those laments with “certain reference to sickness” (Pss 38; 41; 88), those with “probable reference” (Pss 39; 69; 102) and those with “uncertain reference” (Pss 6; 13; 51). In some cases the sickness is perceived by opponents as judgment for sin, and so false accusation and alienation exacerbate the suffering.

In the traditions of the early church the “penitential psalms” include Psalms 6; 32 (a thanksgiving psalm); 38; 51; 102; 130; 143. Upon closer inspection, however, we discover that only Psalms 32; 51; 130 give concerted attention to sin and forgiveness as their chief issue. Psalm 51 is unrivaled in its expression of penitence and the need for inner transformation rather than simply a transformation of circumstances (e.g., enemies, sickness). On the other hand, Psalms 6 and 102 make no explicit mention of sin. Most of Psalm 38 concerns sickness and enemies, and most of Psalm 143 concerns being near death and under enemy attack.

A derivative from the individual lament psalm is the “psalm of trust” or “psalm of confidence,” which is simply an isolation and expansion on the motif of the “confession of trust” (see Confidence, Psalms of). The most notable example is Psalm 23.

3. Corporate Laments: Literary Motifs and Function.

The motifs found in the corporate lament psalms are similar to those found in the individual laments (see Table 2).

(1) The opening address to God may expand to include several divine titles or epithets (as here in Ps 80:1: “the one who leads Joseph like a flock, the one enthroned on the cherubim”).

(2) Generally speaking, the lament sections are longer and more developed in the corporate laments. The “we-laments” are comparatively infrequent, and when they do appear, they usually describe humiliation (e.g., Ps 79:4). Their foe-laments describe the respective distresses: conspiracy to wipe out God’s people (Ps 83), the destruction of Jerusalem and its temple (Pss 74; 79), murderous social violence (Pss 9–10) or agricultural dearth (Pss 85; 126). The dominant lament is against God. The God-laments are more frequent among the corporate psalms: nine of the roughly thirty-nine individual laments have them, while ten of the roughly twenty-three corporate laments have them. Each of these contains a verse or two of a God-lament in a question form similar to that found in the individual psalms, but half of them also contain extended sections of God-laments in a declarative form (e.g., “But you have rejected and refused; you have become furious against your anointed. You have repudiated the covenant of your servant; you have defiled his crown to the ground. You have broken down all his walls; you have made his fortifications a ruin” [Ps 89:38–40]). In several corporate psalms that contain a “reference to past saving deeds” (see immediately below) the lament is patterned after this language of praise. In other words, the lament is phrased as a reversal of the praise. In Psalms 9–10; 44; 89 extended sections of praise are recited, along with extended laments that mirror in reverse what is hymned in the praise sections. Psalm 9 recites the praise of God who rescues the oppressed and punishes the wicked, and Psalm 10 shows that for each point of praise there is a cor-

Table 2. Corporate Lament

1. Address and introductory petition	“Shepherd of Israel, give ear” (Ps 80:1–3)
2. Lament
a. we	“We have been a taunt to our neighbors” (Ps 79:4)
b. you (God)	“How long will you burn against the prayer of your people?” (Ps 80:4–6a, 12)
c. they (foe)	“and our enemies mock us” (Ps 80:6b, 13)
3. Reference to past saving deeds	“A vine from Egypt you uprooted; you drove out nations and planted it” (Ps 80:8–11)
4. Petition
a. for favor	“Turn, look from heaven and see!” (Ps 80:14a)
b. for intervention	“Attend to this vine” (Ps 80:14b, 17)
c. motive	“the shoot that your right hand has planted” (Ps 80:15)
5. Vow of Praise	“and on your name we will call” (Ps 80:18)

responding lament that describes the wicked abusing the oppressed with no apparent intervention from Yahweh. Psalm 44 recalls how Yahweh waged war on behalf of Israel's forebears and then laments how Yahweh now simply hands them over to their enemies. Psalm 89 begins singing of Yahweh's kingship and of his promises to exalt the Davidic dynasty but then laments how Yahweh has exalted the king's enemies.

(3) Confessions of trust are virtually absent in the corporate laments. In their place they often recite a reference to past saving deeds, which recalls God's deliverance from an analogous distress known from Israel's history (e.g., Ps 44:1-3). These are drawn from the corporate traditions concerning creation, the ancestors, the exodus, Yahweh, war, *Zion and the temple. When viewed in isolation, these references to past saving deeds are very similar to hymnic praises: God is the grammatical subject, and he performs a saving action. But their juxtaposition with the lament reveals a function very different from that of praise. In Psalm 44, for example, the reference to God's earlier saving deeds (Ps 44:1-3) brings to light the anomaly of God's present destructive action toward his people (Ps 44:9-16, 24-25). The reference to past saving deeds thus functions to remind Yahweh of what he should be doing presently, not to praise him for past actions. These references to earlier saving deeds differ from confessions of trust in the individual laments not only in form and content but also in function. In most cases the confessions of trust function in the psalm to affirm the relationship between Yahweh and the psalmist, but the references to earlier saving deeds function to draw out the contrast between Yahweh's past saving action and his present negligent or hostile action. They serve as historical precedents, arguing that God should now deliver as he had for past generations.

(4) The "hear" type of petition is frequent in individual laments but appears only once in corporate laments (Ps 80:1). Petitions among the latter psalms focus on intervention.

(5) The vow of praise does not stand out as an independent motif as clearly as in the individual lament psalms. Among the corporate laments, only Psalm 79 has the normal form of the vow (Ps 79:13). In other cases God's future praise is echoed in a petition ("Let the afflicted and needy praise your name" [Ps 74:21]) or lies within a result clause attached to a petition ("Revive us, so that we may call on your name" [Ps 80:18]; "Save us, Yahweh our God, and gather us from the nations, to give thanks to your holy name" [Ps 106:47]). (It is interesting to note that virtually all the *"thanksgiving psalms" in the Psalter are for individuals. It is possible that corporate thanksgiving was expressed through the regular hymns, or that for some unknown reason corporate thanksgivings did not make it into the 150 canonical psalms.)

In view of the foregoing criteria, the following psalms may be classified as corporate laments: Psalms 9—10; 12; 14; 44; 53; 58; 60; 67; 74; 79; 80; 82; 83; 85; 89 (also a royal psalm); 90; 94; 106; 108; 137; 144 (with royal adaptations). As noted above, the Psalms of Ascents form a unique collection within book 5 of the Psalter. Among these, Psalms 123; 126 can be read as corporate laments. According to this reckoning, there are twenty-three corporate laments (counting Pss 9—10 as one psalm), thus bringing the total number of lament psalms to sixty-two—by far the largest category of psalms. Some commentators consider Psalms 9—10 as an individual lament, others as an individual thanksgiving. Some commentators interpret Psalms 14 (= Ps 53); 58; 82 also as prophetic psalms. Psalm 67 has been read as a prayer for blessing or as a corporate thanksgiving, depending whether its verbs are seen to express statements (Hebrew imperfects) or wishes (Hebrew jussives).

"I" and "we" language in the psalms does not always clearly indicate whether a psalm originated out of individual or corporate usage. "I" could denote a representative liturgist, speaking on behalf of a congregation (see Mowinkel, chap. 7). And as I will argue later (see 4.3 below), some individual laments appear to have been adopted by the (post)exilic community to voice their corporate lament (see Lam 3). On the other hand, "we" language may not point to corporate usage if the individual speaker is simply voicing corporate solidarity with the people of God.

Outside the book of Psalms, passages such as the following are comparable to corporate laments: Isaiah 59:4-15; Jeremiah 14:2-9; Lamentations 5.

4. Traditions of the Individual and Corporate Laments.

A tradition is any belief or custom passed from generation to generation. In the OT these beliefs and customs are sacred, normative and generally associated with particular persons, events, places, institutions, symbols or rituals. Little attention has been given to the distinct forms of tradition to which the laments of the individual and the laments of the community appeal (except Albertz).

4.1. Corporate Traditions. The corporate laments draw from a variety of national traditions. First, these psalms appeal to historical traditions concerning the premonarchic period: the exodus (Ps 80:8-11) and Yahweh as warrior during the conquest (Ps 44:1-3) and the judges periods (Ps 83:9-12). In an oracle contained in Psalm 60 Yahweh exults as a victorious warrior, while the opening lament portrays him as now, ironically, waging war against his own people. Psalm 106 rehearses Israel's history from the period of Egyptian slavery to the judges. Occasionally, appeal is made to the "covenant," probably the Sinai covenant (Ps 44:17; 74:20; 106:45). Second, there are echoes of traditions from the early monarchic period: Yahweh's promise of a Davidic dynasty and empire (Ps 89:3-4, 19-37) and his choice of Zion as the location for his temple (Ps 9:11-14; 74:2; 79:1). Third, in the postexilic period, Psalm 85:1-3 appeals to the restoration from exile as an expression of Yahweh's forgiveness. Fourth, the ancient tradition of divine cosmic kingship, the God of the skies, forms the basis for Yahweh's appointment of Davidic kingship in Psalm 89 (Ps 89:1-2, 5-18). In Psalm 74 the reference to God as the "king" who vanquished "the sea" and "Leviathan" (Ps 74:12-17) initially appears to make little sense in a psalm that elsewhere focuses on the destruction of the temple—that is, until we recognize the larger tradition to which the psalm appeals. In this ancient Near Eastern tradition of divine kingship, after the God of the skies subdues the chaotic seas, the construction of his palace-temple is the climactic event. Psalm 74 thus implicitly appeals to God as the cosmic king to restore his earthly temple, his symbol of world order.

4.2. Individual Traditions. With a few possible exceptions that will be discussed below, the individual laments do not draw from the above traditions. They echo a much simpler piety, which may be summarized in their favorite divine title, "my God." Yahweh is hailed as the personal, guardian God, who answers when called upon. Of the fifty-five occurrences of "my God"

(ʾēlōhay and ʾēhī) in the Psalter, at least forty are clearly used in immediate connection with the psalmist calling, trusting or praising. The worshiper's implicit obligations are to "trust" (e.g., Ps 31:14), to "call" upon God when in distress, and to "praise" God once delivered (e.g., Ps 30:11-12). The divine obligation that surfaces repeatedly is to answer with deliverance (e.g., Ps 13:3; 22:2; 30:2; 38:15). Claims to having a special relationship with "my God" are not unique to Israel. But in the ancient Near East "my God" (i.e., my personal guardian deity) was simply one deity among many and certainly not the chief god (see, e.g., Prayer of Kantuzilis [ANET, 400-401] and Man and His God [ANET, 589-91]). In this light, we see that the claim to Yahweh/Lord as "my God" is remarkable. The personal, guardian deity of the worshiper is none other than Yahweh, the God of Israel, the Most High, the One incomparable to all spiritual beings.

The significance of this phrase is spelled out most clearly in Psalm 22, where we see the title closely associated with the psalmist's calling and expectation that "my God" should answer (Ps 22:1-2). The next eight verses make evident that the obligations upon worshipers of "my God" are "to trust" and, once delivered, "to praise." The intimacy of the relationship is most evident in Psalm 22:9-10, where Yahweh is described as "the one who drew me forth from the womb, the one who caused me to trust when upon my mother's breast. . . . Since my mother's womb you have been my God."

It is in times of extreme distress that one may best discern the bedrock of one's faith. In these laments that bedrock appears to be this "my God" theology, whereby the worshiper lives to trust, call upon and praise Yahweh. Yahweh is then expected to answer when called upon and especially to preserve his worshiper from premature death. In these laments there is little reference to specifically ethical obligations. This is not to say that *ethics had no role in individual religion, but rather that when one is at the edge of death, the key obligation that was essential to affirm was the relationship with "my God." (On the references to the corporate tradition of "covenant" in Ps 25:10, 14, see 7 below.)

4.3. The Combination of Individual and Corporate Traditions in the Exilic and Postexilic Periods. Surprisingly, the lament psalms show little integration of individual and national traditions.

Psalm 22:3-5 is a notable exception (on Pss 22; 51; 69; 77; 102, see immediately below.) We should expect the individual's experience of crisis and salvation to be related to that of the nation, as we see elsewhere in the OT. According to Deuteronomy 26:1-11, for example, when the farmer was to offer up his firstfruits, his confession consisted of the exodus and conquest traditions. But when the lament psalms of the individual argue for Yahweh to intervene, they do not appeal to the privileges of covenant or of being a citizen of Zion. Those lamenting oppression from enemies do not call on Yahweh to do to them as he did to the Egyptians. Perhaps most surprising is that the individual laments make no mention of Zion or Jerusalem or appeal to the special privileges of praying toward this holy site (see esp. 1 Kings 8:29-30, 35). A few reflect a particular attachment to God's dwelling place (without specifying its location) but give no clear indication that they were actually sung there (Ps 3:4; 27:4-6; probably Ps 57:1; 64:4). Otherwise, allusion to God's dwelling is simply a memory mentioned in the lament (Ps 42:4; 55:14) or a future hope mentioned in the vow of praise (Ps 35:18; 43:3-4; 54:6).

Corporate traditions are found in the individual laments of Psalms 22; 51; 69; 77; 102, but in each case they are found in a discrete section and show a particular affinity to the exilic or early postexilic periods. Both Psalm 51 and Psalm 69 reflect individual distress throughout until their closing verses, where attention turns specifically to Zion and its restoration (Ps 51:18-19; 69:34-36). Psalm 102:1-11 reads like a traditional individual lament, which is resumed in Psalm 102:23-24. But the intervening verses (Ps 102:12-22) affirm that Yahweh "will arise and have compassion on Zion," which now lies in "dust." Nations will fear him "when Yahweh has built Zion." Like these three psalms, Psalm 22 is a lengthy individual lament to which are attached praises or promises that Yahweh's attention to the needy will result in worship from Israel and the nations in generations to come (see Broyles 1999). Psalm 77 also opens with the traditional language of lament, except that it refers to God in the third person, thus sounding more like a brooding meditation than a prayer. God is not addressed directly until the second half, where he is praised for his saving deeds in the exodus. As the psalm develops in its final form, its central issue appears to be the contrast between God's mighty actions in the past and his apparent absence in the present. Although there is nothing in the psalm that ties it to a specific historical period, its appropriateness for the exile is evident. Because the corporate traditions in these individual laments appear to be later insertions, it is likely that earlier preexilic individual laments were used as vehicles of expression for the communities of the exilic period—for the exiles in Babylon and for those who remained in Palestine. Lamentations 3 is a clear example of this phenomenon. Using the literary form of individual lament, it laments the destruction of Jerusalem (see Lamentations 1: Book of).

5. Social Settings of Individual and Corporate Laments.

Most psalms, especially the psalms of temple entry, the hymns, the thanksgivings and the royal psalms (see Kingship Psalms), are replete with liturgical and ritual allusions. They frequently contain plural imperatives addressing a congregation or choir and references to musical accompaniment, to the Jerusalem temple and Mount Zion, and to sacrifices and processions. By contrast, the lament psalms, both individual and corporate, have comparatively few allusions to a congregation, *music or ritual.

The original setting of the corporate lament psalm probably was special crisis services called at the chief sanctuary of the nation in Jerusalem. The prayer by *Solomon at the temple's dedication provides that on occasions of battle defeat or drought, the people may "pray and implore favor . . . in this house" (1 Kings 8:33-36). Jehoshaphat's prayer, on the occasion of foreign invasion, actually invokes Solomon's words (2 Chron 20:5, 9). The prophet Joel, on the occasion of agricultural disasters, calls for the people to "lament" at "a solemn assembly" at "the house of the LORD" (Joel 1:13-16; 2:15-17, whose last verse actually echoes the lament of Ps 79:10). Even when the temple lay in ruins during the exile, there were scheduled services of lamenting and fasting (Zech 7:3-5; 8:18-23; cf. Jer 41:5).

Since the lament psalms of the individual lack allusions to the temple and its rituals and symbols, which is not the norm among the psalms, we probably should not assume that there were any ties to the Jerusalem temple. Given that some individual laments use the language of extreme sickness (Pss 38; 41; 88 [see Seybold]), we should not presume that the sick person must travel all the way to Jerusalem in order to have a lament psalm prayed on his or her behalf. Both E. Gerstenberger and R. Albertz have argued convincingly, both from within the Hebrew Bible itself and from ancient Near Eastern analogies, that the individual laments may have originally been performed in more private ceremonies overseen by a ritual expert, such as a Levite or a clan elder. Given our earlier observations that individual and corporate laments draw from two distinct streams of tradition that are not joined until the exilic period, it is likely that the individual laments were composed outside of official temple circles and probably reflect the piety of the common people, whose trust was in Yahweh “my God.” The Deuteronomic centralization of worship under Josiah in 622 BC may have been the factor that later brought the individual laments to Jerusalem and led to their inclusion into corporate worship. Then, after the demise of the temple and its liturgical services in the exile, these two streams of psalmody were merged into new prayers (as in Pss 22; 51; 69; 77; 102 [see 4.3 above]).

6. Significance for Spirituality and Theology.

Lament psalms can be numbered among the most disturbing passages of the Bible, until one actually encounters crisis, and then they can become the most comforting and helpful.

The psalms cannot be regarded as the “word of God” in the same way as the prophetic word, whereby God speaks to his people. But in them, Israel hammered out the most appropriate and effective ways of speaking to God. And they have been regarded by generations of God’s people as speech that is appropriate to God and thus a fair reflection of who he is. In this respect, they are the “word of God” for God’s people, as they are models for praying to him. They are thus a legitimate source for constructing an exemplary spirituality for God’s people and a theology about God. God is mirrored in these human words. Whereas the hymnic psalms present a theology “from above” (e.g., God’s majestic attributes), the lament psalms present a theology “from below”—that is, from a perspective of human need.

To unpack the spirituality of the lament psalms, we should respect not only their contents but also their literary form and function—that is, their genre. In this way, rather than selecting what features seem interesting and helpful from our perspective, we should remain truer to the emphases and priorities of the lament psalms themselves.

Their first literary motif is the address of God. Initially, there might seem to be little worthy of comment here because it is obvious that prayer, to be prayer, must be addressed to God. But this fixed convention within the lament genre should make clear that worshipers need to become intentional that in the act of praying they do nothing less than to seek an audience with the Most High. The frequency of the opening address, such as “O Lord,” and the introductory petition, such as “hear” (šēmaʿ) (or “give ear” [haʾāzînâ], or “give attention” [haqšîbâ]), indicates that the words that follow in the prayer are no mere meditation or soliloquy; they are meant to leave an impression on God in heaven. It is an obvious point but also one that makes all the difference: worshipers must consciously fix their minds on the one to whom they address their prayers.

The motif that is most foreign to modern Christian prayer is also the longest: the lament itself. Prayers today usually consist primarily of requests or petitions. But the lament psalms were no mere “business agenda” or “shopping list” telling God what to do. The laments testify to the value of simply telling one’s story to God. God is not portrayed simply as “Mr. Fixit”; he is the supreme listener. The image of God reflected in the psalms is one who is interested not only in healing but also in pain. Remarkably, they testify that God can be moved.

One must also be struck by their frankness, especially when complaint is addressed to God himself. The laments are unabashedly told from the worshipers’ perspectives. They are a reflection of their perceptions and feelings, not necessarily a synthesis of others’ viewpoints. They do not attempt to qualify their rhetoric or consider mitigating circumstances or other explanations. Thus, for example, this classic lament reflects a feeling of God-forsakenness: “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me? Why are you far from my cry for help, the words of my groaning? My God, I cry by day, but you do not answer” (Ps 22:1-2). But a later claim in the psalm shows that this lament is not, in fact, an accurate reflection and evaluation of the state of affairs when viewed in retrospect: “For he has not despised or disdained the affliction of the afflicted; and he has not hidden his face from him and when he cried to him for help he heard" (Ps 22:23). Also, the mere fact that the psalm prays to God at all mitigates the opening lament. These observations have obvious pastoral benefit. The psalms allow for a free vent to one's feelings. Remarkably, believers are not required first to screen them with a methodical "reality check" or to censor expressions not "theologically correct" before voicing them to God. In effect, God allows our feelings to be validated, even if in the final analysis they miss the mark. Reflected in these lament expressions is a deity who is not easily shaken or offended or who needs to be pacified. In other words, this is a God whom we can trust and toward whom worshipers can be vulnerable. The openness and frankness of the laments presuppose a relationship that is direct and personal. Even the complaint "Why do you hide your face?" (Ps 44:24) exhibits the high expectation of a "face-to-face" relationship with God. This invites forthrightness and candor, not averted eyes and politeness for its own sake.

These laments also exhibit a realistic faith, one that is bluntly honest with the realities of life but also takes the promises of God seriously. The faith reflected here does not try to deny reality (mind over matter) or to rationalize the dilemma away, nor does it reject God's word as ineffectual. It recognizes the gap between God's promises and human experience and believes that this dissonance should be presented to God for him to resolve.

In view of the foregoing observations, we must also be struck that these laments were not regarded as aberrations from the faith; they were part of the set prayers for the people of God. Questions and claims of betrayal were not relegated to private counseling sessions with an elder or priest but rather remained a part of authorized prayer services. Lament psalms, and individual laments in particular, compose the largest category of psalms, implying that distress and lament are not the exception to the experience of God's people. Regrettably, lament has been all but censored from most Christian worship services. By always stressing the positive, such worship alienates those suffering pain and depression. And shying away from lament produces unnecessary guilt and, ultimately, a superficial faith.

For us to come to terms with lament language, it is best that we understand its aim as both expressive and evocative, not merely informational. As words given to humans to speak in the midst of pain and distress, they seek to be true to the human perspective in the relationship. In other words, they display genuine feelings whether or not they are rational or theologically correct. They allow for the expression of emotions, not just facts. Since psalms are speech from humans to God, what is appropriate is determined not solely by who God is but also by who humans are, with all their limitations and weaknesses. These laments are thus true, not in the sense of teaching accurate theological information at every point but rather in the sense of being a true reflection of the divine-human encounter. They are thus the most explicit biblical testimony of the need for authenticity. (In the context of the human heart, the Hebrew term ʾemet is more accurately translated "authenticity" than "truth" in the sense of moral perfection: the "doer of righteousness" is defined as the "one who speaks with authenticity in his heart" [Ps 15:2]; and in the context of a confession of sin Ps 51:6 affirms that "authenticity you desire in the inner parts.")

In addition, lament language is evocative. It uses rhetoric to elicit a response of help from God, not necessarily to convey or obtain information. Lamenters asking, "Why do you hide your face?" would not be satisfied with reasons—they want God to stop hiding his face. And lamenters asking, "How long will you hide your face?" (Ps 13:1) would not be satisfied with a period of time—they are complaining that it has gone on long enough. It is not only the rhetorical questions that are evocative. A statement such as "You sold your people for a pittance, gaining nothing from their sale" (Ps 44:12) does not convey theological information but rather seeks to prod God to respond with horror at such an interpretation of events. This lament is similar to that of Moses when he intercedes for the people during the incident of the golden calf: "Why should the Egyptians say, 'With evil intent he brought them out to kill them in the mountains and to finish them off from upon the face of the land?'" (Ex 32:12). The petition and lament of Psalm 44:23 ("Awake! Why do you sleep, O LORD? Rouse yourself! Do not reject forever") is not theologically correct when viewed against the claim of Psalm 121:4 ("Behold, the keeper of Israel does not slumber nor sleep"). But later editors of the Psalter did not go back to censor or soften Psalm 44:23. It remains as legitimate rhetoric that speaks from the appearance of the circumstances.

The presence of petitions in lament psalms shows that lament was not lamentation over unchangeable circumstances, as at a funeral. Lament psalms do invite worshipers to vent their frustrations and pour out their feelings, but there comes a time to seek a way out. The petition motif indicates that these psalms seek change, and that they are based ultimately on promise, not doubt. They acknowledge that something is wrong and affirm that God can put it right. Some readers have characterized the praises as psalms of faith and the laments as psalms of doubt. On the contrary, the lament psalms exhibit faith under the most contrary circumstances.

The motives supporting the petitions and the overall aim of these lament psalms indicate that they “argue” with God. They offer reasons why God should intervene on the speaker’s behalf. This is most evident in those corporate laments that set God’s promises, echoed in reference to God’s earlier saving deeds, side by side with a lament describing the disaster (e.g., Pss 9–10; 44; 89). In this sense, the composing psalmists were theological lawyers arguing the people’s case before the Most High. These psalms do not evidence a passive faith that simply accepts circumstances as “God’s will”; rather, they show that the promises of God should be taken seriously and affirm that they should become manifest. Assumed here is that God can be moved not only emotionally, as expressed in the laments, but also by reason and by argument. In Psalm 6, for example, the appeal is threefold. First, it pits Yahweh’s “loyalty” (hesed) against his “wrath.” Second, it seeks to move him to pity and to heal by focusing on the intensity (e.g., “my bones shake in horror”) and duration (“how long?”) of the distress. Third, it seeks rescue from death so that God’s worshiper and God’s praise may continue.

The confessions of trust and the vows of praise make apparent that the ultimate goal of the lament psalms is the praise of God. Worshipers may vent their feelings and seek to get something from God, but they must also seek to give something back to him.

Finally, we may observe that lament is part of what helps faith grow. This may not be self-evident within the Psalter alone, since all that we have are the prayers themselves. We do not know their final outcome. Although not a formal lament psalm, Psalm 73 testifies to a deeper faith (esp. Ps 73:23-26) following the expression of lament (Ps 73:12-14). But the phenomenon of lament is prevalent elsewhere in the OT. It is evident in Mosaic *law/Torah, the Prophets and the Wisdom literature. Moses (Ex 3:1–4:17; 5:22–6:8; 32:1–34:35), Habakkuk and Job (keeping in mind God’s final assessment of Job’s speeches in Job 42:7-8) engaged in lament. And remarkably, their words represent some of the most profound breakthroughs in OT faith. Indeed, the plot development around these figures implies that God discloses some of his deepest revelations of himself in response to the frank language of lament (see Westermann 1974).

Several theological implications have already been noted above in connection with the spirituality of the lament psalms. We should also recognize, perhaps most importantly, that these psalms portray Yahweh as deliverer/savior and refuge. Such a proposition is hardly remarkable, except that it implies further that hardships and threats are more the norm to the believer’s life, not the exception. We should not presume that God is a guardian who spares his people from all encounters with difficulties and setbacks. The vow of praise that usually concludes lament psalms shows that praise is to be based on deliverance from distress. This notion is confirmed by the flip side of the individual lament psalm—the *thanksgiving of the individual (e.g., Pss 30; 116), which largely consists of a recitation of the earlier lament.

The conception of God as deliverer also impinges on the notion of God’s sovereignty. In the “psalms of plea” (i.e., lament psalms without a God-lament) no attempt is made to trace the distress back to God. As savior, he is third party to the distress; he is not portrayed as the controller of all events. Only in the more extreme “psalms of complaint” are questions raised about God’s role in the distress, whether that of indifference or hostility (and, surprisingly, rarely that of corrective discipline). In this connection, we should also recognize that the lament psalms presuppose that God can be moved and persuaded to intervene where he might otherwise not do so. These observations reveal remarkable divine condescension, an attribute often overlooked in theological discussions of divine sovereignty. God has the power and right to assert his sovereignty, but the lament psalms testify that he also chooses to condescend to his creatures. In a positive vein, he gives an audience to our prayers. In a vein that is positive but also potentially negative, he grants considerable autonomy or freedom to his creatures, even to the extent that they can become “enemies” and “the wicked,” who are the primary causes of distress in the psalms. Circumstances are not a telltale indication of God’s posture toward his people. The laments clearly attest that life is not always fair.

As noted above, however, the longest component of the lament psalm—the lament itself—testifies to God as the sympathetic listener. He thereby becomes a partner in our suffering. This divine empathy in some respects prefigures the incarnation, whereby God saves his people first by sharing in their predicament. The lament psalms profoundly disclose the character of God and his way of achieving salvation for his people.

In addition, by looking outside of the book of Psalms, we see that Yahweh not only listens but also answers. In Isaiah 40–55, for example, we hear echoes of laments. In the “trial speeches against Israel” Yahweh explains that the people’s lamentable condition is a deserved, deliberate judgment on their sin (Ps 44:10–11 and Is 42:22, 24; Ps 44:12–13 and Is 50:1). And in the “proclamations of salvation” Yahweh responds to their laments with a promise of salvation (Ps 44:12–13 and Is 52:3, 5; Ps 44:24 and Is 49:14; Ps 74:3–8; 79:1, 7 and Is 49:17, 19). By comparing Scripture with Scripture, we clearly perceive that Yahweh is a responsive deity. The many laments and complaints in the psalms, which have no answer there, are answered in the Prophets. He is one who provides reasonable answers to complaints (as in the trial speeches), and he is one who promises hope (as in the proclamations of salvation), lest his people despair.

7. Limits of Lament Psalms and the Biblical Trajectory for Their Reinterpretation.

Few books of the Bible are cherished more deeply than Psalms, especially for how it gives voice to our feelings about God and the experiences that we face. Yet, we must admit that the psalms have their own limitations, especially when we consider God’s progressive revelation that extends beyond this OT book. The main roots of psalmody lie in the preexilic period of Israel/Judah’s monarchy, where evil was identified primarily in the “enemies” and the “wicked,” and the solution was encapsulated in petitions such as “Deliver me,” “Crush them,” “May they be ashamed.” Militaristic images dominate, not only for the worshipers and their situations, but they are also applied to God as warrior (see Warfare Imagery).

It is in God’s judgment of the Babylonian exile and thereafter that Israel came to realize more fully that evil lies among the people of God. The Prophets had made clear that the human dilemma lies largely within; that is, the problems and tragedies that the people experience are, in part, consequences of their own attitudes and behaviors. Psalm 106, a corporate lament, closes with a postexilic petition: “Save us, Yahweh our God, and gather us from the nations” (Ps 106:47). This concluding verse (Ps 106:48 is actually the doxology closing off book 4 of the Psalter) rounds off a recital of Israel’s history of rebellion that begins with this confession of sin: “We have sinned with our forebears; we have committed iniquity; we have acted wickedly” (Ps 106:6). Similarly, Psalm 79, a corporate lament over the decimation of Jerusalem, offers a rare petition that acknowledges “iniquities” among the people of God (Ps 79:8). In Psalm 103:10 and Psalm 130:3–4, both postexilic (see Broyles 1999), the speakers own their “iniquities.” Similarly, Psalm 25 confesses “sins” as part of the human condition (Ps 25:7, 11, 18). Its reference to “covenant” (Ps 25:10, 14) is unique among individual laments, but its acrostic* structure and its attention to instruction (Ps 25:4–5, 8–9, 12) and other motifs of the wisdom tradition imply its relatively late date as a literary composition (see Broyles 1999; Craigie).

The final series of lament psalms in book 5, which consists primarily of postexilic psalmody, follows the same trajectory. These psalms recognize evil within the human heart, and some are distinguished by a reference to God’s “Spirit” (Ps 139:7; 143:10; also significantly Ps 106:33 MT). Psalm 139, with its lengthy reflections on Yahweh’s searching, pursuit and craftsmanship of the individual worshiper, closes with an acknowledgment that the worshiper may possess “disturbing thoughts” and a “hurtful way” within (Ps 139:23–24). Psalm 141 reflects the awareness that a worshiper’s heart may be tempted to evil (Ps 141:3–5). Here we also see that the temple symbols of “incense” and “evening sacrifice” are spiritualized, so to speak, as metaphors of prayer and the lifting of hands. Psalm 143:2, in fact, speaks of sin in universal terms: “Do not enter into judgment with your servant, for no one living is righteous before you.”

The later psalmody of Psalm 144, a corporate and royal lament, invites us to reinterpret earlier psalmody. Virtually the entirety of Psalm 144:1-11 is drawn from formulas found in earlier psalms, especially Psalm 18. In its original, pre-exilic context of the Davidic monarchy the militaristic imagery of Psalm 18 should be interpreted literally. But Psalm 144 (especially Ps 144:12-15) shows strong affinity to the postexilic period, when the province of Judah had no Davidic king or army under the Persian Empire. Thus, the militaristic language is reinterpreted and reapplied figuratively to point to the aggressive resolve that God's people must maintain against the forces that threaten their security.

Psalm 51, an individual lament, can be read as a “Davidic” prayer against the backdrop of 2 Samuel 11—12, but its main petition section is remarkably unique in the Psalter and shows its strongest affinities to the postexilic penitential prayer found in Isaiah 63:7—64:12 and to the exilic “new covenant” passages of Ezekiel 36:24-32; Jeremiah 24:7; 31:31-34 (contrition of heart is also exceptional among later psalms and the third section of Isaiah: Ps 51:17; 147:3; Is 57:15; 61:1; 66:2). Psalm 51 is unrivaled as a confession of sin, with the inner conscience instructed by God and in its interest in inner transformation rather than a transformation of circumstances (such as sickness or enemies).

It is in these passages that Israel squarely encounters sin and the need for inner transformation. The penitence reflected in the postexilic prayers of Psalm 106; Isaiah 63:7—64:11; Nehemiah 9 contrast sharply with the protests raised in the preexilic laments of Psalms 44 and 89. These later passages also raise expectations about a more immediate encounter with God, particularly through the agency of his “Holy Spirit” (Ps 51:11; 143:10; Is 63:10-11, 14; Ezek 36:27). Such revelations about the Holy Spirit, the universal reality of human sin—among both “the righteous” and “the wicked”—and the possibility of inner transformation are, of course, consummated in the NT. Personal transformation thus becomes a possibility not only for the people of God but also for the “enemies” (Mt 5:44).

See also CULT, WORSHIP; PSALMS; FORM CRITICISM; IMPRECATION; IMPRISONMENT IMAGERY; LAMENTATIONS I: BOOK OF; SALVATION AND DE-

LIVERANCE IMAGERY; SUFFERING; THANKSGIVING, PSALMS OF; THEODICY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. A. Aejmelaeus, The Traditional Prayer in the Psalms (BZAW 167; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1986); R. Albertz, Persönliche Frömmigkeit und offizielle Religion: Religionsinterner Pluralismus in Israel und Babylon (CThM 9; Stuttgart: Calwer, 1978) 23-49; J. Begrich, “Das Priesterliche Heilsorakel,” ZAW 52 (1934) 81-92; C. C. Broyles, The Conflict of Faith and Experience: A Form-Critical and Theological Study of Selected Lament Psalms (JSOTSup 52; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989); idem, Psalms (NIBC 11; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1999); idem, “Psalms Concerning the Liturgies of Temple Entry,” in The Book of Psalms: Composition and Reception, ed. P. W. Flint and P. D. Miller Jr. (VTSup 99; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004) 248-87; W. Brueggemann, “From Hurt to Joy, from Death to Life,” Int 28 (1974) 3-19; idem, “The Costly Loss of Lament,” JSOT 36 (1986) 57-71; B. S. Childs, “Psalm Titles and Midrashic Exegesis,” JSS 16 (1971) 137-50; P. C. Craigie, Psalms 1-50 (WBC 19; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); E. S. Gerstenberger, Der bittende Mensch: Bitritual und Klagebed des Einzelnen im Alten Testament (WMANT 51; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1980); idem, Psalms: Part 1, with an Introduction to Cultic Poetry (FOTL 14; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); idem, Psalms: Part 2; and Lamentations (FOTL 15; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); H. Gunkel, Einleitung in die Psalmen, completed by J. Begrich (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1933); W. W. Hallo, “Lamentations and Prayers in Sumer and Akkad,” in Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, ed. J. M. Sasson (4 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995) 3.1871-82; O. Keel, Feinde und Gottesleugner: Studium zum Image der Widersacher in den Individualpsalmen (SBM 7; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1969); idem, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (London: SPCK; New York: Seabury, 1978) 61-109; H.-J. Kraus, Theology of the Psalms (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1986); P. D. Miller, They Cried to the Lord: The Form and Theology of Biblical Prayer (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship (2 vols.; Oxford: Blackwell, 1962); K. Seybold, Das Gebet des Kranken im Alten Testament (BWANT 99; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1973); C. Westermann, “The Role of Lament in the Theology of the Old Testament,” Int 28 (1974) 20-39; idem, The Psalms: Structure, Content and Message (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1980); idem, Praise and Lament in the Psalms (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1981); E. Zenger, A God of Vengeance? Understanding the Psalms of Divine Wrath (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1996).

C. C. Broyles

LAMENTATIONS 1: BOOK OF

The book of Lamentations offers a window into the struggle of the people of God in the wake of the fall of Jerusalem and demise of the kingdom of Judah. The book presents a series of poems that express the grief of the community using language, imagery, forms and theology in line with Hebrew traditions of mourning and *suffering. The struggle expressed in these poems is communicated through contrasting voices: female and male, individual and corporate, bitter and penitent, suppliant and prophetic. The book attempts through the *acrostic style in Lamentations 1–4 to articulate exhaustively the pain of the fall of Jerusalem and provides through the elaborate and copious third poem a way forward through a penitential response to Yahweh's grace. In the end, however, these goals are frustrated by the endurance of suffering, which in the final pericope leads to the abandonment of the acrostic pattern and to the erratic swings between confidence in Yahweh's sovereignty and uncertainty over Yahweh's grace.

1. Authorship and History
2. Genre and Setting
3. Literary Features and Structure
4. Content of Each Poem
5. Theological Traditions and Themes
6. New Testament

1. Authorship and History.

1.1. Authorship. In contrast to the Hebrew Jewish canonical traditions, which placed Lamentations among the Ketubim (Writings) and, as the scribal tradition developed, ultimately among the five *Megillot (scrolls) to be read at the major festivals (*Ruth, *Song of Songs, *Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, *Esther), the Greek Jewish canonical traditions placed Lamentations between Jeremiah and Ezekiel—that is, among the Prophets. This association with the prophets is probably related to the unique superscription that prefaces the book in the Greek tradition, which clearly links the poems to the period immediately after the *destruction of

Jerusalem and identifies Jeremiah as the one responsible: “And it was after Israel had gone into exile and Jerusalem had been laid waste, that Jeremiah sat weeping and composed this lament concerning Jerusalem, saying. . . .”

This connection to Jeremiah may have been suggested by the Chronicler's note in 2 Chronicles 35:25 that Jeremiah composed laments for Josiah, but this note says nothing about the laments related to the fall of Jerusalem. Literary connections have often been identified between Lamentations and Jeremiah (cf. Lam 2:14 with Jer 5:31; Lam 2:22 with Jer 6:25; Lam 3:14 with Jer 20:7; Lam 3:15, 19 with Jer 9:14; 23:15; Lam 3:48–51 with Jer 14:17; Lam 3:53 with Jer 38:6; Lam 4:17 with Jer 2:36), suggesting to some that Jeremiah authored the book. Many have questioned this conclusion, noting that the perspective and ideology of some of the sections of Lamentations stand in tension with the message of a prophet who consistently predicted and justified God's punishment of Judah (cf. Lam 4:17–20 with Jer 2:18; 37:5–10; Lam 1:10 with Jer 26:4–6).

Probably the greatest challenge to Jeremianic authorship for Lamentations is found in the dominant structuring device throughout the book: the acrostic. Similar to Psalms 9–10 and Psalm 119, four of the five chapters in Lamentations are written as an acrostic, which means that each verse (Lam 1–2; 4), or series of verses (Lam 3), begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet (twenty-two letters). Lamentations 5 contains twenty-two verses but is not written in acrostic. The order of the alphabet in these poems, however, is not identical. Lamentations 1 contains the traditional order of the Hebrew alphabet, where the sixteenth and seventeenth letters are ordered ‘ayin/pê. In contrast, Lamentations 2–4 contains the order pê/‘ayin. Evidence from ancient abecedaries reveals that both arrangements of the alphabet were acceptable in Israel, but it is difficult to imagine a single person using two different orders of something as basic as an alphabet. This suggests that there is not a single genius behind these compositions, but rather that they represent poems used in a common liturgical setting over a period of time.

1.2. Date. This, however, does not mean that the book is unrelated to the prophet Jeremiah and the period in which he lived. Despite the assertion of some (e.g., Provan 1990, 130–43; 1991, 11-12) that the book cannot be set accurately into a particular historical context, most scholars agree that the book reflects the conditions of the final years of the kingdom of Judah in the sixth century BC. In this period Judah experienced the destruction of its city and temple, the exile of its king and upper class, and the massacre of its population. Although the vivid poetry in Lamentations may merely reflect the genius of an imaginative poet and probably shows that these poems were composed by trained liturgists, there is no reason to deny that this vividness arose from the personal observation of the poet(s) or that liturgists could compose authentic expressions of pain for the community (contra Westermann, 100-101). F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp (1998) places Lamentations in the period of 586-520 BC based on linguistic evidence as well as intertextual connections to Isaiah 40—55. Additionally, some discern within the book a voice that echoes the voice of Jeremiah or at least the book that bears his name (Lee; Boda 2003), evidence that suggests that the connection of this book to the prophet Jeremiah in the Greek tradition may be legitimate.

Although most scholars place these compositions in the period immediately after the fall of the kingdom of Judah in 587/6 BC (see Westermann, 54-55, 104-5), there has been disagreement over the chronological order of the individual poems that now comprise Lamentations. For instance, S. B. Gurewicz (19-23) argued for the order Lamentations 3, 2, 4, 1, 5; R. Gordis (126-27) for the order Lamentations 2/4, 3, 1/5; and R. Brandscheidt for the order Lamentations 2, 1, 5, 4, 3. Many have argued that Lamentations 5 is the latest of the compositions (see Lee) because of its employment of temporal references such as “forever” (nēṣaḥ) and “so long” (lē’ōrek yāmim), but such evidence is not that helpful because expressions such as these are not only stereotypical in liturgical compositions (see Ps 9:19; 10:11; 23:6; 44:24; 93:5) but also relative to the composer’s perspective. Additionally, the reference to the “sins of the ancestors” in Lamentations 5:7, which to some suggests a later generation looking back on the generation at the fall of Jerusalem, is not a secure argument because such appeals are evident in compositions arising in the last decade before the fall of Judah (cf. Jer 31:29; Ezek 18:2). The dominant perspective of the poems is that of life in the land in the wake of the fall of Jerusalem rather than life in exile, suggesting that it arose among those who had remained in the land after the fall of the city (although there is some interest in the plight of exiles in Lam 4:15 and especially Lam 4:22).

2. Genre and Setting.

The placement of Lamentations among the five Megillot (scrolls) secured its role at the enduring commemoration of the destruction of the Second Temple on the ninth day of Ab in AD 70. This connection to the destruction of the temple probably was seen as appropriate in a later era because of a much earlier precedent in the life of the Jewish community. The link between this book and the demise of the temple and state has informed scholarly discussion over the genre and liturgical setting of the poems in the book (see Megillot and Festivals).

2.1. Genre. H. Gunkel saw the various poems as examples of either the funeral dirge (Lam 1; 2; 4), individual lament (Lam 3) or communal lament (Lam 5) (see Lament, Psalms of).

2.1.1. Funeral Dirge. After Gunkel, some focused on the funeral dirge as the key form that underlies the poems found in Lamentations (see Jahnow; Lee). Examples of actual funeral dirges are found in 2 Samuel 1:17-27; 3:33-34; Jeremiah 9:16-21; 38:22, with forms modified for poetic use as short prophetic sayings (Is 1:21-23; Jer 9:10, 17-22; Ezek 26:17-18; Amos 5:2) or as popular sayings (Is 14:4-21; 23:1-14; Ezek 19:1-9, 10-14; 27:2-36; 28:11-19; 32:12-16) (see Westermann, 6). The influence of the funeral dirge is usually associated with Lamentations 1; 2; 4.

The employment of female voices and female *personification at various points in Lamentations also suggests the funeral dirge form, since in ancient cultures (including Israel) dirges and laments were often chanted by *women, some of whom engaged in mourning rites as a vocation (2 Chron 35:25; Is 22:12; Jer 7:9; 9:17; Ezek 32:16 [for ancient Near Eastern evidence, see Block, 210, cf. Olyan, Pham]). In ancient societies premature death was most often associated with males, especially in relation to war. Furthermore, males were older than their female marriage partners and, as in modern societies, typically preceded their mates to the grave. This explains why widows and the fatherless were regularly identified as the most vulnerable within ancient cultures and why women were concerned to bear a son to protect their interests later in life (see Ruth 4; 1 Sam 1). Thus the most common occasion for funeral dirges was defeat in war (e.g., 2 Sam 1:17-27). Its counterpart probably was the “call to joy” (Aufruf zur Freude), a form associated with victory in war and usually elicited from women (Is 12:4-6; 54:1; Hos 9:1; Joel 2:21-24; Zeph 3:14; Zech 2:14; 9:9 [see Crüsemann, 55-65]). Interestingly, this form is addressed to “Daughter Zion” in Zephaniah 3:14; Zechariah 2:14; 9:9 and to a female inhabitant of *Zion in Isaiah 12:6, and it is employed in a satirical way in Lamentations 4:21-22.

2.1.2. Lament. Others, however, have questioned the extent of the funeral dirge’s influence on Lamentations (see Westermann, 6-11). For these scholars, the lament forms of the Psalter dominate the book, with elements from both individual and communal lament evident throughout Lamentations. As Westermann noted, these forms dominate Lamentations 3; 5, but they are also present throughout the other poems.

2.1.3. Mesopotamian City Dirge. Beginning with the suggestion by S. N. Kramer (see Dobbs-Allsopp 1993, 2-10; Lee, 37 n. 163) that Mesopotamian laments over ruined cities and their sanctuaries were the foundation for the poems in Lamentations, the majority of scholars have highlighted close connections between these two forms (see, e.g., Kraus; Gwaltney; Gottwald 1962; Hillers; Ferris; Westermann; Dobbs-Allsopp 1993; 2002; Bouzard). These Mesopotamian forms were used as part of ceremonies accompanying the refounding and restoration of sanctuaries destroyed by war (see Boda 2006; Boda and Novotny). The Mesopotamian forms link the destruction of a key city and/or its sanctuary to a decision made in the divine assembly and resulting in the abandonment of the sanctuary by its gods. The destruction is carried out by the god Enlil through a human enemy. In the Mesopotamian laments usually the city’s patron goddess challenges this decision of the assembly and laments the demise of city and sanctuary (see Dobbs-Allsopp 1993; 2002).

2.1.4. Form. Dobbs-Allsopp (2002, 9) has identified key connections between these Mesopotamian dirges and the book of Lamentations but is careful to note that Lamentations is a “thorough translation and adaptation” of the genre put to a different use. Unlike the Mesopotamian laments, Lamentations employs typical Hebrew poetic devices, clearly identifies the culpability of the people, replaces the destructive god Enlil with Yahweh and the weeping goddess with the personified city of Jerusalem (Daughter Zion), and avoids any mention of the return of Yahweh or restoration of the temple and city (Dobbs-Allsopp 2002). Therefore, in the view of these researchers, the Mesopotamian city dirges may have provided a precedent for some of the elements found in Lamentations, but even so, there is evidence that the form has undergone significant changes and may only echo a general tradition of lamenting over the destruction of a city and sanctuary. This evidence, along with the fact that the Mesopotamian city dirges typically incorporated lament prayers, could explain why other traditional Hebrew forms, including the funeral dirge (cf. 2 Sam 1:17-27 with Lam 1:1-11, 17; 2:1-12; 3:48-51; 4:1-6) and the individual (Lam 1:12-16, 18-22; 2:20-22) and communal (Lam 3:40-47; 5) lament can also be identified within Lamentations (see Gunkel; Westermann). Of the five poems, only Lamentations 1; 2; 4 are usually seen as reflecting strongly the genre of the city dirge, with Lamentations 3 dominated by individual lament with some communal lament, and Lamentations 5 comprising a communal lament.

Although it is possible that all three form traditions (funeral dirge, individual lament, communal lament) have informed the book of Lamentations (see O’Connor, 10-11), there may be another way to explain the connections at least to the Mesopotamian city-dirge tradition. The use of a goddess to express the predicament of the city and sanctuary within the Mesopotamian city-dirge tradition suggests that it has been influenced by the ubiquitous phenomenon of female mourning rites in ancient societies. Therefore, it is likely that the ancient Mesopotamian liturgists envisioned a *divine council akin to human society, with a female figure crying out against the merciless acts of a male-dominated divine council as she mourned the loss of the city and sanctuary. Motifs shared by the city dirges in Mesopotamia and the poems in Lamentations, therefore, can be attributed to female mourning rituals that ancient societies shared in common.

2.2. Setting. Even if a link can be established between the Mesopotamian city dirges and the poems in the book of Lamentations, the absence of any reference to the rebuilding of the sanctuary and the return of the deity shows clearly that the setting in which the poems in Lamentations arose is different from the ceremonies related to temple refoundation that gave rise to the Mesopotamian city dirges (see Dobbs-Allsopp 2002; contra Gwaltney). The fixation with the events surrounding the fall and destruction of the city and its aftermath in Lamentations suggests that the setting of the poems is most likely the series of days of fasting that arose immediately after the fall of Jerusalem. Evidence for mourning rites associated with the destroyed sanctuary and possibly also the fallen state is found in Jeremiah 41:4-9. There, eighty men from Shechem, Shiloh and Samaria, displaying rites associated with mourning (shaved beards, torn clothes, self-inflicted wounds, weeping), are depicted in the seventh month as on their way to “the house of Yahweh” with grain offerings and incense. While this evidence comes from the beginning of the Babylonian exilic period, Zechariah 7–8 speaks of the practice of four fasts during the “seventy years” of the exile, fasts that took place in the fourth, fifth, seventh and tenth months (Zech 7:5; 8:19). That these fasts were related at least to the temple in Jerusalem (as Jer 41) is suggested by the fact that a delegation from Bethel approaches the priests and prophets of “the house of the LORD Almighty” (Zech 7:3) to determine whether they should now come to an end with the second temple nearing completion. Some have suggested that the four fasts were related to a complex of four key events related to the fall of the Judean kingdom (Wellhausen, 103-7; Ackroyd, 207 n. 122): tenth month (588 BC), the siege of Jerusalem began (2 Kings 25:1; Jer 39:1); fourth month (587 BC), Jerusalem’s walls were breached, and leadership fled (2 Kings 25:3-7; Jer 39:1-10; 52:6-11); fifth month, Jerusalem was destroyed (2 Kings 25:8-12; Jer 52:12-16); seventh month, Gedaliah was assassinated (2 Kings 25:25-26; Jer 41:1-3). Since the delegation from Bethel in Zechariah 7 originally only asked about one fast (fifth month [Zech 7:3]), which was expanded first to two fasts (fifth, seventh months) in Zechariah 7:5 and later to four fasts (fourth, fifth, seventh, tenth months) in Zechariah 8:19, it is possible that these fasts reflect a diversity of rites observed by different communities within the land and possibly also in exile.

Other compositions that may have arisen in this liturgical setting are now found in the Psalter (Pss 44; 60; 74; 79; 83; 106; 123; 137) as well as in narrative books describing the practice of penitential prayer in the Persian period (Ezra 9; Neh 1; 9; Dan 9). That the same context is suggested for both laments and penitential prayers, the latter coming to dominate the liturgical expression of the Persian period community, is bolstered by close literary and ideological connections that have been established between the book of Lamentations and this tradition of penitential prayer (see Boda 2003). Close associations also between Lamentations 3 and the prophetic lament liturgy found in Jeremiah 14:1–15:4 (which most likely occurred during the reign of Zedekiah, last king of Judah) suggests a common liturgical setting for prayers of lament and penitence throughout the sixth century BC.

3. Literary Features and Structure.

Observations on the original setting of the individual compositions provide some insights into the historical circumstances that gave rise to these compositions as well as the basic building blocks of the individual poems. However, such insights need to be supplemented by analysis of the final canonical shape of these originally independent prayers. This involves paying attention to key rhetorical features employed throughout the collection (see Rhetorical Criticism).

3.1. Personification. One regular rhetorical feature is personification, usually related to the city of Jerusalem, but also to its gates, walls, roads and surrounding kingdom. By personifying these physical structures and regions, the composers were able to vividly describe the pain and express the heart cry of the people. There is a sense that the poets send out God’s “precious” Zion to intercede for them, hoping that she may have greater success to gain Yahweh’s ear (see Lanahan, 43-45; Heim).

3.2. Voice. Another rhetorical feature has been highlighted especially in the work of N. Lee, who analyzes the modulating voices throughout the book (although see Westermann, 65, 139-40). Lee identifies the two dominant voices in Lamentations with two voices that can be discerned in the book of Jeremiah: Jeremiah the prophet and a female poet voicing personified Jerusalem’s pain (called “Jerusalem’s poet”). This dialogue, which Lee (42) traces back to “different poetic singers who performed their composed songs in response to one another,” is prominent in Lamentations 1; 2; 4. The female perspective of Lamentations 5 (cf. Lam 5:14b with Lam 5:15a) and links to the earlier cries of personified Jerusalem (cf. Lam 5:17 with Lam 1:13, 22; Lam 5:17 with Lam 4:17) suggest that the communal lament of Lamentations 5 has taken over the role of the personified Jerusalem (Lee, 196).

Lee's study, building off of the earlier work of W. F. Lanahan on Lamentations and especially C. Mandolfo on biblical laments, highlights the importance of sensitivity to the various voices that appear throughout the book (cf. Boase). No two poems are alike in the structuring of the voices. One needs to be alert to the impact that employing various voices has on the reading of the poem. W. C. Kaiser (44) picks this up in his analysis of Lamentations 1 when he notes, "It would appear that emotional and psychological progress is realized in this poem as it moves from a more distant, descriptive 3rd-person reporting in verses 1-11 to a more personal, private 1st-person speech in verses 12-22." The poem begins with an external point of view, observing the pain of the personified city, only to give voice to the suffering woman who discloses her inner turmoil. In Lamentations 3 this inner turmoil is presented from the outset and is expressed not by the city personified as a woman but rather by a suffering man (warrior?). The interplay of various voices provides more opportunities to express and experience the pain of the crisis.

3.3. Acrostic. A third key rhetorical feature in Lamentations is the acrostic that structures four of the five poems (Lam 1—4). This literary device appears at several points in the OT (Pss 9—10; 25; 34; 119; 145; Prov 31:10-31; Nah 1) as well as in other Semitic literature, including Akkadian, Ugaritic, Paleo-Canaanite (see Westermann, 98-100; O'Connor, 12). Several purposes have been offered to explain the use of acrostics, including fulfilling magical rites, aiding memorization of poems, emphasizing completeness, or producing aesthetically pleasing literature (Westermann, 98-100; O'Connor). Although there may be multiple purposes behind the use of acrostics, most likely they communicate that the poem expresses totality, and in the case of Lamentations both the total devastating effect of the destruction and the total expression of the pain of those who experienced it.

3.4. Structure. The uniqueness of each poem's acrostic pattern in Lamentations 1—4 shows that each poem in the book has its own integrity. Nevertheless, some have questioned whether the book merely represents an anthology of poems or instead was designed as an integrated collection. Although recognizing independence for each poem, J. Renkema (1988; 1998), for instance, argues for a collection united by connections between equivalent letter stanzas in the four poems (e.g., elements in stanza 'ālep in Lam 1 may be found in stanza 'ālep in Lam 2, 3 or 4). Although some examples seem to support his view, the evidence is not consistent across all stanzas in all poems. D. J. Reimer draws on modern grief theory in order to trace the thematic structure of Lamentations, concluding that the book moves through the stages of isolation (Lam 1), anger (Lam 2), bargaining (Lam 3), depression (Lam 4) and acceptance (Lam 5). Reimer is careful to admit that these themes are only "dominant" in their respective poems, but these various stages appear at various points in all the poems—a point that led earlier scholars to abandon such psychological theory as a basis for structural analysis (see Moore; Joyce). Especially difficult to this structure is Reimer's identification of the final poem with its conclusion vacillating between confident hope and embittered lament.

The fact that Lamentations 3 has not only the longest poem but also the most complicated acrostic brings rhetorical focus onto this poem within the collection. The reader should take note of the message of this central poem, which represents the height of rhetorical artistry and so also, as O'Connor (13) has said, functions as "the book's most important chapter, the book's theological heart." This central poem points to a theological solution to the present suffering, one that accentuates Yahweh's grace and justice (Lam 3:1-40). This solution, however, is seriously challenged in the remainder of the book, first in the central poem itself (Lam 3:41-66) and then in the two poems in Lamentations 4—5. This latter is emphasized recently by I. W. Provan (1991), Dobbs-Allsopp (1997) and T. Linafelt, who remind readers that the book does not end with Lamentations 3:40. The final two chapters contain poems shorter than Lamentations 1—3, with Lamentations 5, although containing twenty-two verse units as the first four poems, abandoning the acrostic pattern. This suggests that Lamentations 5 signals the end of this completeness—something made clear in its painful and dialectal conclusion. As O'Connor (13-14) has argued, Lamentations 4—5 “move back to themes of grief, anger, and despair, and smother hope like a blanket over fire.” Therefore, overall flow of the book of Lamentations suggests an honest struggle in the midst of the darkness of the exile, even if it foreshadows the dominant solution that will be adopted within the community in the wake of the exile (cf. Ezra 9; Neh 1; 9, Dan 9; see Boda 2003).

4. Content of Each Poem.

4.1. Lamentations 1.

- 1:1-11 Third-person description of Zion's suffering
- 1:12-16 First-person singular cry of Zion to onlookers (the nations?)
- 1:17 Third-person description of Zion's suffering and its cause
- 1:18-19 First-person singular cry of Zion to the nations about Yahweh's innocence and Zion's rebellion
- 1:20-22 First-person singular cry of Zion to Yahweh about the nations' guilt (malediction)

The first poem in the collection draws the reader in to view the pain of personified Zion from an external vantage point through third-person speech (Lam 1:1-11). At the outset no attribution of guilt is given; the reader is allowed to experience the shocking pain before realizing in Lamentations 1:5 and again in Lamentations 1:8-9 that Zion's sins lie behind this suffering. This first section introduces a key emphasis of this poem: the solitude of the city—first seen in the opening declaration that she is “deserted” (Lam 1:1) and then in the refrain in Lamentations 1:2, 10: “There is none to comfort her.” At two points in this opening section the poet uses the device of apostrophe to give voice to the suffering city, both consisting of cries for Yahweh to look upon her affliction (Lam 1:9, 11). The detachment of the first half of the poem is soon lost in the second half as Lamentations 1:12-16 shifts to the first-person voice of the city as she pleads with those who pass by. Zion echoes the themes already introduced in the third-person section, admitting her sins and repeating the refrain of solitude in Lamentations 1:6, “no one is near to comfort me,” already encountered in Lamentations 1:2, 10. For a moment in Lamentations 1:17 the perspective shifts to the external with a short third-person description of Zion that again reminds the reader “There is no one to comfort her.” But then the poem plunges back into the bitter first-person pain of Zion that carries the poem to its conclusion (Lam 1:18-22). In this concluding section Zion first speaks to the nations about Yahweh (“Listen all you peoples” [Lam 1:18-19]), admitting that her suffering was caused by her rebellion; Yahweh was innocent. Her speech then engages Yahweh directly, expressing her distress, admitting her culpability, but also highlighting the pain that the nations have inflicted upon her (Lam 1:20-22). Here again the refrain emerges in Lamentations 1:21: “There is no one to comfort me.” This section calls for vengeance upon those who have treated Zion so brutally, suggesting that although the discipline was deserved, the nations have violated God's justice in their actions.

4.2. Lamentations 2.

- 2:1-10 Third-person description of the suffering of Zion and Judah
- 2:11-12 First-person singular lament over Zion's suffering
- 2:13-19 First-person singular address to Zion
- 2:20-22 First-person singular lament of Zion to Yahweh

The second poem begins, as did the first poem, with a detached third-person description of the pain (Lam 2:1-10) focusing on the city (Daughter Zion) and kingdom (Daughter Judah) as women. The final verse in this section (Lam 2:10) describes rites connected to mourning and lament (sit on ground in silence, sprinkle dust on heads, put on sackcloth, bow heads to the ground), and this introduces the first-person voice that emerges in Lamentations 2:11-12, the voice of one who weeps while observing the pain of the people. In Lamentations 2:13-19 this or another first-person voice turns and addresses Daughter Zion directly, highlighting the city's suffering, attacking the false prophets, and identifying the defeat of the enemy as the planned judgment of Yahweh. As in Lamentations 2:10, so Lamentations 2:18-19 depicts the rites of mourning and lament of the people and even encourages such rites from the “walls of Daughter Zion”

(Lam 2:18-19). In response to this invitation a voice of prayer addresses Yahweh directly to conclude the poem in Lamentations 2:20-22. In the first poem Daughter Zion asked onlookers this searching question: “Is any suffering like my suffering that was inflicted on me, that the LORD brought on me in the day of his fierce anger?” (Lam 1:12). In this second poem Daughter Zion addresses this to God directly: “Whom have you ever treated like this?” (Lam 2:20).

4.3. Lamentations 3.

- 3:1-20 First-person singular lament over God’s judgment on the male poet
- 3:21-24 First-person singular transition to hope
- 3:25-39 Application of the poet’s experience to all people
- 3:40 First-person plural cohortative invitation
- 3:41-47 First-person plural communal response
- 3:48-51 First-person singular lament over God’s judgment on the people
- 3:52-66 First-person singular thanksgiving and request (malediction)

The third poem begins with the expression of a “man” (geber [Lam 3:1]) who has experienced suffering at the hand of God (Lam 3:1-17) and explains to the reader how he moved from despair (Lam 3:18-20) to hope (Lam 3:21-24). This situation is then applied universally to anyone who experiences similar circumstances (Lam 3:25-39)—a presentation that prompts an invitation to the entire community to examine their ways and return to God (Lam 3:40). A response to this invitation by the people comes in Lamentations 3:41-47, and this response appears to reject the observation in Lamentations 3:39 that no one has a right to complain against God. This communal complaint argues that although they have admitted their sin, God has not responded to them (Lam 3:41-47). Furthermore, a first-person common singular voice follows in Lamentations 3:48-51, weeping over the despicable state of the city-community, and functions as a transition to a closing individual prayer in Lamentations 3:52-66, which contains both thanksgiving and request.

The source of hope for the afflicted man (Lam 3:1-20) in Lamentations 3 is clearly his consideration of the gracious character of God in Lamentations 3:21-33. Here the composer uses the breadth of Hebrew lexical stock of “grace,” including “covenant loyalty” (hesed [Lam 3:22, 32]), “compassions” (raḥmīm [Lam 3:22, 32]), “faithfulness” (’ēmūnā [Lam 3:23]), “goodness” (tôb [Lam 3:25, 26, 27]) and “salvation” (tēšû’ā [Lam 3:26]). In light of such grace, the poet encourages the people to wait (qwh [Lam 3:25]), seek (drš [Lam 3:25]), wait silently (yhl Hiphil + dūmām [Lam 3:26]), bear the yoke (ns’ + ’ol [Lam 3:27]), sit alone (yšb + bādād [Lam 3:28]), be silent (dāmām [Lam 3:28]), put the mouth in the dust (ntn + be’āpār pihū [Lam 3:29]), give the cheek to the smiter (ntn + lēmakkēhū lehī [Lam 3:30]), and be filled with reproach (šb’ + bēherpā [Lam 3:30]). Such actions describe the posture of passively accepting the discipline of God but also of awaiting God’s deliverance.

This all leads to a presentation of the justice of God in Lamentations 3:33-38, teaching that God “does not afflict with delight” (Lam 3:33) but rather disciplines because of sin (Lam 3:37-38). In light of this, there is no room for complaint when being punished for one’s sins (Lam 3:39). Thus in this central poem it is a consideration of the grace of God that is to prompt an acceptance of the discipline of God and a refusal to complain in light of one’s culpability. It is this that leads to the key penitential invitation in Lamentations 3:40. Nevertheless, the frustration of the people comes out in Lamentations 3:41-47 as they declare that they admit their sins (Lam 3:41), and yet God has not pardoned, and they continue to live in their suffering. The repetition of the term “destruction” (šeber) in Lamentations 3:47-48 shows that the first-person common singular voice (possibly the same one that began the poem in Lam 3:1-20) feels this frustration of the people (Lam 3:48, 51) and is committed to interceding for the people (Lam 3:49) until Yahweh looks upon their suffering (Lam 3:50). This same voice closes off the poem with a prayer of request for himself as well. In this closing prayer the poet calls for God’s justice and vengeance on his enemies (Lam 3:59-66) based on his own past experience of God’s salvation (Lam 3:52-58).

4.4. Lamentations 4.

- 4:1-10 First-person singular description of the need of the people
- 4:11-16 Third-person description of the - need of the people

- 4:17-20 First-person plural lament over disaster
- 4:21-22 Second-person prophetic announcement of judgment and salvation

The fourth poem begins in Lamentations 4:1-10 with a first-person description of the need of the people (see “my” in Lam 4:3, 6, 10), focusing especially on the common fate of those considered most (children) and least (princes) vulnerable. In this section the focus is on the deplorable circumstances rather than on the cause of the crisis. With Lamentations 4:11-16 the poem shifts into a third-person description of the need, now identifying the cause as Yahweh’s fierce anger against the sins of prophets and priests (Lam 4:13). In Lamentations 4:17-20 a first-person plural voice, possibly the voice of the prophets and priests who now “grope through the streets as if they were blind” (see Lam 4:14), emerges. This voice articulates the failure of both international allies (Lam 4:17) and national leadership (Lam 4:20) to rescue them in their time of need. The poem ends (Lam 4:21-22) with what appears to be a prophetic announcement of judgment and salvation, declaring a curse against the rival Daughter Edom, who takes pleasure in their demise, and promising Daughter Zion that her punishment will one day end.

4.5. Lamentations 5.

- 5:1 Request: call for Yahweh’s attention
- 5:2-18 Lamenting the predicament, admitting guilt
- 5:19 Motivation for God to act
- 5:20 Questions (borderline accusations)
- 5:21 Request: call for Yahweh’s action
- 5:22 Motivation for God to act

What is immediately noticeable about the final poem in the book is that even though it consists of twenty-two units, it is not an alphabetic acrostic, as are the other four. There are other points of divergence. It is the shortest of all the poems and the most consistent, employing a first-person plural voice throughout. The poem contains the elements typical of the communal laments of the Psalter, with the depiction of the predicament (Lam 5:2-5, 8a, 9-16a, 17-18), the assignment of the cause of the predicament (Lam 5:6-7, 8b, 16b, 20, 22), the motivations for help

(Lam 5:19, 21) and the request for help (Lam 5:1, 21). In the prayer of Lamentations 5 there is no denying that the cause of the predicament is traced to the sin of the people: both in the previous generation (Lam 5:6-7) and (most likely) in the present generation (Lam 5:16b). However, the questions of Lamentations 5:20 (“Why do you always forget us? Why do you forsake us so long?”) and the suggestion of Lamentations 5:22 (“unless you have utterly rejected us and are angry with us beyond measure”) imply that the endurance of the predicament is God’s responsibility. What is missing is blame directed at the enemies that dominates much of the earlier poems in Lamentations. The request forms a bracket around the entire poem with three imperatives for God’s attention in Lamentations 5:1 (“remember . . . look . . . see”) and two imperatives for God’s action in Lamentations 5:21. The community longs for God to cause them to return to God in covenant relationship, a return that has both physical and spiritual dimensions, and to renew their community’s experience to the glory days of the past. The final stanza of Lamentations 5 brings the book as a whole to an awkward end, vacillating as it does back and forth between the postures of hope (Lam 5:19, 21) and frustration (Lam 5:20, 22). It is not surprising in the darkness of the exile that the book ends without acrostic style and with the declaration of frustration. As Linafelt (60) has argued, “The book is left opening out into the emptiness of God’s nonresponse. By leaving a conditional statement dangling, the final verse leaves open the future of the ones lamenting.”

5. Theological Traditions and Themes.

5.1. Suffering and Redemption. Taken as a whole, these diverse poems provide theological resources for suffering and salvation (see Kaiser). The present pain is identified as a loss of rest (Lam 1:3) and inheritance (Lam 5:2), an absence of comfort (Lam 1:2, 9, 16b, 17a, 21) and especially a loss of covenant relationship with Yahweh through the loss of the religious structures that sustained this relationship (Lam 2:1, 6, 7, 9c). This pain has affected all levels of society, whether rich/poor, male/female, young/old, all aspects of society (physical, social, spiritual) and even ongoing generations of society (past and present).

The poems express the reason for pain in various ways. At times the frustrated voice of the poets suggest that this pain, or at least its enduring quality, is purposeless, the result of an angry God whose wrath will never be satisfied (Lam 5:20, 22). At many places it is clearly seen as discipline for sin (Lam 1:5, 8-9, 14, 18, 20; 2:14; 3:39-42), even though the amount of suffering seems to be out of proportion to the sin of the people, pain at a level unknown to humanity (Lam 1:12; 2:20). Lamentations 3:40 suggests that there is a purifying role as the people speak of examining and testing their ways. Of course, the cause of the pain is often linked to the wiles of enemies taking advantage of the people's plight (Lam 1:21-22; 2:16; 3:52-66; 4:21-22; 5:2, 8), even if this opportunity was provided by Yahweh's legitimate judgment (Lam 1:15, 17; 2:17; 4:13).

The cause of the suffering is linked to the three classic reasons found in the biblical lament tradition: self, enemy, Yahweh. The various poems consistently identify the supplicants as responsible for their own pain due to their rebellion against God. The enemies often become the subject of the lament. Yahweh is regularly identified as playing an active role in the suffering that has been experienced, but this is carefully nuanced with the qualification that this action was justified because of the sins of the community.

The request in the various prayers is dominated by calls for Yahweh (e.g., Lam 1:11, 20; 2:20-21) or passing nations (e.g., Lam 1:12, 18, 21) to give attention to the need of the people, for God to uphold their cause (Lam 3:59), and for God to wreak vengeance on their enemies (Lam 1:22; 3:64-66; 4:21-22). At times voices describe or exhort the people or city to cry out to Yahweh (Lam 2:18, 19), to call for relief (Lam 3:55-56), to confess and repent from their sin (Lam 3:40-42), to wait upon Yahweh by submitting to the suffering (Lam 3:19-30), even though at other times such cries are considered rejected by Yahweh (Lam 3:8). In Lamentations 5 the request becomes far more explicit and practical, calling at the outset (Lam 5:1) for Yahweh to give attention to their past circumstances and their present disgrace, and at the end (Lam 5:21) for Yahweh to restore their relationship with him and renew their life as in "days of old."

Strategies for surviving the present pain appear at various places in the poems. Key is accepting culpability for this suffering—that is, admitting one's sins and even the sins of former generations (Lam 5:7, 16) and absolving Yahweh of any wrongdoing (Lam 1:16). At a couple of places Yahweh's character is highlighted as essential for living through the pain. In Lamentations 3:19-39 the poet encourages a submissive posture toward the suffering, one demanded by the culpability of the sufferer. In this section the poet clings to the gracious character of Yahweh, and it is this that gives him hope. Additionally, it is Yahweh's sovereignty over the affairs of the world that infuses meaning into the present discipline (Lam 3:34-38). In Lamentations 5:19 the community clings to the eternal and sovereign character of Yahweh. Surviving the pain, however, will mean not just a theological reorientation but also a spiritual reorientation, one that involves crying out to God (Lam 2:18-19), a cry that ultimately involves not complaint (Lam 3:39) but self-examination, repentance and confession (Lam 3:40-42).

5.2. Zion, Retribution and the Character of Yahweh. One cannot miss the central role that *Zion theology plays in the book of Lamentations (see Albrectson, 219-30; Ackroyd, 46; Renkema 1998, 44-45). This theology was foundational to Judah's kingdom and thus emphasized by royal circles and the priestly groups that the monarchy supported. The first move that *David made as king of the united tribes was to shift his capital from Hebron, which lay in the heart of Judah's tribal territory, to Jerusalem, which lay on the northern border Judah shared with Benjamin and was a city without traditional attachment to any tribe. This shift helped David control the northern tribes, uniting the nation geographically at Jerusalem and personally in the Judahite king. The connection between the name "Zion" and Jerusalem is uncertain, but it appears that it predates David's arrival in the city, a part of which was called "the fortress of Zion" (2 Sam 5:7; 1 Chron 11:5). Another dimension of Davidic kingship also appears to be associated with the pre-Davidic Jerusalemite tradition, that of Melchizedek's priestly kingship (cf. Gen 14:18-19 with Ps 110). As various psalms reveal (Pss 2; 46; 48; 76; 84; 87; 122; 137), the Zion tradition depicted Jerusalem as the place of God's dwelling and seat of his rule over all the earth, replacing and exceeding the Canaanite seat of divine rule on Mount Zaphon. So exalted was this city that it is seen as invincible, secure from any attack of the enemy—a belief that led to an emphasis on the inviolability of Zion, lulling the people into a false confidence based on God's past choice of Jerusalem and its sanctuary. The prophets will confront this royal ideology, predicting that Zion would be destroyed (Jer 26:18-19; cf. Jer 7:1-15; Mic 3:12) and its sanctuary abandoned by Yahweh (Ezek 10) because of the rebellious behavior of the people. It is understandable, then, why the Zion tradition is expressed so strongly in the book of Lamentations as the people struggle with the promises related to the city of Jerusalem and its sanctuary. In the book it is the Zion tradition that is associated with the most bitter elements of lament and pain.

Combined with this Zion theology, however, is a strong *retribution theology that has been informed by the Deuteronomistic and prophetic traditions and accepts that the fall of Jerusalem has been caused by the covenantal rebellion of the people against Yahweh (see Brandscheidt; Gottwald 1962, 66, 70; Albrectson, 230-37; Ackroyd, 46; Hawtrey, 78). Thus, even when the lament is most bitter, there is always an admission of the culpability of the people.

However, the greatest hope in the book is not related to either the election theology of Zion or the retribution theology of Deuteronomism or prophetism; rather, it is only with the abandonment of Zion theology in the central chapter that one is shown the way forward for the community. In place of Zion theology is the key grace tradition (Lam 3:21-33), linked especially to the ancient rehearsal of Yahweh's "name" found in Exodus 34:6-7 (cf. Num 14:18; Ps 86). This fixation on the "character creed" is followed immediately in Lamentations 3:33-39 with a theology of divine discipline closely allied with Deuteronomic and possibly *wisdom theology (see Gottwald 1962, 71-72), which reminds the people that God does not "afflict with delight" (Lam 3:33) or approve of injustice (Lam 3:34-36) but rather dispenses discipline because of sin (Lam 3:37-38). Instead of complaint (Lam 3:39), the people are encouraged to examine their ways and turn back to God and confess their sins (Lam 3:40). This solution is informed by the agenda set out in several key earlier texts: Leviticus 26:40-41; Deuteronomy 30:1-4; 1 Kings 8:46-51, even though these texts look to the exilic community and Lamentations to the community left behind in the land (see Boda 2003).

The book of Lamentations showcases the theological struggle of a people living in the wake of the greatest crisis in their history. In it we observe the intersection of several key theological streams that rose to prominence in the closing moments of the kingdom of Judah. As the central poem and conclusion to the book make clear, the theological struggle would remain unresolved in the short run.

6. New Testament.

Lamentations is not the final word on the Jewish community in Jerusalem. The fasts with their laments and penitential prayers at the temple site would be replaced by the renewal of the festal calendar with the reconstruction of the second temple in the late sixth century BC. But Zion would never regain the glory of the preexilic era, and the dominance of the penitential prayer tradition after the exile is testimony to the fact that the people longed for more. This longing can be discerned among that cast of faithful characters who appear in the temple courts early in the gospel of Luke (Zechariah and Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna, Joseph and Mary) as they await the *messiah and identify him in Jesus. This Jesus would enter into his people's suffering in a land still under foreign occupation. He would express his pain over and compassion for Jerusalem and yet predict its downfall (Luke 13:34-35). Like Lamentations 3, his message would be focused on God's gracious invitation to repentance. He would even cry out in lament to God ("My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" [Mt 27:46; Mk 15:34]) on that hill outside of Zion as he hung dying for the sins of his people and those of the whole world. It is interesting to see how the Zion traditions are resurrected in the NT to describe the new experience of grace for the people of God in Jesus Christ, who functions in the order of Melchizedek, as these traditions are transferred to the "heavenly Jerusalem," which is both a present reality (Heb 7:1-9:28; 12:22-23) and a future hope (Rev 21).

See also FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; LAMENTATIONS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; LAMENTATIONS 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; ZION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: A. Berlin, Lamentations (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Lamentations (IBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); R. Gordis, The Song of Songs and Lamentations: A

- Study, Modern Translation and Commentary* (rev. ed.; New York: KTAV, 1974); D. R. Hillers, Lamentations (2nd ed.; AB 7A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1992); H. J. Kraus, Klagelieder (Threni) (3rd ed.; BKAT 20; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1968); I. W. Provan, Lamentations (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); J. Renkema, Lamentations (HCOT; Leuven: Peeters, 1998). Studies: P. R. Ackroyd, Exile and Restoration: A Study of Hebrew Thought of the Sixth Century B.C. (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1968); B. Albrektson, Studies in the Text and Theology of the Book of Lamentations, with a Critical Edition of the Peshitta Text (STL 21; Lund: Gleerup, 1963); D. I. Block, The Book of Ezekiel: Chapters 25-48 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); E. Boase, The Fulfilment of Doom? The Dialogic Interaction between the Book of Lamentations and the Pre-Exilic/Early Exilic Prophetic Literature (LHB/OT 437; New York: T&T Clark, 2006); M. J. Boda, "The Priceless Gain of Penitence: From Communal Lament to Penitential Prayer in the 'Exilic' Liturgy of Israel," HBT 25 (2003) 51-75; idem, "From Dystopia to Myopia: Utopian (Re)visions in Haggai and Zechariah 1-8," in Utopia and Dystopia in Prophetic Literature, ed. E. Ben Zvi (PFES 92; Helsinki: Finnish Exegetical Society; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2006) 211-49; M. J. Boda and J. R. Novotny, eds., From the Foundations to the Crenellations: Essays on Temple Building in the Ancient Near East and Hebrew Bible (AOAT; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, forthcoming); W. C. Bouzard, We Have Heard with Our Ears, O God: Sources of the Communal Laments in the Psalms (SBLDS 159; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997); R. Brandscheidt, Gotteszorn und Menschenleid: Die Gerichtsklage des leidenden Gerechten in Klagl 3 (TThSt 41; Trier: Paulinus-Verlag, 1983); F. Crüsemann, Studien zur Formgeschichte von Hymnus und Danklied in Israel (WMANT 32; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1969); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Weep, O Daughter of Zion: A Study of the City-Lament Genre in the Hebrew Bible (BibOr 44; Roma: Editrice Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1993); idem, "Tragedy, Tradition, and Theology in the Book of Lamentations," JSOT 74 (1997) 29-60; idem, "Linguistic Evidence for the Date of Lamentations," JANESCU 26 (1998) 1-36; P. W. Ferris, The Genre of Communal Lament in the Bible and the Ancient Near East (SBLDS 127; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992); N. K. Gottwald, "Lamentations," Int 9 (1955) 320-38; idem, Studies in the Book of Lamentations (rev. ed.; SBT 14; London: SCM Press, 1962); H. Gunkel, Einleitung in die Psalmen: Die Gattungen der religiösen Lyrik Israels (HKAT; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1933); S. B. Gure-wicz, "The Problem of Lamentations 3," ABR 8 (1960) 19-23; W. C. Gwaltney Jr., "The Biblical Book of Lamentations in the Context of Near Eastern Lament Literature," Scripture in Context II: More Essays on the Comparative Method, ed. W. W. Hallo, J. C. Moyer and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1983) 191-211; K. Hawtrey, "The Exile as a Crisis for Cultic Religion: Lamentations and Ezekiel," RTR 52 (1993) 74-83; H. Heater, "Structure and Meaning in Lamentations," BSac 149 (1992) 304-15; K. M. Heim, "The Personification of Jerusalem and the Drama of Her Bereavement in Lamentations," in Zion, City of Our God, ed. R. S. Hess and G. J. Wenham (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999) 129-69; H. Jahnnow, Das hebräische Leichenlied im Rahmen der Völkerdichtung (BZAW 36; Giessen: Töpelmann, 1923); P. Joyce, "Lamentations and the Grief Process: A Psychological Reading," BibInt 1 (1993) 304-20; W. C. Kaiser, A Biblical Approach to Personal Suffering (Chicago: Moody, 1982); S. N. Kramer, Lamentation over the Destruction of Ur (AS 12; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1940); W. F. Lanahan, "The Speaking Voice in the Book of Lamentations," JBL 93 (1974) 41-49; N. Lee, The Singers of Lamentations: Communities under Siege, from Ur to Jerusalem to Sarajevo (BIS 60; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002); T. Linafelt, Surviving Lamentations: Catastrophe, Lament, and Protest in the Afterlife of a Biblical Book (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000); C. Mandolfo, God in the Dock: Dialogic Tension in the Psalms of Lament (JSOTSup 357; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); C. W. Miller, "The Book of Lamentations in Recent Research," CBR 1 (2002) 9-29; M. S. Moore, "Human Suffering in Lamentations," RB 90 (1983) 534-55; K. M. O'Connor, Lamentations and the Tears of the World (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2002); S. M. Olyan, Biblical Mourning: Ritual and Social Dimensions (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004); X. H. T. Pham, Mourning in the Ancient Near East and the Hebrew Bible (JSOTSup 302; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999); I. W. Provan, "Reading Texts against an Historical Background: The Case of Lamentations 1," JSOT 1 (1990) 130-43; D. J. Reimer, "Good Grief? A Psychological Reading of Lamentations," ZAW 114 (2002) 542-59; J. Renkema, "The Literary Structure of Lamentations (I-IV),” in The Structural Analysis of Biblical and Canaanite Poetry, ed. W. van der Meer and J. C. de Moor (JSOTSup 74; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1988) 294-396; J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israels (6th ed.; Berlin: Reimer, 1905); C. Westermann, Lamentations: Issues and Interpretation (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994).

M. J. Boda

LAMENTATIONS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND

Although communal mourning is relatively uncommon in the modern West, we do experience it from time to time. For example, the surprise attacks in 2001 on New York and Washington and the aborted attack that ended in Shanksville, Pennsylvania, made the date “9/11” notorious. That calamity shook the American people, and nations around the world publicly expressed their grief over it.

Public, communal grieving was common in the ancient Near East (Morgenstern, 164-66). When an individual died, the community would gather to grieve, and “professional” keeners were engaged to lead the funereal expressions. Similarly, when a calamity befell an entire community, they would join in public mourning and engage members of a guild of professional mourners to lead the community in lamentation. The guild was responsible for composing and performing dirges that expressed the grief of the entire community. In the Ugaritic “Poem of Aqhat,” for example, these professional mourners are referred to as bkyt (“weeping women”), mššpdt (“women who lead in mourning”) and pzgm gr (“men with mutilated skin”).

The Hebrew Bible reports that Israel shared these public expressions of grieving. Israel also had its professional keeners (J(Jer 9:17), both male and female (2 Chron 35:25). At times, some in Israel even engaged in self-mutilation, common in the ancient Near East (Jer 16:6; 41:5). However, this was proscribed by Torah (Deut 14:1), as a countercultural measure to set Israel apart from its neighbors. The best examples of ancient Near Eastern lament literature are Sumerian.

1. Sumerian Context
2. Sumerian City Laments
3. The Eršemma, Balag and Šuilla Laments
4. Summary

1. Sumerian Context.

Although a significant volume of Sumerian literature has survived from the mid-third millennium BC, the classic communal laments emerge after the demise of the neo-Sumerian Empire (c. 2000 BC). The earliest copies of lamentations over the destruction of a city are several Sumerian poems preserved from the Old Babylonian period (c. 2000-1600 BC) as part of a scribal curriculum until the last quarter of the eighteenth century BC.

At its most basic, the content of a communal lament expresses complaint as well as sorrow and grief over some perceived calamity and an appeal for deliverance to deity. From the perspective of their worldview, the destruction of a city(-state) could be explained only as the result of the arbitrary, often capricious anger of one or more of the great gods. And against that assumption, it seemed that the city’s patron deity had consequently abandoned its domain. It is apparent that such a composition was intended to be used by or on behalf of a community as they reflected on and commemorated a socially and religiously devastating event.

2. Sumerian City Laments.

2.1. Introduction. To date, six distinctive Sumerian city laments have been discovered and published. Three of these are considered major compositions: the Lamentation over the Destruction of Ur, the Lamentation over the Destruction of Sumer and Ur, and the Lamentation over the Destruction of Nippur. Two others are the Lamentation over the Destruction of Sumer and Uruk and the Lamentation over the Destruction of Eridu. The sixth, very poorly preserved, is a lament for Ekimar.

The classic city laments were written primarily in the main Sumerian dialect, emegir. However, the emesal dialect is also used in the laments over Nippur, Eridu and Uruk. Because some texts use emesal when a woman is speaking, it is sometimes referred to as women’s language. However, emesal also appears to have been the language of the gala-priesthood. The gala-priests included both males and females. They chanted laments and so were associated in the literature with female keeners and mourners. One Old Babylonian text claims that the gala-priesthood was established by the god Enki to chant “heart-soothing laments for Inanna.”

S. Kramer was the first to publish a critical edition of a city lament. Given points of similarity with the biblical book of Lamentations over Jerusalem, he titled it the Lamentation over the Destruction of Ur. However, it is important to remember the observation by S. Tinney (19) that “the nature of genres and texts is highly culturally specific . . . and it would be fallacious to assume that the significance of texts in such divergent cultures as ancient Israel and ancient Mesopotamia can be mapped onto the other by the semantic trick of using the same modern term to denote both.” The point is that, as far as we know, none of these compositions are formally designated as a “lamentation” by their composers. M. Green (1975, 283) concludes, “The city-lament could be another body of literature like myth or epic, which was not viewed by the Sumerians as a single genre.”

2.2. The Ur Lament. The Lamentation over the Destruction of Ur (ANET, 455-63; COS 1.166:535-39) is a 436-line literary masterpiece. It commemorates the fall of Ur to the Elamite and Sua people during the reign of Ib-bi-Sin (c. 2006 BC). The opening kirugu (musical notation for a section) consists of a long list of gods who have abandoned their respective cities. Then the goddess Ningal, Ur’s patron deity, laments the ruin of her city when the god Enlil did not hold back his devastating “storm.” She cries out, “My city has been destroyed; my house too has been destroyed; O Nanna, Ur has been destroyed, its people have been dispersed” (lines 249-50). The god Nanna is pled with to restore the city. He is implored to protect the city and keep its citizens “pure.”

It is evident that the lament was composed within one generation or so of the event. Characteristic of the neo-Sumerian city laments, it is written primarily in emegir, the main Sumerian dialect. However, the first two of its eleven kirugus are in the emesal dialect, which seems to have been reserved in Sumerian literary texts for female subjects.

2.3. The Sumer and Ur Lament. The reconstituted text of the Lamentation over the Destruction of Sumer and Ur is 519 lines long, making it longer than the Lamentation over the Destruction of Ur. In this composition the gods have decreed that the divine powers of Sumer be overturned and the city and temple be destroyed. Then, in the aftermath of its destruction, Enlil decrees that Ur be rebuilt and flourish.

Analysis of more than thirty tablets and fragments indicates that the five kirugus of this lament have fairly well preserved roughly eighty percent of the original composition. Mention of the capture of Ib-bi-Sin (lines 35-37) suggests that this lament is roughly contemporary with the Lamentation over the Destruction of Ur.

2.4. The Nippur Lament. The lament over Nippur is a 323-line composition divided into twelve kigurus. The Nippur lament stands out because there is a shift in theme and tone between the two parts of the composition. The first part is descriptive of destruction and the *suffering that accompanied it; the second part is a hymn of praise to the king and the god Enlil for restoring Nippur.

This lament was composed at Nippur or Isin during the reign of Išme-Dagon (c. 1953-1934 BC), written to be performed in Enlil’s temple by the gala-priest and the king.

2.5. The Uruk Lament. The lament over the destruction of the city of Uruk and its temple consists of some 251 lines divided into twelve kirugus, half of which are badly damaged or missing. It begins by describing the gods’ decision to destroy the city, whose population has become too numerous and a nuisance to the gods. So the gods created a monstrosity that terrorized the city and destroyed it. In the final kirugu Išme-Dagon pays obeisance to the goddess Inanna, “Lady whose greatness is vaster than the mountains.” He offers to serve her as her steward and prepare a great sacrifice to her. He pleads with her to intercede with the great Anunna-gods on behalf of him and the city.

2.6. The Eridu Lament. The lament over the destruction of the city of Eridu and its temple presently consists of approximately 163 lines divided into eight kirugus. The gods Enlil and Damgalnuna (Enlil’s consort) grieve over their destroyed temples.

Typical of the Neo-Sumerian city laments, it is written predominantly in the emegir dialect. The lament seems to have been composed perhaps either during the reign of Išme-Dagon of Isin (1953-1934 BC) or during the reign of Nur-Adad of Larsa (1865-1849 BC), who (re)built a temple at Eridu for the god Enki.

2.7. Structure of the City Laments. Formally, each of the classic city laments is structured as extended stanzas that are marked off by the musical notation kirugu. Within these stanzas, thematic elements are developed (see Table 1).

2.8. Use of City Laments. There is some indication that the city laments may have been used

Table 1. Structure of Sumerian City Laments

Lament over Ur	Lament over Sumer and Ur	Lament over Nippur
I. Complaint of abandonment (kirugu 1; lines 1-39) II. Call to lament (kirugu 2; lines 40-76) III. Ningal's supplication to Nanna about "Storm" and its effects (kirugu 3-4; lines 77-172) IV. Description of devastation caused by "Storm" (kirugu 5-6; lines 173-253) V. Ningal's lament soliloquy (kirugu 7; lines 254-330) VI. Lament for Ningal (kirugu 8; lines 331-387) VII. Supplication to Nanna about "Storm" (kirugu 9-10; lines 388-417) VIII. Appeal to Nanna for restoration (kirugu 11; lines 418-436)	I. Detailed complaint about "Storm" and its effects (kirugu 1; lines 1-118) II. Complaint and lament of Sumerian cities (kirugu 2; lines 119-282) III. Complaint of Ur (kirugu 3; lines 283-339) IV. Complaint and supplication of Sin to Enlil (kirugu 4; lines 340-489) V. Appeal for restoration and imprecation (kirugu 5; lines 490-500+x+1)	I. Complaint of abandonment of city and temple (kirugu 1-3; lines 1-116) II. Call to lament (kirugu 4; lines 117-38) III. Appeal to Enlil to restore city (kirugu 5-7; lines 139-213) IV. Appeal to Enlil to restore Sumer and Akkad (kirugu 8; lines 214-46) V. Litany of restoration (kirugu 9; lines 247-62) VI. Description of restoration (kirugu 10-12; lines 263-323) liturgically for a time. For example, in the Curse of Agade, an oracle of the gods against the city because it had been defiled, we read,

The old women who survived those days,
The old men who survived those days,
The chief lamentation singer [gala] who survived those days,
For seven days and seven nights, Put in place seven balag-drums, as if they stood at heaven's base, and Played ub, meze and lilis-drums for him
[Enlil] among them [the balags].
The old women did not restrain [the cry]
"Alas my city!"
The old men did not restrain [the cry] "Alas its people!"
The lamentation singer [gala] did not restrain [the cry]
"Alas the Ekur [the god Enlil's 'House like a mountain']!"
Its young women did not restrain from tear
ing their hair,
Its young men did not restrain their sharp knives. (lines 196-206)

Another clue to liturgical use is the division of these compositions into liturgical or musical sections, each designated *ki-ru-gu*₂.

In some cases, it appears that lament played a liturgical role in the aftermath of destruction. It was a means of coping with grief. However, there is reason to believe that, for at least some of these city laments, the occasion of their observance was the dedication of the rebuilt city and temple. The lament was a cry for the deity to return home and prosper its subject city. There is no indication that these city laments were used in annual rites of commemoration.

3. The Eršemma, Balag and Šuilla Laments.

3.1. Eršemma. In the aftermath of the fall of the third dynasty of Ur, the center of power shifted roughly seventy-five miles to the northwest to the city-state of Isin, now controlled by Išbi-Irra. Thus the Isin dynasty was established. It flourished c. 2000-1800 BC Eventually the Isin dynasty collapsed under pressure from a developing dynasty at Larsa, just twenty-two miles northwest of Ur. This development was the subject of several eršemma lamentations.

The eršemma, which is supposed to mean "crying" of the šem-drum or tambourine, apparently receives its name from the practice of reciting this type of composition to the accompaniment of that instrument. It does not make reference to any specific disaster; rather, it seems suited for liturgical use.

3.2. Balag. During the first millennium BC, the eršemma laments are found alongside another type of composition, the balag. The balag apparently took its name from the fact that it was chanted to the accompaniment of a harp or lyre-type instrument called balag. The balag compositions tended to be rather general in their descriptions of the troubles. Rather than memorializing a disaster, they seem to be intended to assuage the wrath of the gods, as they were used liturgically. These first-millennium laments were bilingual Sumerian/Akkadian, but they lacked the literary flourish of the classical city laments.

3.3. Šuilla. The šuilla prayers represent another lament subgenre. They took their name from the gesture of “lifting the hands” when these laments were recited or prayed. Most of the extant šuilla laments are bilingual Sumerian/Akkadian as well.

3.4. Structure of Eršemma and Balag Laments. The structure of *eršemma*s that have been discovered from the Old Babylonian period appear to be indicated by the use of a repetend rather than the kirugu notation. First-millennium *eršemma*s may have two or three components. These were marked not by the kirugu notation but rather by a heavy line in the clay tablet that separated one section from another.

First-millennium *eršemma*s were commonly associated with the balag compositions in the liturgy. But the balags used the kirugu notations common to the city laments. There seem to be two main forms of balag laments. One type expresses a complaint and an appeal for restoration; the other type adds praise.

4. Summary.

The expression of pain and grief is formalized in the ancient Near Eastern laments, and the gods are confronted over their role in the calamity. The laments may speak of a divine decree that stands behind the calamity. The decree is described as a tremendous storm surge that cannot be stopped or deflected but rather devastates everything in its path.

Secondarily, the antagonist of the lamentation may be a foreign enemy whose attacks are decried. But even here, the gods may be taken to task for merely standing by as the catastrophe occurred, in essence abandoning their city and people to the foe. The laments recount the resulting devastation to the material culture as well as to the society. Families are torn apart. Justice is lost. And the laments complain that religious institutions are devastated as well, and that “light in darkness is overwhelmed.” It is typical of the Mesopotamian laments to protest that the calamity was undeserved: the people are likened to an innocent ewe, at least as compared with the rapacious enemy.

Apart from the classical city laments, an element of praise is found in many of the lamentations, especially the eršemma. The expressed desire of the community is that the gods will hear the lament, be pacified and reconciled to their people, and restore the city to its former glory.

See also LAMENT, PSALMS OF; LAMENTATIONS 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Cohen, Balag-Compositions: Sumerian Lamentation Liturgies of the Second and First Millennium B.C. (SANE 1/2; Malibu, CA: Undena, 1974); idem, Sumerian Hymnology: the Eršemma (HUCASup 2; Cincinnati: Hebrew Union College, 1981); idem, The Canonical Lamentations of Ancient Mesopotamia (2 vols.; Potomac, MD: Capital Decisions, 1988); J. Cooper, The Curse of Agade (JHNES; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983); F. Dobbs-Allsopp, Weep, O Daughter of Zion: A Study of the City-Lament Genre in the Hebrew Bible (BibOr 44; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1993); P. Ferris, The Genre of Communal Lament in the Bible and the Ancient Near East (SBLDS 127; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992); M. Green, “Eridu in Sumerian Literature,” Ph.D. diss., University of Chicago, 1975; idem, “The Eridu Lament,” JCS 30 (1978) 127-67; idem, “The Uruk Lament,” JAOS 104 (1984) 253-79; S. Kramer, Lamentation over the Destruction of Ur (AS12; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1940); R. Kutscher, Oh Angry Sea (a-ab-ba- hu-luh-ha): The History of a Sumerian Congregational Lament (YNER 6; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1975); P. Michalowski, The Lamentation over the Destruction of Sumer and Ur (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989); J. Morgenstern, Rites of Birth, Marriage, Death and Kindred Occasions among the Semites (Cincinnati: Hebrew Union College, 1966); S. Tinney, The Nippur Lament: Royal Rhetoric and Divine Legitimation in the Reign of Isme-Dagon of Isin (1953-1935 B.C.) (Occasional Publications of the Samuel Noah Kramer Fund 16; Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Museum, 1996).

P. Ferris

LAMENTATIONS 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

Jewish interpretive traditions regarding the book of Lamentations connect the book loosely with the prophet Jeremiah. Both the Aramaic version (*Targum) of Lamentations (Tg. Lam.) and the rabbinic midrash (Lamentations Rabbah) are concerned to demonstrate Yahweh's justice in dealing with Jerusalem and to establish the extrabiblical significance of Jeremiah's prophecies in their exegesis of the canonical book. Although no commentary on the book of Lamentations as extensive as those derived from Jewish traditions has survived from before the ninth century AD, Christian interpretive traditions regarding the book seem to have associated it with the prophet Jeremiah from a very early time, possibly as a result of earlier Jewish exegesis. The tradition is by no means monolithic, but the major interpretive shift introduced by the rise of Christianity has been to understand the extrabiblical significance of Lamentations primarily in regard to Jesus, and only as a function of those correspondences to ask after the book's significance in other areas. Critical scholarship treats the book of Lamentations as an essentially human text and is primarily concerned with questions of provenance and literary analysis. On theological matters, the critical interpretive tradition has very little to say about the extrabiblical significance of Lamentations and focuses instead on attempts to describe the historical and theological developments with Judah during the sixth century BC that might have given rise to the work.

1. Jewish Interpretive Traditions
2. Christian Interpretive Traditions
3. Critical Interpretation

1. Jewish Interpretive Traditions.

As stated above, Jewish interpretive traditions regarding the book of Lamentations connect it closely with the prophet Jeremiah. Both Targum Lamentations and Lamentations Rabbah are concerned to demonstrate Yahweh's justice in dealing with Jerusalem and to establish the extrabiblical significance of Jeremiah's prophecies in their exegesis of the canonical book. (Gwaltney refers to the latter impulse as "the prophecy-fulfillment mode of interpretation.") Although the entire body of Jewish reflection on the book of Lamentations is too extensive to treat in this article, much of what will be left unsaid about the topic in what follows could be shown to fit under one or both of these principles.

1.1. Targum. No settled date has been established for the completion Targum Lamentations. Based on the late date of extant manuscripts and the mixed linguistic character of the texts that have been preserved, it is likely that no precise dating is possible, although historical references in the work suggest that the Targum cannot have been compiled in its final form before the beginning of the Hasmonean period.

In many respects, Targum Lamentations is less a translation of the Hebrew text than a new presentation of its content in explicitly Deuteronomistic terms. In particular, Targum Lamentations is at pains to justify Jerusalem's destruction as a result of God's righteous judgment against sin. The author shows no real evidence of being troubled by a need to provide direct, one-to-one linguistic parallels for the MT of Lamentations, as long as the larger objective is met. Examples of this element within the work might easily be multiplied, but Targum Lamentations 1:1 is perhaps as clear an indication of the work's general theological character as any:

Jeremiah the prophet and high priest told how it was decreed against Jerusalem and against her people that they were to be judged by exile and that they were to be mourned over—^ʿēykâ!—just as Adam and Eve were judged, who were driven from the Garden of Eden, and the Lord of Eternity mourned over them—^ʿēykâ! The divine attribute of justice testified, and spoke about the enormity of her sinfulness, and she was sent away. And because of (the sinfulness) that is in her midst, she will dwell by herself just as a man whose flesh is afflicted with a leprous plague (also) dwells alone. In this way, the city that was full of crowds and many people has been emptied of them, and she has become like a widow, and the one who was exalted among the nations, and the ruler over provinces that used to pay her tribute, has come to lowliness and (even) to (the point of) paying them a head-tax. (my translation)

Although the immediate justification for Yahweh's judgment against Jerusalem is expressed in relation to Israel's faithlessness upon entering the promised land (Tg. Lam. 1:2), Targum Lamentations' description of Israel's guilt is not limited to specific episodes from the biblical period. Other sins named as justifications for God's wrath include oppression of orphans and widows as well as excessive taxation of the children of Israel (Tg. Lam. 1:2), failure to keep the festivals prescribed by Yahweh (Tg. Lam. 1:4), transgressing the word of Yahweh (Tg. Lam. 1:20), ceremonial impurity and failure to keep Yahweh's commandments (Tg. Lam. 2:9, 17), killing priests and prophets (Tg. Lam. 2:20), and false prophecy (Tg. Lam. 3:13), many of which extend well outside the realm of biblical history. Similarly, the destruction of Jerusalem described in MT Lamentations is also presented in terms of both biblical and extrabiblical historical events. Thus, both Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of Jerusalem (Tg. Lam. 1:2) and the conquest of the land by Titus and Vespasian (Tg. Lam. 1:9) are presented as the subject matter actually under consideration in the biblical text. In this way, the author of Targum Lamentations uses the basic hermeneutical principles that we have noted to express what he perceives as the broader historical and theological significance of the Hebrew Vorlage: God's righteous anger over sin justifies the destruction of Jerusalem described in Lamentations, as well as the various struggles experienced by Yahweh's people throughout all of recorded history, for entirely interchangeable reasons.

1.2. Rabbinic Midrash. Lamentations Rabbah is an exegetical compilation of interpretive statements made by various Jewish scholars of the Tannaitic and Amoraic periods (a time span of AD 200 to 600). It expounds the MT of Lamentations verse by verse, and sometimes word by word. The teachings included in the work have been culled from other sources, including the Jerusalem Talmud, Genesis Rabbah and Leviticus Rabbah, and do not include a mention of any sage known to have been alive after the fourth century AD. Formally, the book is divided into thirty-six petita'ot (corresponding to the numerical value of the first word of the Hebrew text) and five parashiyyot (corresponding to the five chapters of MT Lamentations).

Although it is true that Lamentations Rabbah does not present a smooth propositional explanation of the biblical text, J. Neusner has shown that it is possible to discern some interpretive structure within the collection and to identify several key points in its overall theology. As with Targum Lamentations, rabbinic midrash relating to the MT of Lamentations reflects a deep desire to show the justice of God's judgment against Jerusalem and to portray God's wrath against sin as an ongoing reality in the experience of his people. In the rabbinic exegesis of Lamentations, however, this agenda is accompanied by an increased emphasis on God's corresponding compassion and mercy, as well as the opportunity for repentance and reconciliation in the aftermath of divine chastisement. Thus, in its approach to Lamentations 1:22 (MT: "Let all their evil doing come before you, and deal with them as you have dealt with me because of all my transgressions, for my groans are many and my heart is faint."), Parashah 1 of Lamentations Rabbah records the following statements:

When they sinned in double measure, they were smitten in double measure, but they were comforted in double measure.

When they sinned in double measure: "Jerusalem has committed a sin," (Lam 1:8)

... they were smitten in double measure: "that she has received from Yahweh's hand double for all her sins," (Is 40:2)

... but they were comforted in double measure: "Comfort, comfort, my people," says your God. ("Speak tenderly to the heart of Jerusalem and cry to her that her warfare is ended, that her iniquity is pardoned, that she has received from Yahweh double for all her sins"). (Is 40:1-2)

As this quotation suggests, the interpretive program of Lamentations Rabbah is carried out by means of extensive reference to other portions of the Hebrew Bible. In this respect, the rabbinic midrash on Lamentations is more narrowly exegetical than Targum Lamentations, although the interpretive assumptions and objectives remain very much the same. What this quotation does not make clear is the frequency with which the rabbinic exegetes use extrabiblical historical references to help make sense of the judgments pronounced against Jerusalem in the book of Lamentations. For example, Parashah 2 of Lamentations Rabbah specifically identifies numerous postbiblical events related to the Bar Kokhba rebellion as having some direct bearing on the text of Lamentations and its ongoing historical significance.

1.3. Jewish Liturgical Use of Lamentations.

Largely as a function of the interpretive traditions that we have just observed, selections from Lamentations are read on the Ninth of Av (July-August, according to the modern calendar), on which date Judaism commemorates not only the destruction of the temple described in Lamentations but also the destruction of the second temple, the end of the Bar Kokhba rebellion and the plowing over of Jerusalem by the Romans.

2. Christian Interpretive Traditions.

AS stated above, although no commentary on the book of Lamentations as extensive as those derived from Jewish traditions has survived from before the ninth century AD, Christian interpretive traditions regarding the book seem to have associated it with the prophet Jeremiah from a very early time, possibly as a result of earlier Jewish exegesis. The tradition is by no means monolithic, but the major interpretive shift introduced by the rise of Christianity has been to understand the extrabiblical significance of Lamentations primarily in regard to Jesus, and only as a function of those correspondences to ask after the book's significance in other areas. Practically speaking, this new approach to Scripture seems to have deemphasized sustained interaction with the text in all of its particulars, particularly in the early church, in favor of a more selective search for specific data points that could be used to support a particular line of reasoning or address a single, specific set of circumstances.

2.1. Early Church. Among the surviving documents produced by the early church, various passages from the book of Lamentations are quoted, although no commentaries on the complete text are now known to be extant. Taken together, the early church's uses of Lamentations are remarkably limited, both with respect to the variety of passages that seem to have attracted attention and in terms of the specific purposes for which the book of Lamentations appears to have been considered appropriate. By far the most popular verse of Lamentations used in these writings is the LXX version of Lamentations 4:20:

Pneuma prosōpou hēmōn, christos kyriou, syn-elēmphthē en tais diaphthorais autōn hou eipā men, En tē skia autou zēsometha en tois ethnesin

The breath of our nostrils, the Lord's anointed one, was caught in their destructions, of whom we said, "In his shadow we shall live among the Gentiles."

Given the presence of the Greek word christos (= māšiah ["anointed one"] in the MT), this passage was explicitly identified as a reference to Jesus Christ by the church fathers and was put to considerable use, especially in apologetic discussions. Use of the Greek word pneuma (= rūah ["breath, wind, spirit"] in the MT) also seems to have been highly suggestive for the church fathers. Given the prevalence of LXX Lamentations 4:20 in patristic exegesis of the book, a few representative citations will be useful in demonstrating the distinctly Christian turn in the history of interpretation during this time (translations are from Ante-Nicene Fathers and series 1 and 2 of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers).

(1) Irenaeus, Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching (71): "And in another place, Jeremiah says: 'The Spirit of our face, the Lord Christ'; and 'he was taken in their snares, of whom we said under His shadow we shall live among the Gentiles.' That, being the Spirit of God, Christ was to become a suffering man the Scripture declares, and is, as it were, amazed and astonished at His sufferings, that in such manner, He was to endure sufferings 'under whose shadow we said that we should live.' And by 'shadow,' he means His body. For just as a shadow is made by a body, so also Christ's body was made by His Spirit."

(2) Rufinus, A Commentary on the Apostles' Creed, in the context of defending Christ's death and resurrection: "But they who boast themselves of the knowledge of the Law will say to us, 'You blaspheme in saying that the Lord was subjected to the corruption of death and to the suffering of the cross.' Read therefore what you find written in the Lamentations of Jeremiah: 'The Spirit of our countenance, Christ the Lord, was taken in our corruptions, of whom we said, we shall live under His shadow among the nations.' Thou hearest how the prophet says that Christ the Lord was taken, and for us, that is for our sins, was delivered to corruption. Under whose shadow, since the people of the Jews have continued in unbelief, he says the gentiles lie, because we live not in Israel but among the gentiles."

(3) Basil, On the Spirit, in the context of asserting the divinity of the Holy Spirit: "It is at all events possible for us to arrive to a certain extent at an intelligent apprehension of the sublimity of His nature and of His unapproachable power by looking at the meaning of His title, and at the magnitude of His operations, and by His good gifts bestowed on us, or rather on all creation. He is called Spirit, as 'God is a Spirit,' and 'the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord.'"

Other passages from Lamentations attested among the writings of the early church include Lamentations 1:1; 1:2; 1:4; 1:8; 1:16; 1:20; 2:1-2; 3:28; 3:31-32, 34; 3:53. Among these, Lamentations 3:34 ("To crush under his feet all the prisoners of the land") and Lamentations 3:53 ("They have cut off my life in the pit and have laid a stone upon me") have also been put to explicitly christocentric use by Mehodius (seven times) and Rufinus (A Commentary on the Apostles' Creed). The rest are generally employed in various reflections on individual suffering and repentance (Lam 1:2, 4, 16, 20; Ambrose Concerning Repentance [book 2, chap. 6]; Lam 1:8; Clement of Alexandria The Teacher [book 1, chap. 9]; Lam 3:31-32, 34; Ambrose Concerning Repentance [book 1, chap. 5]) or are used to comment on events from the history of the early church in some way (Lam 1:1: Gregory of Nazianzus On Athanasius; Lam 1:4: Gregory of Nyssa Funeral Oration on Meletius; Lam 2:1-2: Eusebius Church History [book 8, chap. 1]; Lam 3:28: Gregory of Nazianzus Second Oration).

2.2. Medieval and Reformation Commentaries. This period in the history of interpretation for the book of Lamentations covers an enormous body of literature that cannot be examined in detail here. For the most part, these exegetes seem to have been concerned with citing and maintaining the general trajectories of interpretation drawn by the early church. Early versions of complete commentaries on the book by Hrbanus Maurus and Paschius Radbertus are still extant and will give some idea of the character of medieval exegesis (see Matter), while Calvin's commentary is indicative of the shift toward something closer to modern historical-critical interpretation that came about during the late Middle Ages and the Reformation.

2.2.1. Hrbanus Maurus. As with previous exegetes in both the Christian and Jewish traditions, Maurus comments on Lamentations in direct connection with the prophecy of Jeremiah. He draws from the few patristic commentaries available to him, although the bulk of the work appears to have been the product of his own reflection on the book. Maurus tends to downplay the historical significance of the text in favor of a reading that can be applied in much broader terms, so that the city of Jerusalem represents the individual soul, while the overall narrative of Lamentations portrays the soul's confrontation with sin.

2.2.2. Paschasius Radbertus. Radbertus is responsible for the first standalone treatment of the book in the Latin tradition. The preface is an excursus on the theological significance of mourning. In Radbertus's interpretation the book Lamentations is presented as the theological and devotional counterpart to Song of Songs. The former is a description of the suffering brought about by God's abandonment, while the latter expresses the blessed state of those who enjoy God's care and protection. Drawing heavily from Hrbanus, as well as numerous biblical passages that he understands as relevant to the text of Lamentations, Radbertus explicates the book in terms of the past, present and future destruction of Jerusalem, the church and the individual soul.

2.2.3. John Calvin. Later in the Middle Ages, historical and grammatical analysis came to be viewed as the proper foundation for biblical interpretation, upon which all legitimate readings must necessarily be based. Aquinas, in particular, was instrumental in thus separating literal and historical exegesis from spiritual and theological interpretation (see Smalley, 10-42). With respect to the history of interpretation for the book of Lamentations, John Calvin's commentary is emblematic of this shift toward historical and philological inquiry as the primary focus of exegesis. Note, for example, the tone of the work's opening paragraph:

I undertake now to explain the Lamentations of Jeremiah. We must inquire when the book was composed by the Prophet, and also what was the object of the author. Grossly mistaken was Jerome, who thought that it is the elegy which Jeremiah composed on the death of Josiah; for we see nothing here that is suitable to that event. There is indeed mention made in one place of a king, but what is said there cannot be applied to Josiah; for he was never driven into exile, but was buried at Jerusalem with his fathers. From the whole contents of the book, we may justly conclude that it was written after the city was destroyed and the people taken into exile. (Calvin, 299)

It would be misleading to suggest that Calvin takes no interest in the spiritual and theological significance of the book of Lamentations, although these introductory statements are of a piece with the rest of his commentary. For confirmation of this, perhaps the best evidence is to observe his commentary on Lamentations 4:20, which was put to extensive christological use by earlier exegetes. In his commentary Calvin does not draw any explicit link from Lamentations 4:20 to the NT but rather is content to focus on the significance of that verse in relation to the historical fall of Jerusalem in 587 BC.

2.3. Christian Liturgical Use of Lamentations. In some liturgical traditions selections from the book of Lamentations are read during the Lenten season, on Maundy Thursday, Good Friday and Holy Saturday. As with Jewish liturgical uses of the book, this points out what is clearly a perception of the book's intimate connection with both corporate and personal penitence and reflection.

3. Critical Interpretation.

As stated above, critical scholarship treats the book of Lamentations as an essentially human text and is primarily concerned with questions of provenance and literary analysis. On theological matters, the critical interpretive tradition has very little to say about the extrabiblical significance of Lamentations and focuses instead on attempts to describe the historical and theological developments with Judah during the sixth century BC that might have given rise to the work. In some sense, it may seem artificial to lump all commentaries produced since the Reformation together under the heading "critical commentaries." This is particularly true when the heading has been explicitly distinguished from "Christian interpretation," since many of the exegetes who have written during this time period perhaps considered themselves to fall within the Christian religious tradition. Nevertheless, it is true that much of the methodology employed in recent times has been shaped by critical assumptions about Scripture, and, as P. House has suggested (Garrett and House, 278-81), this has led to a sharp decline in explicitly Christian reflection on the significance of Lamentations, either in theological or devotional terms.

3.1. Criticism and the Fragmentation of Lamentations. The basic assumptions of critical studies include a suspicion about the authority of religious tradition as a guide to interpretation and a commitment to the idea that any work of Scripture is essentially the same as any other humanly produced work of literature. This approach to the book of Lamentations has brought with it a number of changes in the interpretation of the book. To begin with, the book's close association with the prophet Jeremiah has been almost universally set aside in favor of more agnostic approach to the question of authorship (the book itself does not actually ascribe authorship to Jeremiah). Along with this, questions of literary genre and observations about literary style have led to a reexamination of the book's basic literary unity as well as its possible connection with other similar literary texts from elsewhere in the ancient Near East. At the present time, the weight of critical scholarly opinion seems to be that the book of Lamentations is a work of mixed literary genre, probably written by several authors, with close affinities to both the *lament psalms of the Hebrew Bible and the city laments produced in both Babylonian and Assyrian cultures.

3.2. Expressions of Suffering and the Theology of Lamentations. As a purely literary text, the themes that dominate the text of Lamentations are plain enough. Among the most obvious are suffering and loss, the desire for some kind of meaning in the face of Jerusalem's destruction, and hope for future deliverance. Particularly since the second half of the twentieth century, interpreters have tried to establish what set of historical circumstances and theological vision best accounts for the various themes of Lamentations.

3.2.1. Gottwald. N. Gottwald has argued that the theological vision driving the book of Lamentations was the expectation of God's blessings in response to covenant keeping, an idea that he described as central to Deuteronomistic theology. For Gottwald, this Deuteronomistic expectation of blessing would have been operative in Jerusalem around 587 BC as a result of the Josianic reforms, only to be directly contradicted by the historical reality of Jerusalem's destruction at the hands of foreign invaders. This conflict between faith and experience, he suggested, would have given rise to the kind of religious questioning depicted in Lamentations. There is much to be commended in Gottwald's work, but his view of the theological foundation for the book of Lamentations has been subject to a number of criticisms, many of which were first articulated by B. Albrektson in 1963.

3.2.2. Albrektson. In response to Gottwald's view of the theology of Lamentations, B. Albrektson makes two central arguments. First, judging from the text of Lamentations, Albrektson argues that the reforms of King Josiah do not appear to have created among Judah's inhabitants anything like the expectation of blessing that Gottwald has in mind. Instead, he points out that there is another aspect of Deuteronomistic theology—the expectation of judgment against covenant-breakers—already on display in the text itself (see Lam 1:5, 8, 18). Second, Albrektson argues that the expectation of divine protection, which he agrees is present in Lamentations, is better understood as a function of *Zion theology, first developed by earlier authors in the Psalter (see Ps 46:6-8; 48:2-9; 76:2-7, 13). Thus Albrektson sees not a single central point but rather two foci: the Deuteronomistic assurance of judgment against covenant-breakers and the psalmists' confidence in the inviolability of Zion as the theological principles that hold the themes and content of the book of Lamentations together.

